"Which way do you think of getting back to London?"

"We must walk, I suppose."

"So do I. But I mean which way shall we take?"

Blueskin considered a moment.

"If we go on a little further," he said, "we shall get into the Edgware-road, and I fancy if we turn down that, it will be our nearest and best way."

"It will certainly be the contrary one to that taken by Jonathan Wild."

"I know it, and that is one of the reasons why I think it will be best."

"Let us make our way there, then. You are sure this lane will take us out into the Edgware-road?"

"Quite sure. I know exactly whereabouts we are."

"That is all right, then."

Our two friends having scrambled through the hedge, proceeded along the lane as Blueskin advised.

All was quite still around them, and they met with nothing that pointed to the presence of Jonathan Wild, which confirmed them in their supposition that he had made his way straight back to London.

Every moment then served to give them fresh confidence.

At length they came to where the lane terminated in the Edgware-road.

Blueskin notified this fact to his companion, who said—

"We have got a fair chance now, so let us try if we cannot ascertain what sort of a booty we have got, for I can assure you I am very anxious to know."

"It is dark, and we may have some trouble."

"Never mind the trouble. Let us set down on this bank, and try to form an estimate of it."

Blueskin complied.

"There is a watch," he said, "and one or two other little things of not much value."

"Never mind them; there is a bag, is there not?"

"Yes; but it is neither so large nor so heavy as I should have wished."

As he spoke Blueskin took from his pocket the bag of money he had robbed the traveller of.

"If it is all gold," he said, "it won't be such a bad night's work; but, from the feel of some of the coins, I am sadly afraid it is silver."

"Don't say that."

"However, we shall soon know."

The string which secured the purse was untied, and then, turning it upside down, Blueskin poured the contents into his hand.

His presentiment was realized.

It was nearly all silver, and at the outside the aggregate amount of the whole did not exceed five pounds.

This was a bitter disappointment to Jack, who reflected upon the peril they had incurred, and the narrow escape they had had to procure such a paltry sum.

He could not forbear expressing his disappointment to Blueskin.

"Why, supposing we avoid capture, which is not very likely while Jonathan is in his present mood, how long will it take to get together the sum we require?"

"But, Jack, that would not be a fair way to reckon; because we have been unlucky to-night, that is no reason why we always should be."

"I don't like the plan, Blue. I am sure it will not answer. With the power he has at his command, Jonathan Wild will take such measures that it will be utterly impos sible for us to avoid capture at his hands, and then what would become of Edgworth Bess. She would be left alone and helpless in that villain's hands."

"Get up, Jack. Let us walk along the road and talk a little. You are taking to-night's failure too much to heart, I am sure you are."

"I am not, Blueskin. Take my word for it, we have gone the wrong way to work."

"Can you suggest any better scheme?"

"Not just this moment I cannot."

"Well, think. If you can hit upon anything likely, I shall be glad enough to agree to it. But I do not know what else you could think of."

"Stop a minute."

"What is it?"

"A thought strikes me."

"Oh! is that all. I fancied you heard our pursuers."

"No—no. Blueskin."

"Yes, Jack."

"Do you recollect soon after our affair at the Grange you took me to a place of Wild's, at the Horseferry, Westminster."

"Yes."

"Where Jonathan keeps a good deal of swag?"

"Yes."

"Does he do so now?"

"That is more than I could exactly take upon myself to say. I daresay he does."

"Well, then."

"What would you do? Rob him?"

"Certainly."

"It is a good plan, Jack."

"I am glad you are of that opinion."

"My only wonder is that I did not think of it before."

"It is a wonder."

"But it will be a difficult piece of business."

"Never mind that."

"And we are more likely to fail than succeed."

"We can but try, Blue."

"That's true."

"We shall run no more risk than we did to-night."

"Well, no, I suppose not."

"And, Blueskin, we can almost make sure of taking at one stroke more than we require for our purpose, and it must stand to sense that the sooner we get the money, and have Bess safe out of Wild's power, the better it will be for everybody."

"I don't dispute that."

"Well, then, what have you to say against it?"

"Nothing."

"Well, then, I have nothing to say against it, having made the proposal."

"There is only one thing. It is just possible that Jonathan may have come to the conclusion that it is no longer a safe place to hold his treasures, and we may have all our trouble for nothing."

"We must run our risk of that."

"Come on, then."

"Did you think of making the attempt to-night?"

"Why not?"

"I have nothing to say against to-night, of course; the sooner the better, I say."

"Very well, then; I consider to-night offers a better chance than any."

"How so?"

"Jonathan will doubtless make his way straight home, under the conviction that we are hiding somewhere on or about Hampstead-heath, and he will wait until he hears something of us."

"I see."

"I would give a trifle if we had our horses back again. If we had I should gallop straight from here to the Horseferry, and, if possible, effect our purpose to-night. Then the following night, when Jonathan's attention is taken up with his loss, we will get into his house, and carry off Edgworth Bess."

"Oh! Blueskin, my friend, that does, indeed, sound like a plan that is feasible. Oh! if we could but be set down in Westminster this moment."

"It is folly to wish for impossibilities."

"So it is."

"We must use our wits, and hit upon some means of getting there with as little delay as possible."

"Do you know of any horses that we can hire hereabouts?"

"No, I do not; but I'll tell you what there is, though it would be running a great risk."

"Never mind the risk," said Jack, impetuously; "let us hear what it is that you have just thought of."

CHAPTER CCXV.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD MAKE THE BEST OF THEIR WAY TO LONDON.

"As I daresay you know, Jack," said Blueskin, "there is a coach which passes this way."

"Yes."

"Well, I think this is somewhere about the time it ought to pass. Now, suppose we take our places in it, and ride as far as Piccadilly."

"With all my heart."

"But do you think of the risk?"

"Never mind that."

"You are but fresh out of Newgate yet, recollect, and your name serves to fill every one's mouth. It would be rather awkward if we were to get into the coach and be recognised."

"So it would; but I think there will not be much danger myself."

"Why not?"

"Because the passengers, for the most part, will be people coming from a distance in the country, and they will not be likely to know much about my personal appearance."

"Well, there is something in that."

"The chief thing I am afraid of is, that if the coach does come by, there will not be a chance of our having a ride."

"How do you mean?"

"It will most likely be full."

"Oh! I don't know that. You see people are put down within short distances of London, so that there are vacant places."

"I hope there will be to-night."

"It is time the coach was here, but I can see nothing of it."

"Nor hear it."

"Walk on patiently."

"It may have gone."

"It may, but I hope not."

Just as he spoke, there arose upon the night air the clear ringing tones of the guard's horn, which he blew from time to time, in order that there should be no one on the road ignorant of the approach of the coach.

All smaller vehicles had to make way for it, for the ponderous machine, once in motion, was not easily turned aside or stopped.

"It's all right, Jack," said Blueskin; "here it comes."

Our two friends stood on one side, and waited anxiously for it to come up.

When it was some thirty yards from them, they began to shout, in order to attract the attention of the driver and the guard.

Their cries were heard, and the coach stopped.

"We want to go to London," said Blueskin, "if you have got a couple of seats vacant."

"All right, gemmen," said the guard, dismounting from his perch behind. "Just room for two inside, if that will do."

"First-rate," said Blueskin,

The coach-door was opened and our friends entered.

The passengers little thought who there was getting in to sit down beside them.

The door was shut.

The guard resumed his seat.

The driver cracked his whip, and off rolled the coach again.

The interior of the coach was only lighted by an oil lamp, which at the best of times only gave out a feeble illumination, but now it stood sadly in want of trimming, and burned with a greatly diminished brightness, while part of the glass was rendered quite opaque with smoke.

This was a state of things, however, which, though probably disagreeable to the other passengers, suited our two friends exceedingly well, since they had all the better chance of escaping observation.

The stopping of the coach roused all the passengers from the real or affected sleep into which they had fallen, and they gazed with listless curiosity at the new arrivals.

Accustomed as they were to a certain extent to the obscurity of the coach, they were able to see our friends pretty well, but it did not seem as though any one saw in their appearance anything suspicious or remarkable.

But they all seemed thoroughly awake.

"Are we far from London now, sir?" asked a clerical-looking personage, who sat next to the door, addressing himself to Blueskin.

"Not far, sir," replied our friend, without any reluctance or hesitation.

"About how far should you think, sir?"

"We shall reach Kilburn in a few minutes, and that, as I dare say you know, is a village about three miles from London."

"Thank you."

The conversation dropped.

Jack and Blueskin looked about them.

Besides the clerical gentleman we have incidentally alluded to, there were in the coach three other persons.

Two of these were females.

One had about her that nameless and indescribable something which proclaims the old maid.

The other was a young girl about nineteen years of age.

As for the one other passenger who remains undescribed, he was a man rather tall and stout, and attired in the very height of fashion.

He leaned back in the coach, with an assumed aristocratic air, and eyed the new comers superciliously.

"Pon honour," said this individual, in an affected drawing tone of voice, addressing the young lady alluded to. "Pon honour. Very extraordinary, indeed! I quite expected we should have been attacked by highwaymen before we got to the end of our journey; but it don't look much like it, I confess."

"La! sir," said the old maid, "pray don't talk about highwaymen—pray don't. It makes me all in a dither."

"All in what, ma'am?"

"Miss, sir, if you please."

"Oh! indeed. 'Pon honour. Very extraordinary," were the ejaculations uttered by the coxcombical-looking personage.

"Have you ever been stopped by highwaymen, sir?"

"I should rather think so, indeed. Good that. 'Pon honour. Very extraordinary."

This was rather an ambiguous reply, and might mean anything or nothing.

But Jack, who found it a relief to get rid of his own thoughts, came to a tolerable correct idea of the character of this person.

He determined to get something out of him, if he could.

"Excuse me, sir," he said, politely, "but the question that young lady asked you rather interests me."

"Does it, indeed. 'Pon honour."

"It does, sir. Was I right in understanding you to say that you had been robbed by highwaymen?"

"Yes, rather—at least, not robbed. 'Pon honour—not robbed—stopped, you know. 'Pon honour, I should like to see the highwayman that would rob me."

"Indeed, sir."

"Yes; why, if you'll believe me, sir—and I tell you this in confidence—without the slightest exception, highwaymen are the greatest cowards on the face of the earth."

"Is it possible," said Jack.

"Yes—'pon honour. Just show them a firm face, and they will run away—'pon honour, run away."

"You quite surprise me, sir."

"'Pon honour; very extraordinary."

"Would it be troubling you too much to give some account of your stoppage by highwaymen?"

"'Pon honour—which one?"

"Which one, sir?"

"Yes; which stoppage do you mean?"

"The one you mentioned just now."

"Oh! yes; 'pon honour. But I have been stopped so many times that I could not think for a moment which time you meant."

"I mean any one, sir. Perhaps you would give us the most remarkable one."

"'Pon honour; very extraordinary; but they were all most remarkable."

"You interest me more and more, sir; but if, as you say, they were all most remarkable, you will not have the trouble of making a selection."

"'Pon honour, no."

"Perhaps you would not mind favouring me with the first that comes to your recollection?"

"'Pon honour; no. I recollect"—

"No, no; please to don't," said the old maid, whose phraseology seemed as peculiar as her personal appearance; "I declare I am all of a dither."

"All of a what, ma'am?" asked the fop again.

"Miss, sir, if you please."

"'Pon honour; ten thousand pardons. Very extraordinary."

And here the subject would have dropped, but Jack determined to persevere.

"I am sorry to trouble you so much," he said, after a pause, "but, really, I feel so curious that"—

"'Pon honour, yes. I was going to tell you. Very extraordinary."

"The encounter, sir?"

"Yes, 'pon honour. Did you ever happen to hear of Jack Sheppard?"

"I have heard something of him," said Jack, coolly. "He's a most audacious chap, is he not? I mean the one who has broken twice out of Newgate."

"Pho!—pho! my dear sir, 'pon honour. You don't mean to say that you are a believer in that little fiction, are you?"

"To which little fiction do you allude, sir?"

"'Pon honour. Very extraordinary. I mean the fiction of Jack Sheppard being a brave chap, and having broken twice out of Newgate."

"I must confess, sir, that until you spoke, I was under the impression that these fictions were reality."

"Very extraordinary, 'pon honour. All a fiction. Why, Jack Sheppard never broke out of Newgate at all."

"Indeed," said Jack, "then I must have been sadly misinformed."

"There are more besides yourself, sir; but I happen to be in possession of the facts of the case."

"May I inquire what they are?"

"'Pon honour. Very extraordinary. Jack Sheppard and the governor of Newgate"—

"Yes—yes."

"'Pon honour. Very extraordinary. But they are firm friends, leagued together, and work into each other's hands."

"Can it be possible?"

"'Pon honour, yes. Very extraordinary."

"Very extraordinary, sir, indeed. But the best of all understandings exists between the governor and Jack Sheppard."

"Do you know the nature of that understanding, sir?"

"'Pon honour, yes. Very extraordinary."

"Is it indeed, sir?"

"'Pon honour. I tell it you in confidence. Jack Sheppard pays the governor of Newgate a certain sum of money every month, and so he is allowed to walk in and out of Newgate whenever he likes."

"It's really the most extraordinary thing that ever I heard of."

CHAPTER CCXVI.

JACK SHEPPARD HAS RATHER AN AMUSING ADVENTURE WITH THE BOASTING TRAVELLER IN THE COACH.

"'Pon honour, yes. Very extraordinary. Mind you, I tell you this in confidence. If it was known, why, of course, the governor of Newgate would lose his situation."

"Of course he would, sir, as you say."

"'Pon honour, yes. So it does not matter for being taken prisoner one bit. By virtue of the arrangement I have mentioned, Jack Sheppard can walk out of Newgate whenever he pleases."

"How awful!" said the old maid. "If you'll believe me, sir, when I think of him and his doings I go all of a dither."

"All of a what, ma'am?"

"Miss, sir, if you please."

"'Pon honour, yes. Ten thousand pardons! Very extraordinary."

Neither Jack nor Blueskin could refrain from smiling at this ridiculous and ludicrous scene.

But Jack was determined not to quit the subject.

"As you have remarked, sir," he said, "it is really very extraordinary, but something has continually interrupted you in the little anecdote you were kind enough to promise to give me."

"'Pon honour, yes. Very extraordinary, but is always the case; somebody interrupts me, and so I never finish what I begin."

"Just so, sir; but we will endeavour not to interrupt you this time. You began talking about Jack Sheppard, if my memory serves me rightly, as though he was the person who stopped you on the highway, when you broke off to tell me the extraordinary arrangement he had made with the governor of Newgate."

"'Pon honour, yes."

"I should think that circumstance exempts him from the charge you made against highwaymen a little while ago."

"'Pon honour, sir, I forget. What?"

"You said that highwaymen were the most cowardly set of fellows in existence."

"'Pon honour, sir; very extraordinary—but I assure you they are. I think I told you that in confidence, sir, did I not?"

"You did, sir."

"'Pon honour: yes."

"But since Jack Sheppard feels that he has nothing to dread from capture that makes him an exception to the rest."

"'Pon honour; do you mean being a coward?"

"Yes, sir; I should think, under such advantageous circumstances, he must be brave."

"'Pon honour, sir; very extraordinary. But he is positively the greatest coward of the lot."

"What, Jack Sheppard?"

"'Pon honour; yes. I tell you in confidence, but he is the greatest coward of the lot."

"How do you account for that sir?"

"'Pon honour, sir, I don't know. Very extraordinary, but I was going to tell you"—

"A little anecdote of your encounter with highwaymen?"

"On! pray don't use that horrid word," interposed the old maid again; "you don't know how it sends me all of a dither."

"'Pon honour, ma'am."

"Miss, sir."

"Very extraordinary; 'pon honour, miss, but would you oblige me by telling me what you mean by being all of a dither."

"Does that matter to you, sir?"

"'Pon honour; yes. Very extraordinary, but for the last half hour I have been trying to tell this young gentleman an anecdote, when, through your being in a dither, I have not done so yet. Now, 'pon honour, very extraordinary, you know, but would you tell me what is a dither?"

"A dither, sir?"

"Yes, a dither."

"A dither, sir, is a sort of a—kind of a—you know what I mean."

"'Pon honour, ma'am"—

"Miss, sir."

"A million pardons, miss; I don't know what you mean; I only wish I did. What is a dither?"

"A dither is a—a—a—a"—

"Yes—yes."

"A dither."

"Oh! a dither, is a dither."

"Yes, sir."

"Oh! indeed. 'Pon honour. Very extraordinary."

"I must beg your pardon for persevering, but all these provoking interruptions have inflamed my curiosity to a most incredible extent, and, therefore I do hope, sir, you will not allow your attention to be diverted by any interruption, but tell me the particulars at once."

"'Pon honour, yes. Very extraordinary. But, in confidence, if you'll believe me, I almost forget what I was going to say. Oh! I know; it was about Jack Sheppard."

"Yes, sir. I believe you said that highwaymen were the greatest cowards on earth, and Jack Sheppard was the greatest coward among highwaymen."

"Pon honour, yes."

"And you were going to give me an instance of his cowardice."

"Pon honour, yes. Very extraordinary. I recollect now quite well. I do hope no one will interrupt me."

"Proceed, sir, if you please."

"Pon honour, yes. Very extraordinary. But about two months ago I was coming from Uxbridge."

"It was night, sir, I presume."

"Pon honour, yes. Very extraordinary. But I had been to a party, and was coming home. I was mounted on a most magnificent bay horse, sir. 'Pon honour, magnificent. I gave three hundred guineas for him,' 'pon honour. Well, sir. Very extraordinary. But I was mounted on this magnificent bay horse, coming home from a party I had been to at Edgware."

"You said Uxbridge, sir."

"Pon honour, yes. Very extraordinary. But I meant Uxbridge when I said Edgware. It was a lapsus lingue, sir. Talking of lapsus lingue, reminds me that—"

"Yes—yes; but what happened as you were coming home from the party at Uxbridge."

"Pon honour, yes. Very extraordinary. But when I had got about half-way home at least a dozen men, all mounted and armed, rode out suddenly from the shadow of the hedge row and surrounded me."

The old maid uttered a faint scream.

"A dozen men," said Jack.

"Pon honour, yes. 'Your money or your life!' cried one. 'Don't dally with me, I am Jack Sheppard! Your money or your life!'"

"It was Jack Sheppard who said that?"

"Pon honour, yes."

"And he was supported by eleven men?"

"Pon honour, yes. Eleven men, at the very least."

"And pray, sir, what did you do, then, sir?"

"Pon honour. Very extraordinary, but I knew what cowards this Jack Sheppard and all other highwaymen were, so what do you think I did?"

"Really, sir, I am unable to say."

"Pon honour. Mind, in confidence, I'll tell you. As soon as I found who they were, I determined to show fight, when I all at once recollected that I had only got one pistol with me, and that was unloaded."

"Very awkward that, sir."

"Pon honour, no."

"No!"

"No, for, very extraordinary, I knew what cowards the fellows were."

"What did you do, sir?"

"Pon honour, sir. I drew this empty pistol, and, very extraordinary, never put it on full-cock, and cried, 'Turn, you villains, and fly, or I will be the death of every one of you!'"

"That was a very valorous speech, sir, and did you great credit. At any rate, it shows that you were not a coward."

"Pon honour, no."

"What did the highwaymen do?"

"Very extraordinary. But no sooner did I produce the pistol, and speak in the manner I told you, than seeing my determined manner, they turned and fled."

"What, all the twelve?"

"Pon honour, yes. Very extraordinary. All the twelve."

"They must have been cowards for a dozen of them to fly from one man. Did not Jack Sheppard make any defence?"

"Pon honour, no. Very extraordinary, but I believe he was the first to turn and fly."

"No—no."

"Pon honour. He was the greatest coward of all the lot, as I told you."

"So you said, sir."

"Very extraordinary."

"I should think it was an extraordinary sight, sir?"

"Pon honour, yes. One man chasing twelve."

"Then did you chase them when they turned and fled?"

"Pon honour, yes. There was I—one man—with an unloaded pistol, chasing them."

"And they made no effort to attack you?"

"Pon honour, no. They never thought of such a thing. Very extraordinary. But I made up my mind I would drive them all to Newgate like a flock of sheep."

"Did you indeed, sir?"

"Pon honour, yes."

"And how did you succeed in your attempt?"

"Very extraordinary. I'll tell you; but mind it's in confidence. Of course we were in the country, twenty miles from town, so I had a long job before me."

"Excuse me, sir, but didn't you say at first that the attack was made upon you when you were about half-way between London and Uxbridge?"

"Pon honour; yes. Very extraordinary."

"So I think, indeed, if Uxbridge is forty miles from London."

"Pon honour, yes; but that is an immaterial point in the story."

"No, no."

"Pon honour, yes; I tell you, I was chasing these twelve highwaymen along the high-road to Newgate, and every one of the knaves were nearly frightened out of their wits, when—"

At this moment the coach stopped with a sudden jerk, and the trampling of horses' feet ensued.

The boasting fop looked rather agast; and when Jack said, "I'll wager my life that is Jack Sheppard who has stopped the coach!" he uttered a howl of dismay, while he made a frantic effort to get under one of the seats.

He dived down just where the old maid sat who was all in a dither.

In a second all that could be seen of him were his legs, which stuck out most ridiculously from underneath her petticoats.

CHAPTER CCXVII.

JONATHAN WILD, WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF QUILT ARNOLD PERFORMS A VERY DISAGREEABLE BUT NECESSARY DUTY.

CURSING Jack Sheppard—cursing Blueskin—cursing himself—and cursing all the world, Jonathan Wild rode up to the door of his own house in Newgate-street.

The night was young yet, and many hours would have to elapse before dawn came, but he, nevertheless, for a time relinquished his search for those he so much wished to see the end of.

But on that occasion he found it would answer his purpose better not to waste time in searching for the two objects of his hate, but to wait until he heard of them.

Very long he felt sure it would not be before some tidings were brought him of their doings.

Now, he argued, they were no doubt safely hidden, where, on a dark night, he would stand no chance whatever of finding them.

Little did he imagine how far he was off the truth.

Little did he think that so bold a plan would occur to them as to make their way with all speed to his warehouse in the Horseferry, Westminster, and despoil it of its precious and valuable contents.

He threw himself off his reeking steed, and dismissed those who had so far aided him in the night's proceedings.

But though he dismissed his men, Jonathan's work for the night was by no means over.

He had a disagreeable task to perform, but it was a compulsory one.

It was to bury his mistress, Mary Milliner.

Some days had elapsed since her mysterious death; and as he had said, when speaking that evening to Quilt Arnold upon the subject, ever since the escape of Jack Sheppard his thoughts had been so much engrossed that he had forgotten all about her.

Quilt Arnold was now quite in Jonathan's confidence, and in every respect his head man, occupying about the same position as Blueskin did when we first introduced him to the reader at the commencement of this narrative.

Wilkinson was on the lock that night, and of course heard the trampling of hoofs which accompanied Wild's arrival.

He flung open the door, and allowed his imperious master to enter.

"Where's Quilt?" was Jonathan's first question.

"Upstairs, Mr. Wild."

The thief-taker made no reply, but stalked along the hall and ascended the stairs.

He went into the room where he usually sat on the first floor.

But, before entering it, he called out for Quilt Arnold in a voice that shook the house.

There was a hurried trampling of heavy feet, and then some one knocked submissively at the door.

Jonathan just at that moment was engaged in drinking from a bottle of brandy which he had taken off the table.

Removing it, however, from his lips he called out—

"Come in."

Quilt obeyed.

"What is it, Mr. Wild, if you please," he asked, as he stood on the threshold with the knob of the door in his hand.

"Come in and sit down, Quilt. I want to speak to you."

Quilt sat down without a word, and waited in patience to hear what would be said to him.

"I shall want your assistance to-night."

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

"You remember what I was saying to you?"

"About Mary Milliner?"

"Yes."

"What am I to do, sir?"

"Have you been up in the room to look at her?"

"No, sir."

"Then, how do you know she is there?"

"That's where she was put, Mr. Wild, and she was past moving."

"She must be buried."

"So you said, sir."

"You and I will do it."

"Me, sir?" said Quilt, not altogether relishing the idea, for since the little affair in the vaults of Tottenham Church, he had a mortal repugnance to dead bodies.

"Yes, you. I'll tell you how it is to be done."

"Yes, sir."

"You must get a light cart, and a horse, and a sack."

"A sack."

"Yes, a sack to put the body in, Quilt."

"Oh! lor, Mr. Wild."

"You had better go and order the horse and cart at once."

"What time must it be at the door?"

"In half-an-hour."

"Very well, sir."

"Then come back to me, and I will give you further instructions."

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

Quilt Arnold left the room by no means well pleased with the night's work he had in prospect.

But it was more than his life was worth to make the slightest demur, so, in spite of his unwillingness, he went.

While he was gone, Jonathan seated himself in a chair by the fireside.

He drew the table towards him, and took another sip at the brandy.

Then he lighted his pipe, and fell into a musing fit.

How many different thoughts swept through the brain of the thief-taker it would be hard indeed to say. He had a great many things on his mind, each of which required his immediate attention.

He thought deeply, and while so busily engaged the time passed rapidly.

He was aroused by a faint tapping at the door, which announced Quilt Arnold's return.

"Come in."

"The horse and cart will be at the door in half-an-hour, Mr. Wild."

"Very well. Where's the sack?"

"On the landing outside."

"Is it a large one?"

"The largest I could get, Mr. Wild."

"Have you got a lantern?"

"Yes, sir."

"Then we are provided."

"Shall you require anything more?"

"I think not."

"Very well, sir."

"You have not got a very pleasant job before you, Quilt."

"No, Mr. Wild."

"However, take a drop of brandy. Don't be afraid, that will put you all right."

Quilt did not need a second bidding to do this.

To be sure, while he was out he called at a public-house and had a draw on his own account, but he could do with a little more.

Jonathan rose to his feet and put down his pipe.

Quilt put down the brandy.

"Now," said the former, "take your lantern and the sack, and go upstairs. I will follow."

Quilt led the way.

He had left his dark lantern on the broad part of the balustrade, and the sack was lying on the ground close to it, rolled up into a very small compass.

These he took in his hand, and went upstairs to the door of the room in which the mortal remains of the defunct Mary Milliner lay.

Steggs was on the landing carefully watching at his post, and Jonathan stopped a moment to question him.

But he elicited only the customary reply that all was right, and that he had seen nothing to account for the awful and mysterious death of Wild's mistress.

Jonathan did not think proper to say anything to Steggs respecting the business which had brought him up there at that late hour of the night, and he (Steggs) watched his actions with considerable uneasiness.

But he soon found he had nothing whatever to alarm himself about.

Quilt Arnold had got the key of the chamber of death, and in spite of the factitious vigour which his recent fiery potations gave him, his hand shook perceptibly when he tried to introduce the key into the lock.

With an effort, however, he controlled himself, and turned the key.

He threw open the door.

The moment he did so both the senses of himself and his master, who stood close behind him, were assailed by that disagreeable and unmistakable odour which decomposing flesh always emits.

So powerful, too, was it, that they had to draw back a step, to allow the pure air upon the landing (for such, by comparison, it seemed to be) to mingle with the foul atmosphere within the chamber.

"I am afraid we have let the job go a little too long, Quilt," said Wild.

"She smells awful, sir."

"Pah! Don't talk about it. We have got a disagreeable job to do, and we must do it. It's no good to tarnish. Screw up your courage, Quilt. The sooner we get it over the better."

Although Quilt Arnold could not help seeing the force of this reasoning, still it did not reconcile him any the more to the task he had to do.

But he knew it had to be done, so, holding the sack in his left hand, and the lantern in his right, he entered.

Jonathan followed him closely.

When Mary Milliner had been carried up stairs, and put in the room, the men had shown her very little ceremony.

They put her down all in a heap, just as they held her, on the floor inside the room.

There she lay still, and had not Quilt Arnold known just where she was, he would inevitably have tumbled over her.

But he cautioned Wild, and stepped aside.

The thief-taker cast one glance upon the corpse, and then turned away with a shudder of horror.

We shall not attempt in any way to describe the awful and revolting appearance which the dead body presented.

We should only disgust the reader.

But the worst part of the work had to be done.

It was a kind of retribution for Wild to have so much trouble with her dead body—a kind of punishment for his own horrible brutality.

Quilt Arnold put the lantern on the floor, and unrolled the sack.

"You will have to help me put her in," he said. "I can't do it all myself, Mr. Wild."

"All right, I'll help you."

With a good deal of trouble, and by their united exertions, the body was at last got into the sack.

[THE ENCOUNTER ON THE HOUSETOPS.]

They accomplished the feat by putting the mouth of the sack over her head, and drawing it down over the whole of her body.

Then, with a sigh of satisfaction, Quilt tied up the mouth with a piece of strong twine.

"Carry her down stairs, Quilt," said Wild; "thank goodness, the worst part of the job is over. Come on carefully. I will hold the light."

Quilt hoisted the body upon his back, and slowly staggered out of the room across the landing and down the stairs after his master.

CHAPTER CCXVIII.

JONATHAN WILD AND QUILT ARNOLD BURY THE BODY OF MARY MILLINER.

THE body of Mary Milliner was no inconsiderable weight, so when he got to the landing on the first-floor, Quilt Arnold was fain to set his burden against the wall and rest himself a little.

"Come and have a drop more brandy, Quilt," said Wild, "and that will take the taste out of your mouth."

"She smells awful, Mr. Wild."

"She does; but come inside and shut the door. We will have some brandy together till the cart comes."

"I should think the half-hour must be up, Mr. Wild."

"It must be very nearly. But we shall hear it when it stops."

"So we shall, sir."

Wild drank deeply of the brandy on the table, and then passed the bottle to his lieutenant.

"Quilt," said Wild, after a moment's pause, "we ought to get all the men out of the way. I don't want this job to get wind, or there will be no end of fuss made about it."

"I think there's only Wilkinson downstairs, sir, and he's on the lock."

"Wilkinson, Wilkinson," said Wild, musingly, "I should think we could trust him."

"Yes, Mr. Wild, I think so too."

"Then go downstairs, and see if there is any one else about. If there is not, it does not matter."

Quilt departed on this errand, and soon returned to say that there was no one downstairs but Wilkinson.

This satisfied Wild, and he renewed his attentions to the brandy, permitting Quilt to follow his example.

At this moment there was the clattering of horses' hoofs, and the rumbling of wheels in the street outside.

"That's the cart," said Quilt.

"Run down, then, and send whoever has brought it about his business."

"Yes, Mr Wild."

"We must have no prying eyes upon us."

"I understand, sir. I'll be back again directly."

And Quilt was as good as his word.

"The coast is all clear now, sir."

"Very good. Quilt!"

"Yes, sir."

"We have forgotten something now."

"What is that, Mr. Wild?"

"A spade."

"Oh! ah! yes. We shall want a spade."

"Of course we shall. Where shall you find one?"

"That is more than I can tell you, sir."

"You must find one, then."

Quilt set off upon this errand, and was fortunate enough, after a few minutes' search, to find the article he wanted in the corridor from which the cells opened.

This he placed in the cart, and then went upstairs to tell his master.

Jonathan was quite ready.

Once more, then, did Quilt take up the sack upon his back, and stagger downstairs.

Along the passage and out into the street they went.

Wilkinson did not know what was being carried out, and Wild did not allow him a chance of ascertaining, for as soon as Quilt got through the door, he stood at it and pulled it shut after him.

He then lent his assistance to his lieutenant to lift the body into the cart, and as this had a flap at the back, it was done with tolerable ease.

Then both got into the cart.

Jonathan took the reins.

The horse started off at a rapid speed, and then, for the first time, Jonathan Wild began to wonder where he should bury the body.

But he thought he should have plenty of time to think as he went along, so he took his course down Holborn.

He wanted to bury her in some place where her remains would never again see the light of day.

What place was best adapted for such a purpose was more than he could say.

But when he came to the corner of Gray's Inn-lane, he turned up that dark and dismal thoroughfare.

"I will ask Quilt's advice," he said. "Perhaps he will be able to give me a good hint."

"Quilt!" he said.

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

"I want to bury the body, Quilt," he said, "in some safe place, where no one will ever find it. Do you understand?"

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

"Now where should you think a likely spot?"

"I am sure I don't know, Mr. Wild; I thought you had made up your mind."

"No, no, I have not; I thought there would be plenty of time to do that after we started."

"We are in Gray's Inn-lane, are we not sir?"

"Yes."

"If you turn to the right a little, Mr. Wild, we shall come to the village of St. Pancras. There is an old church there, sir."

"I know there is."

"It stands in a very lonely position, indeed. Suppose we were to bury her in the churchyard?"

"It is not a bad thought, Quilt, but I am afraid the church you speak of is rather too near London."

"It is rather near."

"But I like the idea of burying her in a churchyard, if we could find some out-of-the-way spot."

"It would be better, sir; and if we filled the grave up carefully, no one would be any the wiser."

"Very true; and now I come to think of it, there is a church about half-way between Kentish-town and Highgate-hill which will just answer our purpose."

"I know the church you mean," said Quilt; "it is a very old one, with a square tower, and covered with green stuff."

"That is it."

"It is far away from all houses, and half in ruins; I should think a better place could not be found."

"We will drive there, then, Quilt."

Jonathan, having come to this determination, struck the horse with the whip, and away they went at a rattling pace.

But when they passed the few cottages which stood near King's-cross, their way lay entirely through the country, until they came to the long, straggling village of Kentish-town.

Through this, keeping along the High-street, they went at full speed.

But there was no eye to see them.

The inhabitants of the little rural village had one and all long ago retired to rest.

It was about two o'clock in the morning when Jonathan reached his destination.

The church lay a little way back from the main road, and was surrounded with a low, moss-grown, wooden fence.

The square tower of the church was rather darker than the sky, so its outlines were clearly revealed upon it.

Jonathan stopped the cart in the high-road, just opposite the church.

But Quilt, whose knowledge of that neighbourhood was perfect, said—

"Mr. Wild! Mr. Wild!"

"Well?"

"Don't stop here, sir."

"Why not?"

"Drive a little further, and then you will come to a very narrow lane, which leads down to one of the gates opening into the churchyard."

"You know the place well, then?"

"Very well, indeed, Mr. Wild, for when I was a boy I lived here."

These last few words were spoken in a tone of voice which no one, not even Jonathan Wild, would have recognised as belonging to Quilt Arnold.

It is probable that the past came back to his mind with extraordinary vividity, and that he was reminded of what he was when he was a boy and what he was now.

But he quickly banished all such unpleasant reflections from his mind.

Jonathan saw the policy of leaving the high-road, so he again set the horse in motion, looking out all the time for the turning of which Quilt had spoken.

It was only a few yards further on.

He turned down it without hesitation, and halted in a minute or two afterwards at a little gate which led into the churchyard.

Quilt sprang out of the cart, and Jonathan followed his example.

They then took hold of the horse's head, and walked him close to the hedge, so that he could eat the soft green grass which grew rather plentifully about that spot.

The board at the back of the cart was next unfastened, and allowed to swing down upon its hinges.

Quilt took hold of the sack and drew it out, while Jonathan possessed himself of the spade.

The body of poor Mary Milliner fell with a heavy dab to the ground, for the weight was more than Quilt could manage by himself.

Jonathan, however, put down the spade, and came to his assistance.

By their united exertions she was carried to the gate.

But it was fastened.

They did not attempt to open it, but fairly swung the body over it into the churchyard, or rather upon the well-trod gravel path leading to it.

Quilt then fetched the spade.

Their next proceeding was to climb over the gate themselves.

But this was easily enough done, and picking up the sack, they carried it to a remote corner of the churchyard, to which Quilt Arnold led the way.

All around was positively as still as death.

So still, indeed, as to become painful, and the thief-taker and his accomplice both wished that they could hear some sound to indicate the presence of some other living creature.

On reaching the remote corner of the churchyard referred to, they deposited their burden.

It was quite a relief to Quilt when Wild said—

"Light the lantern."

He immediately obeyed.

It was a dark lantern, and, by his master's orders, he only partially withdrew the slide, lest its light should attract attention to them.

Jonathan sat down on a contiguous tombstone, and held the lantern in his hand, directing the whole of its rays upon one spot, while Quilt Arnold began very diligently to turn up the earth.

"Dig deep," said Jonathan, "and as quickly as you are able, because every moment we stay increases our risk of detection. When you are tired and can dig no longer, I will help while you rest."

Quilt by no means wished to be discovered in what he was about, so he set to work in good earnest, and soon had a large mound of earth and a deep hole.

But digging is hard work to those who are not accustomed to it, and Arnold was soon obliged to give in.

Then he held the light while Jonathan jumped into the grave, and turned out the earth in incredible quantities.

CHAPTER CCXIX.

RECORDS THE HORRIBLE SCENE WHICH TOOK PLACE IN THE GRAVEYARD OF THE RUINED CHURCH.

JONATHAN set about his task too vigorously at first to be able to keep it up long.

Still, in a very little while, he had done a great deal.

But his strength suddenly left him, and he was obliged to jump out of the grave to allow Quilt Arnold to finish the task.

That worthy was tolerably refreshed by the short rest he had had, and he resumed his work steadily as before.

At the expiration of a quarter of an hour he had dug a hole some eight or nine feet in depth.

"Is that deep enough?" he asked.

"Go a little lower, Quilt; you may as well while you are about it. I want to bury her so deep that there won't be any risk of discovering her when they come to dig upon this spot to bury somebody else. Do you understand me?"

"All right, Mr. Wild," replied Quilt, and he went on with his arduous labour.

As he sat on the corner of a tombstone, holding the light, Jonathan had an ear to catch any sound.

But all was silent still, and he began to indulge in the hope that he should finish his disagreeable duty without interruption.

Once more Quilt asked the question whether the grave was deep enough, and this time he coupled it with the assertion that he could not dig it any deeper in consequence of the difficulty he had in throwing out the mould.

"Come out, then," replied Wild, "and let us get the job over as quickly as we can. I am tired of it."

"So am I, sir," said Quilt, as, not without some trouble, he scrambled out of the deep grave he had dug.

He straightened his back.

Jonathan put the lantern down just where he had been sitting—that is to say, upon the corner of the tombstone.

Then they once more stooped over the inert body of Jonathan's mistress.

Catching hold of the sack at all four corners, they staggered with it to the edge of the grave, and then, giving it one swing, allowed it to fall in.

It struck with a dull thud against the sides of the grave, and finally reached the bottom with a crash that caused a sickening sensation in the breasts of the thief-taker and Quilt as they heard it.

But at that moment their ears were assailed with a cry that made them forget all about the other.

That cry was uttered by a human voice.

"Help! help!" it said. "Murder! murder! help! They are robbing a dead body! Help! help! good people all! Arrest the villains! Murder! murder!"

These words were enough to terrify Jonathan Wild.

Although personally it might be said that he had nothing to fear, yet he did not wish to be mixed up in any way with the transaction, and he would have deputed the job altogether to other hands, only in that case his mind would not have been so much at rest as it would be if he had seen it done himself.

Looking through the gloom in the churchyard, he saw in the distance the figure of an old man, who was running rapidly.

The moment he caught sight of him he made up his mind what to do.

Quilt Arnold had taken the spade with the intention of hastily filling up the grave.

Jonathan snatched it with great rapidity from his hands, and then, heedless of the obstacles that were before him, he ran after the flying form.

It was wonderful to see how he jumped over the tombstones, which were placed very thickly together, and almost every time without sustaining the slightest injury.

But who it was that was flying before him to spread the alarm, must either have had fleetest running powers than Wild, or else, which was more likely, possessed a more intimate knowledge of the graveyard.

In spite of every effort, Jonathan could not overtake him, and he began to grow terribly apprehensive that he would get out of the churchyard, and running to the village, spread the alarm.

This dread made Jonathan double his endeavours.

At length, just before him, he could see the palings which formed the boundary of the churchyard, and the little gate in them.

The flying form, still uttering cries for help, made its way in a direct line to the gate.

He reached it.

But he had to stay a moment to undo the fastening.

That moment was fatal.

It allowed Jonathan to come up with him.

He was nervous and agitated, and could not find the latch.

At last his hand rested upon it.

Then he lifted it.

Another second, and he would have been fairly out into the lane.

But Jonathan was too close behind him.

He saw the person he was chasing fumbling at the gate.

He grasped the handle of the spade tightly with both hands.

He raised it above his head.

Then, just at the very moment when the man, having lifted the latch, was about to pass through, he brought it down with all the force he could impart to it.

His aim was accurate.

The sharp edge of the heavy implement caught the man fairly on the top of the head.

He fell with a gasping sob, with as much suddenness as if he had been struck down with lightning.

Had there been any one to see the countenance of the thief-taker at that moment, it would be seen to be distorted with one of his hideous grins.

That was because he had been successful.

The man he had so brutally and ruthlessly struck down lay just where he had fallen, and exhibited no signs whatever of returning animation.

And now Quilt Arnold, holding the lantern with an unsteady grasp, appeared upon the scene.

He had followed his master, picking his way among the gravestones carefully.

His heart turned sick, callous as he was, when he saw the brutal murder committed.

But the first words Wild uttered showed not the least signs of pity or remorse.

"Ha—ha! Quilt, there he is; I thought I should have him! Lend me the light. Ah! just as I thought; he is as dead as a nut."

Jonathan had taken the lantern, and when he looked at the prostrate form, he saw that the head had been clove in two with the edge of the spade, and the brains scattered around.

"Curse him!" growled the thief-taker, in a voice of extreme bitterness. "Curse him! I have caught him, to be sure, but we shall have no end of extra trouble. Look, there is a pool of blood."

"Lend me the lantern," said Quilt, suddenly, as he caught a transient glimpse of the face of the murdered man.

"What for?"

"As I told you, I lived about these parts when I was a boy—and—perhaps I may know him. Lend me the light, I say."

There was a strange, wild incoherence in Quilt's manner that awed Wild, and he gave him the lantern without further question.

The moment he had it in his grasp he hurried forward with staggering step, and directed the rays of the lantern upon the countenance of the dead.

A horrible groan came from his lips as he caught sight of it, and he sunk down in a moment beside the corpse.

Jonathan was full of astonishment and somewhat terrified, but he would not allow that to be visible, so he assumed an angry air.

Quilt was at first ignorant of the import of the words which Jonathan addressed to him, but when he did catch their meaning, he sprang suddenly to his feet and caught the thief-taker by the throat.

"Villain! villain! monstrous villain!" he shrieked. "Did I come here to-night for this? But you shall pay for what you have done with your own life!"

Surprise at the sudden attack for a moment made Wild incapable of defending himself, but recovering the use of his senses, he, in his turn, grasped Quilt Arnold by the throat, and a desperate struggle ensued.

In this the latter proved no match for his master.

Jonathan had him down in a moment, with his knee upon his chest.

"Are you mad?" he asked, with real anger. "What do you mean? What is the matter with you? Speak, or this moment is your last!"

"I will, Mr. Wild," said Quilt, his excitement subsiding. "I took the lantern to look in the face of the man you had killed. I had a presentiment that I should know it, and so I did. Jonathan Wild! I know that face. It was my father!"

Jonathan himself was too much surprised to reply for a moment, and then all he could say when he did reply was to repeat the words—

"Your father?"

"Yes. He was the sexton to this church."

"Well, well, Quilt; it can't be helped now. It would never have done for him to have spread the alarm all over the village. Besides, I didn't know it was him. It was an unlucky chance."

"He is quite dead," said Quilt, for Jonathan having released him, he had gone back to the body. "He is quite dead."

"It is a most unlucky affair, altogether," said Wild. "It will never do to leave him where he is. We must bury him along with Mary Milliner, and be off. Why, if this was found out, we should both be tucked up, as sure as fate."

Quilt Arnold, who was at first much agitated, was now quite calm and self-possessed, or at all events appeared to be so. How much such behaviour was assumed none could tell. Jonathan Wild had him in his power, and he knew it.

At the command of his master he assisted to carry the body of his father to his unholy grave, and cast him in.

Quilt's heart, hard as it was, smote him.

But Jonathan produced his brandy-flask, and handed it to him.

He drank heartily, and so did Wild, after which they set about ending their labour.

The earth was shovelled in, and pressed down as hard as possible with their feet.

Then the turf was carefully placed over it, and no traces remained of the deed which had been done, with the exception of a mound of soil.

This, however, they loaded with some trouble into the cart, and disposed of at a distance.

The blood stains were removed, and everything done to prevent suspicion of what had occurred, and Jonathan drove back to London just as the day was beginning to dawn.

CHAPTER CCXX.

IN WHICH THE LUDICROUS ADVENTURE WITH THE BOASTING TRAVELLER IS BROUGHT TO A CONCLUSION.

BOTH Jack Sheppard and Blueskin broke out into a hearty laugh when they saw the effect which the mere mention of Jack Sheppard's name, and the bare probability of his having stopped the coach, produced upon the boasting traveller.

Now, most of those in the coach knew that it had stopped from the most natural of all causes.

It had reached its destination, and that is why Jack spoke as he did.

But the "Very extraordinary, 'pon honour" gentleman was quite oblivious of this, and he continued his frantic exertions to get underneath the seat, to the great dismay of the old maid, who, if ever she was in her life, must now be in a "dither."

The guard of the coach now came to the door and opened it, and the passengers alighted.

It was then, and not till then, that Mr. "'Pon honour" discovered that he had nothing whatever to fear, and looking very sheepish, he crawled out of the vehicle, and was off out of sight in a moment in the darkness.

But Jack and Blueskin had both made up their minds that he should not escape them, so they darted off after him.

The valorous gentleman slackened his speed before he got very far, and then our two friends overtook him.

Very skillfully they got one on each side of his person.

"Ha! sir," said Jack, "I see you are going the same way as we are. Come along. We shall be glad of your company."

"'Pon honour" —

"Just so, sir. You will forgive me for my little joke at your expense, won't you?"

"Very extraordinary. But did you think I was afraid?"

"Oh! no."

"'Pon honour; but just under the seat was my port-manteau, and in that I had a brace of pistols. I was trying to get them out, and if Jack Sheppard had stopped the coach I would have peppered him."

"Oh! indeed. Now I trust you will forgive me for making such a mistake, but I really thought you were frightened, and were trying to hide yourself."

"'Pon honour, no; very extraordinary."

"A very extraordinary mistake for me to make. But still I think London streets are very unsafe after dark; and if you are going, our way I think your company would be a protection."

"'Pon honour, yes; very extraordinary, but I am going to Charing-cross."

"And we are going to Westminster, so we shall have the pleasure of your company for half the distance, at least."

"'Pon honour, yes; I shall be very glad to protect you, I am sure. As I told you before, highwaymen are the greatest cowards, and if it had only been Jack Sheppard who had stopped the coach I would have finished him."

"So you said, sir; this way, if you please—round the corner to the right."

"But that is not the way to Charing-cross."

"Oh! yes; we shall save a good deal of ground, you will find, by going this way."

The valorous gentleman did not like to say nay to those who were with him, so they turned the corner.

It was into a very narrow, dark, and suspicious-looking street leading out of Piccadilly into which they turned.

The hour was a late—or rather, to speak more correctly, an early one—still the night was far from gone, and no one scarcely was abroad.

Just as they turned into this street, Blueskin took up the conversation.

"I dare say, sir, considering the government offers a rather large reward for the apprehension of Jack Sheppard, that you would be glad to come across him."

"'Pon honour, yes; if you'll believe me, sir, very extraordinary, but the money just now would be very useful indeed, and there is nothing I should like so much as to meet with him."

"You would drive him before you, I presume, as far as Newgate?"

"Pon honour, yes."

"Then you have got the chance now," said Jack.

"Eh?"

"I say, if you want to see Jack Sheppard, you have got a chance."

In his fright, the boasting traveller forgot the customary ejaculations with which he interlarded what he said, and merely gasped—

"How? where?"

"Here. For I am Jack Sheppard!"

It is out of our power to describe the effect which these words had.

At first he stared at Jack with undisguised amazement, for he could not realize what he had just heard.

Then he uttered a howl, similar to the one to which he gave vent when in the coach.

His next attempt was to fly.

But Blueskin was on the watch for that, so he merely ran into his arms.

"One word," he said, in a stern voice, very different to the one in which he had previously spoken. "One word, or the least cry for help, and I will blow your brains out!"

This threat did not have to be repeated.

The valorous gentleman collapsed at once.

"Put your hand in my coat-pocket, Jack, and you will find a coil of thin rope."

The word rope seemed very suggestive to Mr. "Pon honour," and he uttered a groan.

But Blueskin's next words took a load off his mind.

"Tie him to this post, Jack, and then we will see what he is worth."

There was a post on the footpath close to where they stood, and it was to this that Blueskin alluded.

The traveller was quite helpless in his hands, and he placed him against the post, while Jack firmly bound him to it with the rope.

Their next proceeding was to search his pockets, but all they could find were some trifling toilette articles and some coppers.

At this the rage of our two friends can be imagined, though Jack from the first had formed a tolerably accurate idea of who he was, and how much he was worth.

"Villain!" said Blueskin, "is this all the money you have about you? Tell me the truth, or so sure as I speak, I will scatter your brains upon the pavement!"

"Pon honour, yes."

"Then what do you mean by talking about riding on a bay horse that you paid three hundred guineas for?"

The traveller made no reply.

"Who are you?" asked Blueskin, "tell me this moment."

The traveller hesitated.

"What is your name?"

"Pon honour, sir."

"That is not your name."

"Pon honour, no."

"Cease your foolery. What is your name, I say?"

"Peter Grig."

"Ha! ha!"

Neither Blueskin nor Jack could refrain from laughing at this ludicrous name.

"Is that your real name?" asked the former.

"Pon honour, yes."

"And what are you?"

"A professor."

"Professor of what? Answer me at once; don't keep me here waiting."

"Professor of the tonsorial art."

"Professor of the what art?"

"Tonsorial art."

"And what art is that?"

"In plain language?"

"Yes, of course, and without any 'pon honour or very extraordinary."

"Then the tonsorial art is the art of removing hirsute appendages from the face."

"What?"

"Why," said Jack, "I know what he means."

"What?"

"He is a barber."

"A barber?"

"Yes."

"Is that the truth?" he asked, in great disgust.

"It is so called in vulgar language?"

"Then do you mean to say you had the infernal impudence to sit in a stage coach and assume the airs you did, and talk in the manner you did, when you were only a barber?"

Mr. Peter Grig said never a word.

"I'll tell you what you are," said Blueskin; "you are a liar and a coward, and which predominates is more than I can tell. But you shall suffer for your foolery. Here, Jack, just help me, and then we will be off."

"What are you going to do?"

"Just follow my example."

As he spoke, Blueskin whipped off the barber's hat, and then stooping down, took a handful of mud from the kennel, and plentifully bedaubed his face with it.

In this Jack willingly enough assisted.

Once the unfortunate barber opened his mouth, either to cry out for help or else to expostulate.

But Blueskin had a handful of unsavoury mud ready, and in it went.

"Come on, Jack," he said, "we will leave him now."

Accordingly they both hastened down the street, nor did they pause until they were some distance from the post to which the barber was tied.

"We have lost a great deal of time with him, Blue."

"We have, Jack."

"Did you ever know such a lying coward? I really thought when I was in the coach, and he told his 'extraordinary 'pon honour' story that I should burst."

"It was very rich. But if I had known, I should not have wasted so much time as I did. I made sure he would have something about him that would repay us for our trouble."

"Well I didn't, do you know. I fancied all the time the fellow would turn out to be something like he has. But we have not lost so much time. The night is young yet, and if he has done no more, he has afforded us some amusement, and chased away some unpleasant thoughts."

"Perhaps it is as well. But let us make the best of our time now. It will be late before we reach Westminster."

"So it will; but I cannot help fancying the time will be well chosen. Just before daybreak nearly everybody slumbers."

"So they do."

"How do you imagine we shall carry off the swag?"

"I shall get a horse and cart close by the Horseferry."

"Can you trust the people?"

"Oh! yes."

"Well, I shall leave that to you, but we shall be obliged to have something, for if I recollect right, all that I saw when I went there was heavy articles. I wonder whether we shall find a cartload of those little ingots of silver?"

CHAPTER CXXI.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD MAKE A SUCCESSFUL ATTACK UPON WILD'S WAREHOUSE IN THE HORSEFERRY, WESTMINSTER.

"THAT is more than I can tell," said Blueskin, "for I have not been to the place since the time when I was there with you. But I hope we shall be well rewarded for our risk."

"They say the third time pays for all, Blue, and I hope the proverb will hold good in the present instance. It will be our third adventure to-night, and the two we have had have been unprofitable in the extreme."

"So they have. We are going to do a daring thing, Jack. If there is anything of value in the warehouse, you may trust to Wild for leaving it well guarded."

"Well, we are at Westminster now. Whereabouts are you going to find the horse and cart?"

"Close here; I think it is the next turning on our right hand."

"This one?"

"No, the next."

They reached this corner, and then turned down it.

Blueskin halted before a public-house, or rather before a gateway that adjoined it.

There was a bell-handle concealed in the door-post, but Blueskin knew its exact situation, so he pulled it at once.

He had to wait a little while, however, before there was an answer.

Then a little gate made in the larger one was thrown open, and a man in the garb of an ostler appeared.

Blueskin spoke to him, and what he said appeared to be quite satisfactory, for this man withdrew, and in an incredibly short space of time had a horse and cart ready.

Our two friends got in, and drove off at a steady pace.

At length they came to the place of their destination.

They drew up, however, at some little distance from the warehouse.

Blueskin alighted, and hopped the horse with some links with which the ostler had provided him, so that the animal could not stray away from where he was left.

The reader will no doubt remember that in the thirtieth chapter of this narrative we gave a very particular account of Wild's warehouse in the Horseferry, Westminster.

But there will be no harm in our repeating that the place where the booty was stored was in a kind of vault beneath a shed in the yard belonging to a public-house.

The sign of this public-house was the "Ship and Rainbow," and the ostensible landlord of it a man named John Oaky, who, like most of those with whom the thief-taker had any dealings, was wholly in Wild's power.

He then kept the public-house in which business was carried on in a legitimate fashion, but to only a slight extent, though Wild did not grumble about that. In fact, he did not care how few came to the house, for fear something should be discovered.

Then Oaky did not care, because he only had trouble with his visitors, and he was not in any way dependent upon what he took for support.

And so, at the "Ship and Rainbow," there was very little done in the way of business.

On reaching the front of this house, Blueskin looked up at it, and saw that there was not the least glimmer of a light in any part.

"I think we shall find it all right," he said. "You see the chief security that Wild has for this place is its existence being a profound secret, and known only to about three persons."

"You mean besides himself."

"Just so."

"Then I trust we shall find something worth carrying off. Who is it keeps this public-house?"

"One of Wild's men, by name John Oaky, and who is entirely in his power. He could have him hanged just whenever he liked."

"Does he keep a dog?"

"I think not."

"How shall we get through the gate?"

It was the gate leading into the yard by the side of the public-house of which Jack spoke.

"There is only one way, I think."

"How is that?"

"You must climb over, as you are the lightest, and then let me in."

"But how is the gate fastened?"

"Only with a wooden bar, which goes straight across it."

"All right, then, I think I can manage that."

"Up you go, then."

"You are sure he does not keep a dog?"

"I don't think he does, but you had better keep a good look-out. I should not like to say for certain."

"Help me up, then."

Blueskin assisted Jack Sheppard to reach the top of the gate.

Here, however, Jack paused a moment, and looked down into the yard.

But all was quiet, and he could see nothing indicative of danger.

Accordingly, he lowered himself silently and carefully into the yard.

With great suddenness, however, on reaching the ground he turned his back to the gate, and stood in the attitude of defence.

This proved to be an unnecessary caution.

Finding there was nothing to dread at present, he hastily took down the wooden bar, and found, as Blueskin had said, that it was the only fastening the gate had, with the exception of a couple of bolts which he easily withdrew.

The gate then swung open, and Blueskin entered.

He led the way across the yard to the door of the shed.

This he knew was locked, but from a pocket in the breast of his coat he produced a bunch of skeleton keys.

He felt these with his fingers one by one, and from being familiar with the proper key, he was able to tell which would answer his purpose.

He thrust one which he selected into the lock, which, no less to his gratification than Jack's, yielded.

They passed through into the shed as quickly as possible, and then Blueskin, removing the key from the outer side of the door, locked them in.

The darkness when he had done this was most intense.

Jack did not move, but stood just where he was when the door was closed.

Blueskin's next act was to produce from his pocket a dark lantern and some thieves' matches.

Let him be where he would, he always had the material for procuring a light somewhere about his person.

Even when he could have told for certain that he should have no occasion to make use of them, he always took them in his pocket.

The interior of the shed was now illumined by a faint blue light.

Then the flame from the match, having been communicated to the wick of the lantern, our friends were enabled to see about them.

As on the former occasion, the floor of the shed was littered with straw.

Going to one particular spot, however, Blueskin removed this straw, and then some flagstones were revealed.

His next act was to hand the lantern to Jack, while he felt in his pocket for some instrument that would serve to raise the stone which covered the top of the steps leading down into the warehouse.

A simple-looking housebreaking implement, looking something like a hook, did the business.

He fixed it into the crevice of the stone, and, exerting all his strength, pulled it up in the fashion of a trap-door.

Having done so much, both listened in order to ascertain whether any alarm had been given, and whether any sounds came from below.

But they seemed to have the place entirely to themselves, both within and without, above and below.

"It's all right, Jack, I do believe," said Blueskin, "and I don't think we shall have half the trouble I thought we should."

"Let us make haste, Blue. There is nothing to prevent our descending the steps at once, is there?"

"No; but let me go first, if you please."

"No, no."

"But I say yes."

"Why?"

"Because I know the way better than you do. Just descend after me carefully."

With this Blueskin went down the steps leading to the warehouse, with Jack close at his heels.

On reaching the bottom of the flight of steps, which were very few in number, they paused and listened again, but as they heard nothing, they felt themselves endowed with greater confidence, and were almost certain there was no one in the subterranean passage.

They now found themselves in a small vaulted chamber.

But its appearance was very different to what it was when Jack saw it before.

Then it was piled up with a large number of packages, all tied up and labelled.

There were several hundred of them at least there, but now there were scarcely any.

They ascertained this by Blueskin waving the light up and down.

"This is just what I feared, Jack," he said.

"What?"

"We have got into this place easily, but there will be nothing worth taking away."

"The devil!"

"Jonathan seems to have made a general move."

"Did he always keep a large stock of things here?"

"There used to be at times."

"How did he dispose of them?"

"In two ways."

"How?"

"Sometimes they used to be returned to the owners, and at other times they used to be shipped off to Holland."

"Well, Blue, look here. As we know very well, Johnny has not had much time for attending to his business lately, so perhaps there has been a lot shipped off, and no more brought to replace them."

"That may be."

"Do not give up until you have thoroughly searched the place. It was not those packages, but some of the ingots of silver I saw that we wanted. If we take those, it will be money in a small compass."

"Well, come this way, Jack. I have my doubts, but perhaps we shall find what we want."

"As he spoke, Blueskin led the way across the empty warehouse to the little recess, or smaller chamber, in which the furnace was fixed."

But they felt no increase of temperature in this place. It was as cold as the other, so the furnace evidently was not lighted, and had not been for some time, for it always left a heat in the place long after it was extinguished.

But on going to a corner near the furnace, the joy of our two friends can be imagined when they saw a glittering heap of the silver ingots they were so anxious to possess, and looking as though they had only just been made.

CHAPTER COXXII.

JACK AND BLUESKIN DESPOIL WILD'S WAREHOUSE OF THE MOST VALUABLE PORTION OF ITS CONTENTS, AND AGREE TO BURY THE TREASURE.

"HERE'S luck, if you like, Blue," exclaimed Jack, as he saw the so-much-wished-for treasure. "Here's luck."

"Yes. I can tell you it is more than I hoped to find, Jack. I am very glad. Our troubles are more than half over now. Why, here at least is a sum of money sufficient to last you years."

"As you say, there must be; but come, Blue, do not let us waste a moment in talking. I am sure we have no time to spare. You take up as many as you can carry in your arms, and I will do the same. We will put them down by the door of the shed, and then come for more."

"Agreed, Jack. There is sound sense in that arrangement, but you must recollect you will have to carry the lantern."

"Oh! I will see about that. You pick up some of the shiners."

In a very deliberate manner, Blueskin set to work.

The ingots were of a small size, and his first proceeding was to cram his pockets full of them.

Then he got as many in his hands and arms as he could possibly carry.

Then Jack took up some, and both staggered up the steps.

Then, having deposited their precious burden close to the door of the shed, they descended again.

This operation they continued several times, until they had removed nearly all the ingots.

Then, as they had got about six times as much as they really wanted, they determined not to fetch any more.

Besides, time was speeding on.

"I have a mind to bring the horse and cart quietly into the yard, Jack, and load it. Think of the time and trouble it will save."

"Oh! I should say so it, by all means."

"Very well. We can close the outer gate when we get it inside, and then if any one goes by, there won't seem to be anything amiss."

This being agreed to, Blueskin unlocked the door of the shed, and our two friends cautiously emerged into the yard.

All was still silent.

There was not the least indication of an alarm having been given.

But, upon looking up to the sky, they saw that it was beginning to change colour, and to rapidly grow lighter.

"We must make haste, Blue," said Jack, "or we shall have daylight upon us before we finish."

"We shall, indeed; the dawn is much closer at hand than I should have thought."

"It has been a busy night, and I must say I am beginning to grow tired."

"Never mind that. You hold the gate open, and I will go and fetch the horse and cart."

Jack held the gate open as he had been requested.

Blueskin, owing to the precaution he had taken, found the horse and cart just where he had left it.

Untying the animal's legs, he took him by the bridle, and, as silently as he could, walked him into the yard.

No sooner were they fairly inside than Jack closed the gate.

The cart was drawn close up to the shed, and the ingots of silver loaded into it with speed and silence.

At length all were safely in.

Then, as before, Jack held open the yard gate, and led the horse out into the street.

The instant that this was done, both scrambled into the cart, and Blueskin, taking the reins, drove off at a rapid pace.

"We may think ourselves most lucky," said the latter; "we have got away, you see, without raising the least alarm, and with ten times as much booty as I expected."

"Fortune favours us; but now, Blue, having got the money, there arises another rather important question."

"What is that?"

"Why, where we are to dispose of it, until such time as we may want to make use of it."

"I don't know."

"Nor I."

"Suppose we were to take it to Tumposki's?"

"Trust a Jew with it?"

"Why not?"

"Never."

"I am sure it would be safe."

"Well, it might be, and I don't say it would not, but I should not rest while he had it. No, Blue, you must think of some other place where we can keep it."

"That will be a difficult matter, and the worst of it is we have very little time to decide, for see, it is getting daylight already."

"So it is. But some place must be thought of. We can't carry all that lot about in our pockets, it is not likely."

"I never for a moment thought it. Can't you suggest anything? I know you are fertile in expedients, Jack."

"Which way are you going?"

"I was making straight for Tumposki's."

"I thought so. Now, I'll tell you what would do better than that."

"What?"

"Why, turn the horse's head round, and drive to some of the fields on the river-side below Chelsea. You will find there lots of lonely, rarely-visited spots, and I think the best thing we could do would be to bury the silver there."

"Well, I daresay it would be safe."

"It would, and I should recommend you to bury it in small portions, which would diminish the chances of discovery, and we could fetch a little just as we wanted it, and turn it into guineas by degrees."

"Well, I'll turn the horse, and do as you say."

"I think there cannot be two opinions about it being the best plan we could adopt."

"We shall be late."

"We shall, and yet we shall reach there almost before sunrise."

"I don't doubt that."

"Then, about those desolate places we are not likely to find any one at that early hour, and besides, the mist off the water will serve as an excellent screen to hide us."

"You have laid hold of the right idea, Jack, but, as you say, the money must certainly be buried in small quantities in different places, so that if one is found, which is not at all unlikely, we shall not lose the lot."

"That is just what I thought."

"Come on, then."

Blueskin, as soon as Jack had made up his mind, had turned the horse round, and drove in the direction of which he spoke, of course taking care not to pass near the Horseferry.

On reaching Chelsea, about the spot where the hospital now stands, the character of the place fully bore out the description which Jack had given of it.

The numerous low-lying fields, then nowhere near any buildings, were covered with a dense white mist, which made it impossible for them to see far before them.

But finding the road good, they still drove on, and passed the foot of Battersea-bridge.

The further they proceeded, the denser grew the mist. It was, too, very cold, and settled upon them in large drops of moisture.

But it was in places scarcely so high as it had been, being densest nearest the ground, so that when Jack stood up in the cart he was able to see tolerably well about him, and direct his companion where to drive.

"Blue," he said, "it has just struck me that somewhere about here there is a clump of trees which stretch right down to the water's edge. Now, don't you think that would make a good hiding-place?"

"I do; and moreover, if we had the treasure not far from the river's side, we could row down here some dark night, and carry a quantity away in the boat and dispose of it."

"Capital. The place must be somewhere close here. Drive carefully. I see it just before us. Pull up now."

Blueskin pulled up, and then stood up in the cart to see that his young comrade was not mistaken.

Through the upper stratum of the mist he could just define a mass of something dark.

"We won't drive too close up to the place, Blue, for fear of leaving a trace."

"How shall you manage then?"

"Why, I will stand here with the horse and cart, while you load yourself with as many of the ingots as you can conveniently carry. Then, when you return from having placed them somewhere among the trees, you can stand by the horse while I take a load, and so do it by turns."

"Very well, that will do; at least, I will carry the lot, or how will you know where to take them to?"

"Just as you like."

Jack then loaded Blueskin with a great many ingots, who started off while he stood there on guard.

Blueskin was absent some moments, but when he returned he said—

"I shan't be so long next time; I had to fix upon a place, you know, and to take notice where I was going."

Away he went with load number two, and he continued this process till the whole had been transferred to the wood.

"There seems to be no people about; I have not heard a sound or seen a thing all the time."

"So much the better, then."

"Just so; and I think it would be quite safe if we were to leave the horse and cart here."

"I should not leave them in the road. If you go a little further you will come to a gate leading into the fields. We will lead the horse in there."

"That will do."

Blueskin led the way to the gate he spoke of, and Jack, taking the horse by the bridle, followed.

The gate was not fastened in any way, so they swung it open, and passed in without difficulty.

The links with which the horses two fore legs had previously been fastened were again produced, and the animal having been secured, they made the best of their way to the wood.

There were now some very unequivocal symptoms of the sun making his appearance and dispersing the mist.

Still they thought they should have time, before any one came to the spot, to do what they wished.

Just as they were passing out of the gate, Jack struck his foot against something, which fell with a clattering sound to the ground.

He would have paid no further attention to it, however, if his companion had not asked—

"What's that?"

Jack stooped to see, and then he cried—

"More luck! fortune is on our side at last! It is a spade! What in the world should we have done without one?"

CHAPTER CCXXIII.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD TAKE LODGINGS IN NEWGATE-STREET, NEXT DOOR TO JONATHAN WILD'S.

JUST at that moment so simple a thing as a spade was a valuable acquisition to our two friends, for without one they would have found their task of burying the treasure both tiresome and laborious.

With a lighter heart than he had had in his bosom for many a long day, Jack shouldered the spade and followed Blueskin to the wood with a quick step.

The little clump of trees, however, which grew upon the margin of the river was scarcely worthy of being dignified with the name of wood, but still, for want of a better appellation, we must so designate it.

Blueskin had deposited the ingots of silver in one heap, and so close to the river that they had already begun to sink in the soft earth.

We need not linger over this portion of our narrative. Let it suffice for us to say that, with the aid of their spade, they, in about an hour buried all the ingots, with the exception of four, two of which were carried by Jack and two by Blueskin.

In accordance with the arrangement they had made, the ingots were not buried in one heap.

Indeed, they even went so far as to dig a hole for each ingot, of which there were in all thirty-seven.

By the time they had finished, however, the sun had attained a considerable altitude, and the mist had been wholly dispersed.

But, to the best of their knowledge, they had not been seen in what they were about by any living creature. For certain they had not been in any way disturbed in what they were about.

Going forth into the lane, they were pleased to find the place still preserved its solitary and desolate character.

"Now, Jack," said Blueskin, "what is to be done next?"

We must be uncommonly careful, bear in mind, for Jonathan Wild won't be long before he hears of his loss, and he will set it down to us directly."

"He can't know of it yet, Blue; and there can't be many people astir yet. I think the best thing to do will be to get into the cart and drive straight back to Tumposki's, in Seven Dials, if you think we can make sure of shelter there."

"But that will be a very bold and hazardous proceeding, Jack."

"What, to drive through London?"

"In broad daylight!"

"Not a bit of it. You may depend if we get into the cart, and drive along like ordinary people, taking no notice of anybody or anything, nobody will take notice of us."

"I don't know that, Jack."

"Well, let us try it."

"I don't mind if you don't, of course, but still capture, now that we have succeeded so well, would be uncommonly vexatious."

"I admit that. But do you know I don't think we shall run into much danger. In the first place, it will be such a bold and daring thing to do that no one would believe we had the courage to attempt it."

"I shouldn't wonder."

"Get the cart out of the field, and let us start at once, and get to our journey's end as soon as possible."

The cart was got out into the lane, and our two friends entered it and drove back to London.

They tried their best to carry out the plan which Jack had mentioned, though neither of them could altogether forbear from casting furtive glances around them when they fairly got into London.

However, with a boldness which no one could help admiring, they took their course in a direct line and through the principal thoroughfares to their destination.

But in this to a great extent lay the secret of their success.

Without any mischance happening to them whatever, they arrived at the door of the Jew's house in Little Earl-street, Seven Dials.

They had evidently been watched for and expected, for no sooner had they brought their vehicle to a standstill than the door was opened, and Tumposki appeared upon the threshold.

Our two friends were out with marvellous celerity, and ran into the house.

There was a boy standing in the passage, and he ran out to take charge of the horse.

"Don't ask any questions, Aaron," said Blueskin, observing the look of astonishment which was depicted upon the Israelite's countenance; "but tell me, is that boy who has just run out capable of driving a horse?"

"Oh! dear, yes."

[BLUESKIN, JACK SHEPPARD, AND EDGORTH BESS HIDE FROM WILD IN THE CATHEDRAL.]

"Then call him inside a moment, and I will tell him where I want the horse and cart taken."

The Jew did as he was desired, and then Blueskin gave the boy the required directions.

As soon as he had departed, the Jew led our two friends into the sitting-room where their preceding interview had taken place.

Jack then entered into an account of the various incidents which had befallen them since they last saw each other, and concluded with the production of the four ingots of silver.

They were not, however, very candid with him.

Jack judged it would be best not to be.

For instance, he did not tell him from whence the silver had been taken.

Nor did he tell him that they had any more than what they placed upon the table.

"Now, Aaron," said Jack, "look at those, and tell me what you think of them."

The Jew's eyes glistened as he estimated the weight of the ingots by balancing them in his hand.

"Now we want, of course, to turn them into money, and we trust to you to give us as much as you can for them without reserving an extravagant profit to yourself. We will settle with you for the rest afterwards."

"Be honest with us," Blueskin. "If you are you will find it the best policy in the long run."

"I will be honest with you," said the Jew, "and give you a fair price for the silver. Wait a moment, and I will fetch my scales."

The scales were in a cupboard close at hand, so they were soon produced.

Then, with scrupulous care, Tamposki proceeded to weigh each ingot.

The weight of each he put down on a piece of paper, in characters intelligible to no one but himself.

Then he added the whole up.

"How much can you give?" asked Jack, who was eager and impatient to arrive at the result."

"They do not weigh just the same each," said the Jew, "although the difference is slight. I can give you forty-eight pounds for the four, and, if you will believe me, that is almost their full value."

"Say fifty," cried Jack, while he rapidly divided the whole number of ingots by four and multiplied them by fifty, in order to get at the total value of the whole.

"No; I can only say forty-eight."

"That is twelve pounds each," said Blueskin.

"Just so; and I should not say so little as that, only I thought it would induce you to be liberal with me."

"Well, give us ten pounds each, and keep the remainder on account. You shall have nothing to complain of from us on the score of liberality."

This matter being thus adjusted, a meal was brought in, and while they were discussing it, Blueskin spoke to the old Jew as follows—

"Aaron, we want you to render us a service—a very important service, and yet an easy one. Will you do it?"

"Of course I will."

"That's hearty. Now listen to me."

"I am all attention."

"As I daresay you know, there is, next door to Jonathan Wild's house in Newgate-street, a house which is let out in lodgings."

"I did not know it, but I daresay there is, as you say so."

"Well, this house is occupied by a shoemaker, who keeps the ground floor, and lets all the rest of the house to lodgers."

The Jew nodded.

"They are always having changes in their tenants, so I want you to go there at once and ascertain whether they have one of their top attics to let."

"I understand."

"Mind you, no other room than one next to the roof, and with a window opening on to the tiles will answer my purpose. Do you understand that?"

"I do."

"Well, then, if there should be, and I think it very likely, you will please take that room for Jack and myself, without, of course, saying who we are. You can call us Mr. Jones and Mr. Smith."

"But you don't mean to say you are going to take apartments next door to Jonathan Wild's?"

"Yes we are, but never you mind that. If you quite understand what we want, be good enough to oblige us by setting off at once. If they want any reference, you can pay them a guinea on account."

"All right. If there is an attic to let in the house you mention, I will take it."

"Do so."

"But how if there is not?"

"Try all the other houses on that side of Warwick-lane, though I should much prefer the one I mentioned, if you can manage it."

"I am off now. Here are the ten pounds each you asked for, and the remainder is to go on account. You must remember I was responsible for the two horses you have lost."

"Yes, I know all about that, and if you will serve us faithfully, I will take care that you are not a loser by it."

The Jew, a few minutes afterwards, set out upon his errand, and Jack and Blueskin, who were both much fatigued, repaired to the room they had previously occupied, and endeavoured to obtain a few hours' rest and sleep.

Not only did they stand in immediate need of both on the score of exhaustion, but they felt that in all probability they would have a hard and harassing night's work to do, and when they should have another chance as good as the present was very problematical.

They had not to woo slumber long. It soon came to them.

When they awoke, the Jew was standing at their bedside.

"What is the result of your errand?" cried Blueskin.

"Tell me at once. Do not keep us in suspense."

"Success."

"You have met with success?"

"Yes, the back attic in the shoemaker's house is to let."

"Was to let, you mean?"

"Just so."

"And you have taken it for Mr. Smith and Mr. Jones?"

"Yes."

CHAPTER CCXXIV.

OUR TWO FRIENDS DEPART UPON THEIR PERILOUS EXPEDITION.

"BRAVO, Aaron," said Blueskin, leaping off the bed upon which he had thrown himself, without removing any of his apparel. "Let us hear the whole of the story from beginning to end."

"Very well," replied Tamposki. "I went from here straight to Newgate-street, and next door to Jonathan Wild's I found the shoemaker's, as you described."

"Did you look up at Jonathan's house?" asked Jack.

"I did."

"Did you see anything?"

"Nothing unusual. The door was closed."

"Go on about the shoemaker," said Blueskin. "That is what I want to hear most."

"I found the front door open."

"It always is."

"I knocked, and presently the landlord made his appearance. I told him what I wanted, and he said 'Yes, some people that had lived in his top back-attic had moved yesterday.' I asked to see the place, so he took me up an endless lot of stairs, until at last, passing through a door, we stood in a little bit of a place that could not be called a room."

"Never mind what it could be called," said Blueskin.

"Had it got a window opening on to the tiles?"

"Oh! yes."

"That is everything, then."

"I thought the place would suit you, so I asked how much the rent was, and he told me two shillings a-week."

"Did he ask for any references?"

"Yes; but I told him that the two gentlemen who were about to take it would only want to occupy it occasionally, and that they had commissioned me, I felt any scruples about the matter, to pay him ten wif he in advance."

"What did he say then?"

"Oh! that removed all difficulty, and I gave him a guinea, telling him to keep the extra shilling to drink your health."

"You told him we should want to come to-night."

"Yes."

"Did he make any objection?"

"None whatever."

"What is about the time?"

"Noon."

"Very well; we shall not want to go till dusk, so you will please let us stay where we are until then."

"Agreed."

"We want to have as much sleep as we can, for I have no idea when we shall get another chance."

"When shall I call you?"

"Just about sunset. We will then come down, have something to eat, and start off."

"Of course, it is nothing to me," said the Jew; "but I think you will be running into very great danger by going to Newgate-street. You are a couple of daring chaps, I know; but still I think you ought to use a little discretion."

"Trust to us," said Blueskin; "our plans are carefully matured, and the danger we shall incur will not be half so much as you seem to think."

"I am glad to hear it."

"Leave us now, and rest assured that to-night we shall strike such a blow at Jonathan Wild that he will scarcely be able to recover from it."

The Jew's eyes glittered, and rubbing his hands briskly together, he said—

"Let me see you do that—let me see you do that, and I will cheerfully assist you in any way that lies in my power. If you want money to carry out the enterprize against him, call upon me. I would give you the last shkel I possessed."

"Make your mind easy," said Jack; "you must know that whenever I make up my mind to do a thing I always do it. Now I have made up my mind to bang Jonathan Wild at Tyburn, and you mark my words if I don't."

"That would be brave—brave, indeed."

"Leave us, then, and think it over. You may depend it will be done."

The old Jew left the room, and then Jack, turning to his comrade, said—

"You told the old Jew just now that all our plans were matured."

"I know I did, and so they are."

"I don't doubt that, but you forget I do not share in them, nor do I know what you intend to do, except that I can guess why you have taken the top attic in the house next to Jonathan Wild's."

"Haven't I told you?"

"No."

"Then I thought I had. However, I will give you my plan of operations in a very few words."

"Do so, and then I shall be able to rest all the better."

"Well, my plan is simply this. To-night we go to this house next to Wild's, and enter upon the occupation of the attic."

"Yes."

"The first thing we shall do will be to climb out of the window on to the roof, and from thence on to the roof of Wild's house."

"That is just what I thought."

"In the roof of this there is, to my knowledge, a trap-door."

"And to mine," said Jack, "for I once raised it and got through."

"I intend for you to do the same thing again."

"Let us hear the arrangements you have made."

"I agreed with Steggs, then, that I would tap on this trap-door in a certain manner. If Wild was out, and the coast perfectly clear, he would unfasten it, for it is now always kept bolted. If Wild was there, and it was dangerous for us to enter, he should take no notice, and we should have to wait."

"Good, that is a most excellent arrangement, provided always that Steggs does not play us false."

"I don't think you need fear that."

"I hope he will not."

"So do I."

"If he took it into his head to betray us to Jonathan, we should be very awkwardly situated indeed."

"I fancy he hates the thief-taker too cordially for that. You must remember he has treated him very badly."

"He has."

"And Steggs is a man of a most vindictive character."

"That is a good deal."

"But we must run the risk of that. Let me tell you the remainder of my plans."

"Yes, do."

"Should the coast be quite clear, and Steggs unbolts the door, I shall remain upon the roofs to keep watch and ward, while you will descend through the trap-door, and make your way to the room where Edgworth Bess is confined."

"Go on, go on."

"With all the speed possible you will make her acquainted with what you intend to do, and then bring her to the trap-door. I shall be above, and will assist her on to the roofs; you will follow, and Steggs, if he thinks proper."

"It is a capital plan."

"Do you think it likely to succeed?"

"I think it certain to do so, if Jonathan is from home."

"So do I; and as for that, Steggs will be able to tell us of it. When you are all fairly on the roof, the trap-door will be closed, and we shall make our way into the attic, and thence into the street."

"What then?"

"The next thing will be instant and immediate flight. The treasure must be unburied, and we must make the best of our way out of England, and not return until Edgworth Bess has passed her twenty-first birthday."

Jack clasped Blueskin by the hand.

"I think I can see the end of all that we have endured. Happiness, old friend, is in store for us, I feel sure of that."

"I trust so, Jack."

"Oh! I feel sure of it—quite sure. But stay; there is something in your plans which you have omitted."

"What?"

"When we descend from the attic and make our way into Newgate-street, where shall we betake ourselves?"

"I hardly know, Jack, where we ought to go first."

"And how shall we escape—on foot?"

"I think so."

"But if Wild pursues us?"

"I am in hopes he will not."

"But we must provide for the possibility of his doing so."

"It would be wisest."

"Of course it would."

"What should we do?"

"I leave that to you."

"I do not want to excite suspicion. Now, if we had a vehicle of any sort waiting in Newgate-street, it will be sure to attract attention."

"Then which way are we to take to leave England?"

"You shall yourself decide."

"Shall we go to Holland or to France?"

"Just as you please."

"I should say France."

"Very well."

"Then, as for the route, I should say take the most unfrequented one you can find, and embark from some obscure port."

"Certainly."

"If we were to go to Dover, or anywhere there, Jonathan would be down upon us directly."

"Unquestionably."

"I think Edgworth Bess can ride."

"What of that?"

"Suppose we were to have three horses saddled, and kept waiting for us, not necessarily in Newgate-street, but somewhere close at hand?"

"That might be done."

"Oh! yes, and then we should at least stand a chance of making our escape, even if Jonathan Wild should pursue us."

"Let it be so, then, and consider that all our arrangements are finally settled."

"I think they are."

"And now, get all the sleep you can, and so be able to endure fatigue, for it strikes me it will be a long time before you will have any rest."

"I fear so."

Blueskin did not reply.

He was more weary and more in need of sleep than his younger and more active companion.

But in a little while both slumbered, nor did they awake until just dusk. In accordance with the arrangement made, the old Jew came into the room to wake them.

They started up hastily and went down, where they eat heartily, as men only can eat who do not know when food will pass their lips again.

CHAPTER CCXXV.

JACK SHEPPARD AND BLUESKIN TAKE POSSESSION OF THEIR LODGINGS.

INSTRUCTIONS were given to Aaron Tumposki to have three saddle-horses waiting just round the corner of Warwick-lane, one of which was, of course, to be furnished with a side-saddle.

Then, these arrangements having been made, and as the streets were quite dark, our friends, well and fully armed, with their hearts nerved with courage, and their muscles strung for action, set out upon their perilous excursion.

To reach the place of their destination, however, they made a considerable detour, getting into Newgate-street, in fact, not from the Skinner-street, but St. Martin's-le-Grand end.

The street was dark and tolerably full of people.

But unheeding them, our two friends made their way to the house we have so often mentioned.

Upon reaching it, as a matter of course, they found the front door wide open, and, as another matter of course, the shoemaker was standing on his doorstep, gazing at the passers by in the street.

In fact, his shoemaking business was a mere blind. The fellow was idle, and he made enough out of his lodgers not only to pay the rent, but to keep his wife and children.

Consequently, early and late he was to be seen there adorning the doorway.

It would seem as though he had been on the look-out for his new lodgers. Doubtless, the fact of their having paid so long in advance roused his curiosity.

Now, neither Jack nor Blueskin wished him to peruse their countenances, so affecting to take no notice, they brushed past him into the passage, which was very dark.

Jack spoke, for Blueskin feared that this man might know the tones of his voice.

"Where is the landlord?" he asked.

"Who are you?" asked the shoemaker, trying in vain to pierce the gloom and obtain a glimpse of his lodgers' countenances.

"We are Jones and Smith," said Jack, "and have come to take possession of the attic which our friend took for us."

"Oh! indeed gentlemen; very well; of course. I will show you the way upstairs. Wife! wife!"

"Well," cried a sharp, acerb voice, "what now?"

"A light, to show the gentlemen upstairs."

There was a moment's silence, and then, from the lower regions of the house, there came the faint flashing of a light.

The shoemaker stepped forward and took a candle out of his wife's hand before she could get up to the top of the kitchen stairs.

"This way," he said, "this way," holding the light as high above his head as he could, in the endeavour to obtain a glimpse of his visitors.

But both had their hats drawn so close down over their brows, and the candle itself gave out such an insufficient light, that he was able to see little or nothing.

Besides which Jack said rapidly—

"Lead the way upstairs; make haste, because we have no time to spare."

The shoemaker had no resource but to obey, so up he went, without his curiosity being gratified.

The stairs did, indeed, seem endless, but at length the top of them was reached, and they were ushered into the attic.

"Leave the candle," said Jack, taking it out of the landlord's hand as he spoke, and shutting the door in his face.

Very indignantly the shoemaker stumped downstairs, and poured out his sorrows to his wife.

"Ah!" said she, in an oracular tone of voice, "that surverin means something."

"But what?"

"Something is going to happen; mark my words, if there isn't."

And this was all that could be elicited.

But leaving the landlord of the lodging-house and his wife, we will turn our attention to the proceedings of others in whom the reader must feel a much greater amount of interest.

No sooner was the door closed than Jack Sheppard shot a bolt into its socket.

He would have turned the key in the lock if there had been one.

But from that quarter they did not anticipate any interruption.

The attic was unfurnished, and the only place where they could put the candle was on the chimney-piece.

Our two friends then went to the window.

It was a small one, and opened upon two hinges like a door.

It was most convenient for their purpose.

Jack opened it, and crawled out on to the tiles.

He was quickly followed by Blueskin.

The night, like the preceding one, was a very dark one.

There was no moon, and not even a solitary star could be seen in the whole sky.

From the window the roof sloped down to a kind of a parapet, which was about eighteen inches high.

Our friends had to lower themselves down to this, and then stood in the gutter.

It was full of mud and water, but they could walk along without much trouble, and in a few minutes, by continuing in a westerly direction, they got fairly on to the roof of Wild's house.

The locality of the trap-door was of course well known to Blueskin and Jack. To the former from his residence with the thief-taker, and to the latter because he had once on a memorable occasion made his way through it.

On reaching it they crouched down on the tiles and listened.

But all was profoundly still.

Blueskin took his clasp-knife, and with the horn handle of it struck the trap-door in a peculiar manner.

Then he waited with patience for a response.

More than five minutes elapsed before it came.

That fleeting space of time seemed lengthened into half-an-hour by the waiters on the roof-top.

Then the welcome sound came to their ears of the withdrawal of a bolt.

It was followed by another similar sound, and then the trap-door was slowly raised.

Seeing this, Blueskin took hold of the edge of it and raised it up.

The moment he did so Steggs put his head through the aperture.

A scared look was on his face.

"Where is Wild?" Blueskin asked, without allowing him an opportunity to speak.

"Out! Can it be possible you are here?"

"Yes, why not?"

"Jonathan is like a maniac. He has learned from some one that you broke into his warehouse in the Horseferry, and took away six hundred pounds worth of silver ingots."

"Well, what of that?"

"He has gone there determined to hunt you down. He will track you, he says, until he runs you to earth."

"Pho! pho! Don't pay any attention to what he says. It's all rubbish. He has not got us, you see, and yet here we are on the top of his own house."

"I don't know how soon he may return."

"Never mind! We have made up our minds to take Edgworth Bess away this very night. It won't be safe for her to stay here any longer. You had better come too."

"You had better not try to-night."

"Why not?"

"Wild is so awfully savage."

"I know that," replied Blueskin, "and fully expected he would be, and that is why I thought to-night would be the best to achieve our purpose. But we are wasting time by talking here, and I am quite certain we have not a moment to spare. I shall keep watch here on the roofs; you keep guard on the stairs; Jack will descend and speak to Edgworth Bess."

"Come on, then, since you will have it so, though I should advise you to wait. The girl is quite safe where she is, and I will answer that no harm comes to her. Besides, while she is here, Jonathan is more at rest."

"It cannot be helped, Steggs. We have made up our minds to take her away, and all our arrangements are completed."

"I shall have to leave with you."

"So much the better."

"To remain in my present situation after she is gone would only be casting away my life."

"We cannot stay to unfold our plans now, Steggs, but you shall hear them shortly, and when they are made known to you, I am sure they will meet with your approval."

"Come on, then."

Steggs and Jack did not speak to each other, and there was a certain feeling of hostility between them that not even the present meeting could remove.

The latter, however, as soon as Steggs descended the ladder, by the aid of which he had reached the trap-door, followed him, and also down the attic stairs to the landing from which the door opened that led into the chamber where Edgworth Bess was confined.

Steggs, however, went to the head of the next flight of stairs and listened, but as he heard nothing suspicious, he waved his hand to Jack to stand aside while he entered the room and told Bess who was waiting for her, in order that in her surprise at seeing him she should not give vent to it in a cry which should alarm the house.

In the meanwhile, Jack, with a beating heart, stood on the landing listening for anything that might indicate the coming of his foes.

But in the thief-taker's house all was silent.

In fact, if Jack had known it, there could not have been any moment more propitious than the present.

The only persons now in the thief-taker's residence were Tonks and one of the band.

These two were both on duty.

One was on the lock at the front door.

The other on guard at the grating leading to the cells.

Jonathan Wild had been out some hours.

When the intelligence was brought to him that his warehouse in Westminster had been broken into and robbed, he did not require any one to tell him who were the thieves.

The existence of the place was known to but few persons, and there were fewer still who could have found their way into it.

Uttering the most awful curses that any one could conceive, Jonathan Wild had called his men together and rode to the Horseferry.

His determination was this.

When he arrived he would look all around for some clue as to the route taken by the robbers, and then, having once got upon the track, to follow it up, step by step, until he had them in his power.

But the mere relation of Jack's and Blueskin's adventures is enough to show that at present he had not succeeded in coming up with them.

CHAPTER CCXXVI.

JACK SHEPPARD'S HAPPINESS IS OF SHORT DURATION.

WITH a slow and steady step, and a look of extreme apprehension upon his face, Steggs came out of Edgworth Bess's room, and crossed the landing to where Jack stood.

"Enter," he said, "and be quick. Jonathan may return at any moment, and then all will be lost."

Jack Sheppard did not wait to hear the rest of this admonitory sentence, but hurried to the door.

It was partly closed.

He tapped upon the panel, and entered.

Then his ears were greeted with a faint but fervent cry of welcome.

Almost blind with emotion, he staggered forward, and through a kind of mist he caught sight of the form of she whom he loved better than all the world.

Then the next moment he felt her arms twined round his neck and her head upon his shoulder.

"Oh! Jack—Jack! You have come at last. I have for so long wished and expected you. You have come to save me, Jack, have you not? You will take me away from this hateful and terrible place—out of Jonathan Wild's power? Oh! Jack, I am so very glad to see you."

What Jack's feelings were at this moment no one could possibly tell.

He was in a kind of delirium, and scarcely conscious whether what was taking place was real or a distempered vision.

His heart swelled.

The sensation of joy which he experienced almost overcame him.

Loving her as he did, it was unspeakable rapture to hear her softly-uttered words and feel her arms around his neck.

Was he loved in return?

Could it be possible that she had for him similar feelings to those which he had in his breast for her.

He fancied so now.

It was not in his power to resist the influence which this feeling had over him.

Upon an impulse which he could not have controlled had instant death been the penalty of its gratification, he placed his arms around her slender form, and pressed her ardently against his breast.

At that moment he forgot the purport of the conversation he had had with Blueskin upon this very subject so short a time before.

He forgot their own perilous position.

Forgot that he was a condemned felon with a reward upon his head.

And where was he?

Instead of being far away and safe from all pursuit, there he was in a house that positively adjoined the prison of Newgate.

And not only that, he stood beneath the roof of his greatest and most implacable enemy.

The man who had over and over again sworn that he would bring him to the gallows, and since he swore that oath, had he not step by step urged him forward to his fatal destination.

But all that faded from Jack's mind.

He only felt that he loved—that he held the object of his love to his heart—that her head was resting upon his shoulder—that her arms were round his neck.

She had spoken to him words of kindness—she had expressed her reliance upon him. He had come to save her.

Can it be wondered at that all these things produced a kind of intoxication in Jack's mind.

It was Edgworth Bess, however, who first roused him from this state of bliss—from the only moment of pure happiness that he had ever known.

"Jack," she said, "Release me now—you hurt me. How came you here? Oh! fly—fly! If Jonathan Wild returned, what would become of us?"

"Jonathan Wild!" repeated Jack, for the word struck upon his ear like a jarring discord in the midst of sweet music. "I have a reckoning to pay off with that villain. Do not fear him, for you may already consider yourself out of his power."

"Oh! that is joyful news, indeed. Out of his power? Oh! Jack, I knew you would save me. I felt sure of it. I have waited a long—long time for you to take me away from here; but you have come at last."

"I have; and what is more, I have two trusty friends to aid me, and so you have nought to fear. United, we are a match for Jonathan Wild."

"One is Steggs."

"Yes, and the other is Blueskin."

"He has, indeed, proved himself a friend."

"One is on the landing outside, and the other is on the roofs above, keeping guard."

"On the roofs?"

"Yes. I ought to have told you. The only way we can manage is for you to escape by the roofs. We have taken an attic in the house next door, and to that we shall have to make our way."

"Oh! Jack, you do not know how much I would do to be free from the power of the villain Wild."

"That is all you will have to do. Our course is plain and straight before us. Everything is arranged."

"Then let us fly at once."

"Are you prepared?"

"Quite; and Steggs has told me that Wild is not in the house, though no one knows how soon he may return. Oh! let us fly at once, lest he should come back and find us here."

"We will; but believe me, I have dedicated my life to your service. I am a condemned man. Do not shudder. The crime of which I was accused I am as innocent of as you are yourself. But ere I die I have determined that I will see you in possession of your rights, and Jonathan Wild swinging on the triple-tree at Tyburn!"

"If any one deserved such a fate," said Edgworth Bess, "he does, and he has proved himself so inveterate a foe to me, that I could not pity him were such to be his fate to-morrow."

"Pity him!" said Jack, "I should think not. But surely his course of iniquity must be well nigh run out. The crimes he has committed are enough for the damnation of twenty men!"

"Hush, Jack. I do not like to hear you talk like that."

"He brought my father to the scaffold. He offended him in some way, I know not how, but let it be what it may, for that offence he swore that he should die at Tyburn! He kept his oath, and murdered my father."

"Oh! it is terrible."

"And then, myself. Malignant fate in some way threw us together. At the time even when you saw me first I was in his employ, and had I taken part with him against yourself I should probably never have incurred his hate and enmity in the way I have done. But you know the perils and the dangers through which I have had to pass, and solely on his account. Then he brought a false charge of murder against me—kept away the lawyer who was instructed to appear in my behalf—and caused me to be sentenced to death."

"Your wrongs are great, and so are mine, but in the end we shall triumph, and he will pay the penalty of his guilty acts. If I can do anything to bring about so desirable an end you may depend I shall. But I look upon his downfall as certain."

"We shall see," said Jack; but come, I forget myself. This is not the time for talk or explanations. Blueskin will be wondering where I am so long."

"Oh! yes, Jack. Fly now. I hope we shall have many opportunities of talking to each other."

Reluctantly Jack went to the door of the chamber.

He knew Steggs was there not a moment before, for he had seen him, but now he was nowhere to be found.

Jack's mind was always full of suspicion as regards Steggs, and he looked upon his absence in an unfavourable light.

It was not without much misgiving, too, that he noticed it.

Could it be possible that he had gone to betray him? That he was entrapped?

Taking his companion by the arm, who could tell by his looks and manner—for he said nothing—that something was wrong, he passed out of the chamber on to the landing.

But there was no Steggs to be seen.

He made his way to the top of the stairs that led down into the hall, and looked down and listened.

The moment, however, that he stooped to put himself in a listening attitude, he heard the sounds of some unusual disturbance taking place below.

There was the trampling of feet, the shouting of voices, and among these last Jack fancied he could distinguish the tones of his arch enemy, Jonathan Wild.

But before he could decide upon this, he heard some one ascending the stairs rapidly.

He drew back, and put his left arm around Edgworth Bess, who was half fainting with terror.

Jack coolly drew his sword from its sheath.

Then turned to the other flight of stairs leading up to the attics.

"Fly!" he said, "fly! Be quick, for your life! I will guard this staircase, and cover your escape. Make your way out on to the roofs. You will see a ladder on the landing above that will enable you to do so."

"No, no, Jack; I will not fly and leave you here. You must come with me, or I stay."

"No, no, that must not be. I can ascend the stairs much quicker than yourself. Go up, I pray you. Don't waste time in needless argument. Ascend, ascend. I will follow you."

Thus adjured, and half terrified by the vehemence and rapidity with which Jack spoke, Edgworth Bess ran up the stairs leading to the attics.

At the same moment Steggs reached the top of the other flight.

He looked heated, alarmed, and breathless.

Behind him Jack could hear some one else coming.

His heart told him it was Jonathan Wild.

The impression was firmly fixed upon Jack's mind that Steggs had betrayed him, and that conviction continued, although the first words Steggs spoke ought to have dissipated it.

"Fly!" he said, "fly! with all speed! Jonathan, by some means, has got upon your track, and is coming upstairs. Fly! fly!"

And Steggs came on up the attic stairs, which Jack gradually ascended sword in hand.

Edgworth Bess stood at the top.

"Villain!" cried Jack, his eyes still blinded by suspicion; "villain! you have already betrayed us to the rascally thief-taker, and now you wish to make our capture certain. Take that as a reward for your treachery!"

CHAPTER CCXXVII.

JACK SHEPPARD AND JONATHAN WILD HAVE A STRUGGLE ON THE ROOF-TOPS, AND THE LATTER HAS A NARROW ESCAPE OF HIS LIFE.

As Jack uttered these words in a loud and furious tone of voice, he made a sudden thrust with his sword at Steggs as he was ascending the stairs.

It was impossible to avoid the stroke.

The plunge was a rapid and a vigorous one.

The sharp bright sword pierced his breast, and uttering a yell of agony, Steggs fell backwards down the stairs.

Jack Sheppard hardly stayed to see the consequences of this rash and foolish act, but turned and ran upstairs himself.

Bess was before him.

She had witnessed what had taken place, and was almost too horrified to move or speak.

Steggs had shown himself her friend on so many occasions, and done her so many services, that she had grown to like him, and was quite assured of his fidelity.

"There is the ladder," cried Jack. "Haste, haste, or it will be too late! You will find Blueskin above."

"Here I am," said a voice, and immediately a ray of light from the trap-door above was sent down upon the landing.

It was Blueskin, who held a dark lantern in his hand.

Edgworth Bess saw the ladder, and commenced ascending it.

"Be quick, Blue! Steggs has betrayed us to Wild, but he has paid for his treachery with his death! Take Bess up and over the roofs safely. I will stay behind, and cover the retreat. Quick, I say, or Jonathan will be upon us! Ha! he is here!"

Jonathan had by the greatest chance escaped being thrown down by the body of Steggs, but he had just time to step back.

He paused for a moment, and then ran up the attic stairs, all the time calling lustily to his men to follow him.

Blueskin took in the aspect of affairs at a glance, and, stooping down, caught hold of Bess by both her arms, and drew her up through the trap-door.

Jack Sheppard ran to the foot of the ladder and ascended it rapidly.

He was in hopes of being able to reach the top and get on to the roof in time to either draw the ladder up after him or throw it down so as to impede the progress of his foe.

But Jonathan was too close behind him.

His feet were on the lowest rounds of the ladder before Jack could get on to the roof.

Passion lent Jonathan strength and speed, and he ascended the ladder with marvellous quickness.

But, on reaching the roof above, Jack once more grew calm and cool.

Blueskin had not got far off with Edgworth Bess, and they would have some awkward ridges to surmount before they reached the window leading into the attic of the next door house.

Jack did not know the reason then, but we may as well acquaint the reader with it now.

It was well that Blueskin caught hold of the poor girl and drew her through the trap-door on to the roof in the manner we have recorded. Had he not done so, she could never have got out by her own powers.

Although much better than she had been, she was far from recovered from her dangerous illness. She found herself even weaker than she anticipated.

The excitement, too, of her unexpected meeting with Jack—the sudden appearance of Wild—and the encounter with Steggs, all had their full effect upon her debilitated frame.

Indeed, we have hinted that on the landing, when Jack put his arm around her and led her to the bottom of the stairs, she was in a half-fainting condition.

But on the ladder, as soon as Jack pronounced the words in reference to Wild, "He is here!" she involuntarily turned round and caught sight of the countenance of the villainous thief-taker, which was fully revealed by the light of the lantern.

Her strength seemed then to utterly desert her, and Blueskin caught hold of her at a most opportune moment: otherwise she would have fallen to the ground.

By the dead weight she hung upon his hands, Blueskin guessed what had taken place, and when she was fairly outside he found his worst forebodings were confirmed.

She was in a swoon.

This was an unlooked-for dilemma.

However, he took her in his arms, and carried her for a short distance, until indeed, owing to the awkward slopes of the tiles, it became impossible to carry her any longer.

Then he placed her down carefully.

How was he to revive her?

He felt hot and cold by turns as he thought Jonathan would be upon them ere they could make good their escape.

He felt in his pockets, and the first thing his hand encountered was a flask containing some brandy.

This, he imagined, would go farther towards reviving her than anything else he could find, so, hastily pulling out the cork, he poured no inconsiderable quantity of the burning fluid down her throat.

The effect was instantaneous.

She gasped violently for a moment, and then recovered. Blueskin looked behind him.

He saw Jack standing, with his sword drawn, over the trap-door through which he had come.

The only way in which he could aid him was, as he knew, to make all speed with Edgworth Bess to the attic window, and this he at once set about.

With these few words of explanation why they did not go further in the time than they did, we will leave them, and turn our attention to Jack Sheppard.

As Blueskin had seen, he was standing with his sword drawn.

Jonathan Wild reached the top of the ladder, and saw his adversary there ready to receive him.

But nothing daunted by the advantageous position of his foe, Jonathan drew his own hanger from its sheath, and held it before him to guard his person.

Jack did not speak.

His whole attention was centred upon his adversary, and not the slightest movement that he made escaped his vision.

As yet Jonathan Wild was out of his reach, or he would have assuredly attacked him.

Cautiously, however, Jonathan mounted the ladder.

Then, with his sword ready for action, he made a sudden and impetuous rush upwards.

Jack saw him coming.

But almost before he could strike at his foe he was standing on the roof.

In an instant Wild pressed forward and attacked his foe with his heavy hanger.

Jack, however, stood firmly.

Now the advantage was on Wild's side.

Jack was not skilled in the use of the sword, and Jonathan was.

Moreover, the thief-taker had a style of fighting peculiar to himself, and which would have embarrassed even an accomplished fencer.

He relied altogether upon the vigorous delivery of heavy blows, brought down with the whole strength of his arm, and such as would break through any guard.

But Jack fought bravely against him during the few seconds that the conflict lasted.

Suddenly, however, Jonathan Wild, with one of his heavy blows, whisked his sword out of his hand.

Away it went whirling through the air, until it fell with a clattering sound upon the tiles.

And now, if Jonathan had wished to have taken Jack's life, he could most assuredly have done so.

But to have slain him with his own hand would not have satisfied his revenge.

Nor would it have allowed him to fulfill his oath.

Jack Sheppard, he resolved, should swing at Tyburn.

Dropping his own sword, then, he made a rush forward before Jack was aware of his intentions, and grasped him by the throat.

Then a furious struggle commenced.

Jonathan evidently thought that when it came to a hand-to-hand encounter, his superior strength would make the contest a brief one.

But he was mistaken.

Jack's muscles were like steel.

Backwards and forwards they went, now up the sloping roof, then down, reeling alarmingly near the open trap-door, which yawned for them like a grave, and so close to the low parapet which bounded the roof, that it seemed as though they must fall over it.

But they did not.

Then Jack managed to break from Wild's grasp.

With the swiftness of lightning he turned and fled.

But Wild was after him instantly, and caught hold of the skirt of Jack's coat as he climbed up the angular tiling.

Jack's hold was a frail one, and this almost pulled him down, but he struggled manfully, and grasped the edge from which the roof sloped down on both sides.

Needless, however, of his neck, Jonathan scrambled after him, and overtook him ere he could begin the descent.

Then in this perilous position, was their struggle renewed with redoubled fury.

But Jonathan soon got the advantage again over his opponent.

He forced Jack down.

Both were then compelled to release the hold which they had kept upon the tiles.

The consequence was that they slipped down with rather alarming rapidity.

Jack was undermost.

Wild's hands were tight upon his throat.

The sharp edges of the red tiles cut his head, tore his clothes, and grazed his skin as he slipped down with Wild upon him.

He gave himself up for lost.

But unexpected assistance suddenly presented itself.

Blueskin had safely reached the attic window with Edgworth Bess.

He had placed her in the room, requesting her not to stir while he went to effect Jack Sheppard's rescue.

The poor girl promised to obey.

He, however, made his arrival just in time to save his comrade.

He had a large pistol in his hand, but he was afraid to fire for fear of hitting Jack.

He grasped it by the barrel, and got as near the combatants as he could.

Then, seeing an opportunity, he brought the butt end down with full force upon Wild's head.

The blow was an awful one, and sufficient to extinguish life.

The thief-taker relaxed his grasp, and rolled down the roof towards the parapet.

CHAPTER CCXXVIII.

JONATHAN WILD GIVES OUR FRIENDS A GREAT DEAL OF TROUBLE.

BLUESKIN stretched out his other hand, and clutched Jack Sheppard, thus arresting his descent.

Jack soon aided himself.

But no such aid was vouchsafed to Wild.

If not dead, he was certainly insensible, for no one could have received such a blow as that without losing consciousness.

He rolled down the tiles, then, and at length came with a dull crash against the low parapet.

There it was thought he would have stayed.

But an ominous cracking, crashing noise followed.

The parapet was old and rotten, and quite unable to stand against such a blow as that which Wild's body gave it.

It crumbled away in a large mass, and the whole, Jonathan Wild and all, disappeared from the eyes of our two friends, who were much startled by this unexpected occurrence.

Jack Sheppard, however, recovered himself instantly, and, not without some misgiving, they went to see what had become of their foe.

"He is done for at last, I do believe," said Blueskin. "I should never have thought it, for I have considered from the first that he was destined for the gallows, but it seems not."

"Don't make too sure," said Jack. "I have known him have as narrow an escape as this. Wait till we look down."

They now reached the edge, and not trusting the parapet so much as to lean against it, they looked down.

Beneath them was the yard at the back of Wild's house.

Just below, and not many feet off, was a roof belonging to some outbuilding, and on the top of this roof was a large water-tank or cistern.

It was uncovered.

Jonathan Wild had fallen into this.

He was not dead.

So thick was his skull, that the blow he received only partially stunned him.

The cistern, which providentially was just under where he fell, was almost full of water, and he fell into it with a tremendous splash.

The sudden contact with the cold water restored him so far to his senses that he struggled about, and finally stood up.

The water then reached to his breast.

More our two friends did not wait to see, but made the best of their way to the attic where they knew Edgworth Bess would be anxiously and impatiently awaiting their return.

From Jonathan Wild they would have nothing to fear, for a little while at least.

But, then, there were his men.

How it was they had not long before this made their appearance upon the scene was more than they could tell.

They did not know, however, the extent of Wild's precautions in this matter, nor how he had disposed his forces so as to make their capture certain.

Indeed, they thought their danger was very nearly over. Certainly all they would have to do would be to join their horses as quickly as possible and make the best of their way off.

The attic window was reached in perfect safety, and without any further molestation.

Edgworth Bess could not suppress a cry of joy when she saw them enter. She had been in a state of terrible, anxiety, and suspense ever since she had been left, and the sounds of strife, which had of course reached her ears, filled her with the utmost dread, and more than once she had been upon the point of going to them, only she remembered the promise which she had given to Blueskin not to stir.

Now she was rewarded for having obeyed it by seeing them return safe and unhurt.

They soon passed through the window into the attic and closed it.

The candle, which had been stuck against the corner of the mantelpiece, was still burning, though a preternaturally long wick dimmed its light.

But Blueskin snuffed it, and then the three fugitives could see each other's faces.

Jack Sheppard carried the marks of the harsh usage he had received both upon his face and his apparel.

But although he was scratched, and had bled a little, still he was not much hurt.

"What shall we do now?" asked Bess.

"That is just what I think requires a little consideration," said Blueskin; "good gracious, what's that?"

A succession of the most awful howls which any one could possibly imagine arose as Blueskin uttered these last words.

"It's Johnny," said Jack; "he does'n't seem to like his cold bath."

"Yes; that is Jonathan's voice, beyond the slightest doubt."

"What an awful noise he makes."

"He does; and if we have not already alarmed the whole neighbourhood with our uproar, his howls are sure to do it. Hark at that!"

"Yes, Blueskin, my friend, you must take that into consideration."

"What?"

"Our having alarmed the neighbourhood."

"I know that."

"We must be careful now how we proceed; I can see our troubles are not half over yet."

"No, confound it, I was in hopes they were."

"So was I, but they certainly are not."

"If the neighbourhood is alarmed."

"Say, if it is on the alert."

"Well, on the alert. What had we better do?"

"I think it would be hardly safe to do as we at first proposed."

"What, walk downstairs, and out of the front door into Newgate-street?"

"Yes."

"Certainly not. I shouldn't wonder if there's not quite a mob of people there."

"Nor I."

"Or else, what is more likely, some of Jonathan's men are stationed to keep watch upon the houses."

"You may depend upon it that has been done."

"Steggs told him, doubtless, that we intended to effect our escape."

"Ah! you said something about Steggs having betrayed us to Wild?"

"Yes, I know I did."

"Did he?"

"Betray us?"

"Yes."

"Certainly he did."

"How do you know?"

"While I was in the room with Edgworth Bess, he slipped off downstairs, and brought Wild up with him."

"Did he?"

"Yes, he did."

"And have you slain him?"

"I don't know. I met him on the stairs, and gave him a few inches of steel in his chest."

"What then?"

"He fell backwards downstairs."

"How awkward."

"I knew he would play us false. I said so from the first."

"I think Jack has been led into error through his dislike," said Edgworth Bess, joining in the conversation.

"Why so?"

"I believe Steggs to have been faithful towards us. He might have gone downstairs to see whether Wild had come home, so as to give us warning, which he seemed to be doing."

"I'll lay my life that's it, Jack."

"I don't think it."

"I do, and you will find you have made another enemy, for now Steggs will be nothing but a foe to us, and from the fact of his knowing all our plans, we shall be almost certain to be overmatched by Wild."

"You can keep to your opinion of the matter and I'll keep to mine," said Jack, rather angrily. "I think we ought to be talking about something else just now. How are we to get out of this house? If we stay here much longer, Jonathan will walk in and take us prisoners."

"Ask yourself," said Blueskin, who was chafed to think Jack had acted so hastily as he had with Steggs. "Ask yourself. Why do you apply to me?"

An angry response was on Jack's lips, but Bess spoke, and turned it aside.

"Do not quarrel now," she said. "I will ask you not to quarrel for my sake, because I believe both of you wish to see me in safety."

"We do, we do," they replied, with one voice.

"Prove it, then, by thinking upon the best means of taking me from here."

"We will."

"I ask your pardon, Jack," said Blueskin; "let the affair for the present be forgotten. We shall doubtless learn soon enough which of us is in the right."

"With all my heart."

"Let us devise our escape."

"We abandon our first idea?"

"Utterly. You see, by this time Newgate-street will be full, and, as you said just now, Wild's men are doubtless set to watch the houses."

"I can't understand the affair altogether."

"In what way?"

"Why did Wild come out on the roof alone?"

"That was strange."

"Very. I heard him calling to his men as he came up the stairs."

"Well."

"Not one replied or made his appearance, nor did there, as you know, during our conflict with him, nor has there now."

"It certainly does seem strange. Now do you know what I always think when I see anything strange in Wild's conduct?"

"No."

"I mean anything that we can't exactly understand."

"Just so; what do you think?"

"I think he is playing some very deep game, indeed, and that it is doubly necessary for us to have our senses awake."

"I am entirely of your opinion there."

"Well, then, let us be careful what we do."

"We must be."

"Now, if we could only ascertain one thing."

"What?"

"Whether the house is watched."

"It can be done."

[THE ESCAPE FROM THE SUBTERRANEAN PASSAGE.]

"How?"

"I will find out myself."

"How?"

"Why I?"

"What makes you stop?"

"Hark!"

As soon as Jack Sheppard uttered the word Hark! his two companions, as well as himself, instantly assumed listening attitudes.

CHAPTER CCXXIX.

JACK SHEPPARD AND HIS FRIENDS HEAR A FOOTSTEP ON THE STAIRS.

THE sound which had caught his quick ear soon increased in loudness, and manifested itself.

It was a footstep on the stairs.

A sneaking, cautious footstep, as though some one was trying to come up some creaking stairs as quietly as possible.

What were our friends to make of this?

They exchanged glances, and then listened again.

Up came the person, nearer and nearer to the attic door.

All three almost held their breath.

At length the footstep reached the threshold of the door.

There it paused.

Then followed a rustling, scratching noise.

Our friends knew what occasioned it.

Some one was feeling for the latch.

They looked towards it.

They saw it raised slowly, and a slight pressure against the door.

But it was held fast shut by the little bolt which Jack had shot into the socket.

The latch was dropped again, and a pause took place in the proceedings of the person outside.

A great deal of secrecy and silence was desired, that was certain

But what could be the motive for the surreptitious attempt to enter the room?
That at present was a mystery.
Time alone would clear it up.
But what was the person outside going to do next?
Was he a friend or foe?
The latter most likely, for what friends had those two fugitives got in all the wide world?
Not one.

By the aid of the candle which was glimmering on the mantle-shelf, they looked in each others' faces as these thoughts passed through their minds.

They were afraid to communicate with each other, except by signs.

Suddenly they were startled by a fresh sound manifesting itself at the door.

"Tap—tap—tap!"

That was the sound.

It was as though some one had struck the door with the extreme points of their fingers, or rather with their nails.

As no notice was taken of it, the tapping was renewed. Doubtless, like the reader, our friends were unable to tell what to think of this.

The worst of it was, they could not deliberate.

But Blueskin looked at Jack as much as to ask what he thought was best to be done.

Jack responded with a nod, as though he had made up his mind to adopt some plan of action.

At the same time he noiselessly took one step nearer the door.

Then he stooped down, and, with the utmost care, withdrew the little bolt which he had previously taken such pains to shoot into the socket.

His two companions watched his actions eagerly and anxiously.

No audible sound was produced by the withdrawal of the bolt, and this was in some measure due to the fact that, at the moment when Jack drew it back, the person outside, whoever it might be, renewed the tapping on the panel, and this time with greater loudness than before.

Jack rose to his full height.

He put his left hand upon the latch, and slowly lifted it up.

He had his right arm ready for action.

Then, with the greatest suddenness, he pulled the door open.

At the same moment he darted out his right arm, and clutched hold of something.

Without waiting a second to ascertain what it was that he had caught hold of, he, by an exertion of strength, pulled the object of which he had taken hold into the room, and closed the door.

So suddenly was all this done, that Blueskin and Edgworth Bess could scarcely believe that it had taken place.

No alarm had been given.

But they were not long in doubting the reality of what had occurred, for tight in Jack's grasp was the landlord of the lodging-house.

The sudden and summary treatment he had received had filled him with surprise, nor had he yet recovered himself sufficiently to attempt the least resistance.

But, thinking that in all probability it would not be long before he did, Blueskin hastened to give his assistance.

Jack motioned to Edgworth Bess to bolt the door again, so as to secure them from all other intruders.

The heiress understood him, and immediately obeyed the sign.

The landlord was on the floor in a half-sitting half-kneeling posture.

He looked the picture of fright.

Blueskin held him at one side.

Jack Sheppard at the other.

The latter now produced a pistol from his pocket, which he very deliberately cocked.

Byron has very truly said—

It has a sharp quick ray upon the ear,
That cocking of a pistol, when you know
A moment more will bring the sight to bear
Upon your person.

And so the landlord thought, as the changing colour of his countenance fully testified.

Jack, however, was not content with merely cocking the pistol.

He saw the effect which that action had upon the landlord's nerves, and he wished to heighten it as much as possible.

Accordingly he turned the barrel of the pistol round, and pressed it in a very disagreeable manner against the landlord's forehead.

Then, and not till then, did this worthy find his voice.

In a faint tone he gasped out—

"Mercy—mercy!"

"You have need to make such a supplication," said Jack.

"Have mercy upon me."

"Do you feel that?"

"Yes—oh!—yes."

"Do you know what it is?"

"Mercy!"

"No, it is not mercy. It is the muzzle of a loaded pistol pressing against your forehead. I daresay it has made quite a mark. My finger is on the trigger. One touch and your brains would plaster the wall behind you."

"Oh! mercy—mercy!"

This time the tone of voice in which he spoke was a perfect howl.

"Silence," cried Jack. "Another such a sound as that, and you are assuredly a dead man. Do you understand?"

"Yes; but have mercy upon me."

"Your life is in my power, to take it or not as I think fit."

"I know it is, good sir; but have mercy."

"That will depend entirely on yourself."

"On myself?"

"Yes."

"How, good sir? how?"

"I will tell you the one chance you have of saving your miserable life. And yet, what's the good, you won't take it, I know, so I may as well kill you at once."

"No—no. Mercy! I will take the chance. Only let me have the opportunity. I would rather do anything than have my life taken at once."

"I can hear you are a sensible man."

"Yes, good sir. I hope to please you. Have mercy, and give me the chance you spoke of."

"I will. You must tell me at once, and truly, what made you creep upstairs and try to get into this room."

"I, good sir?"

"Yes, you: and understand me, that one of the chances of saving your life depends upon your telling me, not only truly, but quickly. We heard you creep up stairs and lift the latch and try to enter. Now tell us your reason for so doing."

The landlord hesitated and stammered.

"Beware!" said Jack, significantly, and he pressed the pistol yet more closely against his forehead.

"I was sent up, good sir."

"Ah! by whom?"

"One of the gentlemen downstairs."

"What gentlemen? Quick. I am impatient."

"One of Mr. Wild's gentlemen."

"Oh!"

"Which one?"

"Mr. Arnold, sir."

Jack and Blueskin looked at each other uneasily.

"Go on," said the former.

"I have told you sir."

"But not all I want to know. What did Mr. Arnold, as you call him, send you up for?"

"To see whether you were in the attic."

"Oh! indeed. Do you know us?"

"I know two of you."

"Do you really? Then I am afraid you are in possession of a very dangerous piece of knowledge."

"Who am I?"

"Jack Sheppard; and there is a reward of five hundred pounds out for your apprehension."

"That need not interest you, for you will never get it, take my word for that. And who is this on the other side of you?"

"Blueskin."

"How do you know it? Tell me on your life."

"I fancied it was you from the first, and then—"

"Then what?"

"When Mr. Wild's gentlemen came and took possession of the front door, and they told me they were on the watch for you in case you should try and get into the street?"

"Oh! what else?"

"Then I told them about you taking the top attic, and so we agreed that I should come up and see whether you were in it."

"And what else? Tell your whole plot, or your life will pay the forfeit."

"If you were here?"

"Curse you, go on. You tire my patience."

"Oh! there is nothing more."

"Go on, I tell you. I know there is more. One—two three. Will you speak?"

"Oh! dear, yes. Anything to spare my life. I was to come in, you know, if I could, and speak to you, and try to take you downstairs."

"That was it, was it? and then they would have comfortably nabbed us."

"I am afraid they would."

"I don't know whether you are more knave than fool."

"Whichever you like, sir."

"But anyhow you have need to tremble for your life. You have sided with our enemies, and have tried to betray us to them, and your life must pay the penalty."

"No—no! Have mercy. You told me you would spare my life if I told you all. I have told you. Have mercy!"

"Are you sure you have told us all? Reflect a moment and refresh your memory before you reply. Are you sure you have told us all?"

"Yes, I am quite sure."

"Then what excuse have you to offer for your conduct? We came here as lodgers—we paid you liberally for your accommodation; then what right had you to betray us?"

"You forget the reward."

"And it was that which tempted you, was it?"

"It was."

"And nothing else?"

"Nothing else."

"It was not because you had any spite against me and wished to see me scragged?"

"Not a bit of it. You never did me any harm, and I don't suppose you ever would."

"Of course I should not."

"I rather like you than otherwise, and I should be as sorry as anybody to know you had come to grief."

"But did not you wish to render Wild a service if you could?"

"Not a bit of it. I don't like him well enough."

"It was only the reward that you wanted?"

"That is all, indeed. You see I am a poor man, and the temptation was greater than I could withstand."

"Well, if that is the state of the case, of course there is some excuse for you."

"Do you think so?"

"Yes, I do."

"Then you will spare me?"

"That depends upon your conduct. I want to call your attention to something."

"To what?"

"How many of Wild's men are there downstairs?"

"Do you mean in the street as well?"

"Yes."

"About twenty."

"Oh! about twenty. Now, of course, if your little plan had succeeded you would have expected the reward to be shared out among you?"

"Ye-ye-yes."

"You didn't think you would have the whole of the reward to yourself, did you?"

"No, I suppose not."

"Of course not. Now just attend to me for a moment, will you?"

"Oh! yes."

"Now I should think the least that could be done, would be for the reward to be equally divided among you. Shouldn't you?"

"I expect that is what they would want."

"To be sure; and very fair it would be, I take it. Now you said there were twenty of Wild's men downstairs."

"About twenty."

"Well, say there were twenty, counting yourself as one.

Now, if so, it follows that the reward must be divided into twenty portions."

"Yes, but what of that?"

"I will tell you in a moment, if you will pay attention. The reward, you say, is five hundred pounds. Now that, divided by twenty, will give just twenty-five pounds apiece for you."

"I suppose it would."

"Now that to me appears a very trifling sum of money."

"I don't say it mightn't, but it seems a great deal to a poor man with a large family."

"That's right enough, but you don't seem to have included one thing in your calculations."

"What?"

"Why, that you exposed your life—that, indeed, you were more likely to lose it than not. Now, do you mean to tell me that you only estimate your life to be worth twenty-five pounds?"

CHAPTER CCXXX.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD COMPEL THE LODGING-HOUSE KEEPER TO CONNIVE AT THEIR ESCAPE.

THIS seemed to be quite a fresh view of the case to the lodging-house keeper, and he looked at Jack with a puzzled air.

"I might not have lost my life," he said, at length.

"But you stood a very good chance of it, for you might be sure we are neither of us the right sort to give in easily, and we should have made a point of shooting you, if we shot no one else."

"Oh! should you?"

"Certainly we should, because we should consider that Wild's men were doing only what they were told, and what they conceived to be their duty, while you travelled out of your way to aid them."

The landlord made no reply to this.

Jack continued.

"Now there is another view of the case which you ought to have taken before you agreed to side with Wild's men. I have put it as being all fair and straightforward. Now we will just suppose that you had succeeded in capturing us, and had not lost your life. In fact, that all had gone on in the most satisfactory manner conceivable, which is not very likely. Still, we will suppose it. Now, do you think that Wild's men would have troubled themselves about your having your share of the reward? Of course they wouldn't. You know, as well as I do, that the first thing they would set about doing would be how to cheat you out of your due, so as to have all the money among themselves."

"I never looked at it in that light," said the landlord.

"I know you didn't, and that is why I am putting the case to you. But you ought to have done before you embarked yourself in such a perilous undertaking. You ought to have considered the matter over."

"I wanted the money."

"And you are sure that was the sole motive?"

"Quite sure."

"Then, you just look here. Suppose now you had come up to us and said Wild's men are downstairs and want you. Now, if I tell them you are here, all I shall get if they catch you is twenty-five pounds. Now, how much will you give me if I show you how to make your escape?"

The landlord had been a good deal startled by what Jack had said to him, but this last supposition thoroughly astonished him.

"I am a dolt—an ass—a blockhead—that's what I am. In fact, I'm more, for I am a d—d fool."

"Just so. That is what I thought, but I hardly liked to say it."

"Well, then, I say it again myself. I am a d—d fool."

"You think it would have answered your purpose best to have tried to make terms with us?"

"Of course I do."

"You might depend we should be willing to give a great deal more than twenty-five pounds if we were allowed to get off. Now, don't you think we should?"

"Think? I am sure you would."

"And so you see, not only would you have got more money, but you would have run no risk of your life whatever. Now you see it is in the greatest possible peril, for, if I liked, I could take it this moment."

"But you won't?"

"I don't know that. We have made up our minds not to be caught."

"How shall you escape?"

"That we have to decide, but I wanted to bring you to your proper senses first, and then talk about that afterwards."

"But it is no good thinking about it now, I suppose?"

"Well, not much. You see the case is quite altered, but you know now how it would have been if you had your proper senses about you. But we must dictate the terms. Your life is in our power. Now, what will you do to save it?"

"Do? do? Oh! do? Why, you promised to have mercy if I told you all."

"I know I did, but I didn't promise that I should not take your life, or, if I did, I didn't mean it. Now, then, we will propose some terms to you, and, if you agree to them, your life will be spared, but most certainly not without."

"What are the terms?"

"I will satisfy you. They are simple, and won't take long to tell. You must in some way manage to let us escape from this place. You can do it or not, just as you please, but the moment you refuse, out go your brains, for I should think no more of shooting you than I should of shooting a dog."

"Oh! mercy!"

"You hear what Jack says," said Blueskin, for the first time taking part in the conversation, "so just tell us at once whether you say yes or no."

"I wish I could say yes."

"And what is to prevent you?"

"The thing is impossible."

"How so?"

"Jonathan's men are in the house on guard."

"What of that?"

"You cannot escape."

"Well then, you must die," said Blueskin. "Pull the trigger, Jack, and put the poor fellow out of his misery. Besides, we have got no time to spare, and have wasted too much already."

"Speak," said Jack. "I want to be merciful. Will you help us to escape? Yes or no?"

"Say yes, and I will give you ten pounds into the bargain," said Blueskin, who knew quite as well as Jack that the only chance they had was to get out of the house by the connivance of the landlord, and that was the reason they had taken so much trouble with him as they had.

This offer of Blueskin's to give ten pounds in addition had a marked effect upon the landlord.

Money generally will do away with a great many impossibilities.

He ventured to ask a rather momentous question.

"Have you got the money about you?" he said.

"Of course we have," replied Blueskin. "You don't think we should want you to trust us? Look here."

As he spoke, Blueskin took ten guineas out of his pocket, and jingled them in his hand.

"They are yours," he added, "if you will just show us the way out."

The landlord sighed as he said—

"I wish I could."

"Why can't you?"

"Wild's men."

"Tell them you made a mistake."

"They won't believe me."

"Send them away."

"How could I do that?"

"I leave it to your own ingenuity."

"It's quite impossible."

"Haven't you got a back door of some kind?"

"Oh! yes."

"Do Wild's men guard that?"

"No."

"Then why not let us out of that?"

"Where could you go?"

"Wherever it took us."

"But it won't take you anywhere. You can get out into the yard, to be sure, but how are you to get out of the yard?"

"I don't know. Take us down, and then we will see."

"It's very hazardous."

"Not half so hazardous as your first undertaking. Do you agree to take us into the yard?"

"Yes."

"And without the knowledge of Wild's men?"

"Yes."

"Then, if you will do that, we shall be quite content. You leave the risk to us."

"Very well. If you consent to those terms I do."

"Good. Then the ten guineas are yours. But look you, Mister Landlord, we intend to be very careful of you."

"How careful?"

"Why, that you don't try to play a double game, and after all lead us into the claws of our enemies."

"You need not be afraid."

"Well, perhaps not; but still there is no harm in taking precautions. So, please to understand this. You will not receive the ten guineas until we stand in safety in the yard, and from now until that happy moment I will keep hold of your arm, and Jack will hold the pistol to your forehead in the same pleasant manner as he has done throughout the interview. It will answer a double purpose. It will enable us to place confidence in you, and it will remind you of the fact that your life depends upon your own actions."

"Trust me," said the landlord. "I don't want to see you captured, and I don't want to throw away my life. It won't be a very easy matter, I daresay, but I will try my best to take you into the yard, and then I shall leave you to shift for yourselves."

"Well, then, let that be the understanding, and, to play fair with you, I will give these ten guineas into the hands of this young lady who we have rescued from Wild's house, and she will give them to you as soon as we reach the yard."

The landlord seemed to be well pleased with this arrangement, and at once signified his readiness to take them by endeavouring to rise to his feet.

This our two friends permitted him to do.

Then, at their request, Edgworth Bess unfastened the door and threw it open.

As they had said, Blueskin and Jack still retained their hold upon the person of the landlord, and the latter pressed the pistol against his temples.

"Listen," said Blueskin to Edgworth Bess, "and tell us whether you can hear anything of our foes."

Edgworth Bess went to the top of the stairs, and, leaning over the balusters, listened intently.

"All is well, I think," she said, at length. "I can hear nothing."

"Come on, then. You, Bess, I think, had better follow us. We three will go down together."

It really did seem as though the landlord was quite sincere, and fully intended to do what he had promised, but then he had cogent reasons for his sincerity, since, if he had played false, he would certainly have sacrificed his own life.

In this way, then, they made their way down the narrow attic stairs.

It was impossible for them to walk all three abreast, so the way they managed was this.

Blueskin went first.

He had hold of the landlord's arm, who followed next.

Then came Jack, who had hold of his other hand, and held the pistol to his head.

Edgworth Bess followed her two friends, under the impression that that would be the safest plan for her to adopt.

In this way they proceeded in total darkness, until they reached the landing at the top of the next flight of stairs, and at this point they paused and listened.

But from below there came no sounds indicative of their foes.

They resumed their descent with more confidence.

The house was a very high one, and, as the chamber they had just left was situated at the very top of it, the number of stairs they had to go down was something prodigious.

But they descended them in safety, and, so far as they could tell, without raising any alarm.

At length the landlord said in a whisper—

"We must not go any lower."

"Why not?"

"This is the first floor, and down them stairs takes you into the hall in which are Jonathan's men."

"The devil! Then how are we to reach the yard?"

"I'll show you, but don't speak a word more than you are obliged, and always in the lowest possible whisper, for fear we should be overheard."

"All right; but show us how to reach the yard."

"I will. Just on your right hand there is a door; knock at it very quietly."

Bess executed the order.

In the profound darkness that was upon the landing-place, Edgworth Bess would never have been able to see the door alluded to, only within the room into which it opened was a light, and as the door fitted badly in its frame, a line of light could be seen running completely round it.

With this for a guide, Edgworth Bess easily found the door, and she tapped lightly upon the panel of it, according to the landlord's direction.

The other three stood close beside her, and waited for their summons to be responded to.

"I'll speak as soon as they open the door. You will find it all right."

"We will trust you so far."

A step could now be heard approaching, and the next moment the door was flung open.

A woman appeared upon the threshold.

She carried a lighted candle in her hand.

She looked rather alarmed when she saw so large a party, and seemed very much inclined to scream.

Probably she would have done so had not the familiar tones of the landlord's voice struck upon her ear, and then she surmised that all was well.

"It's all right, Mrs. Perry," said the landlord, in a very low voice. "Let me and my friends come into your room, and we will tell you what we want."

The woman addressed as Mrs. Perry, and who occupied the first-floor back, made no demur to this, but stepped aside and allowed the little party to enter.

Edgworth Bess closed the door in a moment, and stood with her back towards it, and then Mrs. Perry discovered that the landlord was held as a prisoner.

Before, however, she could make any remark upon the subject, the landlord spoke, and from what he said it appeared very clear that he meant to keep faith with our friends.

"This is no time for explanations, Mrs. Perry," he said; "I will, though, tell you all by-and-bye. In the meantime, take my word for it that everything is quite right and proper. Time is precious. We don't want your help in any way that I know of, so long as you do not obstruct us."

The woman made no reply to this, but stood stock still with her eyes wide open with astonishment, until at length, her astonishment increasing the longer she reflected and the more she saw, her limbs refused to any longer support her, and she dropped down upon a chair, which providentially happened to be behind her.

In the meanwhile the landlord proceeded to explain his intentions, not by speech but actions, and our friends soon comprehended by what means they were to reach the yard.

They were simple enough.

CHAPTER CCXXXI.

REVERTS TO THE ACTIONS OF JONATHAN WILD AFTER HE FELL OFF THE ROOF-TOPS INTO THE WATER-TANK.

As we have before stated, Mrs. Perry occupied that room which was always designated as the first-floor back.

From this our readers will be at no loss to know its exact position in the house, and therefore further explanation would be unnecessary.

Since the landlord spoke, Blueskin and Jack released their hold, and the latter also restored his pistol to his pocket, because, whatever doubts he might have had about his good faith, they were now completely dissipated.

The landlord then walked straight to the window of the room, which, of course, looked out into the yard.

Slowly, and as noiselessly as possible, he opened it.

He would not have accomplished that feat so silently as he did if the window had been constructed as most windows are now-a-days, that is to say, to rise in a sash.

This opened like a folding door, as attic windows are sometimes made to do.

As soon as this was done, he turned to Jack and whispered—

"You will be able to do more than I thought. Well, I am glad of it. You will escape from your foes easy enough."

"That is good news. How shall we do it?"

"Well, down there is the yard. It is not above ten feet below us, and I should think one of you could drop into it easily enough."

"Yes, but"—

"Stop a minute. I know what you were going to say, but just wait until I have done, and then you will be spared the necessity of speaking."

"Go on, then."

"One of you will be able to drop it."

"Oh! yes, easy enough. If it is no lower down than you say, it could be dropped easily enough."

"Very well, that's what I thought. Now one of you had better do it as speedily as may be. When you get down in the yard, look about you and you will see a ladder"

"All right!" cried Jack, "I understand. I'll go."

"Stop—stop. Hear me out."

"I know what you're going to say."

"No, you don't. Be quiet."

"What is it, then?"

"By the aid of this ladder the other two will be able to get down easily enough, won't they?"

"Oh! yes."

"Very good. Now do you see that wall opposite?"

"Yes; but it's as much as I can do."

"Never mind, so that you do see it. Do you know what place that is that's on the other side of it?"

"No. What is it?"

"Newgate-market. Now do you understand? When you are in the yard, put that ladder up against the wall, and get over it. You will then have only yourselves to blame if you do not escape this time."

"Thanks," said Blueskin. "Thanks to you, we shall indeed be free. Bess, give him the ten guineas; and, landlord, I'll tell you what you shall do. Call, the day after to-morrow, at Tumposki's, the Jew's, in Little Earl-street, Seven Dials, and he will give you fifty guineas on my account, so you won't be a loser by this night's work."

The eyes of the lodging-house keeper glistened when he heard these words.

He was avaricious, but it was poverty that made him so.

"Do you really mean that?" he asked, not able to believe his own ears.

"I do, and if you will recollect the place, and call at the time appointed, you will receive the money all right enough."

"Then I am sorry I did not help you at first."

"Never mind that now. It's too late to regret. It's a good job things are no worse. You see you will get more than twice as much as you could have hoped to receive even if Jonathan's men had acted square with you, which they certainly would not."

"I'll come, and I'll take care you are not seen. You quite understand what I mean."

"Quite. I only hope Jonathan has not been cunning enough to post some of his men in the Market."

"I don't think he has done so, though he has posted them all about the street, so as to pounce upon you the moment you make your appearance, so it will be necessary for you to be very careful."

"Trust to us."

At this moment Edgworth Bess, who had continued standing with her back to the door, gave a slight cry of alarm.

She ran towards the window at which her two protectors stood.

"What is the matter?" they asked.

"Quick! oh! quick. Be quick!"

"What did you hear?"

"Some one, or some ones, are creeping stealthily up the stairs. I could not hear their footsteps, but only the rustling of their clothes."

"Ha! then Quilt and his men have grown suspicious of my long absence. You have no time to lose. Perhaps in another moment they will attack us. Who is going to drop into the yard?"

"I will," said Jack.

"Very well; perhaps you will be the best, as you are such a light weight. Don't make any more noise than you can help. We will help to lower you through the window."

"Thanks; I shall manage it."

Jack Sheppard got out of the window feet foremost, and the landlord and Blueskin held him by his hands, and so let him down.

At the suggestion of Blueskin, Jack did not shift his grasp to the window-sill, and drop after holding by that, but they fairly lowered him down, he keeping hold of their hands until they hung half-way out of window.

Jack had then only a few inches to drop, which he did noiselessly, and without creating any alarm.

Without pausing, the moment he felt himself upon his feet he looked round for the ladder, as he had been directed, and espied it lying down at the foot of the wall.

It was a short, light ladder, and yet quite sufficient to answer the purpose required.

With more strength than any one would have thought he possessed, Jack raised the ladder, and placed it against the window-sill.

He was not a moment too soon.

From somewhere in the upper regions of the house there came a horrible cry, which was immediately responded to by another.

Then followed the rushing of many footsteps down the stairs.

"That's Wild, I would stake my life!" said Blueskin, the moment he heard the hideous cry. "We are found out."

"Then the best thing you can do is to make haste. Here's the ladder. Down with you."

"I will go first," said Blueskin, "and then you assist the lady to follow me."

"Very good; I'll see to that. Make haste."

Blueskin got on the ladder and descended it a little way, then Bess was placed upon it, and he assisted her to the best of his ability.

Jack stood at the bottom of the ladder to steady it during their descent.

But we must leave them for a moment, while we take just a passing glance at Jonathan Wild, and explain the cause of the cry which Blueskin felt so certain was uttered by the thief-taker.

It will be recollected that we left Wild in rather an awkward predicament.

After his struggle with Jack and Blueskin he had rolled down the tiles, and gone with full force against a time-worn parapet, which gave way before the sudden shock with which his bulky body went against it.

Then, amid a mass of masonry, he had fallen down, not on to the ground, which was some fifty or sixty feet beneath him, but into a large open cistern, which was nearly full of water.

The blow upon the head which he had received from the butt-end of Blueskin's pistol, for a moment completely stunned him.

But the thief-taker's head was made of uncommonly hard materials, as the numberless blows it had withstood would testify.

So when he went with that awful crash against the parapet, it went a long way towards restoring him to consciousness.

The sudden immersion in the cold water completed the process.

Had his insensibility continued, he would certainly have been drowned in that cistern.

As it was, having partial possession of his faculties, though his brain was somewhat confused, he plunged and tumbled about till he got out of the water.

This was accomplished by standing up on his feet, when the water in the tank reached up to his breast.

Then he commenced the most horrible ululation which could possibly be conceived.

The roaring of the most ferocious wild beast would have sunk into insignificance in comparison with it.

He continued this little amusement until his powers failed him.

And not till then did he make the discovery that the monstrous howling he had set up did not aid him in the least.

But, when he acquired this piece of knowledge, he set about doing something else that would aid him with all the speed he could.

Jonathan Wild was a man gifted with uncommon energies, and it is much to be pitied that he did not direct them in some useful pursuit.

He was, indeed, indomitable, never allowing himself to be daunted by the most adverse occurrences.

Accordingly, having ceased howling, he looked about him, and then perceived what he might have perceived long before, if he had only had the sense to look.

This was, that there was a window just on a level with the tank.

The window opened into one of the rooms in his own house.

So immediately was this over the tank, that, had any one been within the room which it illuminated, they would have been able to dip water out of it with the greatest ease.

Jonathan's gratification knew no bounds when he saw that window, and he inwardly blessed the friendly architect who had had the forethought to place it in so excellent and so useful a situation.

Before he attempted to get through it, however, he swilled his head and face well with cold water.

This done, he made a frantic dash at the latticed case, and pulled it open.

Another moment and he was standing within the room.

He could not subdue the utterance of the burst of triumphant laughter which came to his lips as he did so.

But he did not waste time.

Hurrying to the door, he threw it open, and once more hastily ran across the landing to the foot of the attic stairs.

But, in his haste, he forgot all about the body of Steggs which had fallen downstairs.

It lay upon the landing.

We say it because it was scarcely possible for any one to survive such a wound as Steggs had received, and certainly impossible if skilful and surgical aid was not immediately administered.

The body of Steggs, then, lay extended upon the landing not far from the foot of the attic stairs, without the least signs of motion.

Hurrying forward, Jonathan caught his foot against the prostrate form, and, unable to recover his lost equilibrium, he fell heavily over it.

The stairs were placed just so as to receive his unfortunate head, which came down upon them with such a crack that it made the whole house echo and tremble again.

It was responded to by a deep groan which came from the lips of Steggs, who was suffering great anguish.

Jonathan Wild lay for a moment quite as still as the body over which he had fallen.

Then he sprang to his feet.

His first impulse was to salute the body over which he had fallen with half-a-dozen heavy kicks, each one of which was followed with a groan from the lips of the wounded man.

But so far from having any humanising effect upon Wild, he drank them in like music.

Then, blinded with rage and pain—his body aching in every joint—his head seeming as though it would split—he rushed up the attic stairs.

With desperate fury, and guided by that instinct by which madmen and drunkards are governed, he reached the foot of the ladder leading to the trap-door.

Up this he went without making one false step—over the parapet, passing by unmoved the scene of his late accident, and all the while heaping the most horrible curses upon the heads of Blueskin and Jack Sheppard.

Still under the guidance of the instinct to which we have adverted, he reached the window opening into the attic of the lodging-house.

No sooner, however, had he crawled in and given a glance round the empty chamber, than Quilt Arnold, followed by several of his men, rushed in.

Then Jonathan had uttered that cry which had so startled the fugitives upon the first-floor, and which made Blueskin quite certain that their arch enemy was once more upon their track.

A few words passed between Quilt Arnold and his ferocious master.

Wild cursed again, and then the whole party rushed down the stairs.

His long absence had made Quilt Arnold suspect that the landlord had played him false, and the first glance he cast into the empty attic changed that suspicion into conviction.

On reaching the first landing, they dashed open the door that came first to their hand.

They were at the window instantly.

The first thing they caught sight of was the wall opposite.

Against this was a ladder.

On the top of the wall was a figure.

Two more were ascending.

"Fire!" roared Wild, as he saw what was taking place, "fire! curse you all. Fire!"

He drew a pistol from his own pocket, and cocking it, pulled the trigger, but no explosion followed.

The priming had got wet while he was in the cistern.

CHAPTER CCXXXII.

JACK SHEPPARD, BLUESKIN, AND EDGWORTH BESS GET INTO NEWGATE-MARKET, BUT ARE UNABLE TO FIND THE HORSES IN WARWICK-LANE.

BUT Quilt and the remainder of the band had got their weapons in better order, so Wild's command was followed by a sheet of flame and a tremendous report.

The amount of damage done could not, however, be ascertained, nor did they make the attempt, for, directly the discharge had taken place, Wild commanded his men to follow him down the stairs—his intention being to reach the yard of the house.

This he would have no difficulty in doing, so we will leave him and once more turn our attention to the proceedings of those in whom the reader must feel a much greater degree of interest.

Blueskin and Edgworth Bess reached the foot of the ladder in safety, and then, without delay, it was placed against the wall, on the other side of which, as the landlord had told them, was Newgate-market—at that time a different place to what it is now, for the part we are describing was destroyed by fire very many years ago.

Jack Sheppard went first up the ladder, and in a minute or two was on the top of the wall.

He was then rejoiced to find that there was a shed in the market, the highest portion of the roof of which was about a foot beneath him.

He did not hesitate to stand upon this, and while in this position he held the ladder firmly at the top.

Blueskin did the same at the bottom, and then Edgworth Bess commenced her perilous ascent.

Dread of being captured by her enemies lent her strength and courage, and she went up the ladder step by step without the least accident.

Seeing this, Blueskin, knowing how precious time was, conceived it unnecessary to continue standing at the foot of the ladder any longer, so he, too, commenced to climb.

Such was the position of affairs when Wild gave the order to fire.

Jack heard that order given, and his heart sank within him, but fortunately Edgworth Bess was almost on a level with where he stood.

Rendered desperate by the peril with which she was menaced, Jack seized her by the arms and drew her rapidly and somewhat roughly over the wall on to the roof of the shed.

He was only just in time.

Almost before he had drawn her over there came the discharge of the pistols.

They felt as well as heard the bullets go whistling over their heads.

But they were unhurt.

Blueskin, however, was not so lucky.

He was on the ladder, about a couple of feet from the top, when the volley was fired.

He had no resource but to remain still.

A sharp, stinging sensation made him aware that he had been hit in his right leg.

It was a thousand wonders he did not lose his footing, but he retained it, and continued climbing rapidly to the top of the wall.

He called out to Jack, and found him on the shed we have described.

Here Blueskin followed him, and the first thing he did was to draw up the ladder out of the yard, partly because he thought it might be useful to them in assisting them to descend, and also because it would be debarring Wild from a ready means of following them.

The roof of the shed was rather precipitous, and it was with difficulty that Jack and Edgworth Bess retained their positions upon it.

"Are you hurt?" was Blueskin's first question.

"No," was the reply uttered by both his companions in one breath. "Are you?"

"I am afraid I am."

"Where?"

"In the leg."

"Is it serious?"

"I can hardly tell, but I hope not. It bleeds very freely, and one of the first things I do must be to bandage it up."

"Wait till we get down on the ground," said Jack.

"Let me have the ladder, and I will place it ready."

"It is here, lying beside me."

"All right, I have it. You look to Edgworth Bess for a moment. I have great hopes now that we shall get off in safety, without any further hurt."

"I trust so."

"That's it."

These last words were spoken by Jack in reference to the ladder, which, to his satisfaction, he found was plenty long enough to reach to the floor of the market.

He was again the first to descend.

But he was down in a moment.

"All right," he cried; "follow me as quickly as you can."

"I can manage by myself, I think," said Edgworth Bess to Blueskin; "but, with your wounded leg, how shall you be able to descend?"

"Never mind me, I will manage somehow. I am getting pretty used to being knocked about, but, as for you, why, of course, that is quite another matter."

Edgworth Bess, without much aid from Blueskin, reached the floor of the market.

Our old friend bore the pain and inconvenience of his wound like a martyr.

He managed to slip down the ladder somehow.

"Now," he said, "you must just wait a moment while I bandage my wound, because, if I do not, not only shall I get weak from loss of blood, but I shall leave such a track behind me, that Wild will be able to follow us blind-fold."

"I'll bind it up for you," said Jack, and, as he spoke, he pulled off his voluminous neckcloth.

It was already in the shape of a bandage, so he had nothing more to do than to tie it tightly round his comrade's leg.

Blueskin could tell there was no bone broken.

The bullet had struck him in the fleshy part of the thigh.

Jack put the bandage on very skilfully, and by drawing it tight he was able to stop the bleeding entirely.

Before the hemorrhage had been copious, for the bullet had gone in at one side and out at the other; but perhaps this was better than if it had lodged in the wound.

"Now, Jack," said Blueskin, "I am all right, and shall do very well. The next thing now is to get out of the market with all speed. I should not be a bit surprised if we were to find Wild waiting for us now at the gate in Warwick-lane."

"He can scarcely have had time to reach there yet, I should think, Blue."

"Well, perhaps he hasn't. Clearly, we must get out of here as soon as we can, or else we shall be taken like rats in a trap, for Wild could easily surround the place."

"Do you know the nearest way out?" asked Jack, "because, if you do, lead the way."

"Follow me. I know exactly where we are. Two minutes will bring us to the archway in Warwick-lane."

"Where," said Jack, "I hope we shall find our horses waiting for us."

"So do I. We have been much longer, though, than we expected. Still, I trust all will be well."

Blueskin, in spite of his wounded leg, set off at so rapid a pace through the dark and fetid alleys in the marketplace, that Jack and Edgworth Bess had much ado to keep up with him.

But when the large archway which leads out into Warwick-lane was reached, he slackened his speed, and approached cautiously, for about this spot he more than half expected some of his enemies would be lurking.

The place was in deep darkness, which was a favourable circumstance.

Stealthily, then, taking care not to speak to each other, nor to tread too heavily, they fairly got to the gate, so that another step would take them into the street.

Then Jack deemed it prudent to reconnoitre.

He glided out into the street like a shadow, leaving his two companions beneath the archway.

The horses would be at the Newgate-street end of Warwick-lane, so that was the direction he took.

Of course, if they were there all would be well. They would all three mount, and be miles out of the way before Jonathan was ready to pursue them.

But as he crept along the narrow thoroughfare, Jack recollected what the lodging-house keeper had said with reference to Wild having set a watch in the street.

It might be that they had found the three horses, and guessed the object for which they were provided.

If so, our friends would be very awkwardly situated indeed.

It behoved Jack, at any rate, to be unusually cautious.

He had not to go many steps to reach the top of Warwick-lane.

By the top, of course, we mean the upper part of it, for Jack did not go to the corner of Newgate-street.

But he went far enough to be able to see into that thoroughfare.

There were certainly no horses visible in that direction.

Jack's heart sank within him.

He had calculated most fully upon finding the horses waiting for them, but, now they were gone, what were they to do.

He turned back with the faint hope that he might find them at the other end of the street.

But that hope turned out fallacious.

The street was certainly empty.

From what cause?

Had the Jew failed to perform his part of the agreement, which was to have three horses at the place mentioned in waiting for them?

Or, had the horses been sent there, and had they been seized by Jonathan Wild's men?

To neither of these questions could Jack return a satisfactory reply.

He was quite satisfied the horses were not there, so he returned to the archway of the market in order to communicate the disagreeable intelligence to Blueskin.

But he was not much surprised. He had all along feared that this would prove to be the case.

"We must make the best of our way from this place, Jack," he said. "It won't do to stop here another moment."

"If we do, it will only be at a very great risk indeed. Now the horses are gone, we must try to do without them."

"But how?"

"Never fear, we shall hit upon some expedient before long."

"Our position is very critical."

"I know it. Are there any of Wild's men about?"

"I could not see any."

"They may be lurking somewhere. I wonder what Jonathan is about."

"I don't know; but, Blueskin, a thought has just struck me."

"With reference to making our escape?"

"With reference to a secure hiding-place, where Jonathan would never think of looking for us."

"That is much the same thing; but whereabouts is this hiding-place you speak of?"

"Follow me, and I will tell you as we go along towards it. The idea is so excellent, that I am sure you will agree to it at once."

"Well, I trust to you, because time is so precious."

"Come along, then, as fast as you are able. I will take charge of Edgworth Bess."

"Oh! Jack, when will the perils of this night be over?"

"I wish I could tell you," replied Sheppard, as he took his fair companion by the hand, and hastened with her down Warwick-lane, in the direction of Amen-corner. "I trust our perils will quite cease in less than a quarter-of-an-hour from now."

"I trust so, Jack, for I am so exhausted that I cannot keep up much longer, even if my life depended on it."

"I am sure what you have already gone through must have fatigued you greatly. I am in hopes, however, of being able to take you to a place where you will have an opportunity of enjoying some hours undisturbed rest."

"I shall be thankful for it. Do you know, Jack, this long illness I have had has left me so very weak. Indeed, I am surprised I have kept up so well. Where are you going to take me?"

"To St. Paul's."

"St. Paul's?"

"Yes, St. Paul's Cathedral. What do you think of that?"

"I should never have thought of hiding there."

"It is a capital place," said Blueskin, "and I vote we make there with all speed. Why, Jonathan would hunt all London over and never think of looking for us there."

"So I think."

"Which way shall we go?"

"Round the corner into Paternoster-row, and then you will see another turning nearly opposite, which will bring you out just where you want to be."

"I know, in St. Paul's Churchyard."

"Just so. But quick. I can hear some one approaching, and it will never do for us to be perceived."

While this little dialogue was going forward, our three friends turned the corner of Warwick-lane into Paternoster-row, and across this thoroughfare down a narrow passage, from which they emerged upon the north side of St. Paul's Churchyard.

And now before them was that colossal structure which makes itself so conspicuous above the many buildings which surround it.

"Jack," said Blueskin, pausing suddenly, "yours was a good idea of hiding in St. Paul's, and I don't suppose we should ever be found; but then there is a great difficulty in the way."

"What is it?"

"Why, how are we to get inside the doors of the cathedral?—they will all be closed."

"I know that."

"Then how shall you get in?"

"Easily enough. Don't you recollect how they have been at work repairing one end of it for ever so many months past. Well, that is where I mean to get in. I am sure it can be done."

"Ah! well, perhaps it might. But until you mentioned it, I had quite forgotten the repairs were going on that you spoke of."

"I recollected. We shall have rather an awkward job to get over the palings, but I think we shall find some scaffolding that will enable us to do it."

"We shall have to be very quick, too, about it, because if any one saw us climbing over, the whole affair would get wind at once, which would vex me exceedingly, for I should think it a great pity to have such a good hiding-place discovered. When we get fairly inside, we shall be able to talk over what had best be done."

CHAPTER CCXXXIII

OUR THREE FRIENDS GET INSIDE ST. PAUL'S, BUT FIND THEIR PERILS ARE BY NO MEANS OVER.

THIS was so evident a fact, that those who heard it did not think it called for a reply.

The three fugitives hurried along close to the palings of the churchyard, looking about them for the scaffolding of which Jack had spoken.

The latter led the way.

As he had correctly stated, during the past few months some alterations and repairs were in progress at the east end of the cathedral.

They were now approaching completion, but still it was probable enough some crevice could be found through which they would be able to effect an entrance.

The scaffolding was at length reached.

[JONATHAN WILD IS CONFRONTED BY A STRANGE APPARITION ON THE RUINED BRIDGE.]

Several of the tall iron palisades had been removed, and the poles and planks projected for some distance into the roadway.

"Here we are," said Jack, "and I think we shall find it easier to get in than ever we could have hoped for. Look here!"

As he spoke, Jack pointed to a place which certainly looked as though it would take them into the churchyard without any trouble.

"I will go first," said Jack, "and if it is all right, you can follow me."

Jack had fully expected that they would have had to climb over the palings, but this, which would have been very awkward for Edgworth Bess, was happily obviated.

It was a space between some timber which Jack had found.

The place looked very dark, but without the least fear or hesitation Jack entered.

But scarcely had he passed from the sight of his two companions than their ears were assailed with loud cries, and the trampling of many feet, while now and then a clash as of weapons would make itself heard.

The sounds looked very much like pursuit.

The direction from which they came was the same as they had taken, and neither Bess nor Blueskin had any doubt that it was their enemy, Wild, who was upon their track.

Under this impression, then, they did not wait for Jack to return, nor until they heard him call to them from within the recess, but entered it at once, and called to Jack in a low tone themselves.

Their words were responded to immediately, for, owing to the darkness of the place, and the intricate manner in which the scaffold-poles had been set, Jack had not penetrated very far.

"Jonathan is close here," said Blueskin to Jack Sheppard. "We heard him, with a whole troop at his heels, coming along the churchyard. What is to be done?"

"Confound him!" said Jack. "How can he have managed to dog our footsteps?"

"That I have no idea; but what shall we do? Hark, here he comes."

"We can do nothing but remain where we are," said Jack, "and trust to his passing this place and not finding us."

"But that is a very slender chance."

"I know it is, but it is our only one. Keep still, or he will hear us. We can do nothing but trust to his going by."

This was trusting to a very frail thing indeed, and so Jack and Blueskin both felt, for Jonathan Wild was a man possessed of no ordinary skill in hunting down human game.

Some trifling thing, that would escape the observation of most persons, would indicate to him that our friends were hiding there, and if he did take such an idea into his head, their case would be a deplorable one indeed, for what would be easier than for the thief-taker to surround the scaffolding and either slay them or take them prisoners?

They heard him and his ruthless band come on.

Instantaneously they crouched down, as though by so doing they would reduce the chances of their being found, and with bated breath they looked out from their place of concealment.

The next moment Wild and his band came in sight.

The thief-taker himself, in a shocking plight, led the way.

His apparel was drenched with water and besmeared with unctuous mud. Large rents appeared here and there, while down his face trickled several little rivulets of blood.

His appearance was ghastly and horrible in the extreme, and sufficient to strike terror into the boldest heart.

Several of the men behind him carried torches.

They held them high in the air, and they diffused a bright, ruddy light all around them, and by the aid of this light Wild and his men looked about in search of the three fugitives.

On they came—along the narrow, broken pavement of the churchyard, until they came opposite to the scaffolding in which our friends were concealed; another moment and they would have passed it, when suddenly Wild called "Halt!" and the whole throng came to an immediate standstill.

The hearts of the three friends sunk within them when they heard this, and they mentally gave themselves up for lost.

Still they had the prudence and the presence of mind to remain quite still, and not to utter an ejaculation, or, in fact, do anything calculated to put Jonathan upon their track.

From where they were concealed they could both hear and see the proceedings of their enemies.

"Halt!" cried Wild, again; "and listen some of you. Who can hear their footsteps? Silence! Hark!"

The whole band now became intensely still, and every member of it listened with the utmost eagerness for any sound which they could construe into the footsteps of their prey.

But all was still.

Not one of them had ears quick enough to catch the sound they so much desired to hear.

"Curses on it all!" said Wild. "We are here just two minutes too late. They have come this way, I am certain, and whether they have gone up Cheapside, or down St. Martin's-le-Grand, is more than I can tell. We must trust to chance. We must not wait here, however. Down St. Martin's-le-Grand is the most likely way they would go. Forward—forward!"

Upon receipt of this order the little troop put itself in motion, and away they went in the direction Wild had mentioned.

That he should halt just where he did was not at all extraordinary, because, as may be gathered from the thief-taker's words, a choice of roads was spread out before him, and he wanted some better guide than probability to direct him as to which he ought to take.

Our readers may imagine with what joy our friends listened to these words uttered by their enemy, and learned that he had gone upon a wrong scent.

Jack drew a long breath as he said—

"That is one more narrow escape. Thank goodness he has gone!"

"He has. I made sure he halted just where he did because he knew where we had hidden ourselves."

"But you now see how wrong it would have been for us to expose ourselves in any way."

"It would, indeed!"

"What are we to do next?" asked Blueskin.

"I do not know what we can do better than follow up our original idea of taking refuge in the cathedral."

"Do you think it will be best?"

"Decidedly, if we can effect an entrance."

"Why not be off while we have the chance?"

"I have thought of that, and there are two or three reasons why we should not."

"What are they?"

"One is that Edgworth Bess is thoroughly exhausted, and almost incapable of making any further exertion, and the other is Jonathan would be too soon upon our track. You may depend he will soon find he is on a wrong scent, before he goes far down St. Martin's-le-Grand, and then he will be back upon us."

"Those are too very good reasons, Jack."

"And not only that, Jonathan Wild would never think of looking for us in St. Paul's. Now, if we were once to get in there, the place is large enough to hide us without much fear of our being found by any one entering it. It will be necessary to talk over matters and re-arrange our plans. Now, that can be done here more safely than anywhere else, and Edgworth Bess will rest herself at the same time."

"Your reasons are very good, Jack, and quite convince me that what you propose is the best thing to be done, so make your way into the churchyard at once."

Jack did not require to be told twice to do this. He crawled among the scaffolding, and at length fairly stood on the piece of ground which surrounds the old cathedral.

To this place his two companions followed him, and then they set about looking for some breach through which they could obtain an entrance.

For a long time they were unsuccessful, but at length they found a place just large enough for them to crawl through, and no more.

They were particularly careful not to disturb anything, for they by no means wished the workmen to see any signs of their having been about that spot.

In a few minutes more, then, Jack and his two companions were within the sacred edifice.

Even in daylight it is, in many places, shrouded in semi-darkness, but now, on a dark night, the darkness was intense.

For some moments after they got in, all three stood profoundly still and listened.

But no sound came to their ears.

In that place a silence which cannot be described prevailed. The very air itself seemed to be hushed.

Strange sensations will creep over every one upon entering St. Paul's, but how much more must those sensations be intensified when the place is entered at night?

The three fugitives were by no means exempt from this influence, and they instinctively hushed their voices to a whisper.

A very little while served to show them that they had the place all to themselves, and then they had the confidence to advance a few paces.

"Jack!" said Blueskin.

"Yes."

"Where are you?"

"Here."

"I cannot see you."

"Nor I you."

"Are you safe, Edgworth Bess?"

"Quite. I have hold of Jack's hand."

"All is well, then."

"I hope so."

"But, Jack."

"What?"

"Tell me, what are we to do in this place? It will not do to stand here, nor will it be very safe to walk in the dark."

"There is no doubt about that."

"Then what are we to do?"

"Have you the means of procuring a light?"

"Oh! yes; I never fail to carry them about me. But then"—

"What?"

"I am afraid it would be rather hazardous to exhibit a light here."

"I suppose so; and yet I don't know, after all. Such a light as would be sufficient to answer our purpose would only look like a tiny twinkling star in this huge place."

"That's very true."

"I should say, light up by all means."

"I will take your advice. At first sight it looked a dangerous thing to do, but when you come to think of it, a great deal of that danger vanishes."

With these words on his lips, Blueskin felt in his pockets, and presently produced the means of obtaining a light.

These were a bottle of phosphorus and a wax taper.

The latter was small in size.

When it was lighted and the flame of the wick had properly burnt up, Jack's words were found to be quite true, for the light did seem like a tiny star, and it scarcely dispersed the darkness for a foot around it.

Still they were able to see the ground beneath their feet and avoid running against any object which might be in their path.

By keeping on in a straight line they came to that portion of the cathedral in which service was generally performed.

Edgworth Bess was very much fatigued. She did not complain, but Jack could tell as much by the way she leaned upon his arm; indeed, as they walked, he almost carried her.

Upon reaching the place we have mentioned, Jack looked about him as well as he was able, and saw that the pews in which the people sat during the celebration of the service were very large, and roomy, and comfortable.

They were moreover very comfortably cushioned—indeed, everything that would conduce to comfort had been done to them.

This gave Jack an idea.

"Blueskin," he said, "we may as well remain where we now are for a few hours. Bess could lie down on the seat in one of these pews and have a good sleep, while we watched over her. We should have to move at daylight, that would be all."

"I have no objection," said Blueskin. "I don't suppose you would find a better place if you were to search St. Paul's over, and, as you say, we could watch."

This being agreed to, the door of one of the pews was opened by Jack, and Edgworth Bess entered.

Poor girl, she was quite overcome, and sank on the seat with a deep sigh.

Jack closed the door and left her to herself, bidding her good night, and desiring her to get as much sleep as she possibly could, and he would see that she was menaced with no danger.

Edgworth Bess promised all that he asked of her, and then Blueskin and Jack Sheppard crossed the aisle and entered another pew, which was precisely opposite to the one of which Edgworth Bess had taken possession.

Jack Sheppard and Blueskin agreed to watch and sleep by turns, and also to defer all further conversation relative to their future operations until such time as Edgworth Bess would be able to take part in the consultation.

And so, during the remainder of that eventful night, the three fugitives remained undisturbed beneath the sacred roof of St. Paul's Cathedral, while Jonathan Wild was fatiguing himself both bodily and mentally by a useless search after them.

CHAPTER CCXXXIV.

JONATHAN WILD MEDITATES A LITTLE UPON THE FATE OF HIS AFFAIRS.

It was, in fact, about an hour before dawn that a party of men, about a dozen in number, crept wearily down Newgate-street in the direction of the prison.

They were no other than Jonathan Wild's band, returning from their fruitless search after the three fugitives.

For hours had the thief-taker kept up the hunt, but it was all in vain, he could not find the least trace of those he sought.

In a frame of mind by no means to be envied, he marched on, with his troop of men following close at his heels.

Nothing but fatigue, however, and total inability to proceed, would have had the effect of causing Jonathan to relinquish his search until he had succeeded. But, like his janizaries, he was mortal, and more sensible of fatigue than he would have wished to be.

Jonathan Wild was not the man he had been.

All who came into contact with him could see that.

It was not that his mind was less powerful and full of energy than it was of old,—on the contrary, it seemed to have been endowed with fresh strength.

But his body failed him.

That was his weak point.

Originally he had been gifted with a constitution which might be truly termed of iron. Few men ever had a stronger. But he abused his strength, and the wonder was that it had kept up so long and so well as it had.

The numerous wounds he had received upon almost every part of his body had produced great debilitation. For a long time he had withstood their effects, and the huge libations of brandy he was in the habit of taking had imparted for a time a fictitious strength, but every time the reaction came, it left him weaker than before.

But, on this occasion, the first thing he did was to demand brandy, and when the fiery fluid was brought him, he drank such a quantity that a spectator would have been filled with astonishment. It was real good brandy, too, such as had never passed through the publican's hands, but as it had come from the distillery, and very many degrees over proof.

In a moment—before, indeed, he took the bottle from his lips—the brandy seemed to circulate through every vein and artery in his body, and for the instant he felt himself in possession of his pristine strength.

He laboured under the delusion that he was better.

Still not even the brandy which he drank would restore rest to his weary and aching bones. Many a man would have been laid up for a month by such a tumble from the roof-tops as he had had, and yet we have seen what he has done since.

But the limit of his endurance was reached, and he was obliged to succumb.

Without a word to any one (for he was incompetent even to curse his men), he made his way upstairs, and entering a bed-room, he staggered to the bed, threw himself upon it, and endeavoured to sleep.

But for a long time he tried in vain.

He was almost too tired for sleep to come to him. His brain throbbed—his bones, from the crown of his head to the sole of his foot, ached excruciatingly—and where the skin had been abraded and dirt rubbed into the wound, he suffered a terrible smarting torment.

But at length Jonathan Wild fell into a deep sleep—exhausted nature was at last having her due.

In the very next room to that in which Wild thus lay sleeping, there also lay another person, whose condition was by far more desperate than his.

It is scarcely necessary to say that the individual to whom allusion is made is no other than the unfortunate Steggs, who unluckily fell a victim to the blind suspicions of Jack Sheppard.

He was extended on the bed, looking as lifeless as any one well could.

Some one in the house had done him that kindness, and there their assistance ceased, considering that all had been done that was necessary.

The reader must be aware, without being expressly told so, that Steggs was quite guiltless of the crime which Jack Sheppard laid to his charge.

He had not the slightest intention of betraying him to Wild, and when he descended the stairs, it was for the purpose stated by Edgworth Bess, namely, to ascertain whether Jonathan had returned.

He found he had done so, and, moreover (than that, that he had tracked Jack Sheppard to where he was.

No sooner did he learn this, than he listened upstairs to communicate the intelligence to Jack, and urge him to make all possible speed.

We have seen how he did so, and we have also seen how Jack Sheppard allowed his dislike for the man to triumph over his judgment, and so he gave him the desperate wound we have described.

It was a great wonder it was not at once fatal, or that the fall and the kicks Jonathan bestowed upon him while on the landing did not conspire to produce that effect. But no, Steggs still lived—there are some natures extremely tenacious of life, and who will, in a manner of speaking, die a dozen deaths.

So Steggs, however insensible, still lived.

He was no favourite with the thief-taker's body-guard at large. He was not one of their kind. They were jealous of the confidence which Wild reposed in him, and they disliked him accordingly.

The matter, however, was talked over in the hall while Jonathan was absent on his excursion, and, in the end, Tonks, who was really in the main not a bad-hearted fellow, volunteered to go and fetch Mr. Snoxall, and so Steggs had his wound dressed.

The apothecary, however, would not hold out the slightest hopes of his recovery. He said he might do so, but the chances were all the other way. What the effect of all this would be upon Steggs should he eventually recover is hard to say. He was of a vindictive, revengeful spirit, and would probably enough indict all the injury he could upon the person who had dealt him such a terrible blow.

This is a matter, however, which must be left to time for unfolding.

And so, divided from each other by a space of a few yards only, were Jonathan Wild, the thief-taker, and Steggs.

At that very time, too, Edgworth Bess, in the cushioned recesses of the old pew in St. Paul's Cathedral, was enjoying a comfortable repose which would go far to recuperate her wasted energies.

Jack, too, slept soundly and calmly, and Blueskin kept watch over both the slumberers, his brain being all the while busily engaged in devising some means which would promise an eventual escape.

And so the chief actors in this strange story were at this time all similarly occupied—that is to say, were asleep.

All but one.

That one was an unfortunate being who had become so changed that not even his most intimate friend would know him.

The change, too, had taken place in a very short space of time.

But the dungeons beneath Jonathan Wild's house were of such a frightful description that a very short period of incarceration in one of them would suffice to effect a very great change indeed.

We are now alluding to Lord Donnull, whom Jonathan Wild had entrapped with so much ingenuity into one of his cells.

The unfortunate nobleman now saw, when it was too late, that he had been made a dupe of by the thief-taker, and that he had been made use of like a puppet.

The conviction was gall and wormwood to him, and he spent his time in uttering vain curses upon his own imbecility.

Then there would come times when he would feel a sudden accession of vigour, caused when he had made up his mind to escape and restore his poor persecuted niece to her possessions.

This he would have done long since if Wild had permitted him, but such a proceeding as that by no means accorded with his own plans.

And now the end of it all was, his incarceration in that loathsome and pestiferous dungeon, which was so strongly built that it had hitherto successfully defied all the attempts he had made to escape from it.

He did not sleep.

In that place it was almost impossible, and so on that night, or, rather, early morning, Lord Donnull was watchful and awake.

Jonathan Wild slept very heavily.

It was a deep, dreamless slumber at first.

He was too thoroughly prostrated to dream, but after awhile, when his fatigue abated, then his brain began to exercise itself.

Visions of the most horrible description conceivable flitted like a dismal phantasmagoria before his distempered brain.

We will not pause to describe them—they would only take up unnecessary space, and crowd the reader's mind with unmitigated horrors. We will pass over them in silence.

More than once Jonathan groaned, as something of a more than usually awful nature appeared to him, but still he did not wake.

Nor did he until the fierce rays of the morning sun poured full upon his countenance.

Then he opened his eyes, but the sudden blaze of light almost blinded him, so he closed them again.

He turned over on to his other side, so that the burning beams no longer played upon him.

He was awake, but still he gave no signs of being so.

He was thinking.

He had fallen into a deep reverie.

Circumstances had now assumed so complicated a character that a little clear-headed thought was indispensable.

And so the thief-taker took the present opportunity as being one well suited to the purpose.

His reflections ran somewhat in this strain.

"What am I to think of this? In what way will it end? How is it that I, who have ever prided myself in succeeding in everything I undertook, should be so baffled? How is it that those designs, which would be successful on any one else, are useless against Jack Sheppard? Is there such a thing as an evil spirit in human form, who dogs his unhappy victim in every enterprise he takes in hand, and frustrates it? I have heard some persons before now broach such a theory. If it is correct, then assuredly does my evil spirit exhibit itself in the person of Jack Sheppard. But pho—pho! Speculation of that kind is foolish!

"I have sworn to hang him at Tyburn, and I will keep my oath, though everything in heaven and hell should swear against—even if I knew that I myself should perish the moment afterwards. But that shall not be. Let me think calmly, if I can, of what has taken place. I want some brandy. That would assist me vastly."

But just then there was no brandy at hand, and the thief-taker did not feel inclined to take the trouble to get or call for any. The thoughts we have set down coursed each other, one after another, through his brain, as thoughts sometimes will when one lies in a state half between sleeping and waking.

At such a time the body is powerless to obey the will, or rather the will is not strong enough to exert its due influence upon the body.

Jonathan continued his reflections.

"Let me think. Now, when they made their escape over the wall into Newgate-market, they must have gone down Warwick-lane towards Ludgate-hill. I have proof positive that they did so. They have disappeared. Where, I should wonder, have they found a hiding-place?"

This was a question that he perplexed his brain in vain to find an answer to, so at length he was obliged to give it up in despair.

"Never mind where they have concealed themselves," he added at last, "I shall be sure to find out before long. I will consider that point as being quite settled. Now the next thing is, how shall I proceed when I get them all three once more in my power?"

"Blueskin and Jack Sheppard I have already agreed as to the disposal of. The latter is now under sentence of death, so I shall have no further trouble with him, without it would be to swear to his identity. Then, as for Blueskin, it would be the easiest matter in the world to procure a conviction on some capital crime, and he shall swing at Tyburn, too. How I wish that time had come, and that the bodies were swinging to and fro in the morning air. Then, indeed, would my troubles be over, and I should be able to carry out my plans successfully."

"The revenues and the broad acres which comprise the Donnull estate I have resolved shall be mine, and when I resolve upon a thing it is as good as accomplished. I have made up my mind as to the means. I will force this Edgworth Bess, as they call her (for she is, without the shadow of a doubt, the rightful heiress) into a marriage with me; and surely that would be a means at once simple, easy, and agreeable. Unfortunately, the girl is not of age, but she soon will be. I must get her and keep her securely until that day arrives, and then I shall be able to use such arguments that she will find it impossible to refuse me. Yea, such shall be my course. It is clear and straightforward, and the obstacles that stand in my path are comparatively few in number."

"Then there is Lord Donnull, as he calls himself.

Well, for the present he is safe, and I need not trouble myself any further just now concerning him. I can make up my mind as to his ultimate disposal at any time. He is a weak fool, or he might have enjoyed the property for some time yet; but he was free to choose, and he has made his choice, so it is but fair that he should abide by it. Then I shall retire from this harassing life I have been leading. It is wearing me out. I can feel it is, but then I shall have rest—plenty of rest; and as the husband of Lady Donnull I should be forgotten and unrecognised as the notorious thief-taker. I shall not go to her with an empty pocket. I have riches now sufficient to satisfy even an avaricious man, and with such wealth at my disposal I shall, after the lapse of a few years, be able to purchase a transfer of the title to myself, and then Jonathan Wild will be henceforward known as Lord Donnull!"

CHAPTER CCXXXV.

THE THREE FUGITIVES FIND ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL NOT SUCH A COMFORTABLE PLACE OF REFUGE AFTER ALL.

It would have been no bad thing if some one had been at hand to warn Jonathan Wild of the folly of counting his chickens before they were hatched.

The occupation of castle building in the air is, however, found to be a pleasant occupation by almost all parties, and the thief-taker was no exception. It was so delightful to lie therein that state of semi-somnolency and picture what he should do.

He, however, felicitated himself rather too early, and looked upon the thing as already done when it actually was not begun.

The plan he had laid down was most certainly a very good one—perhaps the best that could have been devised to answer the end intended.

But then, like all other schemes, it depended for realization upon a great many contingences, and should any of these turn out different to what he expected, the whole complexion of affairs would be altered.

There was a great deal to be done yet.

Jack Sheppard and Blueskin were at large, and they had Edgworth Bess under their protection.

Of that, however, as his reflections will serve to show, the thief-taker did not seem to think much.

True, they had eluded him, and their present whereabouts was quite unknown to him; but he relied upon hearing something ere long which would enable him to effect their capture; and he made up his mind that if Jack Sheppard once more fell into his hands, he would take such precautions as to make it a matter of total impossibility for him to escape.

He cursed himself for his remissness on former occasions, and yet, when he thought upon the subject, he could not help feeling a certain amount of admiration for the daring youth who had twice done what no other man had ever dreamed of accomplishing.

But Jonathan soon banished that feeling.

He had reasoned himself into one course of action, and he determined to follow it. There was something antagonistic between Jack Sheppard and himself, and he felt sure that none of his schemes would be brought to a successful end if he was alive, for hitherto had he not sprang up and thwarted every one?

Jonathan's thoughts turned most upon the present situation of those three persons whose capture he was so anxious to effect.

"They are hiding," he said. "I am sure of it. They must be hiding. But where? Not far off, I'll be bound; perhaps under my nose. Well, we shall see. I will have spies posted in every direction, whose special business it shall be to look for them. Then, when they make their appearance—as they must do sooner or later—then I shall know my course. I will have a horse procured and a band of mounted men in readiness. Then I will put myself upon their track, and if I lose sight of them this time, I will never try to capture them again. But I shall follow them—I shall hunt them to earth—then I shall triumph, and all that I have aimed at shall be mine.

"Oh! what a difference it would have made to me if I could have had Jack Sheppard on my side! If he had ever been at hand—not like he is now, to thwart my plans, but to aid me in them! But I must not think of that. I have sworn he shall die at Tyburn, and I will keep my oath. I have an old score to settle with him: his father once struck me, then crossed me in an affair which I had near at heart. I took an oath that I would be revenged upon him, and I was, for less than a month afterwards he swung at Tyburn! And there this accursed brat of his shall follow him, or, confound him! I shall know no peace!"

Having reached this point in his reflections, Jonathan rose, with the intention of putting some of his resolve into execution.

He spent but a very few moments over his toilette, and then went downstairs.

He then found that midday had passed.

The pangs of hunger began to make themselves apparent now that he was so thoroughly rested, but before he attempted to satisfy them, he called Quilt on one side, and gave him various instructions relative to posting the spies.

The order was obeyed immediately, and various members of Wild's gang were communicated with, who placed themselves in various positions about the metropolis to keep good watch upon every one they saw, and in the event of either of the three fugitives coming under their notice, they were by no means to lose sight of them, but communicate without delay with the great thief-taker himself.

This having been done, Jonathan Wild, feeling much stronger and better than he had done for days past, went over to the eating-house in Giltspur-street, where he dispatched a hearty meal.

Under such circumstances as these we feel that we can leave him for a time while we repair to St. Paul's Cathedral, beneath which roof are those in whom we feel a much greater interest than we can in the villainous thief-taker.

The night passed away without their meeting with an interruption of any kind.

Edgworth Bess slept calmly and quietly upon the soft cushions of the pew.

At length, when morning came and a faint light struggled in at the windows of the cathedral, showing that, ere long, the interior of the place would be illuminated by the sun, Blueskin, who was watching, touched Jack Sheppard, who was asleep, on the arm and woke him.

For a moment Jack could not think in what strange place he was, but he saw his companion by his side, and then recollected all.

"Jack, I have been thinking for this last half-hour or so."

"Of what?"

"Many things, but chiefly what we should do with ourselves when daylight came."

"Why?"

"We cannot remain where we now are. You must be aware that during the day not a portion of the cathedral remains unvisited by some one or other."

"I suppose not."

"Now this will only be a good hiding-place for us so long as we are not suspected to be in it, but the moment that is known, it will be the most dangerous place in the world."

"Very true; I had not thought of that."

"Bess still slumbers. Now you can tell, by the faint light which finds its way in here that morning is coming on apace, and therefore it behoves us to make up our minds quickly as to where we shall secrete ourselves during the remainder of the day. When the officials arrive it will be too late."

"So it will. And have you been thinking about all this?"

"Yes."

"Then I should not be afraid to say that you have thought of some place where we can safely hide ourselves."

"I can't say but what I have, Jack; still I should like you to reflect as well as myself. I can only think of one place, and that has some disagreeables connected with it, so I would fain find another."

"Well, let me think. What place is the least visited? Why, I know!"

"What?"

"I have heard many a time that underneath St. Paul's Cathedral there are numberless vaulted passages. They are like the streets in a town. That will be the place for na. Why, if it is like the description I have heard of it, we could hide there till doomsday."

"That is the very place I had myself thought of."

"Is it? Then why did you hesitate about it?"

"Why, a churchyard vault is not a very pleasant place to be in, that is all."

"But that is nothing."

"Well, perhaps not to you and me, but you must think who we have with us."

"Edgworth Bess?"

"Yes. She may be alarmed and terrified at the idea of being in such a place."

"I think not. At any rate, we can but ask her."

"Very true; but, before we do so, I should like to try and find some other place that offered equal chances of security."

"You had better abandon that idea at once, my friend, because I am quite sure you would not succeed. We ought not to lose any time, either. Look how fast it is getting light."

"It is."

"And you must recollect that we have got the entrance to the vaults to find, and that may take some time."

"Yes. Two heads are always better than one. I never gave that a moment's thought."

"We may have some difficulty, you know, in getting into the vaults, for they take care to make everything wonderfully secure."

"They do."

"Let us start at once, then."

"And Edgworth Bess?"

"What?"

"Shall we wake her?"

"No, leave her where she is."

"Then we must not go out of earshot."

"Oh! no; for if she happened to wake up and find we were not near her, she would be terribly alarmed; besides which, I should not like to go far away, for fear that something should happen to her."

"Ah! Jack, it is a thousand pities that you could not have been content with being a friend to her, without being a lover into the bargain. I can see how the land lies. She likes you as well as you do her. A blind man could see that. Well, Jack, I must say again that it is a thousand pities, and I am heartily sorry for you both. Nothing but ill can come of it—I am sure of that; and, mark me, if my words don't come true."

"Don't prophecy any more evil for us," said Jack, forcing a light laugh, though in secret he was much moved by the forebodings to which Blueskin had just given utterance. "I am sure we have got trouble enough!"

"We have, indeed. I only wish I could see the end of it. How it is all to end is more than either you or I can see at present."

"We must not get upon that subject now. We agreed not to talk over our plans until Edgworth Bess was with us, and could hear and approve of them. You forget what we have to do."

"No, I do not."

"Then come, let us at once set about finding some means of entering the vaults."

Blueskin rose, and he and Jack left the pew in which they had passed the night, but, before they went away, they were careful to restore it to its original condition, and close the door.

Then on tiptoe they crossed the aisle and peeped into the pew in which Edgworth Bess was sleeping.

She was all safe and well, so they set about their exploring expedition without further delay.

The interior of the cathedral was now tolerably well illuminated, so that they were able to make their way about it without much trouble.

They ran no risk of coming in contact with any of the numerous objects in the interior.

To any one coming into St. Paul's, however, from the open daylight, the cathedral would have appeared to be in total darkness.

But to our friends, who had been there so many hours, and whose eyes had become accustomed to the gloom, the faint twilight which was dispersed about the sacred edifice seemed to them like broad day.

Indeed, philosophers assert that on this earth no such thing as total and utter darkness ever prevails, and instances are on record where prisoners have been confined in dungeons, and who have been unable to distinguish anything, have by degrees, as their eyes have become accustomed to the obscurity, been able to discern the walls, and even the rats and mice with which the dungeon was infested.

So Blueskin walked about in ease and safety, and was able to see everything.

But for a long time their search for some means of reaching the vaults beneath the church was an unsuccessful one; until at length Jack pointed out to his companion a small door set in a recess, and which had escaped Blueskin's eye.

Jack's younger and keener vision, however, detected it.

"This promises to be the very thing we want," he said; "but how are we to get the door open?"

"It may be unfastened."

"No, it is fast; and the only securement I can find is a lock."

"Let me look at it."

"Here you are, then."

Jack stepped out of the little recess in which the door was situated, and allowed Blueskin to enter it.

It was a low, arched door, having all the appearance of leading to the vaults.

It was strong, and crossed in many directions with bands of iron.

Blueskin felt for the keyhole.

It was of enormous size, for in those days the idea was in full prevalence that for a lock to be strong and secure it must of necessity be large.

Indeed, its strength and security were always considered in proportion to its weight and size.

The key of this one, for instance, was so large that Blueskin was able to introduce his finger into it without any trouble.

"I don't know what to do with this, Jack," he said.

"Why not?"

"The keyhole is so large."

"But you have skeleton keys."

"Yes; but none anything like large enough for this lock. If I had a good-sized nail, now, I might do something."

"That would be a funny thing to pick a lock with."

"Not at all. A strong nail hooked at one end is the best thing in the world. I will show you the knack."

"What with?"

"Well, not a nail, but the instrument that I lifted the trap-door with that leads into Wild's warehouse."

"I know."

"I had forgotten all about it, but it will be just the thing. Here you are."

Blueskin put the crooked instrument into the keyhole. A clicking noise followed, and then there was a snap, which showed that the bolt of the lock had been shot back into its setting.

The door creaked open.

What was beyond they could not tell, though Jack peeped over Blueskin's shoulder and strained his eyes to the utmost.

A damp earthy smell, however, saluted their nostrils, which made them think that a charnel-house was not far distant.

"We must light the taper," said Blueskin, "before we can see what this place is like. It may not lead to the vaults after all."

"I hope so, after all the trouble we have taken."

"So do I, but we shall know in a moment."

Blueskin again produced his box of phosphorus and thieves' matches, as they were called, and ignited the little piece of wax taper.

The flame burst up slowly and steadily.

A draught of cold air, which came from the open door, threatened every moment its extinguishment, but Blueskin shaded the flame with his hand and cautiously stepped forward.

CHAPTER CCXXXVI.

EDGWORTH BESS IS UNFORTUNATE ENOUGH TO ENCOUNTER JONATHAN WILD IN ST. PAUL'S CHURCH-YARD.

By standing fairly on the threshold of the door, the current of air was in a great measure done away with, and then Blueskin saw that he stood at the top of a flight of stone steps, which seemed to lead down to the very foundations of the cathedral.

Very slimy and damp, and overgrown with a kind of green parasitic moss were those steps, and, indeed, they presented every appearance of not having been made use of for many years.

"This is all in our favour," said Blueskin. "I do not suppose, if we had searched the whole place through, we should have found anything that suited us so well."

"I think the best thing we can do is to go and wake Bess and take up our quarters here at once, for, if we were to be seen, we should be quite done for."

"Evidently."

"Then let us go and wake her," said Jack, "you will remain here. I will bring her, and then we shall not have the trouble of finding this particular place again."

This was a by no means unnecessary precaution, for in that vast place, if they had once lost the door, they would have had a great deal of trouble in finding it again.

Blueskin consented to this arrangement, and Jack hastened to the pew where he had left Edgworth Bess asleep.

She was asleep still, and, with a beating heart, he asked himself whether she was dead, for she had slept uninterruptedly.

He listened, and then his fears were dispelled, for in the silence of the sacred edifice he could hear her breathing.

Reassured, he called to her in a low voice and awakened her.

At first she was startled, but the sound of his voice was familiar to her ears, and the moment she heard it, she felt safe to a certain extent.

"You must leave this place," said Jack; "it will be unsafe to stay here any longer, because of the many persons who come to visit the cathedral. Blueskin is at a little distance off. We shall have to seek a fresh shelter during the day."

"Anywhere with you, Jack, no matter where it is. I will obey you in all things. Where is Wild?"

"I have heard nothing of him, and, therefore, I begin to hope that for the present we are safe from his persecutions."

"Oh! I trust so."

"Come with me as quickly as you can, for Blueskin is awaiting us, and every moment that we stay will be dangerous to us."

"I am ready, Jack."

Edgworth Bess opened the pew door and stepped out into the aisle.

As soon as she had done so, Jack entered and put the cushions straight, leaving them just as they were at first.

He also closed the pew door.

Then, taking the hand of Edgworth Bess in his own, he led her to the spot where Blueskin was waiting for them.

As yet there were no signs of any one entering the cathedral, but, as it was fully daylight, there was no knowing how soon visitors might be expected.

On reaching the little door in the recess, Blueskin went first down about half-a-dozen of the steps, and then stood in readiness to assist Bess to descend, who came next.

Jack brought up the rear.

As he passed through the portal, Blueskin said to him—

"Close the door after you. If you look you will find a couple of bolts on the inner side. You had better draw them, and then you will secure us from intrusion."

This was good policy, for not only would it have the effect Blueskin had mentioned, but it would also serve to prevent the fact of the door having been unlocked being noticed.

This done, they commenced the descent of the slippery stone steps.

Blueskin went first, cautiously holding the light, and showing the way to his two companions.

It was positively necessary for them to support themselves by the walls, or they would never have been able to maintain their footing.

The flight of steps was of great length, but at last the bottom was reached, and then our three friends found themselves standing in a kind of vaulted passage, which stretched out to the right and the left from the bottom of the steps.

On gaining this place, all three stopped to look about them, and then, by Blueskin's advice, they turned to the right.

The atmosphere in that gloomy place was very attenuated, and it was with considerable difficulty that they breathed, while every moment the little wax taper seemed on the point of expiring.

But it struggled manfully against the foul air that was in the place.

Blueskin kept on, in the hope that they would, ere long, come to a more comfortable place, where they could wait until the day had passed away, but every step he took the passage seemed to get worse, so at last he was obliged to come to a halt altogether.

It was then agreed that they should turn back and retrace their steps until they came to the flight of stone steps which they had descended, and then keep on past them, in the hope that it would lead them to a more salubrious region.

And certainly they found, as they proceeded, that the air got better and better, though, of course, it was impure in the extreme.

The passage terminated at the bottom of another flight of steps, and, from their breadth, and the scrupulous manner in which they were brushed, our friends came to the conclusion that they had reached the regular entrance to the vaults.

After a little deliberation, they agreed to ascend these as far as the door, which was doubtless at the top, and then sit down upon them and wait.

This was poor accommodation, but still it was the best that offered itself.

At the top of the stairs, as they had expected, they found a door.

It was massive in its character, and the whole of the fastenings were upon the outside.

But in the upper part of it was a large iron grating.

Jack looked through this and found that it commanded a view of a large portion of the cathedral.

A number of beams of light found their way through this grating, making the wax taper quite unnecessary, so it was extinguished.

Our friends then found themselves in a dim kind of twilight, but still it was amply sufficient for them.

Here, then, they agreed to remain during the whole of the day, provided they were not interrupted, and to talk over their plans for future operations.

To guard against any sudden surprise, and from eavesdroppers, Blueskin and Jack agreed to take it in turns to stand at the grating and look into the church, so as to give notice of any one's approach.

Then they commenced laying down their plans and speculating upon the movements of their enemies; but it is unnecessary to set this down in full, as their plans will best develop themselves in action.

More than once during their conversation they had to pause, for fear they should be overheard by the visitors, some of whom came very close to the door.

But as one was always on the watch, no alarm was given.

And so the day passed.

There was one thing, however, which, though present in the minds of all, neither liked to touch upon.

And that one thing was, what were they to do for food?

The question was a serious and important one.

Many hours had elapsed since anything in the shape of food had passed the lips of either of them, but now all felt in full acuteness the pangs of hunger, and they had done so for a long time.

And yet, with praiseworthy stoicism, not one breathed to the other a word of complaint.

Jack and Blueskin, however, felt far more keenly for their fair companion than they did for themselves.

They knew how she must be suffering, and yet she had not once murmured.

And so the hours dragged slowly by.

Gradually conversation ceased.

They found that the action of their lungs produced by talking increased their pangs, and so they all became gradually silent.

There were many no doubt who, happy in the possession of all they desired, felt that day to glide swiftly away and for night to come upon them almost before they were aware of it; but it might safely be said that there were no creatures on this earth to whom it passed more slowly and more wearisomely than it did to the three fugitives in the vaults beneath St. Paul's Cathedral.

At length Edgworth Bess, who had stood out as long as she was able, gave way.

She did not expect any relief, but she could not restrain the concealment of her sufferings any longer.

She appealed to Jack.

Blueskin was watching at the grating.

"Jack," she said. "J—J—"

"What?"

"I am so very, very hungry, Jack. Oh! what shall I do? I never suffered so before."

She burst into tears as she spoke.

"I know you are hungry," said Jack, in a voice of deep emotion, "and I can tell by my own sufferings what your's must be like. I can do nothing to help you, I am afraid, until it grows darker, and then, perhaps, I may manage."

"But at what risk?"

"Never mind the risk, darling. You must not be allowed to perish of starvation."

"Nor must you lose your life to procure me food. Oh! Jack, what shall we do?"

"I will ask Blueskin."

"I have heard all that has passed," he said, as soon as he heard his name mentioned, "and I have thought of a plan."

"What is it?"

"To get you food."

"I know; but what is the plan?"

"I will go back to the door through which we came, and open it."

"And emerge into the body of the cathedral?"

"Yes. I have noticed that it is full of visitors, and I shall not be noticed among the number, I think. I will go out and buy as much provisions as I can stow about me unperceived, and then return, if you will be at the door waiting to receive me."

"No—no," said Jack; "the risk is too great."

"Do you think so?"

"Yes. Let me go instead."

"Nonsense! the risk is twice as much for you as it is for me. Rely upon it, I will return in safety."

"There is only one thing which would induce me to accede to such a proposition," replied Jack, "and that is for the sake of Edgworth Bess."

"It is for her sake I make it," said Blueskin.

"Then you shall not go," exclaimed Edgworth Bess. "Indeed, you shall not."

"But I shall."

"No; and I will give you a good reason why you shall not."

"Why?"

"Both you and Jack are well known to many persons, and would be in imminent danger of recognition."

"We don't dispute that; but it can't be helped."

"It can."

"How so?"

"Most easily."

"Tell us."

"I will go."

"You?"

"Yes."

"Never."

"Why not?"

"It is impossible."

"I cannot see that. I am known to Jonathan Wild only, and, therefore, do not run the risk that you do; besides, I could purchase the things that we require without exciting suspicion, which you certainly would."

"But neither Jack nor myself would ever consent to allowing you to run into so much danger."

"I consider I should be in the least danger of all. Grant me the favour. Let me go. I will take every care, but we cannot die of starvation."

"We cannot."

"Consent—it will be best for all of us."

Jack and Blueskin held a whispered consultation with each other, the end of which was that they consented to allow Edgworth Bess to emerge into the cathedral to purchase food.

They retraced their steps to the bottom of the flight of stone steps which in the first instance they all three had descended.

On reaching the top they noiselessly withdrew the bolts, and then listened.

But all was still.

Cautiously, then, they opened the door to the extent of about a couple of inches, and Jack peeped out.

No one was in sight.

He beckoned Edgworth Bess towards him, and opened the door wide enough for her to pass out of it.

She glided through the portal like a shadow, and Jack closed the door behind her.

Oh! how anxious and alarmed he felt when he found that she had really gone.

He could hardly restrain himself from going after her, but, fortunately for both, he was stronger than the impulse.

He did not shut the door quite close, but left it ajar, so he crouched down on the top of the steps, and peeped through the crevice.

Minute after minute elapsed, and every one that passed away increased his anxiety to a tenfold degree, and over and over again he repented that he had suffered her to depart.

But these regrets were useless, and came too late.

The only thing he could do now was to wait in patience in expectation of her return.

But she came not.

He did not, however, give her time sufficient.

But to him she seemed to have been gone an age.

His suspense became dreadful.

It was shared to the full by his faithful comrade, Blueskin.

At last, however, when they had both worked themselves up to an unbearable pitch of excitement, Jack's quick ear caught the sound of a light footstep.

The next moment he saw Edgworth Bess approaching.

He rose from his crouching posture, and pulled the door open.

The poor girl rushed in, breathless and agitated.

"What is the matter?" asked Jack. "What has alarmed you?"

"Quick—quick! Close the door—bolt it—bolt it! Ah! that is well. Now we are safe!"

"For heaven's sake tell me what is the matter?"

"Here is food. I have been lucky enough to procure that—but—but—"

"What, oh! what?"

"Just as I was crossing to the churchyard, which I did hastily, I ran against some one who was going in the opposite direction. I heard an awful curse. I looked up, and saw that I had run against Jonathan Wild!"

CHAPTER CCXXXVII.

WITH A GREAT DEAL OF LABOUR AND DIFFICULTY, THE THREE FUGITIVES SUCCEEDED IN MAKING THEIR ESCAPE FROM THE VAULTS OF ST. PAUL'S.

"JONATHAN WILD!" exclaimed Jack Sheppard and Blueskin in a breath, for they could scarcely believe their ears. "Jonathan Wild?"

"Yes, even him."

"Did he know you?"

"I fancy so, but I did not wait to see. I ran into the cathedral as fast as I could."

"Did he pursue you?"

"That is more than I can tell for certain."

"What an unlucky chance. This will serve us for a retreat no longer."

"You have had a very narrow escape," said Jack.

"I have, indeed. I have been so alarmed. But eat. Look, here is food; and then, when you have satisfied your hunger, it will be time for you to think of escaping from Wild."

"That is good advice," responded Blueskin. "We can do nothing in our present exhausted state."

The small quantity of eatables Edgworth Bess was able to obtain was shared out.

The keenness of their hunger gave them a relish, and it had disappeared in an incredible short space of time.

"I think," said Jack, "that the best thing we can do is to retrace our steps to the principal entrance to the vaults, and from which place we can obtain a view of the body of the cathedral."

"To be sure," coincided Blueskin. "We should then be able to see whether a disturbance of any kind was taking place in the body of the cathedral, and take our measures accordingly."

[THE THREE FUGITIVES MAKE ANOTHER EFFORT TO ESCAPE.]

"Just so."

"Come on, then."

Once more, with Blueskin leading the way, they directed their course to the flight of broad stone steps leading up to the door which formed the principal entrance to the vaults.

They glanced eagerly through the grating.

Their worst suspicions were realized.

A scene of the greatest confusion was taking place in the body of the cathedral, and conspicuously above all was the form of Jonathan Wild.

He had a number of men with him.

The thief-taker was gesticulating furiously, and it was evident he was on their track, and about to thoroughly search the huge edifice.

This was enough.

More our friends did not want to see.

All they had to do now was to make the best of their time, and find some means of exit from the vaults.

But where was that exit to be found?

Into what place could they hope to emerge?

That time must determine.

The passage certainly went no further than the steps upon which they stood.

They had no choice of routes.

They must keep straight on in the direction they had at first taken, namely, towards that spot from which they had had to return in consequence of the foulness of the atmosphere.

With many misgivings the lamp was again lighted, and they took their way along the gloomy and pestiferous passage.

Suddenly, however, there came to their ears, though in a subdued and muffled fashion, as though at a great distance, the sound of some heavy blows struck against a hollow substance.

This added a fresh impulse to their speed.

But the taper gave them great anxiety, for it seemed next to an impossibility to keep it alight, owing to the speed they were obliged to make.

Presently, however, they found their passage barred by a door.

Jack hastened forward to examine it.

He could see no fastenings, so he tried to push it open.

It would not move.

But, upon exerting a greater pressure, it gave way, having got stuck in its framework by the damp.

The moment this door was opened, they were rewarded with a gush of fresh air which came through it.

The taper now revived, and gave out quite a brilliant light.

They pushed eagerly forward through this door.

Jack, however, turned back to see if he could find any fastenings to it on the other side, but there were none.

And now the appearance of the passage totally changed its character.

Hitherto it had been arched and bricked, but now it was only cut out of the solid earth, and both walls and roof were composed of black-looking soil.

The floor beneath their feet was moist and sticky.

But paying no heed to this trifling inconvenience, they pushed along with all the speed they possibly could, in the hope of finding a way out.

Whereabouts they were was more than they could tell. Whether the cathedral was above them, or whether they had got altogether beyond its precincts, was more than they knew, though such knowledge, if they had only possessed it, would have proved of infinite value to them in their present position.

On, on they went, the passage seeming endless; but they noticed as they advanced that it got more and more confined in its dimensions.

Their pursuers, if they had been clever enough to get precisely on their track (which was scarcely likely), were nowhere within hearing, so there was some hope to be gleaned from that circumstance.

But at last this passage, which seemed interminable, had an end, and our friends reached it.

When they did so, they looked about them with some dismay.

Instead of finding the egress they had expected, the passage abruptly terminated with a mass of earth before them, as though it had been begun and never completed.

"What is above us, Blue?" asked Jack, after they had fully taken in their new position.

"I wish I knew!"

"We must take our chance and find out, for it is quite certain that the only thing we can do is to bore our way out. We cannot return, and we have only soft earth to deal with."

"But we have no tools."

"Then we must make shift without them in the best way we are able."

"We are in a very awkward position, Jack."

"Do not despair, Blue."

"It is enough to make one, when we reflect a little upon our position. I am afraid you do not fully realize it."

"I do."

"We are here, just like rats in a trap, waiting to be caught. This passage we have been unfortunate enough to get into is one of those which were intended to be formed into vaults, but which have never been completed."

"That's about it."

"The workmen have gone so far and then left it. Now, if we remain here, we are sure to be found sooner or later by Jonathan Wild, if we do not perish of starvation in the meantime. If we attempt to leave this place, we must retrace our steps, and the immediate consequence of that will be, we shall fall into our enemies' hands, for, though we are armed and resisted to the last, yet it is absurd for us to hope to obtain the victory over such numbers."

Upon hearing this dismal account of their position, poor Edgworth Bess's heart sunk within her, and, clasping her hands together, she burst into tears.

"Oh! this is all my fault," she sobbed. "It is I alone who have brought you into this great peril. It was my utter carelessness. I ought to have looked where I was going, and not have run blindly into the arms of Jonathan Wild, and set him upon our track in the way I have done."

"Do not reproach yourself—pray do not," said Jack, soothingly. "No blame attaches itself to you. You run a fearful risk of being immediately captured by that bold bad man, who is the evil star of your existence."

"But then, if he had taken me in the churchyard, you would have escaped. Now we shall all fall into his hands."

"No—no. I hope not."

"Do you think there is room for hope?"

"Indeed I do. Blueskin, here, takes rather a gloomy view of our situation, but, then, he is doubtless suffering much anguish from his wound, and that will make a difference to any man. Believe me, I am very far indeed from the thought of relinquishing all hope. I think it quite possible we may once more escape from the clutches of our arch enemy, Jonathan Wild."

These words, which were spoken in a tone of confidence, had a cheering influence upon Edgworth Bess, and she evidently thought their position less desperate than at first.

Where they stood they could hear no sounds indicative of the approach of their foes.

In that vast edifice it would be a matter of considerable difficulty for Jonathan Wild, clever as he was in such matters, to get exactly upon their track.

So many turnings would present themselves to his notice, each offering an equal chance of success, that it would be a matter of impossibility almost for him to hit upon the proper one, without some person's knowledge on the subject which would serve him as a guide.

Having spoken to Edgworth Bess the words of consolation we have recorded, Jack Sheppard looked all around him to find some chance of making their escape.

At length he addressed his companion.

"Blue," he said, "I do not see that we stand the ghost of a chance of making our escape, except we adopt the means which I first proposed to you."

"You mean boring a passage out?"

"Yes."

"That will be a work of immense labour."

"Perhaps not. It may be that we are not far from the surface, and that a few moments' vigorous work may open to us a way to freedom."

"It is just possible that such may be the case, but in my judgment not at all probable."

"But we can try, and anyhow it is worth our while."

"The worst of it is we have no tools."

"That is awkward, I admit; but then we have our swords, and with them I should think we shall not have much trouble in making our way through this soft earth. Let us try, at all events."

There was certainly no harm in doing this, so Blueskin followed the example of Jack Sheppard, and drew his sword.

The little wax taper was given to Edgworth Bess, and she held it as high up in the air as she could.

Going, then, to the extremity of the passage, Jack and Blueskin looked closely at the wall of earth that was before them.

There was, however, very little to see.

Certainly nothing to choose for a place at which to commence their operations.

But Jack with his sword gave a vigorous thrust at that part of it where it was joined to the roof, or rather where the wall ended and the ceiling began.

The earth was very soft, for the sword-blade buried itself immediately.

"Come on, Blue; lend us your aid. Bless you! we shall have no trouble in carving our way out."

As he spoke, Jack pulled his sword out again and began picking away the earth.

It fell down on to the floor of the passage in large lumps.

This was encouraging, and Blueskin gave his help as well.

Edgworth Bess made herself useful by holding the light, and in that way aiding them in their operations.

They worked with right good will, and they soon made quite a large breach.

Every moment, too, their task grew lighter, for the earth fell in large portions and with greater ease.

Blueskin did not like to confess it, but he was terribly fatigued.

There was, in the first place, his wound, which had never been properly attended to.

From it a large quantity of blood had effused, and want of rest and food made him more sensible of its loss than he would have been.

This accounted for the desponding manner in which he spoke when, contrary to the expectations in which he had indulged, he found that there was no outlet to the passage.

Jack's example, however, had a beneficial effect upon him, and he, to a certain extent, forgot his debilitation as he saw the rapid progress they were making in their work.

There did indeed now seem at least a reasonable prospect of their being successful in making their escape.

Jack worked with uncommon vigour, but then he had every incentive to make the utmost exertion he was able.

Presently, however, Jack felt his sword strike against some hard substance.

But, thinking it was merely a stone which he had encountered, he plunged his sword into the earth a few feet further off.

The same result followed.

The point of his weapon struck with the same sharp, metallic sound, against something which it was unable to penetrate.

But, not daunted by this, he continued his work, satisfied that there was some obstacle in the way, but determined that it should be overcome.

Accordingly, he removed the earth which covered it, and then saw that a brick wall was disclosed.

But it was very dark in colour, and seemed as though it was rapidly crumbling away.

This effect was doubtless produced by the contact of the damp earth having a corroding influence.

"What are we to do now?" asked Blueskin.

"We must think a moment. Can you hear any sounds of pursuit?"

"No, all seems still."

"Good, then we have a little while for consideration, and I trust a chance of making our way out."

"What do you want to consider?"

"Why, if I possibly could, I should like to ascertain whereabouts we are. I mean to try and find out what is overhead."

"That I am afraid will be very difficult, if not impossible."

"No, I do not think so."

"Why not?"

"I will tell you. I have been thinking about it for some time. You know where they are doing the repairs?"

"Yes."

"That is at the end of the cathedral nearest Watling-street."

"Or Cheapside?"

"Just so. It is all the same thing. Now think. Do you recollect which way we took when we entered?"

"Yes."

"And, then, in which direction the door lay through which we entered the vaults?"

"Yes; that was the Watling-street end of the cathedral."

"Of course it was."

"Then the stairs curved round as we descended, and when we got to the bottom we found there was a passage going right and left."

"That is quite correct."

"Please attend, then. The passage to the left, as you know very well, took us under a part of the cathedral itself."

"Yes."

"Well, then we turned to the right. Now, it appears to me that, as we have come in a straight line from the foot of the steps, and for a very considerable distance, we must have passed under the churchyard—under the road that goes round the east end of it, and that we are now somewhere near Watling-street."

"Stop a minute," said Blueskin; "let me consider."

CHAPTER CCXXXVIII.

OUR THREE FRIENDS SUCCEEDED IN MAKING THEIR WAY OUT OF THE VAULTS OF ST. PAUL'S, BUT NOT OUT OF DANGER.

As he spoke, Blueskin placed his hands over his eyes, so as to shut out the view of the objects by which he was surrounded, and endeavoured to ascertain whether Jack was correct with respect to their situation.

When his eyes were thus closed, Blueskin could see before him the cathedral with reference to the position it occupied, and, as he did so, he turned round once or twice, and at length, stopping with his face in one direction, he said—

"If I am right, I ought now to be directly facing Watling-street, for I have considered our whereabouts very attentively."

So saying, Blueskin removed his hands from before his face, and, looking straight before him, he found he was exactly opposite the breach which had been made in the wall of the passage.

This remarkable coincidence with Jack's idea filled them with tolerable security.

It was scarcely possible for them both to make such a mistake.

"I am right," said Jack. "Now we are not far from freedom, I hope."

"What shall you do next?"

"Why, break through that wall. It looks quite rotten, and I daresay it will be done easily enough."

"But what shall you do afterwards? How do you know where it will take you?"

"Why, I take it, we cannot very well tell that until we look. Come Blueskin! Or, never mind, I think I can manage best without your aid."

As he spoke, Jack jumped upon the mound of earth which he had dislodged, and fairly got up into the hole excavated.

Here he screwed himself into as small a compass as possible, and began his operations upon the brick wall.

As he had said, it was far gone in decay.

The mortar in between the bricks had totally lost its adhesive quality, and was like so much paste.

Jack picked as much of this out round one brick as he could, and then, applying a pressure, strove to force it out.

But he found that would not answer, so he threw down his sword, and took out his clasp-knife.

The blade of this he inserted in the crevice round the brick, and used it in the same fashion as he would a crow-bar, and to his great satisfaction, the brick moved.

In a few minutes he got it out.

His task was then comparatively easy.

The displacement of this one brick was a key to all the rest, and down they came one after the other, with incredible rapidity.

But behind the first course of bricks was another, and these seemed drier and stronger than the others.

The success, however, which had attended his efforts so far inspired Jack with courage, and he attacked this inner wall with great intrepidity.

As in the former instance, he first of all got one brick out, and then the others followed.

When he had made a breach about a foot in diameter, he could not resist the temptation of looking to see what kind of place it was beyond, before he went any further.

Accordingly he took the taper from the hand of Edgworth Bess, and projected it through the orifice.

He was a long time before he could distinguish anything, and then what he did see was not very satisfactory.

It appeared to be a kind of vault.

He communicated this intelligence to his companions, and handed back the light.

Still undaunted, however, Jack continued his labour, and in less than ten minutes afterwards he had enlarged the hole sufficiently to allow them to pass through it.

Then he got down into the passage.

The exertion he had gone through was immense, and the perspiration literally streamed off him.

Blueskin was better, and when he saw how much his comrade had accomplished he took heart, and climbed up to the opening himself.

Having done this, he asked for the light, and announced his intention of getting through and finding out what the place was into which it led.

To this Jack offered no objection.

He was much exhausted, but in spite of that he could not keep still, but crept down the passage in order to listen whether there were any sounds which indicated the proximity of his foe.

In the meanwhile Blueskin crawled through the opening which was no larger than was necessary.

He found a bottom beneath his feet, and then he looked around him.

A glance was sufficient to satisfy him as to the nature of the place into which he had penetrated.

It was simply a cellar beneath a house.

Having made this discovery, he did not wait to do more, but climbed through the hole again.

It was lucky he did so.

As soon as he reached it he heard Jack say in accents of alarm.

"Quick—quick, my friend. We are only just in time. Wild's men are searching the vaults, and are even now in the passage, or else one that closely adjoins it."

"Come on, then. I think we shall elude them after all."

"What have you discovered?"

"That we have made a way into a cellar."

"Capital, then we shall be able to make our way into the street."

"I hope so. Bess, dearest, you will, after all, be saved."

The poor girl uttered a cry of joy.

But it died away upon her lips as the sounds of Wild's men came, even there, upon her ears.

"Do not be alarmed," said Jack. "Let me lift you up, and then you will be able to take hold of Blueskin's hands, and he will draw you up in safety."

Edgworth Bess consented, and Jack raised her in his arms in the best manner he was able.

Blueskin stuck the wax taper against a portion of the broken masonry, and, leaning down, he took hold of the hands which were held up to him, and lifted her up as gently as he could.

Jack, too, lent his assistance, and, by the aid of both, the poor persecuted heiress was placed in safety in the cellar of the house into which they had made so singular an entrance.

The noise of pursuit which had so alarmed them were now inaudible, but it was by no means safe to argue from that circumstance that their pursuers were not close behind them, nevertheless.

Not pausing, then, for a moment, they crossed the cellar.

It was rather spacious in its extent, and stocked with bales of some kind of merchandize, though of what description they did not look to see.

They were intent upon other things, that were to them of far greater importance.

Crossing this cellar, then, as speedily as possible, they came to a door which yielded to their hands, for it was not fastened in any way.

But it led merely into another cellar, similar to the one they had just left.

The only difference was, that it was smaller and empty.

At the end of it was a flight of brick steps, which, leading upward, and that being the direction they wished to take, our friends did not hesitate to ascend them.

But after mounting about a dozen steps, their further progress was stayed by a door which was immovable in its setting, and resisted the slight effort Jack made to open it.

The position of our friends was very equivocal, and they were to the full conscious of that disagreeable fact.

They had no idea whatever into whose dwelling they had made this surreptitious entrance.

And they were equally ignorant of what was on the other side of the door, and what danger they would incur when they passed through it, supposing they were successful in their attempt to do so.

More they did not dare to reflect upon.

The future was so uncertain that they did not dare to speculate upon it.

But this was certain.

They could not remain very long where they were, or Jonathan would be upon them.

Jack Sheppard knew this.

He knew he must act.

Had it not been for the incentive which the poor girl who was under his protection was to him, he would never have gone through what he had, or accomplished so many daring feats.

So, holding up his hand in an attitude commanding silence, he placed his ear against the panel of the door, and, as a preliminary step, listened intently, in order to judge whether there was anything going on upon the other side of it.

But the silence of the grave seemed to prevail.

After listening for several seconds, and with the utmost intentness and acuteness, Jack came to the conclusion that, in that direction at least, there was no one to oppose them.

Then he took the taper and examined the fastenings of the door.

They were all upon the outer side, with the exception of the lock.

But that was so fixed that he could tell at a glance there was no hope of forcing it off.

He turned to Blueskin and asked him for his bunch of skeleton keys.

They were handed in silence and, looking at the key-hole, Jack selected one which he imagined would just fit.

It was a shade too large, but he quickly took another rather smaller, which he inserted and turned round.

The lock resisted for a moment, and then flew back with a snap that sounded quite alarming in the profound silence.

In itself, however, the noise was but slight, still Jack thought it prudent to suspend operations a few minutes while he listened to ascertain whether any alarm had been given.

But all seemed well, so, gently and cautiously, he opened the door.

All was darkness beyond.

Emboldened, then, he pushed the door wide open, and crossed the threshold.

Blueskin ventured to follow, bringing Edgworth Bess with him.

He raised the taper in the air, and gave a glance round him, so as to learn in what kind of place he was.

It was a small chamber, and the use to which it was put was obvious.

All round it shelves were ranged, and upon most of these were eatables and drinkables of various descriptions.

There was a door leading out of it and a small window.

These things were perceptible at a glance, and Jack said—

"I think the best thing we can do now is to spend a minute or two in loading ourselves with these provisions here."

"So do I, Jack," replied Blueskin. "It won't take long, and between us we can stow a great deal away."

"And who can say how soon we may stand in need of food, and, perhaps, not have the remotest probability of getting any."

While the remainder of this little conversation continued, both our friends busied themselves with cramming their pockets with eatables of various kinds, and, in the course of a minute or two, they had laid in a considerable supply.

How to get out was now the next question, but it was soon answered.

They would get out by the door.

To their joy they found it was unfastened, so much time and trouble were saved.

Besides which, the circumstance reminded Jack of something which he ought to have done before, but which there was still plenty of time to do, and that was to properly secure the door at the top of the cellar-steps, so that their foes should have some degree of trouble, at any rate, to pass through it.

When the door leading out of the pantry was opened, the three fugitives found themselves in a kind of underground kitchen.

But in this place, which was not quite so dark as the pantry, there was no one to be seen.

It was early morning, and the inhabitants of the house were not yet astir.

The same care was taken to fasten the pantry-door.

The key was sticking in the lock, so Jack turned it as well as shot two huge bolts into their sockets.

With all speed they now made their way across the kitchen, and passing through the door, they arrived at the foot of a flight of steps.

These they did not hesitate to ascend.

They terminated in what was called the hall of the house.

No consultation had been held as to what they were to do next, nor was anything decided upon, but Jack and Blueskin instantly and unanimously decided that their best course was to get out of the house as quickly as possible, lest if they lingered Jonathan Wild should take such measures as to make it impossible for them to do so without falling into his hands.

But though they came to this resolution there were many obstacles to the achievement of it.

Of course, our friends had no idea of what kind of house they were in, nor of who inhabited it.

Neither could they tell whether it was a private residence or a shop, though they conjectured the latter, in consequence of the merchandize which they had seen stowed away in the cellar.

They did not stop to speculate, however, but taking a hasty glance, endeavoured to decide which was the front of the house and which the back.

Keeping in view the direction they had come, they found that, if their calculations were correct, a turn to the left, after reaching the top of the stairs, would lead them to the front door.

Accordingly they proceeded in this direction, and to their great satisfaction they found they were quite right.

They came to a door, and opened it with the aid of a skeleton key.

This done, they passed through it, and found themselves in what was evidently and unquestionably a shop.

Drapery goods were ranged on shelves all round it.

But bestowing only a hasty glance on these, our three friends, with beating hearts, bent their steps to the shop door.

As the reader must be aware, people when securing their premises at night, although they take every precaution calculated to prevent the entrance of any one, still they very rarely trouble themselves to prevent any one leaving.

So this shop door, which was provided with a complicated series of fastenings, was easily undone from the inside.

One by one, Jack Sheppard noiselessly removed them, until at length he had nothing to do but to lift a latch and fling the door open.

Having reached this point, however, he hesitated.

To have thrown the door open and emerged at once would have been unwise.

Somehow or other their pursuers were very tardy.

What was the meaning of it.

Was that a part of Jonathan's plan?

Perhaps so, for he was a scheming, long-headed man, and nothing pleased him so much as to lull his intended victims into a sense of false security, and then suddenly pounce upon them.

Or was the delay occasioned by the difficulty they found in following the fugitives?

These are questions to which time alone can furnish a reply.

It has taken us some time to relate the proceedings of the three fugitives, but then we have described them in full.

In reality, however, they occupied a much shorter space of time than it has taken us to relate them.

But yet, for all that, one would have thought that Jonathan's men, having been once fairly on their track, had had time to come up with them, or at all events to make some demonstration of their proximity.

But all was still.

CHAPTER CCXXXIX.

BLUESKIN, JACK SHEPPARD, AND EDGORTH BESS HAVE TO RUN THROUGH LONDON STREETS FOR THEIR LIVES.

AND so, with these considerations weighing with full importance on his mind, Jack Sheppard stood like a statue with the latch of the door in his hand.

One step and he should once more be in the open street.

But what if he should find lying in wait for him outside the door several of Wild's men?

It was not at all unlikely.

And so he waited and listened.

His two companions in misfortune fully understood him, and they both maintained motionless attitudes, scarcely even allowing themselves to breathe.

From without there came no sound.

But suddenly from within there arose a terrific crash.

Jonathan's men were in the house.

There was no longer time for hesitation.

If any men were lying in ambush they would have to run the risk of that.

Slowly—cautiously—noiselessly—for his presence of mind never deserted him in the least degree—Jack Sheppard raised the latch, and pulled open the door.

When he had got it open to the extent of about an inch he paused again, and looked through the crevice.

Nothing, however, but the dim outlines of the buildings on the opposite side of the street, rendered dimly distinguishable by the first faint sickly rays of early dawn, met his gaze.

From this he gathered confidence, and threw the door open still further.

Then passed out.

His heart beat quickly as he crossed the threshold, but no attempt was made to capture him.

He was instantly followed by Blueskin and Edgworth Bess, and then the three fugitives stood once again beneath the sky, and felt the cool air of heaven breathe upon them.

A sigh of relief came from their lips, and they felt thankful that so far they had eluded their powerful and much-dreaded enemy.

But what were they to do?

Friendless and homeless they stood in the silent street.

There was nowhere for them to go.

The hands of all the world were raised against them.

How were they to hope to continue so unequal a contest, or, at any rate, hope for victory?

Every chance seemed against them, and yet so tenacious is the human mind of hope, that in this dire extremity of their fortunes, and when things looked so black against them that they could not possibly look blacker, hope did not desert the breasts of either of our friends.

On the contrary, the fact of their having achieved so much in safety, seemed to inspire them with confidence to dare the rest.

Who would have thought that they would have been successful in getting free and unmolested into the open air? and yet they had done so.

It was only for a second that they paused in the street irresolutely.

They were aware how dangerous that spot was to them, and that the sooner they could get to a distance from it unperceived, the better it would be for them.

It was Blueskin who first spoke, for he was the one who first recognised their exact situation.

"Quick, Jack!" he said. "Follow me, and take care of Edgworth Bess. I will lead the way, and I hope, ere long, we shall find a place of refuge in which we can remain until the vigour of the pursuit after us has abated."

As he spoke these words, Blueskin darted off, and Jack and his companion hastened after him at the best speed they could make, for they were apprehensive that they should lose sight of him in the darkness.

Blueskin turned round every corner he came to, taking care, of course, to preserve one direction, and not to double upon his steps.

This was a proceeding eminently calculated to make pursuit after them a matter of great difficulty.

Before they had gone far, however, they were unlucky enough to encounter a watchman.

Running hastily round the corner of a street at which his box was placed, Blueskin ran against it with full force.

He did not see the obstacle in his path until it was too late to prevent himself from coming into collision with it.

But yet he did not knock the box over, as he assuredly would have done if he had not diminished his speed a little; though perhaps, could he but have known it, the best thing he could have done would have been to push it over.

But he prevented this catastrophe.

The fact was, the superannuated old pauper, who was supposed to guard the houses on his beat from all harm, was very comfortably asleep inside his box when Blueskin came in contact with it.

Now, if it had gone over on to its face at once, it is clear that the watchman would have been disabled entirely, and could not have given our friends any further trouble.

But the watch-box, after several oscillatory movements, regained its perpendicular position.

The watchman, however, could not fail to be aroused from his nap, for the shock threw him forward on the seat, and the end of his nose came into violent contact with the wood.

With a kind of instinct he sprang his rattle, before he was more than vaguely conscious that something unusual had taken place.

At the same time, as he rapidly recovered his faculties, he commenced shouting murder and thieves at the very top of his lungs.

Jack Sheppard could not refrain from uttering a curse at the occurrence of this unlucky incident, for he knew how soon the alarm would spread from one watchman to another.

But he put a stop to the exertions of this one by confining him.

In some other portion of this history we have explained the meaning of this term.

But lest it should have been forgotten, we will describe what Jack did on this occasion.

As the old watchman sat inside the box making all the uproar in his power, Jack ran up to it, and by main force threw the box over on to its face.

It, as a matter of course, carried the watchman with it, and there he lay beneath his house, buried and unable to do anything towards effecting his own release.

But the box itself reached the pavement with a bang sufficient to arouse a whole neighbourhood; so, however effective it might have been so far as the watchman was individually concerned, it had that drawback.

Besides which, the alarm was already given, and this only served to increase it.

The watchman continued to spring his rattle in a most praiseworthy manner, but the sound was muffled.

"Come on, Jack," cried Blueskin. "Use your best speed. Put forth your utmost exertion. Hark how the watchmen are taking up the alarm."

They were indeed. In every quarter rattles were sprung, and then the trampling of feet followed.

Not only were the fugitives in imminent danger of being surrounded and captured by these, but the uproar raised could not fail to set Jonathan Wild upon the track—even supposing him to have lost it.

But Blueskin continued to run at full speed, and Jack and Edgworth Bess had no resource but to follow him in the best manner they were able.

Jack could manage pretty well, but the poor girl who was his companion, not only was suffering from extreme debilitation, but was not used to such violent exertion.

Still, the dread of falling into the hands of Jonathan Wild enabled her to keep up very well.

How fervently Jack wished that he was strong enough to lift her in his arms, and so save her from all this fatigue.

But such a thing was quite out of the question. Morning, too, was very close at hand.

Every moment they could see the light increasing, and distant objects coming more plainly into view.

Suddenly a man darted out from a side street.

His attention had doubtless been attracted by the springing of the rattles.

He was just in advance of Blueskin, so he held out his arms and tried to stop him.

But he might as well have tried to stop an avalanche.

Increasing his speed as much as he was able, and clenching his right hand tightly, Blueskin hurried on.

Too late the man made an effort to step aside.

He received the reward due to his folly and interference.

Blueskin raised his arm, and, as he passed at full speed, he struck the man a terrific blow in the face.

No human being could possibly have withstood the effect of such a blow.

Down went the man like a shot.

He lay in the road quite motionless.

Another second and Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess passed him.

From the steadiness with which Blueskin, in spite of all obstacles, persisted in keeping one direction, Jack argued that he had already settled in his mind what their destination was to be.

But this was only his opinion, and it might be incorrect; and he had no opportunity of conferring with his comrade, for he kept steadily ahead of them, maintaining about the same distance as he had done all through.

So quickly did he turn the corners that Jack and Edgworth Bess had some difficulty in keeping him in view.

They had the satisfaction, however, ere long of learning by the sound that they were rapidly distancing their pursuers.

The sounds of their footsteps had entirely ceased, and it was only occasionally that a cry was wafted to their ears.

At length even these ceased to be audible, and when they were, Blueskin slackened his speed, and allowed his two companions to come up to him.

All three were breathless, panting, and exhausted; so before they could speak to each other they were compelled to support themselves and pause a little while.

As soon as he could, however, Blueskin spoke, for he knew the proximity of time.

"Thank heaven!" he gasped out, catching his breath at intervals; "we are safe so far, and that you have been enabled to sustain the fatigue of so long a race. I was afraid it would overpower you."

Both Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess made an endeavour to reply, but failed.

They could not speak.

Blueskin continued.

"Never mind answering me. Save your wind for a more valuable purpose. It is impossible to tell what may yet be required of you. However, close at hand here is a place where I have good hopes of being able to obtain temporary shelter, and that we must have, for we cannot keep up this sort of thing."

Jack nodded.

"I know the landlord of a public-house close by. I once rendered him an important service. It is very many years ago now, and he has more than once displayed his gratitude for it. I think I shall be able to interest him in our behalf, and induce him to find us with a safe refuge until we have to some extent matured our plans."

Jack nodded again.

"If you feel strong enough," continued Blueskin, "you had better follow me at once, because the sooner we are under a roof of some sort the better. You need not run, but proceed at a gentle pace. This will enable you to recover yourselves, and we shall be gaining time as well."

"I am quite able," said Bess, faintly; "but I hope we have not much further to go. If we have, I had better lie down here and die at once, for I am all but exhausted."

"Cheer up," said Blueskin. "Do not think of dying yet. It is but a couple of hundred yards at farthest that we have to go, and you can take your time."

"I will assist you, too," said Jack, speaking with difficulty, for his heart throbbed so from the excessive exertion he had put in, and made him feel as if every moment it must burst. "Lean as heavily as you like upon my arm, and I will assist you to follow Blueskin. It is very lucky that we have found a place at all. I can assure you it is more than I hoped for."

Edgworth Bess was, however, fully aware of the exhausted condition in which Jack was, and she refused to lean upon him as he had requested, though, at the same time, she felt how welcome such a support would be to her.

Jack Sheppard, though, would take no refusal, but insisted upon her complying with his wishes, and in order not to lose time in protracting a dispute, she gave way.

At a walk, then, they followed in Blueskin's steps.

By this means they recovered themselves in a great measure from their agitation.

They grew cooler, too, so that when they presented themselves at the place of which Blueskin had spoken, they would be the less likely to excite commentatorial suspicion.

When Blueskin said that the distance they had to go was only two hundred yards, he was scarcely correct, for it was nearly double that distance.

He was aware of that fact, but then he did not wish to dishearten the poor girl, who had already bore up against fatigue in so heroic a manner, by telling her that she had nearly a quarter of a mile to walk.

But at last, and without the occurrence of any further danger, the distance was performed, and the little party halted before an inn the appearance of which, outwardly at least, was tolerably respectable.

There was one thing that looked rather remarkable, however, and which served to militate against the general appearance of respectability which it bore.

And that one thing was that, though the hour was such an early one, wanting nearly an hour of sunrise, the inn was open.

The shutters were down and the front door wide open, as though it was quite early in the evening.

There was a light in both the rooms on either side of the door, but a dingy-looking blind was drawn so closely down that any attempt to have gained a peep at the interior would have been fruitless.

In what part of London they were Jack had no idea. Even with his intimate knowledge of all localities, he was at fault.

About one thing, however, he was quite sure, and that was that he had never visited that part of the metropolis before.

Looking up, he saw in front of the inn a projecting sign, which creaked dismally as it swung backwards and forwards in the light morning breeze.

He made an attempt to learn the name of the inn, for he could see there was something painted on the sign-board, and that there were letters underneath it, but more than that he could not see, owing partially to the insufficiency of light which fell upon it, and partly to the fact that the painting and the letters were nearly half obliterated.

Jack took this in at one hurried and hasty glance, for Blueskin did not make any pause, but walked straight up to the door of the inn.

He entered, and was closely followed by the two sharers in all the previous perils of the night.

Whether they were to end for a little while or to commence with redoubled activity was a question which they did not care to ask themselves.

CHAPTER CXXI.

JONATHAN WILD KEEPS WELL UPON THE TRAIL OF THE THREE FUGITIVES.

THERE was no one in the passage of the inn when our three friends entered, but the sound of their footsteps appeared to be heard, for a door was opened and a man came forth.

He carried a candle in his hand, for the interior of the inn was quite dark.

The moment the light fell upon Blueskin's countenance this man, who was no other than the landlord of the house, gave vent to a cry of recognition.

He knew him in spite of the disordered state of his apparel.

"Ross," said Blueskin, "you know me, it seems."

"How could I ever forget you, Mr. Blake. I may not be quite what I should be, to some people's thinking, but still, for all that, I can't but remember where I should have been had it not been for you."

"You are in position now to repay me for whatever I may have done for you."

"Am I? Tell me what you require. Let me know in what way I can serve you, and if it is in the power of man to do it, I will."

"That's right, Ross," replied Blueskin, grasping him by the hand. "I thought I could trust you."

"Did you?"

"I did."

"You were quite right, then."

"I rejoice to find it so."

"But what do you require?"

"In the first place, ~~was~~ me and my two friends who are with me into some room where we can have a few minutes' chat with each other."

"That's soon done," said the landlord, in a hearty voice. "Come into the bar. There is no one in it, for they have all gone to bed beside myself."

"Oh! indeed?"

"Why, you see, we are obliged to take it in turns. Sometimes I sit up, and sometimes my wife. But, come, follow me across the passage into the bar."

The landlord moved in the direction he had indicated as he spoke.

Blueskin raised his hand, and beckoned to Jack and Edgworth Bess to follow him.

As soon as they were all fairly inside the bar, the landlord set the candle down upon the table, and closed the door after them.

Then, placing chairs, he requested them to be seated.

But, before he followed their example, he took good care to put upon the table an ample supply of refreshments.

A draught of the capital October ale, which was poured foaming out of the tankard, did the poor exhausted fugitives a world of good, and Blueskin, as soon as Mr. Ross, the landlord, had supplied their wants and resumed his seat, spoke to him as follows:

"You are a downright good fellow, Ross—a downright good fellow. There are very few who would have acted as you have. In general, favours done are soon forgotten. But you are an exception, and a friend in need is a friend indeed, and that is just what you have shown yourself to be."

"I am much obliged to you, Mr. Blake; I wish everybody had as good an opinion of me as you appear to have, I should be spared a great deal of trouble, I can tell you. But never mind compliments. Just tell me in what way I can be of assistance to you."

"That is a straightforward, business-like manner of coming to it," replied Blueskin; "and if you will fill up your glass, I will tell you in a few words as I can all about it, for I am not afraid to place the fullest confidence in you."

Ross, the landlord, bowed, and filled up his glass as requested.

"When you saw me last," began Blueskin, "I was Jonathan Wild's head man."

Ross nodded.

"His second in command, in fact. Well, since that we have quarrelled."

"Quarrelled?" said the landlord, pushing his chair back. "Quarrelled with the great Jonathan Wild?"

"Yes."

"That was a very bad piece of policy."

"Perhaps so."

"Now, I always take all the pains I can to keep in with him."

"I can't blame you for doing that, Ross. It is very wise of you; but still, for all that, we have quarrelled; and the long and the short of it is—I am no longer in his employ."

"Oh!"

"I need not tell you all the particulars, for it would take up too much time. But, at any rate, you will understand me that Jonathan and myself are sworn foes, and he is using every effort he can think of to capture me, and bring me to Tyburn."

"Oh!" said the landlord, again.

"I have just now had the greatest trouble in making my escape from him, but I have succeeded in doing so, and I may safely say that we reached here untracked."

This announcement seemed pleasing to the landlord, for he gave a sigh of relief.

"Now, Ross, you see these two who are with me. They are particular and dear friends of mine, and, like me, Jonathan Wild is their deadly enemy, and he has for a long time now been endeavouring to compass their destruction. But, up to the present moment, all his schemes have proved abortive. We are here in safety. But we are weary. Now, Ross, in return for the services I have at various times done for you, I ask you to give us a few hours' shelter, so that we can rest ourselves and depart."

"If that is all you want, you shall have it, and you are heartily welcome, too. I need not tell you, however, that I am running a great deal of risk, and I hope, of course, that you are satisfied Jonathan Wild has not seen you enter here."

"I think I can safely give you the assurance that neither himself nor any of his men observed us, and I think we shall be quite safe here for a few hours. Of course, it would not be prudent to stay long. You know what a man he is. But this lady who is with us, and who has received at Wild's hands the cruellest treatment, is wearied down and exhausted for want of sleep and food. A little while, however, will restore her, and she will then be better able to cope with her evil fortune. Come, Ross, I do not want to press this matter on you, but tell me, yes or no, whether you will grant my request."

"To be sure I will. I know how to be sensible for a kindness, and, if I can hide you from Jonathan Wild, I will. Now you are here, however, fall to and eat as much as you can. You need not fear being interrupted, for this is a very slack time with us. Presently I will take you upstairs, and there you are at liberty to stay as long as Jonathan will let you, or you think proper."

"Thanks, Ross—thanks. Take my word for it, you will lose nothing by our acquaintance. I should not have asked you, though, only we were terribly hard pressed, and all at once I thought about you."

"Well, fall to—fall to. Eat and drink as much as ever you like now you have the opportunity."

"We will do justice to your invitation, never fear."

"Do—do. It is not made for the mere sake of making it, I assure you."

"I am aware of that, Ross."

"Are you sure there is nothing else I can do for you besides what you have mentioned?"

"Nothing, thank you, without you could find me a trusty messenger."

"Where to go to?"

"Little Earl-street, Seven Dials."

"That is a long way from here."

"I know it."

"What do you want this messenger to do?"

"Deliver a letter."

"Nothing more?"

"Nothing, except to wait a few moments and bring back a reply."

"And is it very necessary this letter should be transmitted?"

"Very; the person to whom it would be addressed is a friend of ours, and he arranged to have three horses waiting for us at a certain place, but from some cause or other he failed to keep his arrangement. At least, we were very much behind our time, and, when we went to the place appointed, there were no horses to be found. Of course, if there had been, we should have been far away by this time."

"I understand. Then you want to apply to this man to send you the horses here?"

"Yes."

"Well, if you like, I'll tell you what I will do."

"What?"

"Take the letter myself."

"Will you really?"

"With your consent."

"It is just what I desired, only I did not like to trespass so much on your good nature as to ask you, but, now you have volunteered, it is quite another matter."

"I shall be quite willing to go. The fact is, I have some business to transact which will take me as far as Charing Cross, and it is not a great distance from there you know."

"Not ten minutes' walk."

"Then, if you like, you shall write the letter now,—I will furnish you with materials, and when it is done, you can all go upstairs, and I will answer for it the secret of your being here shall be kept well enough."

"I will trust you, Ross—I will trust you."

"You can do so safely. Here are all the things you need, so set about writing your letter at once."

"Here, Jack," said Blueskin, "you will manage that job best; you can write faster than I can."

"Very well. I'll write, if you like. What do you want me to say?"

"Tell Tumposki how surprised we were at not finding the horses at the place agreed upon, and how much trouble we have had in consequence."

"What else?"

"Tell him we are here, where we shall be able to find shelter for a few hours; and request him to fulfil his bargain, sending the three horses to this place as soon as it is dark to-night, so that we can carry out our original intention."

"Is that all?"

"Yes."

"I'll soon have that done, then."

Jack Sheppard had received a tolerably good education, so he wrote the letter in a very little time and with a very little difficulty.

At last he folded and sealed it up, then addressed it to Aaron Tumposki, Little Earl Street, Seven Dials.

When this much was done, Blueskin took the letter and handed it to the landlord with many injunctions to be sure and not lose it, and to deliver it to no one but the person to whom it was addressed.

The landlord promised obedience, and carefully placed the missive in one of the inmost recesses of his pocket-book.

He then led the way upstairs.

Our friends had well satisfied their hunger and thirst with the bountiful good things which had been placed before them.

It was by this time quite daylight, so there was no need to carry the candle with them.

It was Jack who had the thought to suggest something to Blueskin which otherwise would never have occurred to him.

"Blue," he said, in a whisper, "has the old man got a wife, or any daughters, or anything of that sort, eh?"

"I don't know."

"Ask."

"What for?"

Jack pointed to Edgworth Bess.

"I understand," he muttered; then, in a louder tone, he added, addressing himself to the landlord as soon as they reached the first landing—

"Ross, are you married?"

"Eh?"

"Are you married?"

"Lor' bless you! yes. Haven't you never seen my old woman?"

"No."

"Then you never will."

"Why?"

"She went dead about three months ago, and now I am a forlorn widower."

"You don't seem to have grieved much; but have you got any daughters?"

"In course I have; two."

"Grown up?"

"Oh! yes."

"Are they in the house?"

"Yes."

"Then oblige me by calling them up and letting them attend to this young lady, who stands in the utmost need of their assistance."

"Certainly—certainly. The lazy huzzies! they ought to be up by this time. Here, Susan—Jane!"

The landlord pronounced the two names in a tone that amply attested to the strength of his lungs.

He was replied to almost immediately, and a door was opened, from which emerged two young girls—one rather older, and one rather younger than Edgworth Bess herself.

They were dressed, and ready to go downstairs.

They understood what was required of them without many words being said, and with that ease and freedom which is always apparent in young girls of about the same age, they made friends with Edgworth Bess, and withdrew with her into the room from which they had emerged.

Blueskin and Jack Sheppard were placed in the adjoining room, so that, let what would happen, they should not be far from the young girl in whose fate they felt so warm an interest.

Here the landlord left them—the last words on his lips being a renewal of the promise to lose no time in conveying the letter to the Jew.

Blueskin and Jack were both very glad to stretch themselves upon the sofa and comfortable bed which they found in the room.

As a precautionary measure, however, they determined to sleep and keep watch alternately, for they could not tell how soon Wild might make his appearance.

But the day passed over without any alarm occurring.

Edgworth Bess found the landlord's daughters homely and agreeable companions.

Everything that lay in their power they were only too glad to do for her.

And so that one day at least passed more calmly and comfortably for the poor persecuted heiress, than many a one had for a long time.

She slept well and soundly, and when she awoke paid

[JACK AND BLUESKIN IN SEARCH OF THE BURIED TREASURE.]

those few attentions to her toilette which it actually required.

It was long after midday when the landlord returned from his journey.

But the intelligence he brought was welcome enough.

He had seen Tumposki, and brought back a letter from that individual in reply.

Its contents were brief, and the purport was that three horses should be brought to the inn as soon as it was dark. They had been in Warwick-lane in pursuance of the arrangement, but the time having been considerably increased, and many of Wild's men lurking about, it was thought prudent not to wait any longer.

Things now looked very promising, and the intelligence having been communicated to Edgworth Bess, our friends awaited the coming of night with considerable impatience.

But they were doomed to be crossed and prevented from getting off so easily as they had anticipated.

Soon after sunset, and as they all three stood watching for the arrival of the steeds at one of the windows in the upper story of the inn, they heard the trampling of horses' hoofs.

Not doubting for a moment that it was the approach of what they wished, they threw open the window and looked out, in order to assure themselves.

But who could conceive their horror and amazement when they saw Jonathan Wild, followed by a large band of his janizaries, draw up in front of the inn.

He saw them, too, for the thief-taker uttered a howl, and pointed to the window with the butt-end of his riding-whip.

CHAPTER CCXLI.

JONATHAN WILD IS CONFRONTED BY A STRANGE APPARITION ON THE RUINED BRIDOE.

EDGORTH BESS responded to Wild's howl of recognition with a scream, which she found it wholly impossible for her to repress.

Blueskin banged the window shut, and even as he did so, he saw Wild alight recklessly from his horse, and hasten in the direction of the front door of the inn.

But before we proceed to relate what took place after his unexpected arrival at the inn, and before we relate how the three fugitives fared under this critical situation of things, we feel it to be a necessary duty to go back, and account for the thief-taker's inopportune appearance.

How he could have found his way there is at present a mystery, but it is one that will soon be cleared up.

It will doubtless be recollected that the last time we personally adverted to him was when he went over, from his own domicile, to the eating-house in Giltspur-street.

We have casually seen or heard of him several times since then, but that was the last that we said about his own adventure.

We will resume, then, at this point, and, in a few words, relate what happened to him afterwards.

Having made a hearty meal, and feeling very much better in consequence, he walked back home again.

On his return, there was some business which required his immediate attention, and this occupied him some little time.

His instructions relative to posting the spies had in the meantime been fully carried out.

Men in his employ, who were to be found in almost every part of the metropolis, were furnished with a full and accurate description of the three fugitives, and ordered to keep a careful watch.

The business over, then, Jonathan himself, who was restless and uncomfortable, strolled out, in order to see that his instructions had been properly attended to.

He was under the conviction, too, that those he sought were not far away, and hiding in some secure place.

He had traced them to that end of Warwick-lane which lies nearest to St. Paul's Churchyard, and there he had lost them.

But he was uneasy, for he knew he had missed them somewhere, so, like a sagacious dog who had lost scent of his game, he went to the same spot again, in order to see whether he could find anything to put him on the right track again.

In a moody manner, then, with his hands clasped behind his back and his head bent forward, he walked along Newgate-street to the corner of Warwick-lane.

Down this narrow and unsavory thoroughfare he turned, but he reached the other end of it without meeting with anything to recompense him for his trouble.

A choice of routes was now spread out before him, and he stood some moments in speculation.

He could have turned to the right up Amen-corner.

He could have turned to the left up Paternoster-row.

Or he could have kept straight on down Ave Maria-lane, and this would have brought him on to Ludgate-hill.

But there was nothing whatever to be seen that in any way served to assist him in his deliberations.

Quite by chance, then, for there was nothing else to guide him, he resolved to take this last-mentioned route.

Upon emerging on to Ludgate-hill, he turned to the left in the direction of St. Paul's.

While wondering what place the fugitives were likely to select as offering a good chance of concealing themselves, he glanced up at the cathedral.

But, though his gaze rested upon the huge edifice, yet not for one moment did the idea strike him that within that very building were the three persons for whom he sought.

He turned the corner of the churchyard, then, following pretty much the same course he had previously taken when our friends had so narrow an escape of capture at his hands.

While walking in this moody manner along the north side of the cathedral, with his face turned towards Cheapside, he suddenly experienced a shock.

Looking up to see what had caused it, with a horrible curse upon his lips, he saw that a young girl had run against him, and that she was entangled somehow in his apparel.

But, quickly disengaging herself, this young girl gave a bound forwards in the direction of the sacred edifice.

But not before the thief-taker had seen her face.

For a moment, so intense was his astonishment, that he stood like one paralyzed.

Then, recovering himself, he placed a small steel whistle to his lips, which always hung at his neck, being suspended by a fine chain.

He blew it fiercely, and the signal was immediately responded to by the rushing of many feet.

That whistle was the means by which upon any emergency he summoned any member of his band who happened to be within hearing of it.

In an incredibly short space of time, then, he found himself surrounded by quite a party of his officers.

He did not utter a single word of explanation, but simply crying, "Follow me," he dashed into the cathedral, to the utter dismay of the old verger, who was at the door.

The men kept close to his heels.

Jonathan winked and blinked when he found himself in the dim obscurity of the cathedral, and strove vainly to find some trace of the heiress.

But there was none.

She had disappeared.

But Jonathan was not to be balked, nor did the size of the building give him the least uneasiness or despair.

Posting one of his men at each of the entrances, he, with the remainder of his band, commenced a rigid search.

He also sent off for reinforcements.

In every way he behaved more like a madman or a demon than a human being, showing not the slightest respect for the sacred character of the edifice he was in.

He overturned every movable object that came within his reach, and plunged his sword recklessly and furiously into every crevice and corner that he came to.

But it was all to no purpose.

All at once he bethought himself of the vaults.

No sooner did the idea occur to him than he compelled the verger to unlock the door and allow him to enter them.

Down the steep steps he went at headlong speed.

But the vaults beneath St. Paul's are of a rather ramified character, and it was no easy matter for any one to search them all through.

Moreover, there was nothing whatever to guide him as to the proper direction he ought to take.

Had he been less violent in motions than he was, he might, to be sure, have heard the slight noise which the fugitives made in excavating the earth.

And at least half-a-dozen times Jonathan was within a few yards of where they were at work, and yet each time he took a wrong turning, and missed them.

It was not, indeed, until some time after our friends had passed through the opening, that the thief-taker and his gang came upon the spot where they had been at work.

They understood all at a glance.

There was no longer any trouble about finding the track of the fugitives. There it was, straight before them, and they had nothing to do but to follow it.

Jonathan Wild was the first to rush forward, and scramble through the opening.

He had a dark lantern in his hand, and it was a lucky thing for him he had, or he would assuredly have fallen into the cellar.

But he descended into it without meeting with any accident, and he began to look carefully about him, while his men one by one crawled through the aperture, and, as they did so, aided him in the search.

Of course, it was a likely enough thing that the fugitives had gone no further than that cellar, and had hidden themselves therein. At least, Jonathan thought it likely, and, fearful of doubling upon his prey again, he caused a thorough examination to be made of the place.

But that search, so far from resulting in anything save letting the thief-taker know that those he sought were not there, only took up valuable time, and afforded them increased facilities for escape.

This will explain what puzzled Jack so much. He could not conceive what had caused the delay.

But, as we see, the cause was simple enough.

In this way, then, carefully looking about him as he went, and being rewarded at almost every step by evidences that the fugitives had only lately been that way, Jonathan kept on until he reached the shop.

Here the partially open door leading into the street, let him know that his prey had been more speedy than he thought, and that they had once again got out into the streets.

But so far from feeling any despair or anger in consequence, Jonathan only rubbed his hands over one another, and grinned in that disagreeable fashion which was so peculiarly his own.

He had faith in the precautions he had taken.

He knew what a many different eyes were at that very moment looking out for them, and that they could not go far without being seen, and his receiving the intelligence of it.

But, for all that, he resolved to keep up the pursuit.

He would, however, never have succeeded in getting upon the track at all, had it not been for the encounter with the watchman.

The hubbub raised of course had the effect of attracting him to the spot.

But by the time he arrived there, the fugitives were again out of sight.

We know already that he did not overtake them.

Cursing his want of success, Jonathan at last relinquished the search.

He resolved to wait for some intelligence from his spies to reach him.

Accordingly he retraced his steps towards Newgate-street.

But as that place was at some distance, he despatched one of his men for horses.

He soon returned, and Jonathan and his gang mounted and turned their faces towards home.

It was now early morning.

The first rays of the coming dawn were just perceptible in the eastern horizon.

By no means pleased with himself, Jonathan rode at the head of his troop.

In accordance with his usual plan he took the most direct route back to his destination.

Just as the sun was rising and casting his first beams of yellow light upon the different objects around, the thief-taker and his party arrived at a part of the road where a stream flowed underneath it, which was spanned by a rude and ruinous-looking bridge.

Upon reaching this place the horse which Wild rode stopped suddenly, and reared in such a manner as would have thrown a rider less practised than the thief-taker.

But he maintained his seat, and struck the horse heavily.

Subdued and terrified by the violence of the blow, the noble creature became more still.

The remainder of the troop also came to a halt.

Then looking to see what it was that caused this interruption, Wild saw a few feet from him one of the strangest looking objects which could possibly be imagined; and he ceased to wonder at the terror which his steed had manifested.

Standing in the middle of the road was something

Which looked not like an inhabitant of the earth
And yet was on't.

By the garb which hung in tattering ribbons from her body, it might be conjectured that she was a woman.

Her hair was silvery gray, and streamed behind her in the early morning light in a dense mass.

It was so long as to completely cover the back part of her person.

A rude kind of cloak was thrown over her shoulders in which two holes had been roughly torn, and through which a couple of long bare, bony arms were thrust.

Her feet were in shippers, but it was easy to see that the whole of her apparel was of the flimsiest and scantiest nature conceivable.

The age of this woman appeared to be very great.

But then other causes besides old age might have conspired to make her so withered, so thin, so haggard, and so witch-like.

In her left hand she held a slender twig, torn apparently from some hedge.

For what purpose she carried it was a mystery, without she used it as a means of defence, but for that it seemed woefully deficient.

And it was not long enough nor strong enough to serve as a support to her steps while walking.

Her skinny and bare right arm she held extended at right angles from her body.

The hand was clenched, and one finger was pointed in a menacing and threatening manner towards the thief-taker.

The other hand, which grasped the stick, she held aloft in the air and pointed with it to heaven.

Then, in terrible shrieking accents and with furious gesticulations, which made even Jonathan Wild's cheek blanch, she spoke.

"Man of blood!" she said; "man of blood! you are here to meet your fate. I knew you would come! I dreamt of it, and you are here. You know me not, but I know you. Your deeds of evil are well known to me. But you are hurrying forward to your doom. You are hastening to it with all the speed you can, instead of flying and allowing it to overtake you! Man of blood! I warn you! I can see the end of all, and that end is not far distant—much nearer perhaps than you imagine. I see a scaffold—the triple tree at Tyburn. There is a huge and gaping crowd. I see them; they sway to and fro; they yell and howl as the victim for the day appears before them. I see his face—I see his face! It is the man of blood! It is Jonathan Wild, and they will hang him upon Tyburn tree, even as, years gone back, that same man of blood hung my husband. Oh! I see him, and the sight fills my heart with pleasure. His face whitens as the ordinary speaks, and his limbs shake under him so that he can hardly stand. Then I see the hangman; he grins derisively when he sees who is to be his victim. He holds the white cap in his hand—he draws it over the head of the man of blood! I see!"

So far Jonathan heard.

But no further.

All that had been said had been uttered with such extraordinary vehemence and rapidity, and the purport of her words was so peculiar, that the thief-taker, prompt to act as he generally was, had not been able to interrupt her.

But now, with a yell of the most infuriate rage, he struck his horse several sharp blows, and urged him forward.

The gallant animal which he bestrode was fiery and full of spirit.

He swerved, and reared, and pranced, but yet all the time he took his rider not one step nearer to the object which had so excited his passion.

The old hag waved her stick defiantly, and with extended arms shrieked out more words of menace and abodance.

But she could not make her voice heard above the din which the trampling hoofs of Wild's horse created.

But having said all she wished to say, and feeling most probably alarmed at the fury which the thief-taker exhibited, she waved her stick and sprang over the low stone parapet of the bridge into the stream.

No sooner had the object which so terrified Jonathan's horse been removed from its path, than it gave one tremendous bound forward and sped away at a terrific rate.

In vain Jonathan pulled the rein and strove to check his headlong course. Terror had, for a time, made the high-spirited but docile animal insensible of all things else.

CHAPTER CCXLI.

GIVES A GLIMPSE AT SOME PARTICULARS CONNECTED WITH WILD'S EARLY HISTORY.

THE janizaries, who had one and all been much startled by this apparition and the words it uttered, no sooner saw Wild start off at the headlong speed we have described, than they clapped spurs to their own steeds and followed as fast as they were able.

Jonathan heard them thundering in his rear, and the sound seemed to alarm his own horse afresh.

In a very little time he found that all hopes of roining him in and checking his speed were at an end, so he simply held tight, and did his best to steer him clear of obstacles.

In this he succeeded, and, after a time, the horse quieted down, and once more became passive in his hands.

Then Wild drew up, and for about five minutes swore in a most awful manner at his men.

At the expiration of that time he ceased, but only because he was compelled by want of breath to do so.

His anger arose from the fact of their having followed him in the way they did.

He wanted them to have stayed behind, and either captured or slain the hag who had caused him so much mental and bodily discomfiture.

But it was no good to think of turning back now at the hope of finding her again, because she had had plenty of time to get a long way from the spot.

Bidding them follow him, Jonathan continued on his way to his house in Newgate-street, where certain things connected with his general trade required his attention.

He had neglected his business a great deal lately, and, though the thief-taker was in no way dependent upon it, yet he could not avoid grieving a good deal.

"Curse it," he said. "It seems to be my fate that I am never to get any one about me that I can trust. I thought I had found what I wanted in Blueskin, but even he has turned against me. If he would come back and be to me what he has been, I feel that I could overlook all the past. But that cannot be, and it is folly of me to think about it."

"Other men," he continued, after a few moments' silence, "have sons who, as they grow up, replace them and serve them. But I am not as other men. I have a son—I mean I had one, for whether he is alive at this moment is more than I can tell. But he was a dolt—an idiot. So it is no good thinking about him. He might have joined his fortunes to mine to the advantage of both of us, but he elected otherwise. He is gone, but I wish—I wish he had been a son to me."

Jonathan Wild was human, and there were times when even he, iron-hearted as he was, grieved about his son.

It seemed to be one portion of the punishment attached to his evil doings to be in a state of isolation. He seemed to stand upon a pedestal, where there was room for no one but himself. Yet he longed for companionship and assistance of a confidential character in the numerous enterprises he had under hand.

But he was fated not to have it.

This son of his of whom he spoke, and to whom allusion has on a former occasion been made, was born him by his first wife.

We have touched but little upon the early biography of the great thief-taker.

But as this son of his soon afterwards made his appearance, and took a prominent part in the adventures which subsequently happened, it will, perhaps, be as well if we take this opportunity to bestow a hasty glance upon the thief-taker's early life.

Wolverhampton, in Staffordshire, has the honour of being the birthplace of this unparalleled miscreant.

His parents were poor, but respectable people, residing in that town.

Some of their descendants are, we believe, still to be found residing in the immediate locality.

But that has nothing to do with our story.

Had Jonathan been an ordinary kind of man, he would have lived and died as thousands of his forefathers did before him, with their name unknown to the world.

They had been content to travel in the rut in the highway of life in which accident had placed them, and never once thought of making the slightest attempt to raise themselves out of it.

But Jonathan was gifted not only with extraordinary strength and energy of constitution, but also with uncommon strength and energy of mind.

It is rarely that these two qualities are found united in one individual; but Jonathan was one.

At an early age his ambition manifested itself—though in a humble way.

Still it led to other things.

The other members of the family had been content to learn their father's trade—that of buckle making—in their native town, but Jonathan determined to go to Birmingham and learn it—that town which is frequently designated as the metropolis of the midland counties, and which was some twelve or thirteen miles distant from the place of his abode.

This was his first step.

And here let it be said that if fortune had been favourable enough to the future thief-taker as to drait him into the army, he would have unquestionably made in very many respects the best man in the force.

But fate decided otherwise.

In Birmingham, where he served his apprenticeship, he, like many another young man, fell in with a lot of dissolute people about his own age, and was ruined in consequence.

It is not our intention, however, to preach a homily upon Jonathan Wild, or to attempt to extenuate in any way the numerous and barbarous crimes of which he was guilty.

Let it suffice to say, at Birmingham he was first educated into the ways of villainy, and he proved an apt pupil.

In a little while he excelled all his companions in everything, so that at last he came to be looked upon as quite a head man amongst them.

And this was always his fate—to join others upon a footing of equality, and then to rise superior to them.

And we are not afraid to say that, had Jonathan Wild been trained right, he would have proved to be an ornament to society, instead of a disfigurement.

At length, to such a pitch did he carry his depredations in Birmingham, that he was compelled to fly.

Of course, the first place that would suggest itself to a man like Wild would be London.

To that city he resolved to repair, and he set out on foot to perform the journey.

He accomplished it.

But we should state here that, during his stay at Birmingham, which was of considerable duration, he became acquainted with a young girl, who was both virtuous and honest.

As Jonathan was a young man, earning good wages, and with a capital prospect before him, she consented to become his wife, and they were legally married to each other.

But at the time the young girl took the (for her) fatal step, she had no idea what kind of man he was to whom she had given her hand.

Soon, however, whispers of the truth reached her ears, but she refused to believe it.

Then came Jonathan's hasty flight to London.

He did not make her the companion of his journey—he did not even make her his confidant.

The poor woman, when she learned what had taken place, was distracted with grief. Her parents and friends whom she had offended by marrying Wild, turned their backs upon her, and she was cast upon the mercy of the world.

What was she to do?

Expecting very shortly to become a mother, what was to happen to her and to her child?

Still, for all that, with that fond devotion, of which a woman is alone capable, she loved her husband, and despite his treatment of her—his hasty flight—and the reports which were circulated against his good name—she determined to follow him to London.

She carried out her intention, and was so fortunate as to enlist the sympathies of a waggoner who was going to the great city, and he allowed her a seat in his conveyance.

For the reader must recollect that at the time of which we are writing—nearly a hundred and sixty years ago—there were no ready means of travelling to and from distant places, such as are in existence now.

The consequence was, that the poor wife reached London almost as soon as her reprobate husband.

She also succeeded in finding him out.

But where?

In Bridewell, where she was taken for being a beggar and a vagrant.

Wild received his wife with dogged sullenness.

While in this prison Wild's first child was born.

The one of whom we have made mention.

After a time the pair were liberated.

Jonathan was driven to many shifts for a living, and at last, finding thieving to be the easiest, he adopted it, despite the remonstrances and presages of his poor young wife.

And so things went on.

In time, Jonathan made the glorious discovery that it was better to act as thieves' agent than thief; that, in fine, he should reap the best harvest by constituting himself a sort of middle-man between those who thieved and those who were robbed.

And this was the beginning of that monstrous system, which he carried to such a pitch that the legislature were compelled to interpose and suppress it.

Jonathan did an enormous business.

But we have already made the reader acquainted with most of the ramifications of his trade, so it is needless to refer to them here.

This wife and mother then lived with Jonathan for some time, but at length he killed her in a fit of drunken passion.

He had had many a mistress since then, and the last one was Mary Milliner, whose end the reader has already seen.

But this son, as he grew up, proved to be a great trouble to Jonathan Wild.

It would not be going too far to say that he inherited all his father's bad and evil qualities, without any of the redeeming ones.

His was a fierce, untameable spirit, and one that fairly got the master of the great thief-taker.

He had, however, tried to bring him "up to the business," for so he designated his nefarious traffic.

This son, then, whose Christian name was George, was accordingly initiated into the mysteries of the office in Newgate-street.

For a time all went well.

Jonathan was delighted.

He thought that at last the trouble he had had with his son was over.

He fancied he beheld in him one who would shortly become a most able coadjutor and ally.

Delusive hope.

The darling son wormed his way into the whole of his father's secrets, and by pretending to interest himself in the proceedings, elicited everything.

The thief-taker took him entirely into his confidence.

And what was the result?

Just what might have been expected from such a spirit.

He took advantage of one of Jonathan's long absences, and packed up into as small a compass as possible the principal portion of his father's wealth.

Then absconded with it.

He had been an apt pupil!

The numerous lessons in villainy and iniquity which Jonathan had given him were not thrown away.

They all recoiled upon the teacher's head.

That was a just retribution.

This son, then, knowing the means at his father's command, took measures to destroy them accordingly.

He laid all his plans—made every arrangement for an immediate and rapid flight.

Then, when he had the booty safe in his possession, he lost not a moment, and was almost out of the country before Wild discovered his loss.

The impotent anger of the thief-taker was terrible to witness.

He made instant search for his son.

But vainly.

And so Jonathan's iniquity had recoiled upon his own head.

He little thought when he was giving lessons to his son that he was preparing a rod for his own back, and that the first person who would reap the benefit would be himself.

As we have said, the thief-taker's anger was terrible.

He suddenly found himself despoiled of the savings of many years.

Of wealth obtained only by a constant exposure and risk of his life.

Money enough to have enabled him to retire a rich man.

Now it was all swept away.

He would have to begin life afresh.

Registering a fearful oath of vengeance, however, against his son, Jonathan Wild, with his usual indomitable energy, set about his task afresh.

And, what was more, he succeeded, for he amassed wealth more rapidly than before.

And all the while he had heard nothing of his son.

But there were times when, as we have recorded, Wild could not help wishing that his son had been to him all that he might have been.

This was when he felt the want of some one whom he could trust sufficiently to take his place.

And so on the present occasion he felt the loss of some one trustworthy, and how advantageous it would be to him if he could have a substitute.

And so, with the thoughts of this son of his occupying his mind more than they had done for many a long day, Jonathan Wild moodily took his way towards Newgate-street.

It may be that the words which had been uttered by the mysterious old woman upon the bridge, and which seemed to have such an evident connexion with his own fate, had some effect upon his mind.

Certainly his thoughts went far back into the past.

But little did he think that this son of his was so close at hand as he actually was, and that he would so soon make his appearance.

Whether as a foe, or whether as a friend, time alone can determine.

Without the occurrence of any particular incident calling for recollection at our hands, Jonathan reached his own house in Newgate-street.

There he remained for several hours during the day, wholly immersed in his business.

Towards four o'clock in the afternoon he was made the recipient of some intelligence which produced a remarkable effect upon him.

He armed himself—called out his men—mounted them—and set out at their head at full speed.

His destination was the inn where the fugitives had found a refuge, and to which they had been tracked by some of his myrmidons.

CHAPTER CXXLIII.

JONATHAN WILD CAPTURES THE THREE FUGITIVES AT THE INN.

WE have seen how, as they stood incautiously at the window of the inn, awaiting the arrival of the horses, Blueskin, Jack Sheppard, and Edgworth Bess were seen by Jonathan Wild.

This put an end to all doubt respecting the correctness of the information he had received.

With a yell, then, which might have come with better grace from the throat of some ferocious animal than a human being, the thief-taker threw himself off his horse and called to his men to follow his example.

All this the fugitives had seen with horror imprinted upon their features.

In what way were they to escape the clutches of the thief-taker?

The horses had not come, and, if they were to arrive now, they would not be able to avail themselves of them.

What could have brought Jonathan there they were unable to conceive, for, of course, they were in ignorance of the facts with which the reader has been made acquainted.

They inclined to the belief that his presence there was the result of accident alone, and that he would never have known where they were hiding themselves if they had not unluckily been present at the window.

But Jonathan's information was rather precise, and, even if he had not seen them in the way he did, he would not have gone away from the inn until he had thoroughly searched it in every part.

But now he had the proof which his own vision afforded that they were in the building, and his heart rejoiced, for he felt that at last his pains were rewarded, and that he had got his prey within his grasp.

And indeed the position in which our friends now found themselves was by far more critical than any in which they had hitherto been placed.

In what way were they to hope to escape?

Jonathan's first step was to post his men at various points round the house, so as to command a view of the whole premises.

Then he stalked into the hall of the public-house—and that was the first intimation Ross, the landlord, had of his presence.

Upon seeing him, however, he expressed his astonishment by a low, faint whistle, while he looked the very picture of dismay.

Jonathan enjoyed his discomfiture amazingly.

He leant his arms upon the ledge of the bar window, in which Ross stood.

He held a cocked pistol in a negligent manner in his right hand.

Then, in his growling voice, he said in a tone and manner which he intended to be facetious to a degree—

"Good morning."

The landlord could do no otherwise than reply to the salutation.

He used precisely the same words.

Jonathan grinned.

"You know me, I suppose," he added.

"I have seen you before, sir."

"Ah! then you know me, of course. No one ever mistakes or forgets me if they only get one good glance at my face."

"Yes, sir."

"And I know you," replied Wild.

"Do you, sir?"

"Yes; and you are in rather an awkward situation."

"As how, Mr. Wild?"

"You know how."

"Indeed I don't, sir."

"What am I here for?"

"I am waiting for you to tell me, sir."

"Look here, Ross—for that is your name."

"I know that, and you might have known it if you had just looked up at the signboard that hangs outside."

"Bah! I suppose you know there is such an offence in law as aiding and abetting felons."

"I believe so, sir; but what has that to do with me?"

"Everything, as you will find."

"Indeed, Mr. Wild."

"Now, it's no good for you to deny it. You have at this moment concealed in your house three felons, whom you have aided and abetted."

"You make a mistake, Mr. Wild."

"Don't deny it."

"But I do deny it."

"I tell you they are here. I know it; I have seen them."

The landlord muttered an involuntary oath.

But a new idea struck him, so he went upon a fresh track.

He by no means wished to have a rupture with the thief-taker.

The reader will perhaps remember the astonishment he evinced when Blueskin told him that he and Wild were sworn enemies.

Moreover, he had expressed his opinion that it was the best policy to keep friends with such a man.

We shall see how he acted.

"I don't know who you have seen, Mr. Wild; but I can tell you this, that so far as my knowledge goes, there are no felons in this house, nor have I aided and abetted them."

"But, perhaps," replied Wild, with a leer, "if they were found here concealed in your premises, you would have a great deal of trouble in rebutting the charge if it was brought against you."

"I don't say but what I should, Mr. Wild; but I shouldn't think you would be the man to do me such a turn."

"Well, perhaps not. You see, it depends in a great measure upon your own behaviour."

"I am glad to hear that, Mr. Wild."

"Why?"

"Because then all will be well."

"Very good; I am glad to hear that, Mr. Ross. But, understand me, I have got at my back a strong force of well-armed men, who never stick at trifles if I tell them not to do so. The house is thoroughly surrounded with them, back and front, and it would be impossible for a mouse to leave it without their knowledge."

"I have nothing to say against that, Mr. Wild."

"Very good again. Now then, tell me the truth. You will find that it will answer your purpose best. Do you, or do you not, know those people who are upstairs?"

"I do not, Mr. Wild."

"That is enough, then. I tell you that they are three felons, for whose apprehension a very large reward is offered."

"You don't say so, Mr. Wild? Well, I should never have thought it from their looks."

"Oh! shouldn't you?"

"Certainly I shouldn't."

"And you had no idea of it?"

"None, Mr. Wild."

"When did they come here?"

"Early this morning, Mr. Wild."

"Early this morning?"

"Yes."

"What did they say?"

"They asked for refreshments, and said they wanted to stop in the neighbourhood for a few hours, and asked me if I could find them accommodation."

"Oh!"

"So I told them yes."

"And you had no suspicion of their characters when you said yes?"

"Of course not, Mr. Wild, or I should have said no in a minute."

"Well, I hope you will be able to prove it."

"Shall I be called upon to do so?"

"Very likely, I think."

"But you could get me out of that little difficulty, Mr. Wild, could you not?"

"I don't know. Very likely I might."

"Ah! do, sir."

"Should you feel inclined to do anything in return?"

"Anything in reason."

"Very well, then, I call upon you to lead me up to the room in which they are concealed, and then everything shall be looked over. I will take the responsibility upon myself."

Ross, the landlord, looked rather uncomfortable when this proposition was made to him, though, of course, he more than expected it.

"Oh! yes, Mr. Wild. To be sure," he gasped, for he wished to save himself from the consequences of what he had done, and to serve Blueskin and his two companions at the same time. "Oh! yes, of course. They are upstairs."

"I know it."

"Oh! you know it?"

"Yes, didn't I tell you I had seen them?"

"I think you did, sir."

"Of course I did. I was just outside, and, happening to look up, I saw them all three at the window."

"Oh! d—m it."

"Eh?"

"I said, was that it?"

"Yes."

"They had a room upstairs, and that's where they are now, I daresay."

"Lead the way up, then, and don't make a noise. I and my bull-dogs will follow you."

Ross, the landlord, gave an inward groan, but what was he to do.

Besides, he thought, if they were captured, it would be no fault of his. The fact of his leading Jonathan to the door of the room in which they were could not possibly make any difference to them, because he knew the room already, whereas to himself the result would be very different.

"Lead on!" said Wild, "there's no occasion to hurry, I know, because it will be impossible for them to escape; but still, we may as well get the business over, so lead on at once."

"How dark it is going!" said Ross, as he stepped out of the bar; "why, it was lighter than this an hour later last night."

"It is growing dark," said Wild; "but, never mind, lead the way."

"Hark at that!" ejaculated the landlord, as he walked towards the stairs.

A terrific peal of thunder, which seemed to shake the house to its very foundations, preceded his words.

"Only a thunderstorm," said Wild; "you are not afraid of it, are you?"

"Oh! no, Mr. Wild, only it's not a very pleasant thing, you know."

"No more it is."

"There's the lightning, then!"

A vivid flash of lightning at this moment lighted up the staircase, and revealed the forms of Jonathan Wild's janizaries, who were crowding close behind their master's heels.

Then it left them in what seemed deeper darkness than before.

Jonathan himself did not like the turn that affairs were taking.

In spite of his bravado, he was always awed by a thunderstorm, and this is not at all remarkable, for a hundred and fifty years ago few people, except the well-educated, could be brought to believe that the tremendous strife of the elements proceeded from purely natural causes.

Now Jonathan was far from being in a position to claim the title of being a well-educated man, though he had rather more learning than his fellows; but there was a large amount of superstition mixed up in him, and every now and then it showed itself.

As he walked up the staircase after the landlord, although he allowed no sign of it to be visible, he felt very uneasy in his mind.

"Lights!" he cried. "Curse you all, you carry lanterns, don't you? Why don't you show a light in this infernally dark place?"

He spoke these words in a loud voice just as he reached an angle in the staircase, which was very dark indeed.

The men halted immediately, and produced their dark lanterns.

There was a moment's delay while they lighted them.

But this was soon accomplished, and then from the united lanterns there came quite enough light to illuminate the staircase.

In the meantime the landlord was pondering over the disagreeable position in which he found himself placed.

He had no wish that Jonathan should succeed in effecting a capture, and he was quite ready to do anything that would be likely to prevent his doing so, if he could only see an opportunity.

But it was in vain he cudgelled his brains.

He could think of nothing.

When the lanterns were fairly alight, they resumed their way up the stairs.

But still the lightning and thunder continued with unabated violence, indeed, if anything, the peals of thunder increased in loudness, and the flashes of lightning in brightness and frequency.

At length the room in which the fugitives were was reached.

Jonathan and his troop halted before the door of it.

"Is this the room?" asked the thief-taker of the landlord.

"It is, Mr. Wild."

"Very good. You have kept to your part of the bargain, and I will keep to mine. You shan't have any further trouble."

Then, going close to the door, Jonathan knocked loudly upon the panel of it.

But his summons was unanswered.

There was no more notice taken of it than if the room had been empty.

Wild next tried the handle.

It turned round, and he endeavoured to push it open.

It was fast.

He shook it in its frame.

"Surrender!" he cried. "Surrender! It is folly to resist, and make a foolish struggle to avoid capture. I am here in force. My men surround this house, so it will be impossible for you to leave it. Give in, therefore, and you shall be treated gently. Refuse and resist, and the consequences be upon your own head. I call upon you again to surrender. Surrender, I say!"

Jonathan waited a moment to see whether any reply would be made to this speech, which he considered a highly conciliatory one.

But no notice was taken of it.

Those within the chamber—if any were within it—were silent as if they had never heard a word.

This infuriated Wild, and he caught hold of the handle of the door again and shook it violently in its setting.

He hammered, too, with the butt-end of a pistol upon the panel.

But it was all to no purpose.

"There is no help for it," he said, at length, to the landlord. "You see, they are such obstinate people that they will compel me to break the door down."

"I hope not, Mr. Wild."

"I'll see that the damage is made good."

"Oh! it isn't that, but just think what a name my house will get. I wish you could capture them quietly."

"Well, I have tried, but, you see, they are determined to fight to the last. However, a thought strikes me."

"What is it, Mr. Wild?"

"Have you got a ladder on the premises?"

"I daresay we have, sir."

"Very well, then; I will go down with you and look for it. You, Smith and Goggs, remain at the door and see that no one passes out. Stop there till you have orders from me. The remainder follow me quietly down stairs."

With these words on his lips, Jonathan turned round and commenced the descent of the stairs.

The landlord did not dare to refuse to follow him, though, at the same time, his determination to aid the fugitives was unchanged.

CHAPTER CCXLIV.

RELATES WHAT TOOK PLACE AT THE INN AFTER THE CAPTURE OF JACK SHEPPARD, BLUESKIN, AND EDGORTH BESS BY JONATHAN WILD.

WITH the exception, then, of the two men who had been left to guard the door, the whole party went downstairs.

The landlord could not, of course, say no to any of Wild's propositions without throwing himself open to suspicion; so he made a point of readily conceding to every one of them.

Accordingly he led the way into the yard at the back of the inn, and looked about for a ladder.

The storm was still raging, though not much rain fell; still the clouds were very black overhead, and completely shut out the sky from view.

The ladder was found, and Jonathan ordered his men to carry it round to the front of the house—after giving a word of caution to those who were posted at the back not to relax their vigilance, but to keep as sharp a look out as possible.

The landlord now saw what Wild wanted with the ladder.

He had it reared up in the front of the inn, and put close to the sill of the window which looked into the room in which our friends were.

No sooner was it placed—and care was taken to do it as noiselessly as possible—than Jonathan sprang to the foot of it, and rapidly began to ascend.

His men followed quickly after him.

But we must leave him for a moment, while we more particularly revert to the proceedings of the fugitives who were in such a desperate strait.

And let not the reader be surprised when we say that they almost lost all hope.

No wonder that they should do so, for all their endeavours to get free from Jonathan Wild were unavailing.

Clasping her hands together, Edgorth Bess cried, in a despairing voice—

"Oh! what shall we do? Tell me, what shall we do? Or must I give up all hope, and resign myself once more to the fate of being made prisoner by that bold, bad man?"

"Do not despair yet," said Blueskin. "We will do our best to prevent such a thing, but I am afraid the odds are too much against us for us to hope for that."

"Oh! fly—fly. Let us fly."

"We cannot."

"The horses have not come; but yet we might go on foot."

"How far before Jonathan's men—who are well mounted—would come up to us? Besides, we should never have the chance of making the attempt, even if we were inclined."

"Why not?"

"I know Jonathan Wild well, and am quite certain that, having seen us here, the very first thing he would do would be to surround the house with his men, so that it would be utterly impossible for us to leave it without being seen by one or the other of them."

"Oh! I am distracted. Let us submit to fate. I am doomed to be his victim."

"Nay—nay, be calm. Recollect the old adage, 'all are not lost who are in danger,' and perhaps, even now, things may take a more favourable aspect than they appear to wear at present. Be calm, and leave all to us. We will do the best we can, both for your sake and our own."

"What shall we do, then?" asked Jack.

"I can hardly tell, but I should propose this."

"What?"

"That we should fasten the door and erect a barricade before it, composed of all the heavy articles of furniture in the room."

"Would it not be best to leave it while we have the chance?"

"No, I think not; for all we could do, if we were not captured on the stairs, would be to enter another room. As for leaving the house, I am quite sure that is an impossibility."

"I am afraid, then, that it is all over with us at last," said Jack.

"I fear so, but hope not. Our only chance lies with the landlord."

"Then it is a poor one."

"Not so! I think he would do his best to save us."

"But how is he to manage it?"

"That is more than I can exactly see. We must wait patiently."

"I think the best thing we can do is to erect a barricade. If it does nothing else, it will of course retard our capture."

"Come on, then."

It was at this moment that the three fugitives perceived the first indications of the coming storm.

Edgworth Bess, who was already alarmed, was much terrified by it, and Jack had no little trouble in soothing her.

Blueskin busied himself in moving the different articles of furniture, and piling them up against the door, thus forming a barricade that would be by no means easy to surmount.

In a little while, when Bess grew calmer, Jack came to his assistance.

In a few minutes, so energetically did they work, they had their task completed.

They would now have to patiently await the current of events.

Scarcely had they finished than Jonathan ascended the stairs, and spoke and knocked at the door in the manner we have recorded.

We have already seen that they took no notice whatever of his call for surrender.

With what anxiety they listened to him, however, the reader can easily comprehend, if he can for a moment imagine himself in their situation.

Then came Jonathan's retreat downstairs.

They heard it, and could not conceive what it meant.

Cunning they knew him to be, and they were certain this was only the commencement of some scheme by which he trusted to effect their capture.

Jack and Blueskin looked carefully to the priming of the pistols, and held them ready for immediate service.

Edgworth Bess, sobbing and crying as though her heart would break, crouched down upon the floor.

Poor girl, she was quite overcome, and really abandoned herself to despair. She felt that there was no longer room for help, and that it was futile to longer struggle against her adverse destiny.

Her two protectors, whatever their feelings might be, determined to defend her to the last gasp.

The little room in which they stood was profoundly dark, and it was only when a blinding flash of lightning shot across their vision that they were able to see each other.

But these transient glimpses thus obtained were terrifying to a degree to Edgworth Bess.

The booming of the thunder, which rattled fearfully—each peal seeming to grow louder than its predecessor—effectually drowned the slight noise which Wild's men made in rearing the ladder against the front of the inn.

They were in ignorance of these proceedings.

Both Jack and Blueskin had endeavoured to account for Jonathan having descended the stairs again, and the conclusion to which they both came, though a probable enough one, was very far indeed from being correct.

They fancied he had gone down in order to obtain something wherewith he could force the door.

The thought of his eluding the point of his attack to the window never entered their minds, and the first intimation they had of his having done so was a terrific crash.

Looking round instantly to ascertain the cause of it, they saw that Jonathan had dashed himself bodily through the casement.

The first thing Blueskin and Sheppard did upon making this discovery was to fire both their pistols.

The darkness of the place prevented their seeing whether they had taken the effect they wished.

Jonathan was well supported by his janizaries, and they poured into the room with extraordinary rapidity.

Edgworth Bess sprang to her feet, and clung to Jack's arm.

He clasped her round the waist, and endeavoured to reassure her by a tender pressure.

Then they heard a voice, which to them was discord itself, cry—

"Don't fire, my men—don't fire. I want to take them all three alive and unhurt. We shall do it easily enough, never fear, for they can't get out. Don't fire, for fear you should wound one of them by a chance shot."

It was Jonathan Wild who spoke.

At the same moment he rushed forward.

Then a flash of lightning, of such intense brilliancy that the eyeballs of all seemed scorched by it, illuminated the room.

It was gone with that rapidity which is perceptible in nothing save lightning.

But, brief as was the light, it showed to our friends Jonathan Wild and his band of desperadoes.

They, too, were seen, and Jonathan noted the exact position which they occupied.

Then all was dark again.

But the janizaries one by one produced their lanterns.

They had not extinguished them, but merely placed them in the capacious pockets in their coats while they ascended the ladder.

Very soon, then, there was a constant light in the little chamber.

All the lanterns were directed upon one spot.

That was where the three fugitives stood.

Their forms were as fully revealed as if it was broad daylight.

They, however, had not the advantage of seeing their foes.

Indeed, all they could perceive were the round bright lenses of the lanterns.

In quick succession Jack and Blueskin discharged their remaining pistols at the dense throng before them, and then drew their swords—determined to fight to the last.

"Upon them, bull-dogs," shouted Wild. "Upon them! Rush upon them in a body, and they will be overpowered instantly. Down with them—but use no weapons but your hands."

On receipt of these orders the janizaries made a simultaneous and vigorous rush upon their prey.

It was in vain that Jack and Blueskin endeavoured to defend themselves with their swords.

They were borne down at once, for the impetuosity with which the bull-dogs rushed at them was irresistible.

In a moment they were all three upon the ground, with six times their weight of janizaries to keep them down.

There was no hope for them now.

In this position they were perfectly helpless.

With speed and dexterity they were handcuffed.

Then they were indeed prisoners.

Jonathan's eyes gleamed with triumph.

He had at last achieved that which had hitherto been attended with so many difficulties.

He could scarcely contain himself for joy.

Edgworth Bess was ready to swoon with terror, but with a great effort she retained her consciousness.

The dread of being insensible in the hands of Wild alone enabled her to obtain a mastery over the feeling.

Jack Sheppard was silent.

He could not have spoken had words been offered him—he was literally choked with vexation and disappointment.

It was the same with Blueskin.

Jonathan laughed triumphantly and discordantly as he took a lantern from the hands of one of his men, and flashed its light upon the persons of the three prisoners.

At last they were in his power.

He could scarcely believe it was real.

His joy was, however, extreme, and he swore a mental oath that they should not again escape him with life.

Then, turning to his men, he said—

"Clear away that rubbish before the door, and let us go downstairs."

[JONATHAN WILD HAS A FEW WORDS WITH HIS SON.]

His order was promptly obeyed, for his janizaries were quite as delighted as he to think they had succeeded in their object.

They trusted to its having an amiable effect upon their master's temper.

Alaciously, then, they set about their duty, and soon had the pile of lumber removed from before the door.

Then they unfastened it and flung it open.

The prisoners were then compelled to move.

Fearing that some violence would be offered to Edgworth Bess if they refused to move, Jack and Blueskin submitted to the wishes of their captors without a murmur or a struggle.

One by one they were led down the stairs under a strong escort.

Jonathan followed them.

Upon reaching the bottom, they stood for a moment in the passage.

The storm still continued; indeed, its violence was now much greater than it had hitherto been.

The flashes of lightning were more brilliant and incessant, while the peals of thunder were so loud as to cause a momentary deafness after they had subsided.

It was, moreover, now accompanied with such a deluge of rain, that it seemed as though some waterfall was descending upon the earth.

The interior of the inn was but poorly illuminated.

Ross, the landlord, however, stood near the bar door with a lighted candle in his hand, as the party descended the stairs.

Blueskin looked at him—not in anger, for he felt how utterly powerless the landlord was to prevent what had just taken place.

Ross was conscious that the eyes of his old friend was on him, and he allowed something to appear upon his features which Blueskin construed into a hope.

He fancied that the landlord would even yet do something towards effecting their release.

But how?

He could not think.

On reaching the passage, Jonathan stalked to the front door of the inn.

It was closed.

But he lifted the latch, and opened it.

The aspect of the weather without rather dismayed him.

As we have before said, Jonathan Wild had rather a horror of thunder and lightning.

Not only this, it was quite certain if ever he went out while that rain continued he would be wet through to the skin in less than a moment.

A curse came from his lips as he saw this.

He hated to be interfered with by anything or anybody.

He wished to make his way to Newgate-street with his prisoners with all speed, and on arriving there, to immure them in one of his dungeons, taking such precautions as would effectually preclude all possibility of their making their escape.

But under the present aspect of affairs it seemed next to an impossibility for him to do this.

And yet he felt that to remain at the inn until the violence of the storm had abated, would be to expose himself to a very great risk.

But the reader must not for a moment fall into the mistake of supposing that it was through any element feeling upon Wild's part with regard to his prisoners that made him hesitate about proceeding direct to London.

To be sure, Edgworth Bess was only of value to him while she was alive, and that manifestly it was his best policy to take all the care of her he could.

The chief thing, however, that was present to his mind was the terrific nature of the storm.

And this was scarcely to be wondered at.

CHAPTER CCLV.

JONATHAN WILD AND HIS GANG FALL EASY VICTIMS TO ROSS'S CLEVER PLAN.

It is only at very rare intervals indeed that such a storm as that was desolates the plains of England.

Jonathan was quite sure that never in all his life had he seen or heard anything like it.

The brilliant flashes of lightning seemed to show themselves without intermission, while the thunder roared incessantly.

And the rain.

It came down perfectly straight, and when it reached the ground, so violent was its descent, that it rebounded several inches.

The road, too, in front of the house, soon became quite flooded, for the earth could not absorb the moisture, neither could it run off in the provided channels as quickly as it came down.

For almost two minutes Jonathan Wild stood at the door of the inn beholding the strife of the elements.

Then, not being able to perceive the least signs of its abatement—fancying, on the contrary, that it increased—he turned away, closing the door after him.

Ross, the landlord, who still held the candle in his hand, came towards him.

The janizaries, keeping a tight hold upon the prisoners, had not moved from their station at the foot of the stairs.

In a most respectful tone of voice, Ross addressed the thief-taker.

"This is an awful storm, Mr. Wild," he said, "a truly awful storm, and I am afraid it is going to last a good while longer yet. Would you like to stop here a little while, Mr. Wild, for, if you were to go out, you would be quite drenched and blinded?"

"This is an inn, isn't it?" growled Wild.

"Certainly, sir."

"Then I can stay if I choose without anyone's permission."

"Certainly you could, Mr. Wild," replied Ross, determined, for the sake of our friends, not to take offence at him, no matter how offensive his remarks became. "Certainly you could stay, but I merely spoke out of civility. I only meant you were quite welcome to make use of my house if you thought proper."

"Oh! very well. We will stay until the storm gives over a little, or, at all events, until it shows some signs of doing so."

"Which it certainly does not at present. But where would you like to stay, for I am afraid I have not got a room large enough to accommodate the whole of you."

"Show us into the largest room you have got, and then we will do our best to make shift."

The landlord rubbed his head, and pretended to be confused.

"The largest room in the house, Mr. Wild, is the kitchen."

"The kitchen?"

"Yes, Mr. Wild, the kitchen."

"Then take us there at once, the kitchen will do as well as anywhere."

"I'll tell you what it is, Mr. Wild, and, then, afterwards, if you like to go down in the kitchen, you can."

"What is it?"

"Why, we are doing a great deal in the cooking way."

"Is that all?"

"Yes."

"Then, that does not matter."

"All right, Mr. Wild, I am glad to hear you say so, only I thought I had better mention it."

"Bah! stuff! Lead the way, and we will follow. If we are to stop here half-an-hour we can't stand in the passage."

"Of course you can't, Mr. Wild. Be good enough to follow me, and I will lead the way."

Jonathan took no further heed of Ross, but called out to his men—

"Look sharp after your three prisoners, my lads, and follow me. They are slippery customers, you know."

"All right, Mr. Wild," was the response, and, as they spoke, the janizaries tightened their grasp upon their prisoners.

On their part, however, the fugitives offered no resistance, and had no thought of offering any.

They saw that, just at present, it would be worse than useless, for not only would it be impossible for them to release themselves, but, by making the attempt, they would only be likely to bring down upon themselves additional ill-usage and severity.

Accordingly, with a manner that was humble enough, they followed the janizaries whither they led them.

Poor Edgworth Bess was quite cast down with grief.

All the terrible efforts she had made to escape from the evil genius of her life had been in vain.

She was once again in his power, and this time there was still less hope that she should be able to escape from him, because he would redouble his precautions to retain her in his custody.

Besides which, her two defenders and protectors were in the same predicament as herself.

So it was no wonder the poor girl felt so cast down as she did.

On the other hand, Blueskin was full of hope.

He relied upon Ross finding an opportunity to put them in the way of effecting their escape if they remained long in the inn.

He looked upon the conversation respecting the kitchen from this point of view, and felt convinced that it was but the prelude to some scheme which Ross had formed.

Whether he was correct or not, we shall very quickly see.

The whole party proceeded to this place, which was a long room, apparently added to the main structure of the inn by being built out into the yard.

As soon as they entered, their nostrils were saluted with a most savoury and appetizing smell, which proceeded from the culinary operations of which Ross had spoken.

The fire-grate was a huge one, and occupied the whole of one end of the kitchen.

By the directions of the landlord, additional chairs and benches were brought in, upon which the janizaries and their prisoners could sit down.

Then the apartment was still further illuminated by lighting some candles, which were stuck in tin sconces along the walls.

By the aid of these Wild was able to take in the general aspect of the place, which he did before he sat down.

When he did so, he placed a chair in such a position that, as he occupied it, he could observe every movement of the three prisoners, and, by holding out his arm at full length, almost touch them.

This, then, was the aspect of affairs on that eventful evening when things looked so black against our friends.

And still the storm continued with unmitigated fury.

After a time, as they sat down, the men, and Jonathan included, turned their eyes around them listlessly, because they had nothing to do.

As for Ross, he took good care to keep aloof.

Where he was, or what engaged him, none knew but himself.

Presently, however, he made his appearance in the kitchen.

"It's no good my sitting in the bar such a night," said his, Mr. Wild, waiting for customers, is it?"

"I suppose not."

"It's a most unfortunate thing for me, this storm is."

"How so?"

"Why, you see, a large party promised to come here to supper to-night, and that is the reason you see all this cooking going on. Now, do you know, there's as nice a piece of beef hanging before that fire as ever was put upon the spit, and there's a leg of mutton of equally good quality boiling in that pot over the fire."

"And I suppose you are afraid this storm will keep your guests away?" replied Wild, who had sat in his chair and looked at his prisoners so long that he was quite amiable.

"I am more than afraid, Mr. Wild; I am quite certain they will not come now. For who in the world would start out on a night like this for the nicest supper in the world?"

"Very true."

"And besides, most of them would have a long way to come; and even if the storm was to cease this moment, the roads would be in such a state that, for the next hour or so, they would be almost impassable. I was at the front door just now, and the rain seems to have regularly dug the earth up, and the depth of the mud is something more than I can tell."

"And about this supper?" said Wild. "Will all the loss fall upon you?"

"I am afraid so."

"That is unfortunate."

"I said so, sir; this storm is a most unfortunate thing for me."

"And for me, too," growled the thief-taker, "or else, by this time, I should have been a good way on my road to Newgate."

"Just so, Mr. Wild. But then you are not quite so bad off as me, because your prisoners cannot help being perfectly secure while you have got your own eyes upon them."

"Oh! very true. I don't say but what they are safe enough."

"Still, you would rather see them in Newgate?"

"Just so. But, Ross?"

"Yes, Mr. Wild?"

"You have acted very fairly and straightforwardly with me in this matter, and I am sorry to find you will sustain such a loss."

"Thank you, Mr. Wild."

"However, I don't mind having something for the good of your house, and as my bull-dogs have done their duty very well, and as they have got a long ride before them, why, they shall have something for the good of the house too."

The janizaries gave utterance to cries of unqualified satisfaction as they heard these words fall from the lips of their imperious master.

They found sitting there without anything to drink was very dry, uninteresting work.

"I am very much obliged to you, Mr. Wild," replied Ross, "very much obliged to you; and no one will ever find me saying a bad word against you. What would you like to take?"

"What have you got?"

"Almost anything you like to mention, but there is one article in my cellar which I cannot help especially recommending."

"What's that?"

"Some prime old October ale of my own brewing. Perhaps I ought not to praise it myself, but I am quite sure, after you have once tasted it, I shall have no occasion to do so."

"Well," said Wild, "that will suit us, I fancy, as well as anything. You shall bring in half-a-dozen tankards of this ale you speak of, and serve it out all round to my men."

"Thank you, Mr. Wild," said Ross; and off he went, apparently in high glee, to execute this order.

He soon returned, bringing with him the half-dozen tankards, which he placed on the table, immediately in front of Wild, who said—

"Serve it out—serve it out."

Glasses were filled, and one given to the thief-taker.

The remainder were handed round to the band.

Ross performed this duty, but, as he did it, he never made the least offer to give the three prisoners any.

But then their hands were tied behind them.

Slight as this circumstance was, however, Blueskin took note of it, and the hope that, after all, they would escape, strengthened and strengthened in his mind.

But he allowed nothing of this feeling to be perceptible in his countenance.

The ale was drunk with great relish, and Ross filled the glasses again, and said—

"Mr. Wild, what do you think of the ale?"

"Very good; but I prefer brandy."

"Do you sir? I have got some of first-rate quality."

"Never mind. I will have another glass of ale, as I have had one already."

"Yes, Mr. Wild. Ah! look, now isn't that a sight to fetch the tears into anybody's eyes? Oh! dear."

Jonathan turned round to see the sight referred to by the landlord, and saw the cook taking up the joints of meat, having quite despaired of the coming of the expected guests.

It certainly did seem a very great shame that such tempting and delicious viands should be spoiled, and yet there seemed no help for it, and Jonathan expressed himself to that effect.

"Would you like to have a snack, Mr. Wild," said Ross, as if struck with a new idea. "It's no good for it to spoil, and if you feel inclined I am sure you are very welcome."

"Thank you, Ross," said Wild, who had grown quite hungry through snuffing the cooking. "I don't see any signs of the weather improving, so I don't mind having a taste."

"Very well, Mr. Wild."

"Here, stop! Ross!"

"Yes, sir."

"I'll tell you what you shall do, and then, after all, you won't be such a very great loser."

"I should be glad to hear that, Mr. Wild. How can it be?"

"As I said before," replied Wild, who appeared, in a most singular manner, to grow more and more good-tempered every moment; "as I said before, I am very much pleased with the way you have acted all through this affair. You have given me every assistance. Then there's my bull-dogs, they have behaved themselves well. Now I think you ought both to be rewarded."

"I think I understand you, Mr. Wild."

"You shall serve the supper up to my bull-dogs and me, and sit down to it yourself, and we will reckon up afterwards for the lot."

"Mr. Wild," said Ross, "I am so obliged to you that—"

But the remainder of his speech was drowned by the clamour which the janizaries made when they heard how munificently their employer was about to behave to them.

Probably no one was more astonished at seeing Wild in this vein, than Jack Sheppard.

It was quite inexplicable to him.

Even Blueskin, familiar as he was with the thief-taker and his ways, was puzzled. There was something extraordinary in this behaviour, he was sure.

Ross, however, busied himself, and soon had a tempting white cloth spread upon the table.

Upon this the viands were placed, and then Jonathan and his men drew close up to the table.

Jonathan's beneficence did not, however, extend to his prisoners.

He did not invite them to partake of the feast, and Ross, though he would have been only too glad for them to do so, felt how impolitic it would be for him to allude to it in any way, so he passed it over in silence.

Jonathan's janizaries were hungry.

It was astonishing to see with what rapidity the joints, both roast and boiled, disappeared, and as for Ross, he was quite kept on with carving.

The three fugitives had the pleasure of looking on upon all this.

More of the October ale which Ross had so strongly recommended was brought in, and full justice was paid both to it and to the esculents.

CHAPTER CCLVI.

JACK SHEPPARD, BLUESKIN, AND EDGWORTH BESS SUCCEEDED IN THEIR ATTEMPT TO ESCAPE FROM JONATHAN WILD.

GRADUALLY the storm subsided.

The flashes of lightning became less vivid, and the rumbling of the thunder less tremendous.

The peals came, too, at much longer intervals.

But the rain poured down steadily enough, though not with the impetuosity which had before distinguished it.

Still Jonathan and his men seemed quite oblivious of it.

Surely that old October ale possessed some very strange and curious qualities.

In fact, the more they drank of it, the more good-tempered they grew, until, at length, they positively called upon Jonathan for a song.

All this our friends watched with an all-absorbing interest, though to Blueskin it was perfectly intelligible.

He could tell that Ross, the landlord, was doing much more in his and their behalf than ever he would have expected.

In fact, cautious as the landlord was, and having so much dread of the thief-taker as he knew him to have, he could scarcely believe that he was not making some mistake.

But no, there was Wild, and there were his men, all looking as merry as they well could, and about as oblivious of prudence as it was possible for them to be.

Yet Ross had never given Blueskin the least sign that things were progressing favourably for him. Perhaps the reason was that he should be seen, and that he did not wish to have all his trouble for nothing.

Suddenly, however, one of the janizaries doubled up into a curious heap and slipped under the table.

But, such was the state of excitement in which all his companions were, the circumstance was unnoticed, except by those who were seated next, and all they did was to laugh.

After the lapse of a moment, another of the bull-dogs, as Jonathan loved to call them, doubled up and disappeared in precisely the same manner.

He was followed by another and another, and with increasing rapidity.

The reader, doubtless, already suspects what had taken place, and, therefore, there is no reason for us to keep it a secret any longer.

Ross was a man who possessed one of those dispositions which can never forget a kindness.

Now, although a long time had elapsed since Blueskin had performed the service to which we have alluded, still—

His memory was green, and he resolved, no matter how much he might personally inconvenience himself, to requite the favour.

Accordingly, then, when he had made up his mind to this, he determined to induce Jonathan, by some means or other, to remain for a time at the inn.

We have seen how cleverly he took advantage of all the circumstances which would enable him to do so, and how, without Jonathan being aware of it, he had contrived to supply them with ale, and then to keep them still longer by serving up the meat.

The ale was drugged.

Not one pot was brought in that did not have some addition made to it by the landlord.

And this did not alter the taste of the ale—on the contrary, it seemed to improve its flavour, giving it a richness and creaminess, if we may so speak.

We are not afraid to say that there are plenty of publican's who know very well what it was that Ross put into the ale.

It was a decoction of berries, used to impart an intoxicating quality to whatever it was added to.

A certain quantity always found its way into the casks of old October ale, and all the landlord did was to add a little more in each tankard.

Its effects were not sudden, but gradual and unconscious.

It stole upon them unawares.

And so the janizaries, as the fumes rose up into their brains, felt themselves deprived of sense and strength, and their bodies collapsing in the manner we have described, they fell under the table.

At length, Jonathan Wild, who seemed to withstand the power of the drug much better than his men, became aware that they were one after another falling off their seats in a state of helpless drunkenness.

This was a condition of things that would never answer.

Uttering a terrible imprecation, he sprang to his feet.

But his excitement and motion appeared to accelerate its effect upon him, for his legs suddenly gave way beneath him.

He felt himself going—felt that he was growing overpowered, and made a frantic effort to recover himself.

But in vain.

He clutched at the edge of the table, but it slipped from his grasp, and he fell as helpless and insensible as a log of wood upon the floor.

None of his janizaries remained to follow his example.

They were all down.

Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess viewed this scene with the greatest astonishment, and were scarcely able to understand it.

Blueskin, however, knew all.

As soon as he saw that it was prudent for him to do so, Ross approached them.

"Mr. Blake," he said, "I have acquitted myself of the obligation I was under to you. You are free."

"You have acquitted it nobly," replied Blueskin, "though, I am afraid, at great cost to yourself."

"Never mind that now. Quick. You cannot be too quick, for there is no knowing how soon Jonathan may recover, and make your escape difficult, if not doubtful."

"You must release us, Ross. We are powerless to help ourselves."

"Are you handcuffed?"

"Yes."

"Then I must get some keys. Stop a moment."

"Don't be any longer than you can help."

"Rely upon me, Mr. Blake."

As he spoke, the landlord hastened towards the prostrate body of Wild, and, feeling in his pockets, soon found a bunch of keys, which he doubted not would release the three prisoners from their disagreeable thraldom.

And in this anticipation he was not disappointed, and our friends, to their unspeakable satisfaction, found their arms and hands at liberty.

"Now," said Ross, "don't stop to talk to each other, but follow me as quickly as you are able. The storm is quite over, and you have a good chance of making your escape."

"But the horses from Tumposki's?" said Blueskin, "some fatality seems to attend them. I suppose the storm which had the effect of detaining Wild here will also have kept them away; so what are we to do for horses in our flight?"

"Surely you forget Jonathan Wild's?"

"Oh! ah! yes, he came here on horseback, and so did all his men."

"Of course they did."

"And where are the horses?"

"All in the stable, and you can have a good pick out of them. Take the three best."

"Ross, you have indeed saved us."

"I have tried to do so."

"But, my friend, when Jonathan recovers, what shall you do? His anger will be terrible, and your life will not be safe at his hands."

"I will get out of his way, never fear."

"Do so, for it would grieve me much if any harm happened to you. But do not think that I shall allow you to be a loser by this night's work. You have saved us, but it has been at the cost of your own ruin. However, we set a high value on the possession of our lives and liberty, and you shall have it."

"I want no reward, Mr. Blake. What I have done I consider was purely my duty, and there the matter rests."

"Not so. I know you will not refuse to receive some compensation for the loss you have already and may futurely sustain. Meet me two days hence in Westminster Abbey, and you shall receive a reward for what you have done."

"Many thanks. I am a struggling man, and do not feel ashamed to confess that just now money is of especial value to me, and that I should be very thankful for your bounty."

"Do not call it bounty, because it is not. It is rather the repayment of a service you have done us, of the worth of which we could make no estimate."

"What time shall I meet you?"

"At the hour of midnight two days hence I will be in the recess known as Poet's-corner. When you come, whistle chirpingly, and you will speedily perceive me make my appearance."

"I will do so, and once again I offer you my thanks."

"Nay—nay. The thanks are due, not from you to us, but from us to you; for had it not been for your exertions in our favour we should by this time have been wholly in the power of the villain Wild."

While this little conversation went forward, the landlord and our three friends made their way out of the kitchen, in which the thief-taker and his band lay in such a state of helplessness, and emerged into the yard at the back of the inn.

By this time all traces of the storm had gone.

The rain had ceased to fall, and the clouds had vanished, leaving the sky a pure bright blue, studded with brilliant stars, and the moon shining resplendently.

Crossing the yard, the landlord led them to the stables in which Wild's horses had been placed.

Their trappings had not been removed.

Three of the best were selected, and let out with all convenient speed.

Then a fresh difficulty presented itself, and one that had been entirely overlooked.

It was this.

Edgworth Bess could not ride without a side-saddle.

Now, as the reader must be aware, none of Wild's horses were likely to be thus provided.

But Ross relieved them from this difficulty by finding a saddle which belonged to him, and which he substituted with all speed for the one the horse had previously worn.

This done, the three friends mounted, and set off at full speed along the high-road.

Ross watched them for some little distance, until at length their forms became undistinguishable in the gloom, and then turned his attention to a consideration of his own safety.

He knew well enough that he should have small mercy to expect from the thief-taker when he recovered from his stupor, because he would know, of course, just how he had been treated.

"I must fly," said the landlord, at length; "it won't do to stay here. I must fly, but first I must make known my intention to those within."

Accordingly, after having come to this determination, he re-entered the inn, and, calling his two daughters aside, made them acquainted with his intentions to abscond for a little while, and gave them express injunctions not to let Wild know anything, but to leave him to take his own course when he awoke.

This done, Ross made free with one of the thief-taker's horses himself, and rode off to stay with a friend of his who lived at a distant quarter of the town, and where he knew he could remain for a time in perfect security.

Leaving him to carry out his intention, and leaving the three fugitives to make the best use they could of the time before them, we will return to the inn, and relate what took place upon the awakening of Jonathan Wild.

The drug was a powerful one, besides which a large quantity of ale had been drunk, and, as a liberal quantity had been placed in each tankard, the men were very far gone in insensibility.

It is strange that Wild should have allowed himself to be made the victim of such a trick.

One would have thought the great thief-taker would not have been so easily over-reached.

But the fact was, he was so elated with the thought that he had at length succeeded in taking all three of our friends into custody that he, to a very great extent forgot his usual caution.

And then the behaviour of Ross, the landlord, was a piece of finished acting.

Not for one moment did he allow it to be seen that he wished Jonathan to stay.

If he had, and if he had been clumsy in the least, then Wild's suspicions would have been fully aroused.

But as it was, he had spoken and acted so naturally that Wild was completely deceived by it, and never dreamt that all that was done was the result of preconcertion.

And so he fell blindly enough into the snare which had been laid for him.

He drank the drugged ale himself, without being aware of any peculiarity in the taste of it.

So did his men.

It was just about dawn when one of the janizaries opened his eyes, and began to show other symptoms of returning consciousness.

And as they one by one dropped off into their lethargic slumber, so did they awake from it.

There were some who felt its effects lingering about their brains rather longer than the rest, but then they had perhaps partaken of more than their proper share.

At length Jonathan Wild himself awoke.

He glared at first in a confused fashion round him.

Then he struggled to his feet.

The fire had quite burned out, and so had the candles in the sconces along the walls.

A dim misty light alone found its way in.

But when Jonathan found what had taken place, he gave utterance to one of his most ferocious howls.

Whatever members of his band had not recovered themselves were thoroughly aroused by that sound.

They all started to their feet.

"The prisoners!" yelled Wild, "the prisoners! Where are they?"

The janizaries glared round them with the utmost dismay.

The prisoners were not to be seen.

"We have been drugged," said the thief-taker.

"Drugged by the landlord of this infernal public-house, and the prisoners cajoled away. Quick! up, every one of you."

As he spoke, Jonathan Wild made a rush into the bar, which he found vacant.

He could not very well blame any of his men for what had happened, for he was as bad himself as they were.

But that little circumstance only served to increase his ill-humour.

He was resolved, however, to lose no more time than he could help, but to at once set forward on the trail.

Those he sought, and who he had allowed to slip through his fingers when he thought he had them so tight in his grasp, were doubtless a long way off by now.

But he by no means despaired of finding them.

First, however, he felt he had a score to settle with the landlord.

But he was nowhere to be found.

Jonathan, however, was not to be thus balked of his revenge.

Another circumstance occurred, too, which still further served to exasperate him.

One of the men who had been sent to the stables, came back with the disagreeable intelligence that four of the horses were missing.

Jonathan was now utterly furious.

He set the example of smashing everything brittle he could lay his hands upon, and his men assisted him until the havoc made was really dreadful to witness.

Then, mounting one of the steeds, the others did likewise—the horses having to take it in turns to carry double.

In this way he renewed the chase.

CHAPTER CCLVII.

THE FUGITIVES MAKE A STAY AT THE "COACH AND HORSES," ISLEWORTH.

THE three fugitives were not long in finding, after they left the inn, that the three horses they had taken, belonging to Jonathan Wild, were really of first-rate quality.

They got over the ground rapidly, in spite of its disagreeable character, and Bess preserved her seat much better than her two preservers could have hoped.

There was no apparent need for them to make the haste they did, but they knew the character of their dreadful enemy, and that it would be their best policy to put as much ground between themselves and him as they could before he recovered his senses.

But in order not to knock the horses up too soon, they allowed their gallop to subside into a trot, which, nevertheless, took them along at a tolerable rate.

It afforded them, too, the opportunity of speech.

Jack Sheppard was the first to avail himself of it.

"All this seems like a dream to me," he said. "I can scarcely believe that we have actually been all three in Jonathan Wild's hands, and that we have got out of them so soon."

"It is a fact, notwithstanding," replied Blueskin; "but you may make sure of this, that if Ross had not chosen to stand our friend in the way he did, we should by this time be safe in the cells below Wild's house in Newgate-street."

"I suppose we should."

"It's quite certain. Now, Jack, you heard what kind of a promise I made to Ross."

"Yes."

"I did not consult you about it before I spoke, because I thought as time was so pressing there was no need for me to do so."

"You were quite right."

"I am glad to have your consent. We could not properly estimate the value of the service he has done us, and you may depend Jonathan will make him suffer rather severely for it. Don't you think he will?"

"I don't think anything at all about it."

"You mean you are quite sure."

"Yes."

"Well then, I conceive that the least we could do would be to make him what compensation lies in our power."

"I am quite of that opinion."

"And so am I," said Edgworth Bess; "and should have mentioned it myself if you had not proposed it."

"I am very much pleased to find we are all so unanimous upon this subject," replied Blueskin. "You heard what I said to him?"

"Yes."

"I promised to be in two nights' time at Poet's-corner, Westminster Abbey, where I would give him some compensation for what he had done for us."

"Just so. What do you propose next?"

"I can hardly tell you. There is one thing that troubles me very much."

"What is that?"

"Why, Jonathan Wild being so upon our track. How did he know we were staying at the inn?"

"There I am as much at fault as yourself."

"It is an embarrassing circumstance, is it not?"

"Very."

"I don't think the meeting was a chance one."

"Nor do I; for if you will recollect he was in the act of drawing up before the inn when he unfortunately saw us."

"I am afraid we shall learn little by speculating upon the matter. What makes me uneasy is, I cannot divest myself of the idea that Jonathan have some means of ascertaining where we are and what we are about, which we are in ignorance of."

"I am afraid so, too," replied Jack.

"When—oh! when," exclaimed Edgworth Bess, "will his persecutions cease?"

"You may depend not until he either obtains the object of his desires, or is utterly defeated."

"Alas! that we should have to wage such a battle!"

"We are compelled to do so in our own defence."

"Nay," replied Edgworth Bess, "you must not seek to delude me with that idea. I know perfectly well that Jonathan's enmity to you is caused solely by your championship of myself and my cause, and I am also conscious that I alone am the cause of all that you have suffered since you knew me."

"I don't pretend to deny," replied Blueskin, "that a great portion of Wild's enmity proceeds from the cause you have referred to, but that it does wholly, I must beg leave to deny."

"You would fain deny the other if you could."

"Nay—nay. But never mind. We have enlisted ourselves in your service, and we will never quit it until we are laid low by the hand of death, or until you succeed in gaining possession of your rights."

"I shall have much to thank you for if ever that happy time arrives. When it does, I trust I shall be provided with sufficient means to reward you both as you deserve to be rewarded."

"We wish for no reward," said Jack Sheppard, "and, for my own part, I should accept of none. What I have done has been done willingly and voluntarily."

"I know that, Jack. I know that. But, nevertheless, should the time ever arrive, I know you would not pain me as much as to refuse to accept of what I offered to testify to my gratitude."

"I don't know for that," said Jack.

"Excuse me," remarked Blueskin, "if I call you back from speculating upon the future to our present situation."

"It is full of perils."

"It is, indeed."

"What do you propose?"

"In the first place, that we get as far away as possible."

"But, how for Ross?"

"You must leave me to manage him."

"But how?"

"I have not quite made up my mind."

"Have you any thoughts upon the matter?"

"Yes."

"Let us hear them."

"I should like for us to make our way as far as possible from London, and find you a safe place of shelter."

"Yes."

"And, when that was done, I should set out alone for the spot where we buried the treasure, and dig up a portion of it."

"Well?"

"I should then proceed to keep my appointment with Ross at Poet's-corner, having done which, I should get the other ingots of silver converted into money."

"And all this time, you think of our being safely bestowed somewhere awaiting your return?"

"Yes."

"Then, that will not do."

"Why not?"

"I cannot consent to it."

"But why not?"

"Did you not say just now, that what puzzled you most was that Wild had some means of learning our motions which we knew nothing about?"

"I am afraid that is the case."

"Very well, then, that is an answer to your question."

"Explain yourself more fully."

"We shall be divided, shall we not?"

"Yes."

"And Jonathan will find it out. Then how much easier it will be for him to overpower us when we are apart. No, Blueskin. You may rely upon it, it will not do. Our only chance is to keep close together. If we are once parted, it will be all over with us."

"But, Jack."

"What?"

"Don't you consider that it would be trebling the risk for all three to go to find the treasure?"

"No, I don't."

"You don't consider it would?"

"No, and even if I did, I should not think we ought to separate ourselves for a moment."

"Well I will give in to you."

"I am glad to hear that."

"But I think we shall be running a very great risk, and yet I have a great horror of our parting from each other."

"So have I. United we may do much, but singly, very little, or, I might say, nothing."

"You are right there, and so let us consider the matter so far settled. All that I have proposed to do must be done—the only difference being that you are to be with me instead of my being alone."

"Just so."

"Then, my friends," remarked Blueskin, "we have something else to consider."

"What?"

"In a little while it will be dawn, so it behoves us to look out for a shelter of some sort."

"That is true."

"We have been coming at a good rate from the inn. Have you any idea whereabouts we are, for I confess myself to be completely at fault in that respect."

"You have lost your bearings for some time, I know, but I will soon tell you where we are exactly. I know to a trifle already."

As he spoke, Blueskin raised himself in his stirrups, and, as well as he could, looked about him.

"Where do you make us out to be?" asked Jack, after he had finished his survey.

"Why, about a mile from the village of Isleworth. Do you know it?"

"I have heard of it, I think. It is somewhere near Kew, is it not?"

"Yes. I fancy if we go there we shall stand as good a chance of obtaining shelter during the day as anywhere, and then at night, you know, we must set out upon our voyage in quest of the buried treasure."

"Very well; agreed."

"If we stop at some place not far from the banks of the Thames, we shall be able to go down all the way by boat, which I think will go a long way towards enabling us to elude Wild."

"I shouldn't wonder."

"We should easily be able to hire a wherry that would answer our purpose."

"Oh! no doubt. Do you think we had better push on, in case Wild should be behind us?"

"No, I fancy we are far enough; and, besides, we must not go too far, because of our excursion."

"Very well; I submit implicitly to your judgment in that respect."

"I wonder what Wild will look like when he recovers and finds what has taken place? I would give no trifle to be by and witness his rage."

"It would be awful."

"I trust Ross will be wise enough to get out of the way. If he does not it will go hard with him, for Jonathan's never very particular about what he does."

"And especially when in such a passion as he would be then."

"I can picture him easily—furious with rage, and impatiently cursing every one that happens to be around him."

"And he won't be any better tempered when he finds we have taken his three best horses out of the stable."

"He will be more exasperated against us than ever, but I fancy he will have a good deal of trouble in tracing us to our present whereabouts."

At this moment some more unequivocal symptoms of the coming day made themselves apparent in the eastern horizon.

The feeble gray light, however, enabled the three fugitives to see not far in advance of them the chimneys and roof-tops of a village, with its inevitable accompaniments, a church spire and a windmill.

In the distance, too, Richmond Hill could be distinguished.

"Here we are," said Blueskin; "another five minutes and we shall enter the village."

"Do you think we shall find any one up so early as this?"

"I think so. There is a public-house where a coach stops at, and I think we shall very likely be able to find what we want there."

"But won't it be rather hazardous for us to go to a public and much-resorted-to place like that?"

"No half so much so as to take up our quarters at some out of the way inn."

"How do you make that out?"

"Why, if we are only careful to keep out of sight, Jonathan Wild, with all his cunning, will never think of looking for us here."

"I begin to understand you."

"He would think we should be afraid to stop there."

"Well, if you will believe me, I think it running a very great risk indeed."

"Pho—pho. You will find that in this apparent danger will lie our safety."

"I trust we shall find it so."

"Come, then, you will see I am right."

"Whereabouts is this inn?"

"Why, about a couple of hundred yards further along the road."

"Is that the sign that I can just see in the distance?"

"No, that is another."

Blueskin was right. The sign which Jack saw belonged to a public-house, which was, however, closed, and had about it no signs of life whatever.

Going further, however, they came to the "Coach and Horses," which was the sign of the inn of which Blueskin had spoken.

This even was closed, but the gate at the side leading to the stables was open, so, guided by Blueskin, they took their way down it.

The clattering of their horses' hoofs attracted the attention of a man who emerged from the stables.

By his dress he appeared to be an ostler.

He looked at our friends with something like surprise visible upon his countenance.

Doubtless it was seldom that visitors made their appearance so early at the inn.

Blueskin did not give him time to speak, but addressed him.

"Can we stay here for a few hours," he asked, "while we give our cattle a rest? We have travelled all night, and we are so fatigued that we feel disinclined to proceed farther."

"Yes, sir; all right," replied the ostler. "There ain't no one up yet just at present, though they won't be long. However, I will call them and then attend to you."

So saying, the ostler hastened across the yard to the back door of the inn, upon which he executed a vigorous tattoo with his knuckles.

In the meantime, Blueskin and Jack Sheppard alighted from their steeds and assisted Edgworth Bess to dismount.

This the poor girl was glad enough to do, for she was terribly fatigued.

The least exertion seemed to prostrate her, but this was caused by the debility into which she had been thrown by her severe and recent illness.

Nothing but the indomitability of her constitution could have kept her up. If her spirits had once failed, her bodily powers must have at once given way.

When she reached the ground she would have fallen had it not been for the assistance which her two friends afforded her.

The ostler's summons upon the back door was responded to by some one opening it, and the landlord himself immediately appeared upon the threshold.

He had witnessed the early arrival of the travellers from his bed-room window.

CHAPTER CCLVIII.

THE BURIED TREASURE IS RECOVERED, AND BLUESKIN KEEPS HIS APPOINTMENT WITH ROSS, THE LANDLORD.

A FEW words soon set matters all right.

A comfortable apartment and an attendant were provided for Edgworth Bess.

Blueskin and Jack Sheppard occupied a chamber between them.

There was nothing particular or suspicious-looking about the three travellers.

They seemed as though they had been on the road all night, and were mud-stained in consequence, but that was all.

The landlord, then, was quite willing to entertain them, and Edgworth Bess had every attention paid to her.

The day was passed at the "Coach and Horses" without the occurrence of any particular incident.

All three rested.

They neither heard nor saw anything of Jonathan Wild, from which they concluded that he had wholly failed in his attempt to get upon their track.

And certainly to do so would require something more than an ordinary sagacity.

And yet Blueskin and Jack, knowing his energetic disposition, were all the time in dread, lest he should suddenly make his appearance.

It seemed as though they were destined to have much trouble, and many a perilous adventure and hair-breadth escape before they succeeded in carrying out their intention of leaving England.

The obstacles which Wild would be able to put in the way of their doing so would be most formidable.

Still they did not despair.

They were encouraged by the success which had hitherto attended their efforts.

At length night came.

During the day many arrivals and departures took place at the inn, but in the rooms which they had hired our friends were unmolested.

And now one of the things they wished to avoid was giving the landlord any clue to where they were going.

They did not want their horses.

In their present excursion they would have been quite useless.

If they left them behind, ten to one if ever they came for them again.

Circumstances might arise which would make a return to Islesworth impossible.

They resolved not to return, but to lead the landlord to suppose they would.

We shall understand best by their conversation.

It was just as dusk was deepening into night that the three friends, who were altogether in one room, resolved at once to set out upon their excursion.

Accordingly the landlord was summoned, and Blueskin said—

"We are going out for a few hours. In the meantime we will leave our three horses in your stable, which will be ample security for whatever expense we have incurred."

"Shall you be longer than the time you specify?"

"Not without anything unforeseen happens, and then perhaps we may."

"Very good, gentlemen," said the landlord, who saw nothing in this arrangement to grumble at. "Shall you require any further refreshment before you start?"

"No, we are ready now if you will lead the way."

The landlord did so, and the fugitives emerged into the high-street of the village.

By a circuitous route, for they did not want to be watched to their destination, they proceeded to the banks of the river.

They were some time before they found a place where they could hire a boat.

At length, however, by the payment of a liberal sum, they secured a light wherry, furnished with two oars, and which would carry them comfortably.

It would require, too, in consequence of its lightness, very little exertion to urge it through the water with considerable speed.

It was just the thing they required.

Edgworth Bess was placed in the stern of the boat, and her two protectors seated themselves in the back, each one taking an oar.

The surface of the water was covered with a deep gloom, and as they shot out into the current, they could only just discern the banks on either side of them.

They had a long pull before them, and over rather a dangerous portion of the river bed, for the water was very shallow in places.

There was plenty of time, however, so, using the utmost circumspection, they rowed onwards.

After a time the stream grew broader and deeper, and then they made better progress.

On their journey very little was said.

They were too intent upon what they were about.

Edgworth Bess had turned round in the stern of the boat, and was looking steadily behind her.

But they seemed to have the river almost to themselves.

It was an hour when none would be upon it from choice, but merely from necessity.

In this way, then, they proceeded smoothly enough, until they neared the spot where the treasure had been deposited.

They were compelled to look keenly about them to ascertain whereabouts to seek it, but the clump of trees was a tolerably good guide.

They had only seen it once, and then not from the river but the land, and, moreover, upon a very misty morning, when objects were scarcely discernible.

At length Jack raised his arm, and, pointing to the shore on his left, said—

"That is the spot, Blueskin, I am sure. Row towards it."

"Yes, that is it, sure enough, but land carefully. I do not want us to be observed."

"You need not fear that, I think. The darkness increases momentarily."

"It does. We had a moon last night, but I hope we shall not be troubled with her presence to-night."

"There are no clouds to hide her light, but I fancy she will not rise for some hours to come."

"So much the better, then."

"While speaking, the direction of the boat had been changed, and presently the prow grated against the bank, and the body swung round to the land.

Blueskin sprang out first, and moored the boat by a rope which lay in the bottom of it to one of the trees contiguous to the shore.

Then Jack followed him.

Edgworth Bess remained in the boat in order to keep watch, and with strict injunctions to give the alarm the moment she saw anything unusual.

The quicker they dug up what treasure they wanted, the better it would be for them, for fear any one should appear upon the spot.

Without any trouble they recognised the locality, and, as the ingots were buried separately, and only a few inches beneath the soil, they could dig them up with tolerable celerity with the aid of their clasp knives.

It was while thus engaged that they determined to embrace the opportunity of removing the whole of the treasure, and endeavouring to turn it into money.

Still, as may be supposed, although the time each ingot took to be unburied, the task of raising them all was a tedious one, in consequence of their great number.

But, at length, they were all piled up into a heap.

The next thing, now, was to transfer them to the boat, and care would have to be taken in loading that they did not overbalance the boat.

All this, however, was done satisfactorily and safely, and, such being the case, there is no need for us to dwell upon it.

Regarding their places in the now heavily-freighted boat, which, when it received the addition of their weight sunk to an alarming depth in the water, was unmoored, and Jack and Blueskin resumed the oars.

They had to row with very great care, for the gunwales of the boat were at times all but under the water, and any sudden lurch from one side to the other would inevitably capsize them.

But Blueskin knew their load would be much lightened as soon as they got to Westminster, so he steadily took his course in that direction.

Nothing had been said as to the amount which was to be offered to Ross, but Blueskin did not trouble about that. He knew his two companions would be disposed to be quite as liberal as himself.

To reach the appointed spot the boat was stayed at a place upon which a portion of the Houses of Parliament now stands, and from which a walk of less than two minutes would take him to his destination.

Leaping from the boat on to the shore, Blueskin directed his two companions to remain in the boat while he went upon his perilous errand.

"Now, Jack," he said, "give me as many of the ingots as you think he ought to have for the service he has done us."

"If I did that, I should give you more than you can carry."

"I suppose so, but you must not do that. Give me as many as will represent a respectable sum."

Jack did so, and when he had received six, Blueskin cried hold, for he could not with convenience carry more.

As it was, he was heavily burdened, for the ingots were a good weight each.

However, he staggered on, and in a few moments was out of the sight and hearing of Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess, who could now do no more than patiently sit in the boat and await his return.

When he first started, Blueskin found the quantity he had taken was quite as much as he could carry, but when he had gone a little way, their weight appeared to increase, and he was fain to rest himself in the shelter of a building.

But encouraged by the knowledge that he had not far to go, he bent again quickly to his task.

In less than two minutes he was at the appointed place, and, so far as he could tell, he had reached it unperceived by a single soul.

Selecting the most remote and least frequented corner in the building he could find, he deposited his burden in it.

Right glad to do so, he folded his arms and leaned his back against the wall.

[JONATHAN WILD SETS OUT ON HIS SECOND CRUSADE AGAINST JACK SHEPPARD.]

In this position he was perfectly invisible. He must now await the appearance of Ross, the landlord.

Blueskin had an idea that he was on the promised spot somewhat before the time agreed upon, and he listened with considerable impatience for the old abbey clock to peal forth the hour.

But his patience was doomed to experience rather a severe trial.

There was a dense silence round about that spot.

Somewhat, even at the present, when the metropolis is such a scene of bustle and confusion, it is about the quietest place in it; but a hundred and fifty years ago, when Blueskin lived, London was comparatively a quiet place, and the vicinity of the old abbey of Westminster especially so.

At that hour of the night it was profoundly still, and that hushed silence which is always perceptible in the interior of sacred edifices seemed to extend its influence beyond the walls.

At length Blueskin's patient waiting and listening were rewarded.

Upon the silent night air there floated, in musical cadences, the chiming of the clock.

Then the hour was struck.

It was twelve.

Scarcely had the reverberations of the last stroke died away, and before the myriad church clocks around had time to reply to their larger brother, than Blueskin's ear caught a hasty step.

But he remained perfectly still, and waited for the signal to be given.

It came almost immediately.

Without further hesitation, Blueskin emerged from his place of concealment.

"Mr. Blake," said a voice in a low tone, which Blueskin had no difficulty in recognising as belonging to Ross, the landlord.

"I am here."

"Thank goodness for that."

"And I have brought with me something, which, though not an adequate reward for the service you have done us, is yet enough to go a long way towards compensating you for the inconvenience you have suffered, and the danger you have incurred."

"I am much obliged to you, Mr. Blake, but, if you will believe me, I did not look for any reward at your hands. I considered I was under an obligation to you."

"Well, if you was, I can only say that you have repaid it a thousand-fold."

"I don't say but what it will be very acceptable, for I am afraid I shall have to leave the inn in consequence of Jonathan Wild. I have heard that his rage was awful when he awoke and discovered what had taken place, and that he broke and destroyed everything he could lay his hands upon."

"But your daughters escaped all violence, I hope."

"Oh! yes; but, I suspect, only because they took care to keep out of the way. However, Jonathan has sworn a bitter oath that he will be the ruin of me, and, if I must confess the truth, I feel rather uneasy in my mind about it, because he is so celebrated for keeping his word."

"Pho—pho! defy him, Ross—defy him. Nevertheless, hearing this makes me glad to be able to tell you that I have got sufficient here for you to leave the inn and set up in whatever part of the world you think fit until Jonathan is hanged, and then you can come back to London again."

"When Jonathan is hanged?"

"Yes."

"But that's not likely."

"You think not?"

"I do."

"Why?"

"He is a police-officer."

"That you will find will not exempt him from the punishment due to his crimes. Jack Sheppard and myself have sworn to bring him to Tyburn, and mark my words if we do not keep our oath."

"I sincerely hope you will, for if you do you will be rendering society at large an inestimable service."

"Moreover, you must recollect that he is not properly a police-officer, but that he has usurped that title and office."

"I did not know that."

"It is not of much importance that I know of."

"But he has sworn to hang you."

"I know it."

"And excuse me if I say that I think he is most likely to keep his word."

"I know—I know. But we are wasting valuable time in fruitless discourse. Come this way, and I will show you where I have deposited our token of thanks for what you have done for us."

As he spoke, Blueskin moved to lead the way to the corner in which he had deposited the ingots of silver.

But at that moment there came upon his ears the trampling of horses' hoofs, and the murmuring of excited voices.

Then a pistol-shot followed.

"Confound it!" said Blueskin, in an undertone, "can it be possible that Jonathan has dogged us hither? or has he discovered Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess in the boat upon the river? If so, I fear it is all over with them."

CHAPTER CCLIX.

JONATHAN WILD GOES HOME TO HIS HOUSE IN NEWGATE-STREET, AND MEETS WITH A SLIGHT SURPRISE.

To preserve the proper sequence of events we must leave Blueskin and Ross, the landlord, in their somewhat perilous situation near Poet's-corner, Westminster Abbey.

We must leave, too, for a little while, Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess in that frail boat upon the Thames, while we retrace our steps and chronicle the proceedings of Jonathan Wild.

Under the influence of the first gust of passion which had come over him upon awaking to the discovery of the dupe he had been made, he had resolved to pursue the fugitives without loss of time, and not to relinquish the search until he had come up with them.

But after a little while when he came to a place where several roads branched off in various directions, he became conscious of the folly of such a determination, and unwillingly was forced to admit the conviction to his mind that he was too late upon the trail—that the scent had grown cold.

It was a matter of impossibility for any one to say which of those diverging roads had been taken by the fugitives, for they had left behind them no indications of their course whatever.

To be sure, he might be so far favoured by chance or fortune as to hit upon the right route by accident, but that contingency was too remote for him to be able to calculate with any amount of certainty upon it.

Under the present aspect of affairs his best and most rational mode of proceeding would be to return to his house in Newgate-street, and there await the reception of some intelligence from the numberless spies he had posted all over London and for miles around it.

Ere long, he felt certain, the fugitives must be seen by some one of them. Perhaps at that very moment there was one on their track, and if so, all would become easy again.

But to exhaust himself and his horses and his men by a pursuit where he had nothing to direct him, would be impolitic in the extreme.

So he curbed his impatience and anger, which would have been better appeased by scouring the country round, and turning his horse's head towards London, bade his men in a surly voice to follow him.

Thus they were nothing loath to do.

Their heads ached with the effects of the drug, and several of them reeled in such a manner in the saddle that they seemed every moment in danger of falling to the ground.

Wild led the way homewards at a swift pace.

He was capable of much clear thought.

Violent and hot-tempered as he always was when the least thing went wrong with him, he was now in a state of absolute frenzy.

To think that he had so nearly accomplished his desires—that actually all his trouble had been rewarded—that he had then been told enough to let them go, was maddening in the extreme.

Over and over again he cursed himself for heeding the storm; had it rained fire, he ought to have made his way direct to his own home.

In a state of mind that boded ill for any one who crossed him in the least—burning with inward passion—he he alighted at his own door.

The obsequious Tonks was there, and, apparently, awaiting his return.

He held the horse, and Jonathan, stamping savagely at every step he took, crossed the pavement and went up the flight of steps leading into the passage.

Tonks seemed to have something or other upon his lips which he wished to say, but the aspect of the thief-taker's countenance dismayed him, and he was silent.

The news he had to communicate was not of the most agreeable description, and he dreaded some personal ill-usage if he spoke.

Quilt Arnold, who was in the lower part of the house, now ascended to the ground-floor, for he had heard his master return.

Like Tonks, he seemed to want to say something, for his visage expressed it.

Indeed, he opened his lips to speak, but he closed them again without emitting a sound.

He had caught a glimpse of the ferocious countenance of the great thief-taker, and he knew in a moment that something had occurred which had put him in a bad temper.

So he judged by that his most prudent course would be to say nothing.

Jonathan himself took no notice of him whatever, except to glare malevolently at him as he passed.

Wild took his way direct to the stairs, which he ascended slowly one after the other until he reached the first landing.

He paused before the door opening into his sitting apartment, and where he generally betook himself when he wished to be quiet.

He turned the handle and entered.

No sooner, however, was the door opened than his nose was assailed with a strong smell of tobacco smoke and hot spirits.

Indeed, the room was quite filled with the former, and the different objects in it could only be distinguished through a kind of haze.

Before, however, he had time to do more than just notice this, he heard a voice say—

"Hullo, old man. You are back again, are you? Well, cuss me if I didn't think you never meant coming back any more. Don't gasp like that, you remind me of a great porpus opening and shutting his mouth. It's all right, guv'ner. Only me, you know."

This was a most extraordinary speech for any one to make to Jonathan Wild.

Who could it have been daring enough to seat himself in his sanctum, and then address him in such a manner as soon as he came in?

Jonathan Wild knew.

The voice was familiar enough, to his sorrow.

But the expression of the thief-taker's countenance when those words fell upon his ear, and when he recognised the voice which uttered them, was really a picture to see.

In the first shock of surprise he started back.

Then his countenance became livid with rage, and he opened and shut his mouth in the convulsive manner which had seemed to amuse the inmate of the room so much.

It was only for a moment that Jonathan Wild allowed surprise to retain the mastery of him.

With a howl of rage he dashed into the room.

The smoke escaped in large quantities from the open door, and then the person who showed so little regard for the thief-taker became revealed.

By his attitude now it would seem that he had some dread of Jonathan when in one of his mad passions.

He was standing with his back to the wall, and holding before him, in an attitude of defence, the clumsy wooden chair upon which he had been sitting.

He was a youngish-looking man, though it would have been hard for any one to guess his age with precision. Drunk and debauchery had left their traces upon his countenance, and made him look much older than he probably was.

He had a rakish, jaunty air, as though he was quite reckless and careless, both of himself and any one else.

When Jonathan dashed in, he, with great coolness, held up the chair in such a manner as to repel any attack which might be made upon him, while he said—

"Now, old man, don't be a fool. Sit down quietly, can't you? and don't behave in that wild animal sort of way. I am going to have a little talk with you, just for old acquaintance' sake; so sit down, I say, and don't be a fool."

"Wretch!" cried Jonathan, struggling with his passion, and endeavouring to speak. "Wretch! have I not forbidden you to enter the house? Begone, or I will call my men, and they shall drive you out with their swords' points!"

"Don't be a fool, guv'ner," said the young man, with provoking coolness. "Don't be a fool, I tell you. Sit down, and listen to reason."

This cool defiance of him, and this indifference to all he did, had an effect upon Wild which would scarcely have been expected.

He was overpowered, and sank down in a chair.

"That's right, old man—that's right. Now I'll join you, and we'll make ourselves comfortable."

As he spoke, the young man put down his chair at the corner of the table opposite to the one near which the thief-taker sat, and slowly settled himself in it.

Then he stretched out his legs as though he was quite at his ease, and as though he considered Jonathan Wild the great the most insignificant creature in existence.

From hints which have been dropped from time to time in this narrative, the reader doubtless conjectures who this young man was.

He was Jonathan Wild's son.

A worthy son of so amiable and exemplary a parent.

Such another pair as they were could not have been found if you had searched all London over.

But somehow Jonathan seemed to have a dread of his son.

His coolness staggered him.

"Come, gov'ner," said this hopeful youth, "don't sit there as though you were ashamed of yourself. Here, try a drop of that."

As he spoke, he pushed across the table a glass partially filled with brandy.

Wild took it, and swallowed the whole at one gulp.

"Now, I should think you're better, old chap. You seemed surprised to see me. Didn't expect to, I daresay. Quite an unlooked-for pleasure. Here's your good luck."

"Have you come here to play the fool?" growled Wild. "Be like a man of sense. Curse you! how could you show your face?"

"Now, don't use hard words, guv'ner; please don't! Why shouldn't I show my face? I know. You allude to that little affair that happened some time back?"

"Little affair!" repeated Wild, angrily. "You nearly ruined me! You carried off all the wealth I possessed."

"Sorry—sorry, of course! But what does it matter now? You have got plenty of money again, so I have come to see you. Ha! ha! I have had a jolly life! You'd never believe how I made the money fly! Egad! I astonished the folks. But it's all gone now, every rap; and I am completely hard up. That's what brings me here to see you, guv'ner."

Jonathan Wild was fast recovering his self-possession.

This unexpected meeting with his villainous son for a time unnerved him.

The cool impudence of the fellow was rich in the extreme.

It was quite clear he did not stand in that awe of the thief-taker that most people did.

In the most nonchalant manner conceivable, he leaned back in the chair, with his feet supported upon a stool, with a glass of brandy in his fingers, which he every now and then raised to his lips.

Jonathan looked at him with contempt.

Then, drawing from his coat-pocket a pistol, he very deliberately cocked it, and, leaning his elbow on the table, took a careful aim at his son.

But that worthy took no notice whatever of the menacing action.

He scarcely troubled to look towards him, but allowed the glass of brandy to occupy nearly the whole of his attention.

"George," said Jonathan, in a voice of suppressed passion, "do you see this pistol?"

"Of course I do, old man."

"Leave the room, then—this house, or I pull the trigger and lodge a bullet in your head."

"Pho—pho! guv'ner; you won't do anything of the sort. Now, do be quiet for a little while, and listen to reason."

"I have listened too often to what you have had to say," replied Jonathan, "as I have since found to my cost. How you could be admitted passes my comprehension, but whoever allowed you entrance shall suffer dearly for it."

"Don't be a fool! Can't you hear? I keep asking you not to be a fool, and instead of paying the least attention, you keep on talking the d—dest rubbish I ever heard!"

Wild ground his teeth with rage.

"You will carry this pleasantry a little too far, my spark, so I caution you in time."

"Have a drop more brandy. I have come here to say something to you, and dam' me if I go away till I have said it."

"Leave this house!" said Wild, again, "or you will suffer for it."

There was a baleful light in the thief-taker's eye as he spoke.

"Johnny," said his son, "I am very sorry we are not good friends. I am sure we ought to be. I could assist you, and you could assist me. I know I had the chance once, but I was a young fool then. I'll tell you what it is, guv'ner; if you will look over the past, I will, and we will go into partnership with each other. What do you say?"

Jonathan Wild laid his pistol down on the table.

Here was what he wanted.

His son had come back.

Not showing many signs of contriteness, but still, he had come back.

Never in all his life had Jonathan stood more in need of such assistance as his son could render him than he did at that moment.

Should he trust him again?

That was the question revolving in his mind when he laid the pistol down upon the table.

It would be running a great risk to take this son of his into his confidence, and yet he felt disposed to do so.

He might have changed somewhat, and with increasing years obtained more sense.

"George," said Wild to his son, and speaking in a calmer tone of voice than he had done hitherto, "you might have been a son to me if you had so chosen. But instead of that, you treated me like a treacherous foe."

"I know all about that, old man."

"And so do I."

"What need is there to say anything about it?"

"When you left me you carried off nearly all my wealth, all that I had accumulated during many years. There was not a guinea of that money which did not cost a drop of blood. You took it, and you left me a penniless and a ruined man."

"But you have made that all right again now, gov'nor. It appears to me we are just the right sort to go into partnership. You to get the money, and me to spend it."

"Bah! If you cannot speak in a more sensible manner respecting business, begone; I want you not. But if, on the other hand, you feel disposed to aid me in the plans I am carrying out, you will be able to have as much money as you can desire."

"That sounds well, governor. I'll aid you, don't be afraid, for I do want money now uncommonly bad."

"But is it possible that you have in so short a time squandered the whole of the large sum of money you absconded with?"

"I believe you. It's a long while ago, recollect, and I have seen a little bit of life since then, I can tell you."

"I hope the lesson, then, has not been thrown away, and that you have profited by it."

"Never mind that just now, governor. If you have got some good things in view, and want some one to help you to carry them out, why, I mean to say you could not find any one more suited to the job than George Wild!"

CHAPTER CCXLIX.

JONATHAN WILD HAS A FEW WORDS WITH HIS SON, AND COMES TO AN UNDERSTANDING WITH HIM.

JONATHAN WILD bent upon his son a searching glance as he uttered these words, in order to read him, if possible, to the soul, and ascertain how much reliance was to be placed upon his words.

But the indifferent air assumed by the hopeful youth made this an exceedingly difficult matter, even for the astute Jonathan Wild.

"What guaranty could I have," he said, at length, "that you would act fairly with me? I feel very little inclination to trust you without a security of some kind. How do I know that you will not seize upon the first opportunity you have to serve me the same trick you did before?"

"You must run the risk of that, gov'nor."

"Pho—pho. This foolery will do no good. Be serious for a moment, and let us talk quietly together."

"Well, as you are growing reasonable, I don't mind. Here, fill up your glass, and I will do the same. That's it. Now I am ready to listen."

"Well, then, George, I have some plans on hand which, if they can only be realized, would be sufficient to make the fortunes of ten men."

"Have you really, gov'nor?" said the son, becoming much interested in his parent's conversation.

"I have, but alone my task will be beset with difficulties and dangers. If, however, you understand, I could find some one in whom I could place the most implicit confidence, and who would act precisely as I should myself, I should be spared all this, and the accomplishment of my aims would be comparatively easy."

"Is that a fact, gov'nor?"

"Fact!" repeated Wild; "of course it is."

"Then tip us your slipper, old man, and we will make a bargain of it. I am your man. Why, dam' me, where could you find a better?"

"Do not think I am so anxious to make friends with you, because I am not, and, under any other circumstances than the present, I should refuse to do so."

"Forget the past."

"I willingly would if I could be assured of your good conduct in the future."

"Make your mind quite easy about that. I am wiser than I was, and I can see now that I shall do best by rowing in the same boat with you."

"You would find it so."

"I believe I should. I have had my fling, and I shall be steady enough for the rest of my life. Besides, I have had enough of foreign countries. Give me London before all the world. What do you say, gov'nor?"

"There is no place like it to get on. But look here, George."

"What?"

"The result of one of my schemes, if things turn out according to my wishes, will be that I shall retire from business."

"Oh! what business?"

"The business I have so long carried on."

"Fencing?" (i. e. receiving stolen goods).

"Yes."

"But how's that?"

"Well, for one thing, I am getting tired of it."

"I should think so, by this time."

"I am indeed."

"Well?"

"I shall leave the place altogether. Now, George, you have been here before to-day. Don't you think it would be worth something to become my successor?"

"Of course it would."

"Very well, then. I give you the chance."

"Will you make the business over to me?"

"Yes, provided you give me your faithful services, and aid me to the best of your ability in the prosecution of every scheme."

"It's a bargain, gov'nor—it's a bargain."

"You consent?"

"Of course."

"And you will not betray me?"

"Certainly not."

"How far can I trust you?"

"Wholly—entirely."

"I hope I shall be able to do so, George. Ah! it was a thousand pities you went off in the way you did. You see I can't help being distrustful of you. And if you had only kept by me all the time, who could say what we might not have accomplished?"

"Very true. But I consider you have done pretty well as it is."

"I have."

"You admit that?"

"Yes, but what have you done?"

"Nothing."

"Except squander money."

"Ah! just so. I can assure you I have done that, to rights."

"Is it possible, George?" asked Wild again, for the thief-taker himself was very careful of his money, "is it possible that you have spent all?"

"All!"

"Every fraction?"

"Every fraction; and at this present moment I have not the smallest coin in my pocket."

"You must reform," said the thief-taker, relapsing into his usual gloom of mind. "I am afraid to trust you, even now."

"Don't say that, gov'nor. You give me a trial, and if I don't act fair and square, why, I give you leave to pistol me upon the spot."

"Oh! George, could I but feel convinced that I had some one I could trust as well as I could trust myself—if I could only feel assured of that, I should not care."

"You easily might, gov'nor. I don't mean to go on the cross with you any more."

"You have shaken my confidence."

"I know it."

"And confidence once shaken"—

"I know what you mean, old man. Lor' bless you, I haven't scattered your cash without having something taught me in return."

"I suppose not," said Jonathan, bitterly.

"Don't take on."

"Curses!"

"The money is gone. You have made more, and, by what you say, you are about to add considerably to the amount; so what have you to grumble about?"

"Leave that point, George, and listen to me."

"I am all attention, guv'ner."
 "You must understand, then, that I have two main objects which influence my conduct."
 George nodded.
 "I mean there are two objects which I have set my mind upon attaining."
 "What are they?"
 "For one, wealth and rank."
 "Wealth and rank?"
 "Yes."
 "But that's two."
 "I only count it one."
 "Very well, guv'ner, you won't catch me finding fault with your arithmetic. Cut along."
 "I shall grasp wealth and rank at once."
 "Rank! Do you mean title."
 "Yes."
 "The devil! But how are you to get that?"
 "Never mind; that's my business."
 "Very well, guv'ner."
 "In gaining this one object you will not be of much assistance to me, except by devoting yourself to the business here while I am occupied with it."
 "That will suit me very well."
 "Can I trust you?"
 "Now, it's no good your asking that, and it's less good for me to keep replying to it. All I can say is, try me."
 "I have resolved to do so. To give you this one chance of redeeming yourself."
 "That's all I require, guv'ner. From this time forward you will find me everything that you could wish."
 "I trust I shall. You could never know how much I have yearned for you to come back and be a son to me, or indeed for any one that I could trust. But all have deserted me and turned enemies to me, and I am quite alone."
 "Are you, guv'ner? It's enough to draw tears from a workhouse official to hear you, that it is."
 "Pshaw! You are too fond of folly."
 "Not a bit of it, guv'ner. Well, now that we have disposed of one of your motives, which I count two, and in which it seems I am not to render you any assistance, let us hear the other."
 "That you can aid me in."
 "What is it?"
 "Revenge!"
 "Oh! how vicious you speak, guv'ner."
 "Revenge! that is my grand motive. I must be revenged."
 "But on who, guv'ner?"
 "Those who have made it the business of their lives to interpose themselves between me and the prosecution of my plans."
 "Who are they?"
 "You shall hear presently."
 "I am quite impatient, guv'ner. I should think they were rather daring chaps to set themselves up against you, eh?"
 "They are fools. George?"
 "Yes, guv'ner?"
 "I have sworn that they shall die at Tyburn."
 "A jolly good way of getting rid of them, I should think."
 "They shall swing."
 "Oh! then you mean to try the old game, eh?"
 "What old game?"
 "Why, you know well enough."
 "But do you?"
 "Of course I do."
 "What is it?"
 "Give false evidence against them before the beaks, and have them cast for death—then scragged at Tyburn."
 "Exactly."
 "It's a good plan."
 "I have ever found it answer except with these."
 "How is it it don't answer with them, guv'ner?"
 "I cannot tell. At various times I have had them in my custody—one has already been tried and sentence passed upon him, but I believe they have the devil to aid them, for they always make their escape."
 "Make their escape?"
 "Yes."
 "I should think that is very easily provided against, guv'ner."

"It is not. I have adopted all the precautions I could think of."
 "And did they fail?"
 "Utterly."
 "I can't make that out, guv'ner."
 "Nor more can I."
 "But I suppose all these little failures only serve to make you still more resolved to have your revenge?"
 "Just so."
 "Well, guv'ner, show me how I can help you, and I am ready to do the best I can."
 "That is enough. You shall know more in good time."
 "But, guv'ner."
 "What?"
 "Just tell me one thing."
 "How many people are included in your revenge?"
 "Two."
 "Only two?"
 "That's all."
 "Well, guv'ner, I wonder at you. Mind you, I don't think half so much of you as I did once."
 "Why not?"
 "To allow yourself to be troubled with two people. Why, they could be got rid of easy enough."
 "You had better try it on."
 "I am quite ready."
 "But one of them, let me tell you, has been twice confined in the strongest cell in Newgate, and so loaded with fetters that he could hardly move. Yet, on both those occasions, he made his escape."
 "Yes, and in defiance of all the precautions taken, and the watch which was kept upon him."
 "You surprise me, guv'ner."
 "They are two men of no common kind, or they would not have stood so long against me as they have."
 "I suppose not."
 "Curse them. Even this night, which has but just passed away, I had them securely in my grasp, but they eluded me."
 "How, guv'ner?"
 "Never mind how. Suffice it they did."
 "And got clear off?"
 "Yes."
 "Leaving no clue behind?"
 "Yes."
 "They must be very clever fellows, guv'ner."
 "They are clever. If they were only on my side instead of being opposed to it, they would be allies well worth having."
 "I daresay it would make a difference to you, guv'ner. But you have not yet told me who they are."
 "I know I have not."
 "But why don't you?"
 "How can I tell how far you may be trusted?"
 "Are you going to bring that up again?"
 "I have had no proofs of your sincerity and trustworthiness as yet."
 "I know you haven't."
 "But I have of your treachery."
 "Now, guv'ner, look here."
 "What?"
 "I am going to make a bargain with you, and I do hope you will keep it."
 "What bargain?"
 "Why, never to rake up old sores. Do you hear?"
 Wild nodded.
 "I have been a d—d fool, I know," continued his son. "I took your money and made off with it when I ought to have stopped with you, but, then, I knew no better. However, that is all past and done for, and it won't happen again. So, guv'ner, just please to let the subject drop, and don't refer to it any more, because it can't do any good."
 "Well, I won't, George. I should be only too glad to forget the past. So we will let that rest, and put it down to one of the follies of youth, eh?"
 "Just as you like, guv'ner."
 "Very well."
 "Have you made up your mind to trust me?"
 Wild hesitated.
 His son perceived it, so he said—
 "Now, old man, just listen to me, and be good enough to condescend to take a few words of advice from me."

"I am listening."

"If you are going to make a confidant of me, don't do it by halves. Tell me all or none."

Wild glared fiercely at the speaker.

"Tell you all?" he said.

"Why not, gov'nor?"

"You know not what you ask?"

"Yes I do, old man. I give you my word to identify myself with your interests—to do everything for you just the same as you would do it yourself. Now, as I undertake to do that, it must stand to sense that for me to be any service to you, I must know all; you must tell me all your plans—in fact, everything. Then, when we are leagued together like that, what is there that we could not accomplish?"

CHAPTER CCL.

JONATHAN WILD RECEIVES UNEXPECTED INTELLIGENCE OF THE FUGITIVES, AND SETS OUT ON HIS SECOND CRUSADE AGAINST THEM.

JONATHAN WILD put his elbows on the table, and resting his chin in the palms of his hands, looked stedfastly in the face of his son.

But that exemplary individual bore the scrutiny without changing countenance in the least.

It is possible that he was quite sincere in all his protestations.

"We could accomplish anything under such favourable circumstances as those you mention," said Jonathan, after a pause.

"That is what I say, too."

"But cannot you see what risk I run in taking you so much into my confidence?"

"I daresay there does seem a risk."

"Then do not wonder that I hesitate."

"You are a cautious old file, gov'nor."

"I have every need of caution."

"But come, what do you say? You had better make good terms with me while I am in the humour to serve you."

"George, you can't mince the matter. You don't come to me first, as you might have come. I have cause to suspect you, and therefore you ought not to wonder at me if I hesitate to take you fully into my confidence. But I will tell you what I will do, and I consider it a very fair arrangement."

"Let us hear it, gov'nor."

"You shall remain with me a little while, making yourself as useful as you can. Do you understand?"

"Yes; go on."

"By your behaviour and general comportment I shall be able to judge you. I shall, indeed, use it as my sole guide. If you go on square, and show yourself worthy to be trusted, then I shall be very glad to trust you."

"Those are fairish terms, gov'nor, and I consent to them."

"You do?"

"I do, and I only hope you will stick to your part of the bargain as well as I shall stick to mine."

"You may depend I shall stick to my part, George, because it would so much advantage me if I could have some one I could trust. It is what I have wanted all along, in order to bring my schemes to a successful issue."

"Well don't grumble gov'nor, for you have now got to your hand just what you require. If, however, you mean to try me first, I have no objection in the world, but mark my words if you don't find me everything you could wish."

"I don't like those who profess too much," said Wild, significantly.

"Nor I, gov'nor. Therefore I say, try."

"I will."

"Give us your hand on that bargain, gov'nor, and we'll have another dram together."

Jonathan held out his hand, which his son took with every appearance of sincerity.

Their glasses were then filled and emptied.

Wild, junior, spoke again.

"Now, gov'nor, as all is so satisfactorily arranged, just tell me what I have got to do next."

"Nothing particular. In the daytime when I am absent I shall want you to go into the office and do the business there instead of me."

"That's all right, then, for you know very well I understand all about that."

"You have transacted it before."

"And done it well, too, I flatter myself."

"Well, then, that will be the chief of your business."

"Very good, then. I have something to say."

"Say on."

"If I take the office business entirely off your hands, and transact the business perfectly to your satisfaction, shall you be satisfied?"

"Perfectly satisfied."

"If I do nothing else?"

"Yes, if you do nothing else."

"Then, gov'nor, I undertake it, and in return, to show you I know how to be grateful, I'll tell you what I'll do for you in addition."

"What?"

"If you will tell me the names of the two persons who have been such a trouble to you, and who you want to be revenged upon, I'll be after them like a bloodhound, and what's more, I'll have them, or I'll know no rest till I do."

Jonathan looked at the speaker with gleaming eyes.

"Do that," he said, "and then you will indeed prove yourself to be my son. Do that, and what has happened in the past shall never enter my mind again."

"I will do it, gov'nor."

"There is nothing which would give me so much pleasure as that."

"I am glad my offer has pleased you."

"It has pleased me more than any other which you could have made."

"Bravo, gov'nor. You will find it no idle boast. Come, who are they?"

"These two people?"

"Yes, these enemies of yours you would so like to see at Tyburn."

"I shall see them there, sooner or later, do not doubt that."

"You will, I'll promise that, and before you are many days older."

Jonathan looked at his son with admiration.

He fancied he could detect some of his own nature in him.

And so there was.

He inherited all the bad qualities of his father, without any of the good ones.

It may be asked, what good qualities did Jonathan Wild possess?

Not many, certainly, but at any rate, he was better than his son.

That worthy was vindictive and cruel to a degree.

Nothing would have pleased him more than to hunt down some one for the mere fun of the thing.

But when he had got some great end to gain he could devote himself to it heart and soul, and with an energy untiring and almost superhuman.

Tremble, Jack. Tremble, Blueskin. Not only for your own sakes, but also for the sake of the young girl of whom you are the sole protectors and defenders, for an enemy more deadly, more unscrupulous, and more terrible than Jonathan Wild himself is about to be let loose upon your track!

Hitherto it has been a hard, hard struggle to preserve life and liberty so far, but now that the thief-taker has received so powerful an adjunct, we cannot but fear the worst.

We must not, however, forestal the proper current of events, but patiently reveal, with all succinctness possible, the strange incidents which occurred.

Where could they look for such an accession of strength to their cause? Where could they hope to find so powerful an ally as Jonathan Wild had found in the person of his son?

"Who are they?" asked this hopeful individual again.

"Give me some particulars about them, and a full description. Rely upon it they will not trouble you much longer."

Jonathan shook his head.

"You think too lightly of this affair," he said, "by far too lightly. You must not delude yourself with the idea that the accomplishment of their capture is the easiest matter imaginable. If you fill yourself up with such a notion, you are doomed to certain disappointment."

"Who are they, then?"

"Men of no common kind, or all my previous efforts would not have been unavailing. Do you think I lack experience in these matters? With this solitary exception, have I ever had any difficulty in achieving my desires?"

"I don't know that ever you have had much trouble, guv'ner."

"Very well, then, what does it argue when all my efforts against these have been unavailing? Does it not argue that there is something peculiar connected with them which there never has been with the others? so don't make the mistake of thinking you are going to do easily what I have failed to do."

"I'll have a try, guv'ner, and if I do succeed I shall make you hide your head for shame. But come, it is quite time you told me something about them. Who are they?"

"One, at any rate," replied Wild, "is well known to you."

"Who is he?"

"He was formerly in my service, and I trusted him with everything."

"Now he has turned against you."

"Yes."

"That's infernally awkward, guv'ner."

"It is."

"Does he know much?"

"By far too much for it to be safe for him to live my enemy."

"I see. But who is he?"

"He used to be second to myself, and have charge of all affairs when I happened to be out of the way."

"What, Blueskin?"

"You recollect him, then."

"Is that him?"

"Yes."

Wild junior thrust his hands into his trousers pockets, and gave a low whistle.

"Guv'ner."

"What?"

"After trusting Blueskin with all your secrets in the way you did, you ought to have kept in with him."

"But, how if I couldn't?"

"Why, of course, if you couldn't you couldn't."

"Then I couldn't. I know what policy is as well as most people."

"I daresay you do, guv'ner, but it makes things very awkward that does, and, besides, I know what Blueskin is before to-day. He is all very well for a friend, but a devil for an enemy."

"You are right. Well that is one of the foes I have to contend with, and whose destruction I have sworn to accomplish."

"Well, one comfort you have told me the worst first."

"Don't you make too sure of that."

"The other couldn't be worse than Blueskin, let him be whom he will."

"Wait till you know."

"Who is he?"

"His name will not be familiar to you. I don't suppose you have ever heard it before."

"Let us hear it behind, then."

"Jack Sheppard."

"Is that his name?"

"Yes."

"What of him?"

"He is the most daring and desperate fellow that ever existed. He has been twice confined in Newgate, and has twice broken out."

"You have got two desperate chaps to deal with, I see."

"I have. I tell you, all that I have tried against them has utterly failed."

"I will try what I can do, guv'ner. You won't daunt me. See if I don't prove a match for them."

"When once those two fellows are out of the way, all the rest that I have to do will be done readily enough, but, while they remain, I shall have no end of difficulty in my path."

"They must be removed, then, if that is the case."

"I must also tell you, George, that they have with them a young girl."

"A young girl?"

"Yes."

"What about her?"

"It is virtually essential to my plans that I should get possession of her."

"And they refuse?"

"Yes."

"Does the girl refuse?"

"Yes."

"Guv'ner, you are playing some deep, artful game, but I shall find it all out."

"You shall know all in good time."

"And what is this girl?"

"That doesn't matter. She is with Jack Sheppard and Blueskin."

"Yes. What's her name?"

"Her name?"

"Yes."

"Her name is—is—Edgworth Bess."

"Oh! Edgworth Bess, is it?"

"Yes."

"That's a rummy name, guv'ner. What do you want the girl for?"

"Never mind at present."

"Oh! very well. Now, then, when do you think of setting off in pursuit of these three. Have you any idea where they are?"

"At this present moment I have no idea whatever where they are."

"How's that?"

"But in a little while I expect to receive some intelligence."

"From whom?"

"I have spies in all parts of London, and as soon as the three are seen by any one of them, I shall be at once communicated with."

"Oh! that's it."

"Then, when I know with certainty where they are, I—"

At this moment there came a faint tapping at the door of the room.

"Come in!" roared Wild.

Wilkinson entered.

"If you please, sir"—

"What, villain?"

"A man has brought this for you."

Jonathan held out his hand.

Wilkinson put into it a dirty piece of card.

It seemed by its appearance to be an ordinary playing card.

And such, indeed, it was.

It was one out of a pack, and on its centre was painted a diamond.

It was the ace of diamonds.

Jonathan understood the sign.

It was that which was given by any one of his spies.

It signified that one had called, and that he had intelligence to communicate.

"Is the man downstairs who brought this, Wilkinson?"

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

"Then go and fetch him up here to me."

As soon as the door was closed, Wild junior said—

"What does all that mean, guv'ner?"

"It means that I shall shortly learn something of the three persons I was speaking about."

"So much the better," said George, rubbing his hands together.

"He is one of the spies I have posted about, or a messenger from one of them, and we shall learn whereabouts they are, no doubt."

Again came the tapping at the door.

In answer to Wild's command to enter, Wilkinson came in, ushering in rather a rough-looking specimen of humanity.

He touched his forehead in a respectful manner to Wild, and waited to be spoken to.

Jonathan made a sign for Wilkinson to leave the room.

Of course the janizary vanished instantly.

"Now," said the thief-taker, turning to the man, "you have brought this card, have you not?"

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

"Then just tell your news in as few words as possible."

CHAPTER CCLI.

FORTUNE SEEMS RESOLVED TO BEFRIEND JONATHAN WILD.

THE man, who was not a messenger, but actually one of Wild's spies, twirled his hat round in his hand while he considered into how small a compass he could put his information.

"I have found Ross, the landlord of the public-house," he said.

"Have you?" cried Jonathan, "then he shall pay dearly enough for the way in which he has acted. Where is he?"

"He was walking along the Whitechapel-road, Mr. Wild."

"Well, go on."

"So I followed him, Mr. Wild, and never once lost sight of him."

"Which way did he take?"

"He went westward, and as I expected every minute to house him, I kept at his heels."

"What next?"

"I followed him, Mr. Wild, till he got to Westminster Abbey."

"To Westminster Abbey?"

"Yes, he walked straight on up to Poet's-corner, as though he was going to enter the abbey, but I knew he could not do that, as it was so late, and the place all locked up."

"Well?"

"He went up the narrow turning leading to Poet's-corner, as I told you, and I waited for him to come out again."

"Yes."

"But he didn't seem to come, so I thought, perhaps, he had got an appointment with some one, and was waiting for him to come."

"Very likely. What then?"

"I saw Govus, and told him to take my place watching while I came here to you."

"And that is all you have to communicate?"

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

"Then, here's a guinea for you, and go downstairs and tell Quilt Arnold to have a troop ready at the door instantly and a couple of spare horses."

"Yes, Mr. Wild," replied the man, as he withdrew to execute this order.

"What do you make of this news?" inquired his son.

"Who is Ross?"

"He is the landlord of a public-house, and it was through his instrumentality that Blueskin and Jack Sheppard made their last escape."

"I see. Then you think it likely, by keeping in view of Ross, you will come in sight of the others."

"Nothing more probable. You see they would bribe this Ross to aid them, and I daresay this appointment at Westminster Abbey is for the very purpose of giving him the reward."

The reader knows Jonathan was not very far from the real truth in this supposition, but it was a supposition merely.

Still it serves to show what talent he had in forming an idea of what people were likely to do under certain circumstances, and in this lay no small portion of his success.

"If that is the case, then, gov'nor, we ought to be off like lightning, or they will transact their little business, and be off."

"They will."

"I should like to catch them all at one swoop."

"So should I. Arm yourself, and then we will go down."

A few moments were spent, both by Wild and his son, in looking to their weapons, after which, they went downstairs.

They found the troop already at the door, but not quite in readiness to start.

But it was wonderful to see with what expedition things were done in Wild's household.

A stranger would have declared it impossible for men and horses to be ready upon so short a notice—and yet there they were.

Jonathan Wild descended the steps in front of his domicile, followed by his son.

The janizaries, to many of whom George was known, as well as the circumstances connected with his life, looked on with surprise when they saw them apparently on such good terms with each other.

And here we ought to state that, upon the arrival of George Wild, which took place a few hours before Jonathan's return, Tonks, who was on the lock, refused to allow him admittance.

But the behaviour of Wild junior was so outrageous, that in the end they were obliged to allow him to come in, when he took possession of Jonathan's private room in the manner we have described.

When Wild returned, Tonks wished to inform him of what had taken place, but the aspect of the thief-taker's countenance was so terrible that it quite frightened him, and he resolved not to say a word, for fear any unpleasant consequences should fall upon his own head.

Quilt Arnold, too—when Wild passed him in the passage—opened his mouth to communicate the same intelligence, but he closed it without uttering a sound.

And so Jonathan had the full benefit of the little surprise that was in store for him.

A storm was fully expected, but it seemed to have entirely blown over.

But the bull-dogs, as Wild called them, knew better than to take anything more than a passing notice of this circumstance.

Jonathan mounted the horse which had been provided for him.

George Wild got on to another.

By this time the remainder of the troop were in readiness.

Wild turned round and looked at them, then inquired whether all was ready?

He was replied to in the affirmative.

"Forward, then!" he cried. "Make all speed—follow me."

So saying, he plunged his spurs into his horse's sides, and set off at a furious gallop after our three friends, who are now menaced by perils of a terrible description, and worse than all, they were in ignorance of what was impending over them.

They would have no time to prepare.

At the rate they went, it did not take Jonathan Wild and his band very long to reach their destination.

But ere they got to the old abbey, a man darted out from the shadow of the houses, and stood in the middle of the road.

He held up his arms, and called in a loud tone of voice to them to halt.

Jonathan pulled up, and the remainder of the troop came to a standstill.

"Mr. Wild," said the man who had thus arrested the progress of the cavalcade; "is that you, Mr. Wild?"

"Yes," growled Jonathan.

"Have you had news from Kenrick?"

"Yes."

"Then I have more."

"Come here then at once, close to my horse, and tell me quietly."

The man approached.

"I am Govus," he said.

"Well?"

"I was left at Poet's-corner, by Kenrick, to watch for Ross, the landlord, while he came to you."

"Why have you left your post?"

"I put Tomlins there."

"All right."

"I have important news."

"Tell it quickly, then."

"While I was waiting for Ross to come out, and prepared to follow him, I heard footsteps approaching, so I drew back and watched."

"Well?"

"A man approached, who appeared to be very heavily laden with something. He staggered and could hardly support the weight. Noiselessly I crept to him. I knew who it was."

"Who?"

"Blueskin."

"Good. Is he there now?"

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

"We must be off, then."

"Stop a moment, Mr. Wild; he is quite safe; and I have something more to tell you which I am sure you will be pleased to hear."

[JACK SHEPPARD AND EDGWORTH BESS HAVE A NARROW ESCAPE FROM JONATHAN WILD.]

"Be quick, then."

"I will, Mr. Wild."

"Now, then."

"When I saw Blueskin, I thought to myself, Jack Sheppard is somewhere close at hand."

"What did you do?"

"I summoned Tomlins, and left him to keep watch where I was, and then I looked all about me."

"Go on. Why do you keep pausing?"

"In order that I should tell you all straightforwardly and properly."

"Make haste, then."

"I searched all about, until at length I came to the river-side, and there I found a small boat waiting. I looked more carefully, and saw that in that boat were two persons. I crept closer, and heard them talking. One called the other Jack, and he called his companion, who was a female, Edgworth Bess."

"Death and the devil!" cried Wild. "We shall have them all."

"Easy does it, old 'un," cried his son. "Don't be precipitate, or you will spoil all."

Then, turning to the man who had given him such important information, he said—

"Just let us understand this business thoroughly before we go any further."

"What is there you don't understand, sir?"

"Nothing that I know of, but that is just the point I want to ascertain, because, if we set about what we have to do while labouring under a false impression, we shall have all our trouble for nothing, and, it appears to me, we shall never have a better chance of accomplishing our purpose than we have now."

From this speech it will be seen that Jonathan Wild's son had all his wits about him, and, however much he might be disposed to trifle, yet, when the hour of action came, he was cool, and took into calculation all possible contingencies.

To start upon their errand with any misapprehension of the information they had received would be to ruin all.

Therefore, George Wild determined not to go an inch further until all was straightforward and clear in his mind.

The man prepared to reply to his questions, and George interrogated him as follows, Jonathan, of course, paying the utmost attention, and quite delighted with the manner in which his son was setting about that business which hitherto he, with all his cunning and finesse, had not been able to accomplish.

"You say Ross was watched into Poet's-corner by one of your companions?"

"Yes."

"And he called you and told you so, giving you instructions to take his place, and keep careful watch, while he went to apprise Mr. Wild of what had occurred?"

"That's it, sir."

"Well, then, you say that while you were watching and keeping guard you heard some one approaching?"

"Yes, sir."

"And you recognised that person as Blueskin?"

"Yes, sir."

"And he took the same route as Ross had done?"

"Just the same, sir; that is, up the dark narrow kind of passage between the walls of the Abbey, which leads to the door opening into Poet's-corner."

"Just so; that part of your information is very precise indeed. We will assume they are there still."

"They cannot have gone without Tomlins seeing them, and, if he had, he would soon have despatched a messenger with intelligence to that effect."

"Very good. You say the thought occurred to you that if Blueskin was there Jack Sheppard was very close at hand?"

"Just so."

"And after a time—now, please be particular about this—after a time you discovered a boat close to the water's edge, in which were seated two persons, who, you say, were Jack Sheppard and some girl he called Edgworth Bess?"

"That is it, sir."

"Now, guv'ner," said Wild, junior, addressing his father, "there is no doubt about the correctness of the information. I was disposed to think that we had not heard aright, for it seemed too good news to be true."

"It does seem too good to be true."

"But it's all right, guv'ner. You see now I have joined you the tide of fortune will set altogether in your favour."

"I hope it will."

"So do I, guv'ner. But we have already wasted quite as much time as we can afford to spare. We must make up our minds as to what we are to do."

"Do?" asked Wild. "Capture them at once."

"Easy does it, guv'ner—easy does it! You are too rash by far. You must decide before you attempt to do anything, if you wish to be successful in what you undertake. Now you are in a position to decide upon a course of action. What are you going to do?"

"Can you suggest anything?"

"Yes. I should recommend you to make up your mind which of these two bits of game you are going to have."

"Both—both."

"Ah! now, guv'ner, there you are. That's the secret of your having failed to succeed. You let your attention be divided between two objects, and the consequence is you get neither."

Wild looked rather surprised at these increasing proofs of his son's abilities, but the surprise was altogether of a pleasurable character.

He could not shut his eyes to the fact that he was perfectly right.

"Guv'ner," he continued, "if you want to accomplish any difficult thing, you must fix your eyes upon that one thing, and no other. If you don't, failure is certain, of course. Now of these two parties, which would you rather have? Just say, and be quick about it, and then we will go in a body to that place, and it will go hard with us if we do not achieve something."

It was not the easiest matter for Wild to decide this point.

Yet still he felt that if he did not come to a determination quickly he would be like the sportsman in the fable, who, seeing two flocks of birds, was uncertain which to fire at, and in this state of indecision pulled the trigger—of course hitting neither.

Now, for Wild to say which he desired most to wreak his vengeance upon—Blueskin or Jack Sheppard—was almost an impossibility.

But there were one or two things which assisted him to come to a decision.

In the first place, then, he looked upon Blueskin and Ross as being tolerably secure for a little while in the place they had chosen to occupy, and the only outlet to which was guarded by one of his (Wild's) men.

In the second place, Jack Sheppard had with him Edgworth Bess, of whose person Jonathan Wild was above all things desirous to obtain possession.

This last decided him.

"To the river!" he said, "to the river. We will capture Jack Sheppard first, and leave Blueskin till afterwards."

CHAPTER CCLIII.

JACK SHEPPARD AND EDGWORTH BESS ARE ATTACKED IN THE BOAT BY JONATHAN WILD.

"ALL right, guv'ner," said Wild, junior, with all the coolness imaginable, "but don't make such a rumpus. Easy does it, you know."

"Forward!" said Wild to his janizaries. "Follow me at full speed. And you, Tomlins, lead the way to the spot on the river-bank, close to which you say you saw the boat."

"All right, Mr. Wild. This way, if you please. It is not very far from here, sir."

Jonathan did not deign any reply to this speech, but pulled out a pistol and put it on full cock.

In this way, then, they proceeded to the spot of which the man had spoken.

Of course, the reader having been put in possession of all precedent circumstances, knows well how terribly correct was the information which had just been given.

When we last saw Blueskin and Ross, they were in the narrow passage we have described, and with the tall walls of the Abbey on either side of them; and those of our readers who feel curious enough to visit the spot will see how difficult the task would be to escape if the one narrow outlet was well guarded.

When we last saw Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess they were seated in the frail and heavy-laden vessel just as Wild's spy said they were, awaiting the return of their faithful companion, Blueskin.

With no thought of the danger—the terrible danger with which they were menaced, for they had not seen the dusky, shrinking figure of the spy upon the river's bank—with no suspicion that their arch enemy, Jonathan Wild, was so close upon their track, they spoke to each other upon the many strange occurrences of the past, and speculated upon the future.

Alas! the prospect spread out before them was desolate and drear.

Nowhere could they see the least gleam of hope in the dark clouds which obscured their future.

All was uncertainty.

But Jack, although he felt all this, strove to put as good a face upon the matter as he could, and, though the grounds he had for doing so were slight, yet he cheered and encouraged his companion to the best of his ability, and spared no effort to rouse her drooping spirits.

And he succeeded, though to a partial extent only.

They had heard the old Abbey clock peal forth the hour of midnight, and then they began to look for Blueskin's return, though, of course, they could not tell whether or not he would be kept waiting for Ross, who might have been prevented from reaching the place of assignation at the appointed time.

So, as the time slipped by, they took scarcely any notice of it.

Besides, they were deeply engrossed by their conversation, and did not note the flight of time.

They had been separated from each other for a long time, and many strange events happened to both of them during the interval, as all we have recorded will testify.

During the time they had been re-united, the chances of explanation had been very few indeed, and so they had much—very much to tell each other.

The varied occurrences of the past were all talked over. In the meantime, Jonathan Wild and his men, led onward by the spy, approached the spot where their little vessel rested.

Cautiously and stealthily they all came, treading with the utmost care, so that no sound should reach our friends and give them warning of their approach, the thief-taker and his band crept down to the water's edge.

The same pains were taken, too, to prevent their being seen as there were to prevent their being heard.

They kept close in the shadow of the buildings contiguous to the river, so that their outlines could not be distinguished on the dark background which they formed.

In this way they contrived to creep very close to their victims.

The surface of the Thames was involved in the utmost gloom.

But presently both Jonathan Wild and his son and the other members of the band could perceive a small boat resting on the water, and immediately after could detect two persons seated in it, and hear the murmur of their conversation.

With straining eyes, Jonathan gazed upon this spectacle, and as he gazed he drew nearer, nearer, and nearer still.

It was just at this moment that Edgworth Bess, who had turned to look towards the shore in the hope of seeing Blueskin—it was just at this moment that in a convulsive, agitated manner she clutched hold of Jack by the arm.

Then, with her finger pointed towards the bank, she said, in a low whisper—

"Jack—Jack—"

"What is it?"

"Hush—hush."

"What has alarmed you?"

"Do not speak. Look—look, oh! look in the direction to which I point. What can you see?"

"Nothing."

"Are you sure? I fancied I could see the figures of many men on horseback, looking like shadows in the darkness. Look, can you see them?"

Even while Bess spoke there crept over the surface of the water a faint flush of leaden-coloured light.

It came from the rising moon.

That orb could not, however, be distinguished yet, though a few of her most powerful beams forced a way through the mass of clouds upon the horizon, and it was this which cast the gray beam of light upon the river.

Every moment, too, the light grew brighter.

It was this which enabled Jack to see the objects which the quick eye of Edgworth Bess had discerned.

"By heaven!" he involuntarily exclaimed, "it must be Wild and his myrmidons. It is—it is! They have tracked us even to this spot. Oh! Blueskin; where is Blueskin?"

There could now be no sort of doubt as to the character of the moving, shadowy-looking objects upon the river's bank.

Jack Sheppard was for a moment so much agitated that he knew not what to do.

His companion was no better; indeed, she had cowered down in the boat the moment that she learned her implacable foe was so near.

Jack's agitation proceeded solely from Blueskin's condition.

What should he do?

He had heard no sounds of conflict rise upon the still night air, as he certainly would have done if any encounter between his comrade and Wild had taken place.

The presumption, then, was that they had not attacked Blueskin.

Then, probably knowing nothing of the presence of his foes, he would come down to the river bank, and fall an easy prey into their hands.

But Jack could not see in what way he could aid him; and himself and Edgworth Bess were menaced by a danger of no common description.

His immediate plan would be to see in what way he could avoid it.

In waiting for Blueskin upon the desperate chance of being able to aid him, he might involve poor Edgworth Bess in irretrievable ruin.

These thoughts flashed through his mind with great rapidity, and it was while they did so that his irresolution continued.

But he made up his mind, and, with one vigorous stroke of the oars, he shot the boat out into the stream.

He was able to do this suddenly and quickly, because, while waiting for his comrade, he had been compelled to keep the sculls in his hands and use them slightly, to counteract the effect of the current, for the tide was flowing out rather rapidly, and would soon have drifted him to a considerable distance if he had not taken these precautions to keep himself stationary.

And thus Blueskin was left to his fate, to fight his own battles as best he could.

But then how was Jack to help acting in the way he did?

It was the only chance he had of saving himself and the heiress from capture, and better one perish than all.

But still it was not without a very uncomfortable feeling at his heart that he acted in the manner we have described.

Jonathan Wild observed the sudden movement of the boat, and guessed what had occasioned it.

He had been seen, and they had taken the alarm.

There was now no need for further concealment, and, furious with rage to think that he had had all his trouble of making such a stealthy approach to the water's edge for nothing, he shouted in a loud voice to his men—

"Fire! Curses on you all! fire! Take careful aim. Fire, I say!"

As he spoke, the thief-taker discharged the pistol which he still held in his grasp.

A straggling kind of volley followed from his men, for all had not the weapons in readiness at precisely the moment when he gave the word of command, but they obeyed as soon as they were able.

But Jack was far out of the range of the pistols, and the bullets fell harmlessly into the water.

The next moment he disappeared in the gloom of the river, for the clouds behind which the moon was grew denser and denser, until at length they shut out her light completely, leaving no traces whatever of her presence.

Wild's son was the only one who did not fire.

As soon as the report of the discharge had died away, he said, addressing his father—

"You're a d—d fool, guv'nor; that's what you are. Now I wonder what good it did you to waste such a lot of powder and shot in that sort of way?"

"Pshaw, boy! cease your folly. What could be done?"

"Why, you had a d—d sight better not have done anything than kick up an infernal row like that. Why, you'll spread the alarm all over the place, and not only lose those, but Blueskin also."

"Who says I have lost them?"

"I do. How the devil are we to get at them? Why, if there was a boat all ready for us to jump into—which there isn't—we should have the devil's own job to find them, for they are quite out of sight, and the river's as dark as pitch."

"What do I care for that?" roared Wild, who, after the failure of his design, and the disappointment he felt in consequence, was not exactly in the state of mind to brook these remarks by his son. "I will have them—I have sworn it. A boat—a boat! Find me a boat, and I will not quit it until I have found them."

The men did not wait for any further commands, but seeing the state of fury in which their imperious master was, dispersed themselves up and down the banks of the river in search of a boat.

But nothing of the kind could they find that looked at all as though it would answer their purpose.

"Now, guv'nor," said Wild, junior, who remained quite unruffled during his father's storm of anger, "as I have said to you before, don't be a fool. Just listen for a moment to reason."

"Reason be d—d."

"I know that's what you always say, and that's how it is you don't get on. Reason won't be d—d."

"I didn't mean that."

"The more fool you, then, to say what you don't mean."

But you let your temper get the better of you, guv'ner, that's how it is, and while you do you will never get on. Now, from what I have seen, I don't feel at all surprised that you should have failed in capturing these people as you have."

"Cease your preaching. That will do no good."

"Not now it won't. Now, guv'ner, I am calm and you ain't. Will you just condescend to take my advice in this little matter?"

"What is it?" growled Jonathan.

It was really wonderful to see what an ascendancy George had obtained over the mind of his delightful father.

It was his cool defiance of him that did it.

Who else dared have spoken to the great thief-taker in the manner he just had?

No one.

At all events, not without some hostile demonstration from Jonathan.

But there was George, as unconcerned as possible, and caring no more for him than he did for Quilt Arnold.

The hopeful son proceeded to advise his father.

"You have got spies all over London, don't you say?"

"Yes."

"Very well, then; it's no good you wasting your time in a fruitless search after that boat, because the chances are a thousand to one against you finding it; the best thing you can do is to leave them until you receive some intelligence of their whereabouts, and in the meantime let us hasten to surround Blueskin, and either slay him or take him prisoner."

"No--no!"

"No what?"

"Not slay him! I have sworn an oath he shall die at Tyburn."

"Oh! very well; we will capture him, then, but you must be quick about it, or you may make up your mind he will be off! think what a deal of time we have lost already. Call your men together, do!"

It would seem that Jonathan fully approved of the plan of action chalked out by his son, for he made no further demur, but placing his whistle to his mouth blew a faint blast upon it.

It was, however, loud enough to reach the ears of his men, who at once hastened towards him to hear his commands.

"We can find no boats, if you please, sir," they cried; "at least nothing but lightermen and barges, and they are no good; there is not a wherry to be seen."

"Stop your jaw!" said Wild, junior, "and just wait for orders, will you?"

CHAPTER CCLIV.

JONATHAN WILD AND HIS SON ATTACK BLUESKIN AND ROSS IN THE PASSAGE LEADING TO POET'S-CORNER, WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

THUS rebuked, the men were suddenly silent, and occupied themselves in adjusting their reins so as to be in a condition to give immediate obedience to the orders when they should be given.

From what we have seen of Wild, junior, at present we are rather inclined to pronounce him a better general than his celebrated father.

But, then, we may be mistaken, for, after all, our acquaintance with him has been of a very recent date indeed.

He has said plenty, and shown himself ready enough to give advice and to direct what should or should not be done. But it is not by such things as these that he should be judged and compared with his father, but by his actions.

These we have yet to see.

The men, however, who composed Jonathan Wild's force upon that occasion, looked at each other with surprise and wonder when they saw how completely the command was taken out of his hands and usurped by his son.

And yet it was not exactly that they so much wondered at the son's usurpation, but to think that Jonathan should submit to it with so much tameness as he did.

That puzzled and bewildered them.

They were commanded, then, to follow their two leaders—if such they could be called—at a gentle pace, and with as much silence as possible, the route taken being that which would lead them to the passage at Poet's-corner.

Upon reaching that spot, the two Wilds looked about them, and quickly discerned the man at his post, who made a signal to them that all was well—that those they sought had not emerged from the passage.

"We had better dismount," said George, in a whisper. Jonathan acquiesced, and waved his hand for the men to follow his example.

Silently they all slid from their horses, and stood like spectres in readiness for action.

"Forward," said Wild, senior. "Rush in and overpower them. There are but two, so you will be easily able to do so. They must not be slain on any account."

Wild, junior, shook his head when he heard these words, as though he thought the orders given were not the best that could be issued under the circumstances.

But he said nothing just then—most probably because the opportunity was not afforded him.

With a sudden dash the men rushed forward up the passage, as though determined to end the matter in the most summary manner possible.

But we will just glance in the meantime at the proceedings of Blueskin.

It will be recollected that where we left him last he was in conversation with Ross, the landlord.

But what he was saying was suddenly interrupted by the trampling of horses' feet, Jonathan Wild's command to his men—which reached his ears only in a hoarse murmur—and then the reports of the pistols which were fired at Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess in the boat.

These sounds at once had the effect of filling his breast with the utmost uneasiness, for he guessed that Jonathan Wild was the cause of them.

He feared, too, that he had discovered the boat and its occupants, and the dread came over his heart that, if he had done so, the position of the fugitives would be a very terrible one indeed.

All would be over with them.

But, as we have already seen, Jack Sheppard and his fair companion escaped from Wild with much greater ease than he could have believed possible.

Blueskin, however, had no means of knowing this.

After the pistols had been fired, he could hear nothing more of a definite character.

How to act he scarcely knew.

It might be—and he thought most likely—the sounds he heard had no connexion with him; for who could know he was there?

If this was the case, it was clearly his best policy to remain just where he was, for by moving he might bring danger upon himself which otherwise he would have avoided.

Still there was the doubt upon his mind, and this doubt might operate fatally either way.

What, then, was he to do?

He drew Ross to the most retired corner of the passage, and addressed him in a whisper.

"Do you think any one has dogged your footsteps to this place?"

"No, I think not."

"It is very strange. It may be that what we have just heard, alarming though it seems, in no way concerns us, and yet I cannot divest myself of the idea that, somehow or other, Jonathan Wild has got upon our track."

"Do you really think so?"

"I cannot help doing so. I have about me a most uncomfortable uneasy feeling, and I try in vain to shake it off, because circumstances keep occurring which tend to fix it in my mind."

"What is it?"

"Why, this. Jonathan Wild has some means of which I am quite ignorant, of learning what I am all the time about. In what other way are we to account for his presence at your house, which, ten to one, he has never visited before?"

"He never did visit it."

"Then he must have received information, and that of a very precise character. That is what makes me uneasy, and makes me so full of dread respecting the sounds we have just heard. I fear Jonathan has found out precisely where we are."

"What shall we do?"

"That I know not. Perhaps it will be as well to run the risk of emerging from this place. We cannot make our position much worse, I should think."

"Agreed. I am quite ready to act according to your directions. You must be the better judge of what ought to be done."

"Take up your treasure, then. You will find it a good load. When we leave the passage I shall make my way direct to the boat, and do you turn in the opposite direction, so that if we are pursued our foes will be divided."

"Again I say agreed," Mr. Blake," said Ross, as he began to pick up the ingots of silver from the floor, upon which Blueskin had placed them. "I am much obliged to you," he continued; "more obliged to you than I can well express. You have, indeed, been liberal."

Ross, the landlord, was a stout, strong, hearty man, so he took up the ingots with much less difficulty than Blueskin did, who was greatly enfeebled by the numerous wounds he had received.

As soon as he was ready Blueskin prepared to start.

But they had already lingered too long.

Jonathan Wild had reached the entrance as we have already described, and followed closely by his men, made a sudden rush.

Blueskin comprehended his danger in a moment.

He had all along been haunted by the idea that the thief-taker was upon his track.

Now he was upon him.

His capture seemed certain.

In that narrow passage which had but one outlet, what chance had he of making his escape?

His heart sank within him as the consciousness came over him that he must fall into the hands of the dreaded thief-taker.

Perhaps, he thought, Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess had already been made prisoners, and the treasure which had been obtained with so much risk, been taken from them.

But it was not in Blueskin's nature to submit to any circumstances, let them be ever so adverse, without making at least a desperate effort to preserve his life and liberty.

And so, on the present occasion, actuated by this feeling, he immediately turned and fled up the narrow passage, until the stone walls prevented him going any further.

Then he was forced to stand at bay.

Ross, the landlord (who, burdened with the weight he carried, was less quick in his movements), was immediately borne down by Jonathan Wild's men, and made a prisoner.

The whole of them rushed upon him, for in the darkness it could not be seen who it was.

"A light!" said Wild. "Quick! That ought to have been thought of before. A light."

Those of the janizaries who were not employed in keeping hold of Ross, busied themselves with lighting the dark lanterns with which they were provided.

They had done this too often not to be expeditious and, accordingly, before many seconds had elapsed, the united beams of the lanterns tolerably revealed the character of the place they were in.

Of course the lenses were at once turned upon the prisoner they held so securely in their grasp, and then they recognised him as the landlord who had furnished them with the drugged ale.

Jonathan recognised him, too, and commanded his men to hold him tight.

They obeyed, and directed their master's attention to the ingots of silver which Ross had dropped.

Of course Jonathan recognised them too, and a howl of anger burst from his lips.

In the excitements of the last few days he had almost forgotten the robbery, but now the sight of the well-known ingots brought it back with great vividness to his mind.

Without any positive proof that Blueskin and Jack Sheppard were the robbers, he had judged it to be them, but now he had positive proof.

"Forward," he cried, again. "We have another prisoner to take. Forward."

Flushed and heated with the success they had already met with, the men rushed up the passage.

But they reached the end of it without meeting with an obstruction of any kind.

When they could go no further, with dismay pictured upon their faces, they turned round and looked about them.

No one was to be seen.

By some extraordinary means or other, Blueskin had disappeared.

Wild was furious.

Convinced there was no means of exit, save one—and that one being the passage guarded by his men—he came to the conclusion that Blueskin must have concealed himself in some out of the way nook.

But a hasty, though thorough examination of the place showed there was no such place affording the least capabilities for concealment.

The idea struck him that, somehow or other, Blueskin had been cunning enough to slip out unperceived.

But the men on guard, upon being appealed to, solemnly declared that he had not passed them.

Jonathan was puzzled.

Again and again he made an examination of the place, but without result.

The only thing that looked at all probable was that Blueskin had found some means or other of making his way into the Abbey.

But Jonathan could see none at all practicable.

He knew, too, how carefully all the place was secured, and though there were several windows round about, yet none of them bore the appearance of having been forced open.

"What do you think, George?" Wild asked, when, thoroughly baffled by the mysterious disappearance, he could come to no conclusion himself.

"Don't know, old 'un. It's either one of these two things. If Blueskin has not passed the men at the entrance, he must be inside the Abbey, for it is quite certain he is not hiding anywhere about here."

This was an opinion entirely in accordance with Jonathan's own ideas upon the matter.

"Take care your other prisoner is secured, and let us effect an entrance into the Abbey, and see if we cannot find the other."

"Good," said Wild, senior; "but I hope you see that it is not the easiest matter in the world to capture these fellows."

"You are right, gov'nor."

"Those in the boat, you see, eluded us, and I am sure our approach was silent and cautious enough, but some cursed thing or another gave them the alarm."

"It looks like it."

Wild would not have let slip this opportunity of reminding his son that all was not so easy as he had seemed to think it was for worlds; in fact, he looked upon it with professional pique.

The order was given to keep tight hold of Ross, and then Wild despatched another of his men to call up the man who had charge of the keys of the Abbey—for it was more than even the great thief-taker dare do to break into a sacred edifice upon the mere supposition that a felon, of whom he was in pursuit, had concealed himself there.

Some time was consequently thus lost, and Wild chafed and fretted like an imprisoned tiger.

At length the old man, who had charge of the keys of the sacred building, made his appearance.

At first he demurred, but a diabolical threat, such as Jonathan Wild alone could utter, induced him to alter his mind.

He fitted the key into the lock with a trembling hand, and shot back the bolt.

As soon as the door was fairly open for him to pass through, Jonathan rushed in.

George Wild was next, and, of course, the janizaries were not very far behind, for they knew it was more than their lives were worth to linger.

The lanterns which they carried had been quite sufficient to illuminate the narrow passage, but now they were brought into the area of the vast building, they were found totally inadequate to disperse the mass of darkness with which it was filled.

A dim kind of halo was just cast around Wild and his party, and that was all, and more served to keep any one away from them than it enabled them to perceive any one.

But Wild was not to be daunted by such a thing as defect in the amount of light.

With speed and dexterity he searched all about him, nor did he cease until the whole of the area of Westminster Abbey, vast as it is, had been explored.

The search, however, did not result in their finding anything, not even so much as a trace of the person of whom they were in pursuit.

CHAPTER CCLV.

THE MYSTERY OF BLUESKIN'S EXTRAORDINARY DISAPPEARANCE IS REVEALED TO THE READER.

If the truth must be told, there was no one more chagrined at this complete failure to capture our friends than the thief-taker's son George.

He had spoken so confidently about what he should do, and had, in a manner of speaking, taken the direction of affairs entirely to himself, and, after all, done nothing save capture Ross, the landlord.

A more favourable chance of making them prisoners George considered they would never have, and the probability is, he was quite right.

They were all close together, and yet divided, which made their hopes of succeeding look all the brighter.

And yet, in despite of all this, they had failed, signally failed.

George Wild was so enraged that he could scarcely trust himself to speak, and that is how it is we have heard so little of him lately.

When the Abbey had been searched, Jonathan stood for a moment or two in doubt as to what he should do next.

The evidence of Blueskin being in the Abbey rested upon presumption only.

It might be that he had never entered it, but had managed, somehow or other, to escape.

If, however, Jonathan could have been assured that he really was within the building, he would not have quitted it until he had looked into every crevice.

But in the absence of any such assurance, he was not likely to look so closely.

Still, as we have stated, he explored the whole of the area, not leaving a square foot of it unvisited.

But still to no purpose.

"What do you think now, George?" he asked.

"Think, guv'ner?"

"Yes!"

"Why that they must have the devil himself to aid them."

"Bah!"

"How in the world, then, could he have got out of that passage in the way he has?"

"It puzzles me!"

"And me!"

"Let us go outside and look again—perhaps we may find something."

"Come, then."

With these words the worthy pair left the Abbey and proceeded to the end of the passage.

Looking up they could see nothing but the gray walls of the venerable structure.

"There is a window, guv'ner!" said Wild, junior.

"I see it."

"Could he have got through that?"

"It seems hardly possible!"

"I should not like to try it, guv'ner."

"It has no appearance either of being broken or disturbed. You may depend upon it he has managed to elude the men at the outlet, and has got clear off."

"I am afraid that's it, guv'ner. Curse me, if this isn't the rummiest night's work I have ever had."

"Why so?"

"I would have laid a wager to any amount that we should have had all four prisoners by this time."

Wild laughed.

"You were very confident about what you should do. I said nothing, because I knew you spoke in ignorance; but now you will have a better idea of the kind of people we have got to grapple with."

"Curse it, yes."

"It is a strange thing, George, and it often gives me a great deal of uneasiness, but if I turn against others I can succeed, but with them I have always failed."

"It's a strange disappearance, guv'ner, but now, do you know, I think I can tell you the secret of your unsuccess."

"Can you?"

"Yes. You want your revenge, and"—

"I will have it."

"Don't be savage, guv'ner. I say you want your revenge, and you try to get it, but you are rather too refined in your ideas."

"Refined in my ideas?"

"Yes. I mean refined in your ideas of revenge. Now, if it was me, I should consider my revenge quite accomplished when my foe was dead, no matter how his death was brought about. But you are not content with that."

"I am not."

"You want to capture them alive—to gloat over their sufferings while they are in custody—subject them to the ordeal of a trial, and then have them executed at Tyburn."

"Ha! ha!"

"You laugh."

"I do. I laugh when I think of the coming of that day."

George Wild shook his head.

"Guv'ner, take my advice. If you want to get rid of them, don't wait for the scrapping business, but, the first time you have a chance, put a bullet into them."

"Pho—pho."

"Have your own way."

"George."

"What, guv'ner?"

"Do you know what is always said about Jonathan Wild?"

"Yes; but I shouldn't think you like to hear it."

"I do."

"Do you?"

"And glory in it."

"Well, there's no accounting for tastes. It's true what they do say, but I shouldn't like to hear it if it was me."

"What do you mean?"

"Why, everybody says that you are the d—dest villain unhung."

"Ha!"

"Why, you seem as if you didn't like it, after all."

"Do not try my patience too far, George; you will find it a dangerous game to trifle with me."

"Don't you be a fool, guv'ner. I told you what everybody says about you, and it's the truth."

"You go from the point."

"How so?"

"That is not what I meant."

"What did you mean, guv'ner?"

"Why, all who know me say, 'Jonathan Wild is a man who, sooner or later, never fails to keep his word, no matter at what cost or trouble.'"

"Oh! that's what they say, is it?"

"Yes."

"Then it was a slight misunderstanding of mine, that's all, guv'ner."

"Now, I have sworn that Jack Sheppard shall die at Tyburn, and on this spot I renew the oath. Already has he been tried and cast for death, and his execution will soon follow."

"You are an obstinate pig, guv'ner, and it's no good trying to reason with you. But, if you were a sensible man, and this Sheppard stood in the way between you and your designs, you would be content with his death, no matter in what way it was inflicted. But it's no good our standing here like this, because our talk will come to nothing, after all. What are you going to do?"

"I am loath to give in."

"So am I, guv'ner."

"But what can be done?"

"Nothing, that I know of. It's no good our exhausting ourselves uselessly."

"It is not."

"You say you have spies in every part of London, whose especial duty it is to watch for their appearance."

"Yes, and when seen not to lose sight of them, but immediately communicate with me."

"Then let us go back, guv'ner. We can't do any good here. We must wait in patience for a report to come to us, and the next time we must manage things better than this."

"We must," said Jonathan with a grin, for much as he desired the capture of the fugitives, he would have been deeply mortified if his son had been successful when he himself had failed so often.

It was wonderful how much this reconciled him to his defeat.

He did not feel half so furious as one would have expected.

He would not have liked his son to achieve such a triumph over him.

As he had said, the most reasonable thing for them to do was not to waste any more of their time and energies, but return to Newgate-street and wait for some fresh intelligence.

Accordingly, Jonathan gave the order for his men to mount.

As for Ross, he, at least, was a trophy to take back with them.

Jonathan was much enraged with Ross, and there is little doubt the landlord will have to suffer smartly for the service he rendered to our friends.

By the command of the thief-taker his arms were firmly bound behind his back with the sword belts of some of his men, and while in this helpless condition he was lifted on to one of the horses, while a janizary sprang up behind him and took the reins.

It was in this way that Ross was taken to the thief-taker's house in Newgate-street.

Poor Ross! He was quite unable to help himself, and over and over again he cursed his evil fortune.

But it was all to no purpose.

He was obliged to submit.

He was jolted fearfully upon the pommel of the saddle, and he longed for the end of his journey to come, for the horse upon which he sat trotted roughly, and Ross was profoundly ignorant of horsemanship.

Indeed, if it had not been for the janizary putting his arms round his body to hold the reins, and thus retaining him in his seat, he would certainly have fallen to the ground.

Jonathan did not forget the ingots of silver.

He had them carefully counted and then delivered them to his men to be distributed amongst them and thus carried home.

On reaching Newgate-street, the whole troop alighted, and Ross was assisted to the ground.

The treasure was brought into the hall.

Quilt Arnold had not formed part of the expedition.

Indeed, it had become quite an understood thing that when Wild went out on any of his excursions Quilt stayed at home, and had, for the time being, the sole direction of affairs.

It was so in the present instance.

But he was up, and waiting for the thief-taker to make his appearance, so he lost no time in showing himself.

Moreover, Quilt was curious to learn the result of this expedition, for he had learned from the spy what was the object of it.

He was scarcely surprised when he saw the thief-taker return without the prisoners.

But he dreaded some ebullition of violence.

In this he was deceived.

Wild seemed to be in what, for him, was quite an amiable frame of mind.

His first care was his prisoner.

"Take him to the cells, Quilt," said Jonathan, "and keep a sharp eye upon him. Mind you have him secure. I shall hold you responsible for his safe keeping."

Poor Ross, the landlord, looked very rueful and uneasy when he heard these words.

He had a wholesome dread of the great thief-taker, and, up to the present time, it had been the study of his life to avoid coming into collision with him.

Now, however, he had made Jonathan his bitter enemy.

And yet we should be doing the man an injustice if, despite the perilous position in which his actions had placed him, he repented what he had done.

To be sure, he could not help feeling very uncomfortable at the thoughts of his position, but he strove to hope for the best.

Quilt Arnold saw him deposited in one of the strongest of the cells, and having done so, removed, at the prisoner's request, the belts which confined his hands behind his back.

He had, at all events, the free use of his limbs, and liberty to range the limits of his cell.

That was better than being chained to the wall.

Dawn was now close at hand, and both Jonathan and his son, feeling sleepy, went upstairs, in the hope of being able to snatch a few hours' repose.

Jonathan Wild went to his room, and, according to his usual custom, flung himself on the outside of the bed with his clothes on.

But his brain was busy, and the silence and darkness of his chamber served to engender thought.

His mind was chiefly occupied in thinking of his son.

He doubted him, and yet wished to place full confidence in him.

Could he but have been assured of his good faith, he felt he should not fear to undertake anything.

But he had a doubt.

Would this delightful son of his be all that he could wish for a little time, and then turn round against him as he did before?

It might be so.

And yet, on the other hand, he might have purchased wisdom with experience, and was now quite sincere in his protestations of repentance, and quite willing to join his father in his nefarious schemes.

But, while this doubt remained, Jonathan felt it would be not only impossible, but impolitic to trust him.

How could he make sure that his son was sincere in his professions?

He determined to try and find a means.

The consequences would be ruinous to him if his son wormed his way into his confidence, became possessed of all his secrets, and then turned the knowledge against him.

"I will test him," muttered Wild, as he tossed restlessly over and over upon his bed. "I will test him, and if he proves unworthy, he shall die. He acted to-night with much of my own old daring and cunning, but, then, it is a fresh thing. I must test him—I must test him."

At the same moment, George Wild, in an adjoining chamber, was thinking of his father.

"What shall I do?" he said. "Shall I join myself to him, and let his interests become identical with mine? I am a good mind to say yes. I might do worse—much worse. I would make up my mind at once to be faithful to him, but, the worst of it is, the gov'nor, with all his cleverness, is the d—dest fool alive."

CHAPTER CCLVII.

SOME VERY EXTRAORDINARY ADVENTURES BEFAL BLUESKIN IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

No doubt the reader feels curious in no ordinary degree to learn by what means Blueskin had made such an extraordinary and sudden disappearance, and, before we relate the adventures of Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess in the treasure-laden wherry on the Thames, we purpose devoting our time to the elucidation of this mystery.

We know he managed to get somewhere where Wild, with all his astuteness, was not able to find him, and he was destined to meet with some rather remarkable adventures before he emerged from the place of his concealment.

When the janizaries rushed forward and pounced upon Ross in the manner we have at length described, Blueskin, although the conviction was about his heart that he could not possibly this time avoid being captured by his powerful foe, rushed forward up the passage, animated solely by the instinct which prompted him to place as great an interval as possible between himself and his enemies, and not with the idea that by so doing he should be able to effect an ultimate escape.

Well enough he knew he was in what, to all intents and purposes, was a mousetrap, since there was but one means of entering and emerging from it.

Upon gaining the end of the narrow passage where the stone walls of the Abbey barred his further progress, Blueskin turned round and armed himself, determined to resist to the last the attack which he every moment expected his foes to make upon him.

In consequence, however, of the want of foresight in

Wild's men in not providing themselves with lights before they made the attack, some little delay took place while the lanterns were lighted and while an examination was made of the prisoner they had in their custody.

This afforded Blueskin time for reflection, and almost mechanically he cast his eyes around him in search of something which would afford him a chance of escape.

"If I could but get inside the Abbey," he said, "I might have a chance. The place is so vast, that it would be no easy task for Wild to find me there. I wonder whether it could be done. I fear not. There is that window, certainly, but what a frightful height it is from the ground, and how should I contrive to reach it? I am afraid there is not time even for me to make the attempt. Yet why not? I cannot possibly make my position worse than it is, let me do what I will, and so here goes for the attempt."

Having made this resolution, which he did very quickly, for the words we have set down glided through his mind rather than were spoken, Blueskin sheathed his hanger, which he had drawn with the firm intention of defending himself with it to the last gasp, and made a desperate rush at the gray walls in order to reach the window, which seemed to him to lead direct into the Abbey.

Had any one asked him whether it was possible to reach that window, he would have answered without hesitation in the negative.

That is to say, under ordinary circumstances, and with ordinary occurrences to influence his exertions.

But when any one is urged onwards by threats of immediate death, it is incredible what a difference takes place.

How the timid hare will fly when pursued by the remorseless grayhound!

With a frantic dash, then, Blueskin sprang up to the projecting gable of the old Abbey, and clung to it with the might of desperation. His fingers were bruised and his nails broken by his endeavours to obtain a hold, but he did not heed that, for he was at last rewarded with a firm grasp upon the stonework.

Then, with an agility which no one scarcely would have looked for him possessing, he continued his exertions, and mounted upwards until he clutched the sill of the window which was to lead him to safety.

Having done this, he almost felt that his troubles were over, though, in reality, he had far from vanquished all the difficulties which interposed themselves between him and entering.

Holding firmly with one hand, although he had scarcely sufficient strength to sustain his own weight, Blueskin, with his other hand, rapidly felt over the leaden framework of the window.

To his joy, he found it was unfastened.

It gave way to the slight pressure which his hand produced in passing over it, and swung open like a door.

Here, indeed, was an incentive to fresh exertion, and the glance which he cast at the proceedings of Wild and his men below made him indeed aware of the urgent necessity there was for him to be expeditious in his movements, if he did not want to have all his trouble for nothing.

Summoning all his remaining strength into one spring, Blueskin raised himself upwards and crawled through the window.

Fortunately there was on the inner side a window-sill of great and unusual width—indeed it was formed of the thickness of the outer wall of the Abbey.

This afforded him a place, then, upon which he could rest.

Gladly enough, then, he sat down, and as quickly and as noiselessly as possible shut the latticed casement and fastened it.

He was just in time, for, peeping through the panes, he saw the men exhibit by their gestures the rage and astonishment which they felt at his unexpected disappearance.

Fain would Blueskin, from the position he now occupied, have continued to watch the proceedings of his enemies, but he felt he must control this desire, since it would expose him to the danger of discovery.

A gleam of light cast upwards at that window from one of the lanterns, might, perhaps, reveal his presence there.

Accordingly he drew back, and sat on the very edge of the window-sill, with his legs dangling into space.

And now a rather serious question presented itself to him.

He was, undoubtedly, some considerable distance from the floor of the building, and how was he to reach it?

He was not even in a position to say how far the ground was beneath him.

Nor to ascertain it.

And yet it would never do for him to remain where he was.

He knew the character of the thief-taker too well to think that he would give up the hope of capturing him without making a thorough search.

Some better place of concealment must be found, and that without delay.

Blueskin always made it a point not to be without the means of procuring a light.

He had too often experienced the utility of this not to be fully impressed with the value of it, and it may safely be affirmed that, unless some unlooked-for accident deprived him of them, he had always the means of procuring a light at his command.

But, on the present occasion, he was unable to avail himself of the means in his possession, because, if he had done so, he would inevitably have betrayed his whereabouts to his foes.

Some other means must be found, and Blueskin's fertile imagination soon lighted upon one.

He put his hand in his pocket, and drew forth a coin.

He could not, in the darkness of the place, see what it was, nor did he care to know.

It was a coin, and that was enough.

He held it out at arm's length, and then carefully released it from his grasp.

Then he waited for the sound which it would make upon reaching the ground.

And by taking notice of the length of time it occupied in falling, he would be able to calculate the distance with sufficient nearness to answer his purpose.

The sound reached his ears almost instantly, which showed the distance to be short—much shorter than he conceived it possible to be.

But there was not one clear, ringing, metallic sound as it struck, but a succession of them, following each other with great rapidity, and each one coming with less distinctness to the listener's ears than the preceding one.

"It is a staircase," gasped Blueskin, and, as he spoke, such a gush of pleasure came over him that he almost lost his seat.

A staircase! What could be more fortunate? It was just the thing. He would be able to reach it without difficulty, and gain the floor of the Abbey easily.

He had yet a chance of escape.

Surely, on that night, fortune befriended Blueskin to no ordinary degree.

Rapidly and cautiously, his heart animated by the hope that he should again baffle his foe, Blueskin lowered himself from the window-sill, and had the satisfaction of finding, when he hung down to the full length of his arms, that the tips of his toes touched the ground.

Fearlessly, then, he released his hold and stood firmly upon the staircase.

The interior of the Abbey was involved in the most impenetrable darkness.

Whether the staircase led up as well as down he could not see, and the only means by which he could satisfy himself upon that point was his sense of feeling.

He soon found, then, that he was not at the top of the staircase, but he was still deprived of the means of knowing whether it went up much higher or where it led.

It was a question as to which would be the likeliest to bring him in safety—to ascend or descend.

He choose the latter.

As he went down, Blueskin soon became aware that the staircase was a spiral one, such as are constructed in towers and other buildings.

As he went down, which he did with considerable rapidity, he noticed that he passed no more windows.

This brought to his recollection the circumstance that when he stood outside, the window through which he had forced an entrance was the nearest to the ground.

"Surely," he thought, "I may venture to light a match and look about me. I do not think there is the least fear of it being seen by those outside. I will run the risk, at all events, for this Abbey is a curious old place, and, being a stranger in it, I ought to be more than usually careful in what I am about."

[BLUESKIN STOPS THE POST-CHAISE.]

Speaking these words, Blueskin paused in his descent, and produced from his coat-pocket the requisites for obtaining a light.

The lucifer-match, so handy and convenient, was not then in existence—it had never been dreamt of.

The materials which Blueskin produced consisted of a bottle of phosphorous and some thin pieces of wood.

With these a silent and tolerably brilliant light could be obtained.

The little match which Blueskin lighted sputtered a moment, and then burnt brightly.

While the flame lasted, he took a good look around him.

He found himself on a circular staircase, neither the top nor the bottom of which was visible.

The stairs were of stone and well worn.

There was scarcely any dust upon them, and from this fact Blueskin argued that they were frequently made use of.

The match quickly burned out.
No 49.—BLUESKIN.

Then he was left in a darkness that seemed ten times greater than it really was.

"Whereabouts am I, I wonder?" asked Blueskin, as, stretching out his arms so that with one hand he could touch the wall and with the other the newel of the staircase, he continued to descend. "I can see no windows and no apertures through which I can penetrate. By going in the dark I may fall into some hideous danger which a light would enable me to avoid. It will be a risk, but I will light one of the wax tapers which I carry in my pocket. The flame will be a tiny one, but it will serve my purpose."

Blueskin stopped again, and though he ran a very great risk by so doing, lighted one of the pieces of wax taper of which he had spoken.

It was about four inches in length, and about the thickness of his little finger.

He was quite right when he said the light would be a tiny one, for such in truth it was.

Still it was quite enough to answer his purpose.

And it had this advantage—it was not so likely to be seen through any crevice by those who were without.

As an extra precaution, however, Blueskin took off his hat, and held it with one hand in such a position over the light that no rays proceeding from it were permitted to fall upon the outer wall—indeed, it cast the majority of them down upon the step just beneath his feet.

Swiftly, then, and with a feeling of greater confidence than he had hitherto had, he re-commenced his descent.

In a few minutes his further progress was barred by a door, which was placed right across the staircase.

A strong-looking door it was, too, and it threatened to put a stop to his going any further in that direction.

But the delight of our friend may be imagined when he found it give way to a touch.

He passed through it and closed it after him.

He then found himself in a small, square place, with two doors before him—one on his right hand and the other on his left.

He chose the former.

But it was locked.

The lock was, however, on the same side as himself, and of a very clumsy construction, as the locks are in most sacred edifices erected centuries ago.

Such an obstacle as this would not stand long in the way of our friend Blueskin.

After listening, to be confident that all was still, he took a little steel instrument, bent at one end into a hook, from his pocket and inserted it into the keyhole.

The bolt of the lock shot back in a moment with a loud snap

CHAPTER COLVII.

BLUESKIN REACHES THE VAULTS BENEATH WESTMINSTER ABBEY, AND IS THE MEANS OF RENDERING AN IMPORTANT SERVICE.

In reality the snap of the lock did not make much noise, but all Blueskin's senses, and more especially that of hearing, were on the stretch, so that the sound came to his ears in what might be called an exaggerated fashion.

So he shrank back with a look of alarm upon his countenance, and the hand in which he held the little wax taper shook so excessively that it threatened every moment to extinguish it.

But, after the elapse of a few seconds, Blueskin recovered himself.

He had listened intently, but all was profoundly still.

As a measure of prudence, however, he extinguished the taper before he pushed the door open.

He had no idea where it led, nor what results the showing of a light would produce.

Gently, then, he pushed the door a little way open.

It creaked ominously upon its hinges.

Blueskin projected his head through the crevice, and the first glance which he gave around served to show him what place he was in.

Dimly lighted up by the rays of night, which penetrated through the numerous tall windows, were the solemn-looking aisles and arches of the old Abbey.

Blueskin drew in his head, and shut the door.

"There is no luck that way," he said; "I must try the other door. If I go out there, Jonathan will nab me, to a certainty. Ha! what's that?"

A faint sound came through the door, which was not closely shut, to Blueskin's ears.

He projected his head again, and listened.

He knew what the sound was.

Some one was rather roughly turning a key in a lock which was obstinate and would not act.

"Jonathan is on my track," he said; "I must be speedy. I hope the other door will lead me to some place of safety, where I can hide myself from him."

As he spoke, Blueskin closed the door leading into the Abbey, and, by means of the same crooked piece of steel, locked it again, so no suspicions would be aroused if any who knew the door ought to be locked came and tried it; whereas, if he had left it undone, he might have given a good clue to his situation.

Having done this, Blueskin rapidly relighted the taper, and made his way to the door at the bottom of the flight of steps, and which we have mentioned as being upon his left hand.

He cast a light up and down this door, but could see no other fastening upon it save a lock.

He pushed the door, but it was fast.

The services of the picklock were again called into requisition, and, as the lock was of the same make as the other, there was just as little trouble in opening it.

With a great deal of curiosity—for, of course, a great deal depended upon what kind of place it was beyond—Blueskin opened this door.

As he had more than half suspected from the situation of it, it disclosed a continuation of the staircase he had just descended.

"The vaults?" he said. "Yes, this must lead to the vaults beneath the old Abbey. I have heard how vast is their extent, so vast that no man living is acquainted with all the ramifications. Surely, now, all will be well! I shall escape; but how I long to know the fate of Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess!"

Blueskin might well feel anxious regarding the fate of his two companions, for their position was one of the greatest peril.

The trampling of feet and the murmur of voices reached Blueskin's ears, sometimes sounding quite close at hand and then afar off, as though the pursuers were dispersing themselves over the building, which was indeed the fact.

This warned him to be quick in selecting his place of concealment, for how could he tell how soon some one might try the door which he had relocked.

Accordingly, he, without hesitation or delay, commenced the descent of the winding flight of steps, first taking care to relock the second door.

The damp, earthy sort of smell which now saluted his nostrils, as well as the sawdust on the steps, confirmed him in his previous supposition that he was going towards the vaults.

An oppressive stillness was around him.

The stillness of the tomb.

No sound from above was now audible, though faint would our friend have heard something to assure him that he was among his fellow-creatures.

As he descended, the dampness of the air became more and more perceptible.

The candle soon began to show signs of it, for it burned with a dim and sickly lustre, and scarcely dispelled the darkness immediately surrounding it.

The stairs, too, became slippery, and Blueskin, in order not to lose his footing, was compelled to keep as tight a hold as he could upon the stonework.

The charnel-house odour increased, and made the air have a damp, sticky, sickening flavour when inhaled into the lungs.

Such things as these, to a man who was flying for his life and seeking some place where he could be safe from the persecutions of his enemy, were minor inconveniences, and therefore Blueskin paid but little attention to them.

At length the bottom of the steps was reached, and then Blueskin held the light as high up above his head as he could, and strove by looking round to ascertain what kind of a place he was in.

He found that he stood in a small rectangular-shaped chamber.

Advancing into the middle of this, he saw before him a door deeply set in an arch, and having the appearance of great strength.

Sawdust was thickly strewn upon the floor of this chamber, and Blueskin, holding the light down, saw the traces of many footsteps, which clearly evidenced that the place had been visited quite recently.

He saw this with alarm, because, although he had done so much, he had by no means reached a place of absolute safety.

Some means must be found of passing through that door, which, doubtless, was in immediate connection with the vaults, of whose existence Blueskin had heard frequent mention made.

This door, then, must be passed through.

He listened, but not the faintest sound, save the hurried beating of his own heart, reached his ears.

The influence exerted upon human beings by darkness is as remarkable as it is universal, and Blueskin, strong-minded though he was, could not shake off the feeling which possessed him.

He did not delay, however, except to listen in the manner we have described.

He then turned the whole of his attention to the door, which was the only one visible.

It was of iron.

The feel and the look of it told him that.

No other fastenings were visible, save a couple of bolts, which were shot into their sockets.

One was near the top and the other near the bottom of the door.

This was awkward.

To pass through this door the bolts must be withdrawn, and when he got on the other side, how were they to be shot into their sockets again?

Had it been a wooden instead of an iron door, Blueskin might perhaps have managed to accomplish the feat.

Now it was out of the question.

The drawn bolts would show at once the route which he had taken.

But he could not hold back for this one untoward circumstance.

He had a hope, too, that he might find fastenings on the other side, or, at least, be able to do something which would obstruct the passage of his enemies through it, even if they were successful in tracking him so far.

The bolts were drawn back and the door opened.

A gloomy-looking passage was disclosed beyond, but its extent could not be ascertained without a much better light than Blueskin could procure.

Boldly enough he crossed the threshold of the mysterious-looking portal, and then, turning round, closed it after him.

There were no fastenings of any kind on the other side. Nor could he see any moveable objects with which he could construct a barricade, and prevent it being opened easily.

He was obliged to leave it just as it was.

But he resolved to push on, for he might be lucky enough to come to some place where he could safely hide himself, or else, better still, find some other means of emerging from the subterraneous place.

Animated by this hope, he quickened his pace from a walk to a run, but he was soon compelled to pause, for the little wax taper burned dimmer and dimmer every moment, and the rapid motion threatened its immediate extinguishment.

The whole of the passage was covered with sawdust, so that, as he trod, Blueskin produced no more sound than a spectre.

He was now some considerable distance from the iron door, and he paused to listen.

All was still.

No trampling of feet, no overturning of various objects, no loud shouts, announced the approach of Wild and his men.

Suddenly, however, and just as he was about to move away, a sound arose, which for a moment made him tremble and his blood to rush with a sickening sensation to his heart.

He leaned up against the wall of the passage.

"What was that?" he said. "Oh! what was that? I trust I may never hear that sound again."

There was a scared look upon Blueskin's face as he spoke these words.

The sound which so alarmed him was a groan, or something that sounded like one.

A groan uttered by some person in more than mortal agony, if one might judge from the tone of it.

What could it mean?

Cold beads of perspiration stood upon Blueskin's forehead as he asked the question.

His knees trembled beneath him.

Blueskin was not a coward.

The numberless exploits which, in the course of this narrative, we have seen him perform, will all attest, in the most satisfactory manner, to his courage.

But he was a man, and not exempt from human influence.

The place in which he was exercised a great effect upon his mind.

It was impossible it could be otherwise.

And he was not superstitious.

Far from it.

At a time when superstition was more rife and, consequently more excusable than it is now, he was less tainted with it than many were.

But the solemnity of the vaulted passage beneath Westminster Abbey—

The deep silence which prevailed—

The intense darkness, which the taper he carried only served to exhibit instead of to disperse—

The sickly, clammy feel of the atmosphere in that subterraneous region—

All these effects combined conspired to produce in his mind a feeling of dread—of shaking terror.

In the broad open eye of day, had he heard that sound, it would not have had that effect upon him which it did now.

But here the case was different.

Again came the awful sound.

The wax taper trembled in his grasp, and cast odd-looking shadows on the walls.

Had his life depended upon his giving a reply, Blueskin could not have told from what direction the fearful cry proceeded.

It seemed to fill all the dense impure air in the passage, to be borne along by it, and it sounded on all sides of him just alike.

But such a sound!

No imagination, however vivid—no description, however well-penned—could give the least idea of what it was like.

All that could be said was that it was horrible—most horrible.

What could be the meaning of that sound?

Ere now, Blueskin had many a time heard how disembodied spirits roamed the earth, and how strange sounds had been heard and strange sights seen in those receptacles provided for the interment of the dead.

Strange sights seen.

As this recollection occurred to him, he glared with straining, startling eyeballs up and down the passage, and his excited fancy pictured awful forms, which in reality had no existence.

We can scarcely feel surprised at Blueskin's feelings.

A writer to whom the human heart, and all the varying feelings which sway it, were well known, once said that he must indeed be something more or less than a man who could boldly stand forward and proclaim that he was entirely free from all taint of superstition.

We think so too.

Everything was calculated to produce an effect upon Blueskin's mind.

The midnight hour.

The ghostlike passage.

And, in fine, all those appearances which have ever been deemed accessories to such a scene.

Not for one moment did he think that such a sound as that which he now heard, heart-chilling as it was, proceeded from his foes.

In the strange, prolonged, wailing cry, there was such a tone of intense agony as no one could possibly imitate.

It was real.

But he strove to call logic to his aid, and to fancy that it was but his heated imagination which had conjured up the sound that so alarmed him.

Vain hope.

Even as he tried to cheat himself into the belief, he caught himself stretching his sense of hearing to the utmost, waiting for the sound to come again.

But would it do so?

That was the question.

Blueskin listened.

CHAPTER CCLVIII.

BLUESKIN FATHOMS THE MYSTERY OF THE AWFUL CRY WHICH SO ALARMED HIM.

THE horrible groan which had broken in upon the intense silence of that gloomy place, was a sound so awful that it seemed quite impossible for it to be repeated a third time.

It was such a cry as one could conceive some tortured spirit would utter when the dread sentence of everlasting punishment should be pronounced.

Jonathan Wild was forgotten.

The danger with which he might fairly be presumed to be menaced was unheeded.

All his faculties were bent upon that one of listening for a repetition of the sound which had filled his soul with full of horror

It came.

And, though he was waiting for it—expecting it—Blueskin started with surprise.

This last time the cry seemed much louder than before. Still it seemed to float upon the air and to fill the whole of the passage, making it impossible to say from whence it proceeded.

Had not the cry come this third and last time, Blueskin might have succeeded in deluding himself into the belief that what he heard was fancy only.

Now he felt that to be utterly impossible.

The sound was too palpable for him to be mistaken.

But, feeling ashamed of the sensations which had held him so long in bondage, he, with one great effort, forsook the support which the wall afforded him.

He held the wax taper in the air, and looked defiantly around him.

He made an effort to recover himself.

Then spoke.

He addressed himself.

His voice had a peculiar hollow sound.

"What was that?" he asked. "What was that? Surely it was a groan. Such a groan as some one would give who was suffering the direst pain. Who can it be? Let me throw off from my soul all superstitious feelings. It must be some one human like myself. Yet what an awful one. It seemed to fill the air, and to reach my ears from every side alike. What can it mean?"

These words seemed to have some influence upon Blueskin's feelings.

His voice, perhaps, altered in tone as it was, served to reassure him.

Certain it is that, with a firm step and an erect gesture, he walked still further along the passage.

On either side of him were low strong doors.

He was reminded of Newgate.

It looked just like one of the corridors of that gloomy building, with the cells opening from it on either side.

He could have little doubt about where those doors led to.

Not to cells but to family vaults—the receptacles of the wealthy dead.

Did the cry he had heard emanate from some one of those vaulted chambers.

He could scarcely think so.

The doors were small, and composed of iron.

They fitted closely in their frames.

What groan, then, could penetrate through such a barrier?

It was while these thoughts occupied his mind that, for the fourth time, he heard the cry.

But this time he was more composed than he had hitherto been.

He was able to decide upon the spot from which it came.

"Further along the passage," he said. "Further along the passage. I am sure that was where it sounded. Perhaps after all I have deceived myself. It may be the wind coming through some constructed aperture which causes the sound. I must see. If that is so, who can say that that same aperture might not be the means of leading me to freedom."

Having taken this view of the case, Blueskin might be said to have almost entirely shaken off the superstitious notions which oppressed him.

To be sure, he glanced uneasily from side to side as he pursued his way along the passage, but there was nothing more to denote his trepidation.

Five minutes afterwards his progress was arrested by a stone wall.

The passage extended no further in that direction.

He made a narrow examination of this wall in the hope of being able to detect the crevice which he had made up his mind must exist, and which had produced the awful cry.

But nothing of the kind met his ear.

The wall presented one uniform level surface, and nowhere in it could be detected what he had imagined must exist.

This brought back with full force all his old ideas to his mind.

He turned round quickly and placed his back against the wall.

No sound of his pursuers reached his ears, nor had any for a long space of time.

In fact, Jonathan Wild had withdrawn from the Abbey after his unsuccessful search, and was on his way home to Newgate-street.

But of this comfortable piece of news Blueskin was, of course, in ignorance.

"This is foolish of me," he said. "Let me discard from my brain all the ideas which gather there. Let me discard all the superstitious fancies. It may be that in one of these vaults, the doors of which are on either side of me, there may be some unhappy wretch suffering the agonies of premature interment, and it may be from his lips that these awful sounds have come which have so terrified and alarmed me.

This was a very plausible view of the case indeed, and Blueskin felt strengthened and revived by it.

It might, however, turn out to be just as fallacious as his former hypothesis.

"I will ascertain," continued Blueskin, still speaking his thoughts aloud, for he found it a great convenience to do so, "I will ascertain whether I am right. But how am I to do this? Perhaps the cry will not come again."

He listened, as if in the expectation that his words would meet with some kind of response.

But all was still.

"I will walk down the passage," he said, "and knock at all the doors in succession. Then, if there is any inmate in one of them who wishes to emerge, he will do something to attract my attention."

By these words it would seem that Blueskin had regained something like his ordinary composure.

Reason and reflection had dispelled the delusions of his brain.

In pursuance of the determination which he had formed, he took a pistol from his pocket, and grasped it by the barrel, so that he was able to use the butt-end of it as a hammer.

Holding the candle in the other hand, he stepped forward.

Then, upon reaching the first door, he struck three heavy blows upon it.

A sharp metallic sound was produced.

Ere the reverberations had died away, Blueskin applied his ear to the door and listened, so as to be quite sure, should any sound arise, whether or not it came from within.

The necessity of this precaution was soon apparent.

The same cry arose.

It still seemed to float upon the air, and to come from all directions at the same moment.

But having his ears upon the door in the manner we have described, Blueskin was prepared to say with certainty that the sound did not proceed from the interior of that vault, at least.

Being satisfied of this, he proceeded to the next, and went through precisely the same operation with the next.

And so on with the next and the next, until he had gone all down the passage on one side, and reached the door again which led into the rectangular-shaped chamber.

He was baffled yet, but still he was not disposed to give up the search.

He felt if he did that the recollection of what he had heard would be continually present to his mind, and that in daylight he would be utterly ashamed of himself.

He resolved to go up the other side of the passage, knocking at every door.

He did so, and went half-way without meeting with any better success.

Then he paused in doubt.

He had struck three blows.

He fancied he heard a response.

But so faint a one as to make it quite reasonable for him to doubt.

He struck again at the same door, and this time with greater vehemence than on the previous occasion.

A faint voice replied to him.

There could be no doubt about it.

"Some one has been immured alive," he thought.

Holding the light close to the door, he looked down for the fastenings.

His eyes fell upon two bolts.

These he withdrew with nervous haste.

Then he attempted to pull the door open.

But in vain.

It still remained fast.

A closer search now showed him a keyhole, and, before he applied his picklock to it, he bethought himself of an expedient which would set all his doubts at rest.

Restoring his pistol to his pocket, he stooped down and applied his lips to the keyhole.

Then he spoke as follows—

"If there is anyone here in life who wishes to escape, and have uttered such dismal groans to attract attention, let him speak, for a friend is at hand who will lend him all the assistance in his power."

Blueskin had no sooner spoken than, with the utmost speed, he moved his mouth and placed his ear to the keyhole, in order to catch, with as much distinctness as possible, the reply to his words.

It came.

The voice was feeble, but Blueskin could catch the import of the words which were spoken.

"Mercy—mercy!" cried this voice, in gasping, wailing tones. "Have mercy upon me, and save me. Oh! have mercy upon me. Save me—save me from all the horrors of this dreadful place. You shall have gold—gold, if you will only save me."

"Patience," cried Blueskin, putting his mouth to the keyhole again, and speaking in an assuring tone of voice. "Have patience, and I will do my best to help you. I have been chased to this spot by my foes, but I heard your cries, and I will aid you. The door of the vault is strong, and seems well secured, so that I may be some time in making an entrance."

"I will be patient," said the voice; "but, oh! lose no more time than you can possibly help in freeing me from this place. You do not know the horrors of it. Quick, oh! quick."

"Patience."

"I am patient, but the vault is full of noisome reptiles, and I have great trouble in keeping off the rats—they swarm here. They surround me by thousands. I am already bleeding in many places from the wounds which their fangs have inflicted. Quick—oh! quick."

"I will be quick."

There could be no mistaking the tones of genuine horror with which these words were spoken by the living inmate of the tomb.

As Blueskin heard them he felt the blood curdle in his veins, and his breath came short and thick.

But he did not allow these emotions to interfere with his exertions to procure the prisoner's release.

He set about the task forthwith.

The first thing he did was to make a close inspection of the keyhole by means of his wax taper.

He found the lock to be a very good one, but still he did not despair of being able to shoot back the bolt with the picklock.

What he had already that night effected with this little instrument will suffice to show the reader that he was quite an expert in the use of it.

And so he was.

But, then, his expertness was the result of long practice. He inserted the same hooked piece of steel into the lock as he had made use of on former occasions.

The lock, however, appeared to have some intricate mechanism, or there was some peculiarity in its construction, for Blueskin, after repeated trials, could make no impression upon it.

And, during the time which elapsed while Blueskin was thus occupied, the occupant of the vault from time to time gave vent to the most doleful cries and lamentations.

It was in vain that Blueskin exhorted him to be patient, and explained the difficulties he had to contend with in opening the door.

"The rats!" was the shrieking response. "The rats! They grow bolder every moment. I cannot keep them off. They spring upon me in all directions. They tear my flesh. Off—off! I cannot keep them off."

"A little more patience," said Blueskin, who still persevered with the use of the picklock in spite of the frequent defeats. "A little more patience, and then all will be well."

With this small amount of consolation the prisoner had to be content.

Had he possessed at that moment anything else adapted to unfastening the lock, of course he would have made a trial of it, but he had not.

If the picklock failed utterly, he did not know what he should do.

But he had faith in it, and continued to work on.

He knew that the lock might baffle him to the last moment, and then fly back.

A bullet through the keyhole would, perhaps, have shattered the lock, so much as to make it possible to burst the door open; but Blueskin was afraid to adopt such a means as that, lest the sound should reach his enemies and guide them to the spot.

To his satisfaction, the crooked piece of steel at last caught in the bolt of the lock, and then a sudden twist of the wrist forced it back into its setting.

So far as the lock was concerned, the prisoner was free to emerge from the vault.

Blueskin said as much, and strove to push it open.

But it resisted all his efforts, and remained as immovable as a rock.

CHAPTER CCLIX.

BLUESKIN RESCUES THE STRANGER FROM THE VAULTS, AND HAS A CONTEST WITH THE RATS.

It was a minute or two before Blueskin could think what was the reason the door would not open, now that apparently all the fastenings were removed, and then, with a sudden rush, the idea came across him that the door opened outwardly into the passage, instead of inwardly into the vault, as he had first supposed.

To have this idea and to try whether it was correct seemed simultaneous occurrences, and they were nearly so.

He hooked the piece of steel in the keyhole, and then found that, as he pulled towards him, the door slowly creaked open upon its hinges.

From the impatience which the person who was the inmate of that vault had all along displayed to have the door opened and make his escape, Blueskin quite anticipated that he would make a sudden rush into the passage.

We say "he" because the tones of the voice were decidedly masculine.

But nothing of the sort took place.

All was still.

Not a sound—not a movement came from the interior of the vault.

As soon as he was cognizant of this, Blueskin carried his hand to his forehead, and those strange notions which had first seized upon his brain, when he heard the awful cry, returned with redoubled force.

What if, after all, he had been made the dupe of some horrible spectre, for whom those dark and pestiferous vaults were a congenial residence.

All that he had ever heard from time to time, and all the horrors that his own imagination supplied him with, rushed upon his brain, and, dizzy and sick, he once more leaned against the wall.

But he was aroused from this by a scuffling noise, and now and then a squeak.

Then the truth burst upon him at once.

"What a fool I am to stand here like this. I see it all now, and, owing to my folly, my services may turn out to be unavailing. The poor wretch is exhausted, and has doubtless sunk upon the ground—perhaps he has fainted with the joy of his release from such an awful place. That is the reason of the silence, and now the rats are banqueting upon him, while he is powerless to keep them off!"

As he spoke, Blueskin drew his sword, and rushed into the cell.

A scampering sound followed his appearance.

Then, holding the light above his head, he saw that rats, in countless numbers, were racing over the floor.

It was a large vault into which Blueskin had penetrated.

On all sides of him were coffins placed upon shelves ranged round the walls.

The floor of the vault was thickly covered with sawdust.

But it was not upon these objects that Blueskin's gaze rested.

He took a passing glance at them merely.

His principal attention—indeed, his whole attention was riveted upon the object which lay at his feet.

It was the body of a man.

But so disfigured, so torn, and in such a deplorable condition, that it was only by the looks of the general outline that it could be presumed to be such.

It was dappled in blood, which had soaked into the sawdust all round, and clotted together.

The man lay upon his side, and exhibited not the least traces of life or motion.

The rats, with which the vault appeared to be infested, beat a precipitate retreat as soon as our friend appeared with the light.

There was not one to be seen, though, doubtless, from some secure corner they were watching with their keen, bright eyes the doings of the intruder who had disturbed them from their feast.

Seeing this, Blueskin sheathed his sword, for he did not know when he entered whether he should have to fight a battle with these ferocious creatures.

But for the present they had beaten a retreat.

The little piece of wax taper which had been of such assistance to Blueskin in his explorations was now almost burnt out, so, before he did anything else, he took a new piece from his pocket, and, lighting it, threw the other piece away.

Then he stooped down, and proceeded to render the poor miserable-looking object all the assistance in his power.

An expression of loathing and disgust came over his face as he did so.

The horror of the spectacle before him was almost more than he could bear.

The body was that of a man about fifty years of age.

At least, Blueskin judged him to be so, from the fact that his hair was thin and white, and his face, where it was not clotted with blood, being wrinkled and sallow.

The clothing upon it was of an excellent material, but not such as would be worn by the highest in the land, for, in the times of which we write, a man's rank was tolerably well indicated by his dress.

But it was torn in many places, and from all those places where rents were visible blood was slowly oozing, and soaking into the sawdust.

The hands, too, were dreadfully torn—doubtless in his attempts to ward off the attacks of the rats. In fact, in some places the flesh had been stripped away, and the ghastly bones left bare.

It was a horrible spectacle.

"Is he dead?" asked Blueskin, in a strange, hollow whisper—"is he dead?"

He shrank for a moment from placing his hand upon the man's heart and ascertaining, but he overcame that feeling.

He felt it to be his duty to succour the unfortunate man to the best of his ability.

He would expect it were he in his place, and so our friend nerved himself to his disagreeable task.

If he had forsook him—if he left him to his fate—we should have ceased to feel that respect for him which we do at present.

The moment Blueskin touched the prostrate form, a faint moan came from the blood-stained lips.

"He lives," said Blueskin—"he lives!"

Existence certainly did seem to cling to the pained and emaciated carcass, but that might be a different thing to living.

Blueskin, however, considered it warranted him in taking measures for his recovery to consciousness.

Accordingly he took out a small bottle of rum, and, withdrawing the cork, allowed a considerable quantity to flow into the man's mouth, whom he turned over on his back in order to facilitate its passage down his throat.

The result was rather startling.

The man gasped for breath, and, by the light of the taper, Blueskin could see he was rapidly turning black in the face.

He, therefore, turned him over once more.

This produced a very violent fit of coughing, which Blueskin assisted by banging the unfortunate man upon his back.

But the result of all this was that the man recovered.

His mind wandered, for he only addressed Blueskin in an incoherent manner, and implored for mercy and help, while he fought numerous battles with legions of imaginary rats.

"He will never get better here," thought Blueskin. "I must get him out into the corridor. The air smells better and fresher than it is here. I must do it."

The task which Blueskin thus set himself was not a very pleasant one.

The appearance of the poor emaciated wretch was horrible to a degree.

Moreover, he was bleeding from many wounds.

But Blueskin did not shrink much.

Before lifting the body up, though, he plentifully sprinkled it with sawdust, of which there was such a plentiful supply on the floor of the vault.

This had the effect, not only of stanching the blood, but also of making the man somewhat more comfortable to handle.

But it added considerably to the grotesque hideousness of his appearance.

Having done this much, Blueskin stuck the piece of taper on the door-post, so that it shed a light partly into the vault, and partly into the corridor beyond. Then, lifting the almost insensible form, he carried it out into the passage.

But it would seem as though the rats had a strong objection to this proceeding on Blueskin's part.

They had submitted quietly enough to all his other movements, having a natural dread of him, but no sooner did he raise the body from the floor, than they every one seemed to be endowed with fresh courage, and they made an attack upon him.

Burdened as he was, Blueskin was unable to repel the assault with anything like effect.

He turned his attention to getting out of the cell as quickly as possible.

But this he found to be no easy matter.

From the floor, from the walls, from the ceiling, from every nook and corner of the place, the rats poured out in countless shoals.

They sprang upon Blueskin with surprising boldness, fastening their claws and fang-like teeth both in his flesh and wearing apparel.

He kicked with his feet, and kept them off as well as he could, but they returned undaunted to the attack.

They sprang, too, upon the unconscious body which Blueskin carried, and here they had their own way, for the unfortunate man could not defend himself in the slightest degree, though now and then a deep and hollow groan would come from his lips.

Blueskin was bewildered.

No doubt the secret of the rats making the attack they did upon him was in consequence of his having put down the light, for, while he held that in his hand, they had not offered to molest him.

Now they sprang at his face and neck, and inflicted sharp wounds upon him.

He made a sudden dash forward to leave the vault, his intention being to place the body on the floor of the passage, and then close the door of the vault quickly, so as to shut as many of the vermin as he could in it.

But, unfortunately for him, while passing through the doorway, he struck against the taper, which he had stuck against the post.

It fell to the ground, and in a moment all was darkness.

A curse came from Blueskin's lips at this unlucky accident, and a scream, which sounded like one of exultation, from the rats, who now renewed their attack with ten times more fierceness than before.

But Blueskin did not lose his presence of mind.

Despite the danger of his situation, he recollected what he had intended to do.

Quickly, then, he placed the body upon the floor of the passage, and, though it was so dark, he caught hold of the door of the vault and swung it shut.

A horrible squeaking arose, for several rats were jammed against the door-post.

Although the wax taper had fallen to the ground, and doubtless by this time was devoured, yet Blueskin had several others in his pocket.

So he produced them quickly, and soon had one lighted.

He drew his sword,

Of course, a great many rats had made their way through the doorway with him, and, rendered desperate by the attack which had been made upon them, no longer allowed the feeble gleam of the taper to dismay them, but presented a bold front.

One wave, however, of Blueskin's weapon did wonders in the shape of dispersing them.

At last he routed them altogether, and then he renewed his attentions to the wounded man.

The comparatively fresh air which filled the passage—fresh in comparison with the air in the vault—assisted very much to recover him, besides which, the stimulant which Blueskin had so unsparingly administered began to exert its effects.

In a little time he managed to sit up, and support his back against the wall.

Then he partook of some more spirit, and, opening his eyes, looked with an expression of intelligence into the face of his saviour.

He groaned now and then, for he evidently suffered much agony from the rat-bites he had received.

Blueskin could speak from experience as to their painful character.

But he thought not of himself.

He gave his undivided attention to the man he had rescued from the vault.

He every moment got better and better.

Blueskin spoke to him soothingly and cheerfully.

"Recover yourself as much as you can. You are saved."

"Saved?"

"Yes, saved from the vault. Saved from all the horrors of such a death as you were menaced with."

"Oh! Heaven, yes."

"Believe me, all is well."

"All?"

"Yes. I am but a poor fugitive, hunted by the minions of the law, but all that I can do for you I will. I was forced by my foes to seek shelter in this spot, and I heard your groans while hiding. You are saved, and, when you feel well enough to accompany me, I will do my best to lead you from this place."

"A thousand thanks!"

"You speak better than you did."

"Do I?"

"You do, indeed."

"I feel stronger."

"I rejoice to hear it."

"But oh! the anguish which I suffer from my wounds is almost more than I can bear"

"Have patience."

"I have."

"You have escaped by a hair's-breadth the most horrible death you can conceive, that of being eaten up alive."

"By rats?"

"Yes, by rats. I have had a serious battle with them, but in the end proved myself the conqueror. I have beaten them all off. But, come, are you now able to rise?"

"I think so, if you will assist me."

"Come, then."

CHAPTER CCLX.

BLUESKIN AND THE STRANGER ESCAPE FROM WESTMINSTER ABBEY, AND THE FORMER COMMITS A ROBBERY ON THE HIGHWAY.

BLUESKIN assisted his strange companion to his feet.

But it taxed his strength to the utmost to preserve an erect attitude, and he was forced to lean rather heavily upon our friend's arm.

"Take me from this place," he said—"oh, take me from this place! The very atmosphere here is full of horror. Take me from it. For the service you have rendered me you shall be well rewarded."

"I will not refuse your bounty," said Blueskin, "because, to be frank with you, it will be very acceptable to me. Still, I should like you to understand that I did not aid you merely from a calculation of receiving a reward for so doing."

"I know—I know."

"I was hunted to the death, and, as the only resource I had, sought shelter in this venerable pile. I gained a staircase, which led me to these vaults, and while exploring their gloomy recesses I heard a groan; at first I was terrified and full of fears, but I recovered myself, and—you know the rest."

"I do know the rest, my brave deliverer, and I can never recompense you for what you have done; without your interposition and aid, I should, by this time, have been a mangled corpse."

"Do not think of that. You have asked me to lead you from this place."

"Yes, oh! yes."

"I will try."

"Try?"

"Yes. Did I not tell you I had been hunted here?"

"You did."

"That argues, then, that I am a stranger here, which is just the fact of the case."

"I see."

"But I have reason to think that I have succeeded in throwing them altogether off the scent. Consequently my next proceeding will be to get out of this building."

"And you will let me accompany you?"

"Certainly."

"Then you shall name your own reward."

While speaking, the strangely assorted pair made their way along the passage leading to the bottom of the steps. It will be seen that Blueskin was very frank with this stranger.

But his reason was, he felt exceedingly curious to learn something of the history of this man he had rescued, and he thought candour would beget candour.

The stranger, however, never offered to say a word about himself.

Nor could Blueskin well ask him, considering the manner in which they had become acquainted.

He waited, for he was in hopes that ere long his curiosity would be gratified.

The top of the staircase was reached without the occurrence of any particular incident, the time being occupied in conversation of too unimportant a nature to be put before the reader.

Upon reaching the door leading into the Abbey, Blueskin unlocked it as he had done on the former occasion, and passed through.

They were now in the body of the building.

Morning was close at hand, and through the numerous windows there came faint beams of light, sufficient to enable our friends to see their way without the little wax taper, which he accordingly extinguished.

"We will get out, if we can, at the first door we come to," Blueskin said.

His companion assented.

Like most other places, the doors in Westminster Abbey were secured more against anyone entering than anyone leaving the building.

A lock was all that interposed, and Blueskin, having first reconnoitred through a side window, and ascertained that none of his enemies were about, pushed the bolt of the lock back with so little trouble that his strange companion was scarcely aware of what had been done.

The fresh, cool, morning air blew gratefully upon their faces, and did a great deal towards thoroughly reviving the wounded man.

But he presented a terrible spectacle.

He was covered with sawdust coagulated with blood, or where it was not stained with the ensanguined fluid, the white showed out in all the more horrible contrast.

Blood was flowing, too, from all parts of his body, and his clothing was torn to shreds.

Such was the singular-looking object which emerged with Blueskin into the light of day from the vaults of Westminster Abbey.

The stranger, whoever he might be, was in a most deplorable state of weakness, and Blueskin felt that he should have to support him to whatever place he was going, for he could not have walked unaided.

But how could Blueskin go with him without incurring the utmost danger?

Even at that early hour people would be abroad, and curiosity would be excited the moment they caught sight of the bleeding blood-stained object by the side of which Blueskin walked.

The latter was, of course, in great dread of detection, and was obliged to be exceedingly careful how he showed himself.

And yet Blueskin did not like to mention this

But the stranger thought of it.
 "Did you not tell me," he said, "that you were hunted by the myrmidons of the law?"

"Yes."

"Is it not, then, very injudicious of you to show yourself in broad daylight?"

"It is, very."

"How do you know where the officers are searching for you?"

"I cannot tell."

"I see we must part. I will never consent to bringing you into trouble. You have done me good service, and I am grateful to you for it. I cannot consent to your accompanying me any further. Leave me here; I shall soon get assistance."

"I cannot leave you."

"Why not?"

"You are unfit to be left. But I have a thought."

"A thought?"

"Yes. You doubtless have some place to which you wish to go. Is it not so?"

"Yes."

"Then I will hail a hackney-coach, and you can direct the man to drive you wherever you think proper."

"Many thanks."

"Does that arrangement suit you?"

"Admirably."

"Good, then. We have not far to go before we come to a stand for hackney carriages. There we can hire one."

"Thanks; and now, as we go along, I will tell you that which doubtless you are very curious to know. You have not said so, but I guess it. You wonder how I came to be in the vaults as you found me."

"I have wondered."

"Then I will tell you. At least, all that I am allowed to tell you, for there is much which involves others besides myself, and therefore I am obliged to keep silent on those heads. But, as I said before, I will satisfy your curiosity by telling you all that I dare tell you."

"Do not put yourself to any inconvenience on that account," said Blueskin. "You need not tell me anything. It is by no means compulsory for you to do so. As I say, the circumstances under which I found you have aroused my curiosity and wonder to the highest degree."

"You shall be satisfied—to some extent, at any rate. You would like to know how I, a living man, came to be an inmate, or rather prisoner, in one of the vaults below the old Abbey of Westminster."

"Just so."

"I am the victim of a plot—one of the foulest plots that one human being ever concocted against another."

Blueskin remained silent, and waited for the stranger to proceed.

"I have a foe," he said. "A bitter, uncompromising enemy. Under what circumstances I incurred his resentment does not matter. Let it suffice it is so. He swore to have his revenge upon me."

"Ay—ay."

"It was only indirectly that I heard this. Personally to my face, I mean—he seemed my best friend. We were always friendly together, and I never perceived the least malice in his words or actions, so that, naturally enough, I refused to believe what had been told me concerning his words when I was not present. I disregarded them altogether. Now I find how wrong I was to do so."

Blueskin was deeply interested.

"I am all attention," he said.

"This seeming friend of mine, but bitter foe as he was in reality, continued on the most intimate and friendly terms with me. He had a reason for that. It was that he could lull me into a false security, dissipate my suspicions, and so be all the easier able to achieve his revenge. I will tell you what he did."

The stranger paused, for he found the effort to speak a painful and difficult one; however, he did not wait long, but continued:

"I see, now," he said, looking around him, "that another day has just dawned. I have, then, been upwards of twenty-four hours an inmate of that vault in which you found me—how much longer, I cannot tell. I seem to have been there an age. But let that pass. Yonder is the stand for the hackney coaches, is there not?"

"Yes."

"I must be quick, then."

While this little conversation was proceeding, the strangely-assorted pair made their way from the Abbey to that street leading from Westminster Bridge to St. James's Park, and where there was, as there is now, a long rank of hackney carriages waiting for hire.

In a more rapid voice, the stranger continued:

"This false friend of mine, against whom I had scarcely any suspicion, despite the cautions which had been whispered in my ears, invited me out with him upon a rather peculiar errand."

"I consented, and accompanied him."

"That errand was to the vaults beneath Westminster Abbey."

"My enemy is a man sprung from a goodly stock. For centuries has that vault in which I was made a prisoner been the receptacle of his ancestors' remains."

"The excuse that he made for his visit to this strange place was that he required to look at the inscription upon one of the coffins for an important purpose, and he wished me to accompany him, because it was necessary he should have a witness, and he selected me, so he said, because he felt that I was the only one of all his numerous friends in whom he could put trust."

"Indeed?"

"Yes, that was the specious plea with which he deluded me. I fell headlong and blindly into the snare thus artfully laid for me. I consented to accompany him in the capacity of witness of what took place."

"We entered the Abbey together, and then, without having any of the officials of the building for his guide, he led me down a flight of steep stone steps."

"He was provided with a small lantern, which he illuminated."

"In this way we descended the steps, and presently gained a narrow stone passage, on both sides of which were numerous iron doors, which he told me opened into the various vaults."

"At length we paused before one of the doors, and he intimated to me that we had reached the end of our journey."

"At the same time he handed me the lantern, and requested me to hold it while he felt in his pocket for the key of the vault."

"Of course I complied with his request, and took the lantern."

"After a brief search he produced the key, and fitting it into the keyhole, turned it back in the lock."

"My teeth chattered, and I felt a deadly chilliness all over me, mingled with the apprehension that some dreadful thing was about to happen."

"But I attributed this feeling to the different objects with which I was surrounded—I conceived that the nature of the place I was in would produce such a sensation as I have described."

"My treacherous friend swung the door open, and stood aside a little."

"Having the light, I supposed he wanted me to enter first, so I crossed the threshold without hesitation, in the full anticipation that he was about to follow me."

"And to a certain extent he did so."

"But no sooner did he find that I fairly stood within the vault than, springing back, he closed the door with a clang, leaving me inside."

"He was easily able to do this, for he had never let go of the key—that key which the next moment I heard turned round in the lock and the bolt shot."

"I was indeed a prisoner."

"At first I could not believe the reality of what had taken place, it seemed too horrible, but the sawdust on the floor, the coffins in the niches, and, above all, the voice of my foe, were too real for doubt to any longer hold a place within my bosom."

"Then I thought it was merely a trick he was playing me in order to test my courage, but when I heard the words he spoke to me, that idea, like the preceding one, was dissipated."

"So changed was his voice that I scarcely recognised it—it seemed like the voice of a fiend."

"He had, I fancy, stooped until his mouth was on a level with the keyhole, and it was through this orifice that the sound came."

"Then he poured into my ears a long history, and concluded with saying that I was now past all human hope."

[JACK SHEPPARD AND EDGORTH BESS ARE ATTACKED BY THE THAMES PIRATES.]

that I must die in that vault a lingering death of starvation, that it would be in vain for me to shriek and cry for help, because no human ears would hear my cries, as those vaults were very rarely used or visited. He told me that I was already dead, that his revenge was accomplished, and he left me to my fate.

"In vain I shrieked and implored his mercy. I supplicated him and used every argument which I thought would induce him to set me at liberty. But all in vain, he answered me only with a mocking laugh, which chilled the life blood of my veins when I heard it, and then he strode away along the passage.

"I listened to the sound of his retreating footsteps until, though I strained my hearing to the utmost, I could hear them no longer. I need not describe my sufferings—they were horrible. You have already seen a part; providence, however, interposed and prevented the consummation of so much villainy. You are the instrument of that mysterious power, and I have escaped the most awful of all deaths."

CHAPTER CCLXI.

BLUESKIN DETERMINES TO MAKE AN EXCURSION UPON THE HIGHWAY.

As the stranger uttered the words with which the last chapter concluded, he paused.

The stand for hackney carriages was reached.

He panted for breath, and he wiped the perspiration from his face.

It stood upon it in huge clustering beads.

To the extraordinary narrative he had just related, Blueskin listened with an all-absorbing interest.

It seemed to lift him, so to speak, above his own troubles, and produced that effect upon his mind which a romance will at times produce.

And, indeed, the story was well calculated to produce such an effect upon any one who listened to it.

It possessed all the elements needed in a relation of any wild and wonderful adventure.

Moreover, Blueskin had the advantage of hearing the words from the lips of the man himself.

"We are at our destination now," he said, "and I must bid you farewell."

"Farewell," said the stranger.

"Shall I call a coach?"

"If you do not mind the trouble."

Blueskin held up his hand and beckoned one of the drivers, who were all on the alert for a fare.

"I need not prolong my painful story," continued the stranger. "You must have already heard enough to make you comprehend the circumstances under which I became a tenant of that living tomb. The next important event was my liberation by yourself, for which I shall never be able to be sufficiently grateful."

"Do not mention that," said Blueskin, "for I cannot see that I have done anything so deserving of your gratitude. Chance alone took me to those vaults, and it was simply a duty to release you."

"I like the spirit in which you look at the affair. And, now, one word before we part."

"Willingly," said Blueskin, but, as he spoke, he cast an uneasy glance around, for it was getting light now with extreme rapidity, and he did not know what prying eye might be fixed upon him and observing all his actions.

The stranger noticed the look.

"I will not keep you. In the first place, here is a small purse, containing the bulk of the money I have about me. Take it, I pray you, and use it in the manner you may consider most to your advantage."

Speaking these words, the stranger took a small leather pocket-book from his pocket, and, thrusting it into his hand, entered the hackney-carriage and ordered the coachman to drive on, thus not affording Blueskin an opportunity of refusing to receive his bounty.

Our old friend stood on the footpath and watched the crazy vehicle take its way up the street in the direction of Whitehall.

He turned away then, and with a confused feeling about his brain, muttered—

"What a strange adventure. I cannot banish the incidents from my mind, and somehow I feel a presentiment that sooner or later I shall hear something more about it. Surely, never in the pages of old romance is anything so strange to be found. Upon what a mere chance depended his liberation from the vault! Had I not been in a manner of speaking forced to take shelter there, he would have remained its tenant still, and then, some many years hence, when the vault was opened, the curiosity of the public would have been aroused by the discovery of a skeleton in it; but there would have been nothing left to tell the tale!"

Blueskin once more looked around him.

The sun was already high in the heavens, and many people were astir.

"I must direct my thoughts to my own safety," he said. "This money reaches my hands most fortunately, for I have much need of it. Where shall I find Jack and poor Edgworth Bess? Can it be possible they have fallen into the hands of the arch fiend, Jonathan Wild, who haunts us like some ferocious animal to the death. Where shall I look for them?"

That was a question to which it was not a very easy matter to frame a reply.

"It is a forlorn hope," continued Blueskin, "but it is the only one. I must go down to the river bank where I last left them, and see if there now remains any traces of their presence."

Having come to the determination of doing something, Blueskin felt much lighter at heart, and with something of his ordinary spirit he directed his steps towards the river's side.

He made his approach carefully, however, for he was not without the reasonable dread that some of his enemies or Jonathan Wild's spies were about.

Blueskin was always uneasy upon that subject.

The few remarks he made to Ross, the landlord, will enable the reader to understand the state of his mind.

The conviction had laid hold of him that the thief-taker had got up some elaborate system of watching.

He fancied that every movement he made was noticed by some one.

If it was not so, how could the thief-taker so often and so correctly arrive at his precise hiding-place.

It was a very disagreeable feeling to have, and even at that moment Blueskin could not divest himself of the idea that unfriendly eyes were upon him.

That, however, might have been fancy merely.

He made, however, a considerable detour, leaving Westminster Abbey on his left, and gained the banks of the Thames, somewhere about the spot where Vauxhall Bridge now stands.

Having done this, he walked along close to the water's edge.

The tide was out, and on the muddy shore were several people, all searching in the soft ooze for anything that might be of the slightest value.

From these Blueskin took a hint.

He determined to make his way along, pretending to do as they did.

The plan was a good one, and well calculated to deceive any one who was on the watch for him.

And, as the reader is well aware, there were spies of Jonathan Wild's looking very close after him indeed.

In this way Blueskin advanced, though somewhat slowly, until he reached the identical spot where he had landed.

He recognised it again instantly, and was sure he had made no mistake.

He was not without the faint lingering hope that he might find Jack Sheppard and his companion waiting for him.

He thought they might have been compelled to push off, but, if so, he fancied they would not give him up without, at least, an effort to regain him.

Jack might easily contrive, he thought, to keep the boat hovering somewhere about that spot, and have kept a sharp look out for him.

And this is, doubtless, the very course which Jack would have adopted had circumstances permitted him to do so, but we must leave that point until we can turn our attention exclusively to him.

In the meantime we have to deal with Blueskin.

He stood upright, then, and, shading his eyes with his hand, looked long and earnestly at the different craft upon the river.

The sun was shining brightly upon the water, the surface of which was broken up into numberless wavelets, the crests of every one of which reflected his beams brightly, and made the bosom of the Thames appear as though studded with diamonds.

But, however beautiful a spectacle this might have presented to an ardent admirer of nature, it had a great disadvantage so far as Blueskin was concerned.

It prevented him seeing distinctly.

But nowhere upon the sparkling surface could he distinguish that which he so much longed to see.

In vain he turned his eyes round and round, and looked in every direction, not a trace of the treasure-laden wherry could he see.

At length, with an aching at the heart, a choking sensation in his throat, and the dread that some gigantic evil had happened, he turned away.

Where should he go next?

What should he do?

Those were the questions which Blueskin asked himself, as satisfied that Jack and Edgworth Bess were not upon the river, he turned away.

He was badly situated to search for the missing ones since he was every moment in dread of capture.

But find them he must, no matter how great the risk.

With a slow step he walked across the muddy shore of the river in the direction of Westminster.

The idea in his mind was, that Jonathan Wild had managed to surprise and capture them while they sat in the boat.

At that moment he thought they might be prisoners in the dungeons beneath Wild's house.

But how was he to ascertain that?

He could not walk to the thief-taker's residence and ask the question.

In the first place, however, he made up his mind that he would go somewhere and obtain a thorough change of clothing.

After that he would get a meal somewhere, for he could feel himself sick and giddy for want of food.

In Westminster, clothes' shops are to be found in plenty, so he did not have far to go to find what he wanted.

Entering the shop, he chose a suit of plain-looking clothes, and obtained permission to go into a room and attire himself in them.

When he emerged there was a great difference perceptible and a decided improvement.

He paid the clothes' salesman from the purse which he had just had given him.

Blueskin's next visit was to a coffee shop close by, where he made a hearty but homely meal, which did him a world of good and refreshed him mightily.

"I will get a bed here," he thought. "I am much in need of sleep, and if I show myself by daylight I am liable to immediate discovery. I will wait till night, and then I will see whether I cannot find a clue to their whereabouts."

This was as prudent and sensible a course as he could well adopt.

Upon inquiry he found he could lie down for a few hours, and accordingly he was shown to a tolerably comfortable room.

Here he enjoyed a rest, and remained until dusk.

He did not wake up, in fact, until the different objects in the room were beginning to get confused by the approaching darkness.

He sprang to his feet, feeling more like himself than he had done for a long time.

He was rested both bodily and mentally.

Before he left the bed-room he washed himself plentifully in cold water, which invigorated him still more.

Then he descended, paid the money he owed, and left the house.

He had met with no disturbance yet of any kind, and therefore he very justly came to the conclusion that he had not been seen by any of Wild's spies, and he had only to continue cautious and all would be well.

The first place to which Blueskin now directed his footsteps was, as the reader will guess, Jonathan Wild's house in Newgate-street.

It was quite dark when he reached it.

He stood on the opposite side of the street and glanced up at the gloomy dilapidated residence.

As usual, not a ray of light came from one of the small and dust-begrimed windows, so that a passer-by would have come to the conclusion that the dwelling was untenanted.

There was nothing to be gleaned from the front of Wild's house.

But while he thus stood in front of that much-dreaded abode, he saw the door open.

Instinctively Blueskin drew back into the shadow of a deep doorway, which fortunately happened to be just behind him.

Upon the threshold appeared three forms, which, even in the distance and obscurity, Blueskin easily recognized.

One was Jonathan Wild himself.

His bulky-looking figure could not be mistaken.

The other his son George, about whose return Blueskin knew nothing, and who consequently was much surprised to see him there, and apparently on the most friendly terms with the thief-taker.

The third person was Quilt Arnold, who was now made much of by Wild, and considered second in command to himself.

"They don't come," Blueskin heard Jonathan say in his deep growling tones. "What's the reason they don't come?"

"They will be here in a minute, if you please, sir," said Quilt Arnold, respectfully.

At this moment the clattering of horses' hoofs arose clearly upon the night air.

Each moment the sound increased in loudness.

Then, with a sudden dash, a troop of horsemen, about twelve in number, pulled up with a dash before Wild's house.

There were two horses without riders.

Then Blueskin became aware that the thief-taker was about to set out upon one of his night excursions.

What was the object of it, however, he could not tell.

Jonathan and his son both came out, and mounted the two horses provided for them.

"Are you all here?" asked Wild, turning round.

"All."

"Forward, then; follow me. And recollect this. There is twenty pounds apiece for every one of you if you succeed in capturing them to-night. Twenty pounds each. Forward."

With a rush, Jonathan Wild and his band swept by.

They went in the direction of St. Martin's-le-Grand.

Blueskin followed them on foot as well as he was able, and saw them turn to the left up Aldersgate-street.

"What can that be?" he said. "Surely they cannot be prisoners, for who else is there that Jonathan would offer his men twenty pounds for the capture of? No, it must be Jack Sheppard and Edgeworth Bess. They have, by some means or other, eluded them, and at this moment may be in a place of tolerable security. What shall I do? Get a horse and follow Wild. I should think that will be best. He may know just where they are, and then I shall be at hand to lend them my assistance in the hour of need."

CHAPTER CCLXII.

BLUESKIN STOPS A POST-CHAISE, AND HAS A STRANGE ADVENTURE.

QUITE a gush of joy came over Blueskin's heart at this proof, for so he considered it, that Jack Sheppard and Edgeworth Bess were not prisoners in Wild's house.

The thief-taker and his band went onwards at a fast trot, and for Blueskin to have attempted to follow them on foot would have been simply ridiculous.

As it was, they were already almost out of sight.

This would not do.

He must keep close behind them, because, in all probability, they would guide him to the exact spot where the heiress and her protector now were.

To save them from capture, too, he must be close behind Wild and his band.

The necessity of having a horse was quite manifest.

Then Blueskin remembered that in St. Martin's-le-Grand was a livery stable, where perhaps he might hire a steed.

He went and tried.

He was answered in the affirmative, and though there was no time lost in getting the horse ready, yet it took a considerable time before he was ready.

On emerging into the high-road, not the least sound could be heard of Wild and his band.

At this, however, Blueskin was scarcely surprised, because, as he very well knew, they had been long enough to go some distance.

Plunging his spurs into his horse's sides, he set forward at a gallop.

The horse appeared to be a good one, and got over the ground in capital style.

That he was fast gaining upon those of whom he was in pursuit, Blueskin was certain, and every now and then he would pause and listen if any sounds of their horses' hoofs reached his ears.

But all was still.

Blueskin kept to the high-road, and it was not until he had gone nearly ten miles that the thought occurred to him that he might have passed Wild and his men, in consequence of their having taken some cross country road.

He was quite angry with himself to think he had come on so blindly as he had.

Still he did not feel inclined to turn back. After all, considering the start they had, the janizaries might be on the road before him.

How was he to ascertain this?

He made up his mind to stop the next passenger or vehicle he might meet and question them.

Scarcely had he made up his mind to this effect than, before him in the darkness and distance, he saw two faint twinkling lights, looking no larger and no brighter than stars.

"A vehicle," he said. "Now I shall know. Doubtless, those who occupy it have come some distance along the road, and they will be able to tell me whether they have passed a band of twelve or fourteen mounted men."

With a better spirit, Blueskin now trotted forward to meet the approaching vehicle, and, before long, he could hear the grinding of its wheels upon the road.

The lights, too, which proceeded from the lamps on either side of it grew much brighter.

At length he could distinguish the horses which were harnessed to it.

"Hoy!" he cried, in a loud voice. "Hoy! stop."

The driver, hearing these cries, so far from complying with them, only lashed his horse to make him go the faster, and he also took care to hold the whip in an aggressive sort of way, as though he would strike any one with it who attempted to impede his progress.

But Blueskin was not to be balked thus.

Turning his horse round, he galloped along by the side of the vehicle, which he now saw was a post-chaise, and cried—

"Halt—halt, I say. I want to speak to you."

But the driver took no more notice of this appeal than he did of the former one. If anything, he lashed the horses faster.

Blueskin was now by the side of the chaise, and his ears were saluted with another sound which reached his plainly above the trampling of the horses' feet and the grinding of the carriage wheels.

It was some one in a faint, smothered sort of voice crying for help.

This, coupled with the behaviour of the driver, made Blueskin feel certain that something wrong was going on, and he determined to put a stop to it if possible.

His nature would not have permitted him to go by.

"Halt," he cried again, still galloping by the side of the chaise. "Halt, I say, or, if you do not, you are a dead man."

Still no notice was taken.

Provoked by this behaviour, Blueskin drew a pistol and fired it over the coachman's head.

He was rather surprised by the result.

The man uttered a dismal howl, and fell off his seat at once.

By a sudden movement, and an exertion of the great strength which he possessed, Blueskin grasped the reins of the horse on the off-side, and turned his head round.

The effect of this was to stop the chaise at once.

At this moment the window was let down violently from the inside, and a voice, furious with passion, cried out—

"What's all this? Drive on, coachman. Drive on. Don't stop for anything. Drive on, I say."

"He is past that, I fancy," said Blueskin, trotting up.

"Ah! a highwayman!" cried the voice at the chaise window. "Take that."

Bang went a pistol, and Blueskin felt something hot fly past his cheek.

He was safe from that shot at least.

With all the coolness in the world he pulled a pistol from his pocket, and, cocking it, presented it full at the face of the man inside the chaise who had fired.

He shrank back.

Blueskin saw his advantage.

In another second he was at the window.

The man shrank still further back, until he sat down upon the seat.

Blueskin projected the pistol into the chaise until he could almost touch him with the muzzle of it.

"Now, sir," he said, "another word, another movement, and I will scatter your brains for you. I cannot possibly miss such a good aim."

The face of the man turned a shade whiter, whether with rage or fear is not certain. Perhaps the effect was produced by a combination of the two.

Blueskin's tone of voice and the expression of his face let him know he had got a man to deal with who would stand no trifling.

The same muffled voice again smote upon our friend's ear, and, looking in the direction from which the voice proceeded, he saw, huddled up into a corner, something which his vision, assisted by his imagination, made him think was a woman.

He opened the door of the chaise, and said—

"If, as I suspect, there is some one in here against their will, come out—be free."

An uneasy movement followed these words, but the huddled-up figure got no nearer to the door.

"She must be securely bound and unable to move," thought Blueskin.

He changed his pistol from his right to his left hand, and then, leaning as far as he could into the carriage, caught hold of the dusky-looking figure.

He had to put forth considerable strength to move it, for it seemed to him to have no powers of volition of its own.

However, he managed to drag it towards the door of the chaise.

The man now roused himself so far as to attempt an interference, but he was promptly checked by Blueskin showing him the pistol.

Our friend was now quite sure that the huddled-up figure was a female.

She appeared to be tied both hand and foot.

Round her head and covering her mouth was a thick black scarf.

This was not tied so tightly as to impede her breathing, or even altogether to stop her speech, for she could speak in a muffled tone.

Blueskin encircled this form (which from its slenderness must surely have been that of some young girl) with his arm, and gently drew her up on to the saddle with him.

But he soon found he was unable to keep her in this position, and at the same time maintain his influence over the man, so he was compelled to let her slip to the ground, which he did in the gentlest manner he possibly could.

He next dismounted himself, and proceeding at once to the chaise door, he compelled the man who was inside to alight.

He was evidently a coward, and destitute of all spirit to defend himself, or he would never have submitted to Blueskin in the way he did.

But that is no more than any one might expect, for who but a dastardly coward would bind a young girl as he had done, and force her to accompany him against her will.

The threat of a bullet seemed to have a powerful influence upon him.

With great speed and dexterity our old friend removed the scarf from around the lady's head and face.

He found it was of black silk, and of tolerable length.

It was just the thing he wanted.

Before the abductor of the young girl was exactly aware of what he was about, Blueskin had formed a slip-knot in one end of the scarf, and thrown it over his head.

He drew it until it fitted just tightly round his neck.

This done, Blueskin secured the other end to one of the spokes in the hind wheel of the post-chaise.

To be sure, the man could have released himself by untying one of the knots, but that was a work of time, and before he could succeed in doing that, Blueskin would be ready for him.

Our old friend would have taken more pains to bind him, but that the condition of the young girl attracted all his attention.

She seemed to have fallen into a swoon.

Moreover, now that the scarf was removed, the light of the carriage-lamps shone full upon her face, and showed it to be one of rare beauty.

She was young, too.

It was not in human nature not to feel interested in such charms.

Therefore he left the man as we have shown, and turned his attention to recovering her.

The only means he had at his command were such as a pocket-flask of spirit afforded him.

A small quantity of this he poured into her mouth, and also chafed her hands and temples with it.

He was soon rewarded for his trouble by seeing her open her eyes and look around her.

The swoon was not a very serious one, and she did not relapse.

She was still bound, so Blueskin hastened to release her.

In a feeble voice, then, for she seemed greatly exhausted, she spoke.

"Help—help!" she cried. "Save me—oh! save me from him—that dreadful man! Oh! I pray you save me from him!"

"Be under no apprehensions on that head," said Blueskin, soothingly. "You can rely upon my protecting you from him. It is beyond his power to harm you now."

The poor girl murmured her thanks, and Blueskin assisted her to rise to her feet.

He then had a better opportunity of observing her.

She was clad in plain-looking apparel—such as denoted her position in life to be the reverse of exalted.

But her face!

"That was indeed most beautiful, and Blueskin, as he gazed upon it, felt charmed, and he mentally determined to be her champion, and place her somewhere in security. He wondered, too, how any one could be found who was willing to inflict injuries of any kind upon such a beautiful creature.

But the man who had to all appearances carried her off, looked just such a being as would exult in the destruction of anything beautiful.

The contrast between the two was striking in the extreme.

"What can I do for you?" asked Blueskin, as he supported the trembling form of the girl with his arm. "I should not have known anything amiss was going on had it not been that I wished to ask the coachman a simple question as to whether he had passed a troop of horsemen who I fancied were on the road before me."

The man ground his teeth with impotent rage when he heard this.

Blueskin continued.

"It was the behaviour of the driver which excited my suspicions. Instead of pulling up to answer me, as in common courtesy he might have done, he lashed on to the horses to make them go faster, and then, amidst the din, I heard a faint muffled voice call for help."

"That was me."

"I thought so. The rest you already know."

"I do, indeed, know it, and I shall never be able to be sufficiently grateful to you for what you have done. Give me something to do which will prove my gratitude, and see how readily and how gladly I will do it."

These simple words were uttered with an impressive earnestness, that left no doubts as to the sincerity of the speaker.

"You have saved me from a dreadful fate," she said. "A fate to me ten times more horrible than death in its most hideous and revolting form. Oh! sir, I cannot thank you."

"You have done so," said Blueskin. "You have thanked me more than I deserve."

"No—no."

"I say, yes. I did but do my duty as a man, and act in the manner my inclination prompted me. Say no more upon the point of thanks, I beg you."

"You are unkind."

"How so?"

"You will not give me the opportunity of expressing my feelings."

"I can fully comprehend them. Believe me, I would much rather you told me, with as much haste as possible, what I can do to still further assist you."

"I cannot trespass any further upon you. Doubtless, you have other matters of your own."

"No more—no more," said Blueskin. "I cannot leave you on the high-road like this. I should be unworthy of the name of man were I to do so. You must tell me of some place where you will be secure, and I will take you there."

"I have friends in London," said the young girl.

"Then I will take you there. But, stay a moment," he added, when he saw she was about to speak. "We will dispose of the gentleman first."

"No—no," vociferated the man who was tied to the wheel, and who, by his dress, could claim the title Blueskin had applied to him. "No—no. Leave me be, or you may suffer for it."

"Do what?"

"Suffer."

"Bah."

CHAPTER CCLXIII.

BLUESKIN INFLECTS UPON AN INFAMOUS VILLAIN A WELL-DESERVED CHASTISEMENT, AND TAKES THE YOUNG GIRL TO A PLACE OF SAFETY.

WITH this contemptuous exclamation on his lips, Blueskin left the young girl's side and advanced towards him.

The cowardly fellow crouched down when he saw our friend approach him.

"No—no," he said. "Spare me—spare me. Keep off."

"Spare you? Yes, so I will when I have punished you in the manner you deserve, but not before."

"Mercy—mercy."

"How can you expect me to listen to such a plea when coming from your lips—you who have turned a deaf ear to the words of this young girl when she addressed the same supplication to you?"

The man was silent.

"I will punish you—not as you deserve to be punished—but I promise myself you shall have an instalment of what is due to you."

"No—no. Keep your hands off me. Keep them off, I say. What have I done that you should touch me? I don't want the girl. It isn't me. I am only acting under orders."

"Under orders?"

"Yes."

"What do you mean by that?"

"Simply what I say."

"That you are obeying the commands of another?"

"Exactly."

"That you have been mean-spirited and base enough to become the panderer to the lusts of some greater villain than yourself?"

The man was again silent.

"If so, then there is all the less excuse for you, and the crime you have committed all the more unnatural. You have no excuse whatever."

"Who wants an excuse?" said the man, endeavouring to pluck up a spirit.

"Why you want an excuse," said Blueskin, "and badly, too. But I can tell you beforehand, you will not be able to find one that will satisfy you. No, villain, you shall receive the reward your conduct so richly merits."

Thus speaking, Blueskin took from his pocket a piece of strong twine, and with this, under threats of immediate death if he resisted, he bound the man's hands together behind his back.

The mean-spirited wretch glared at Blueskin with the utmost dismay. He had no idea for what kind of fate he was intended, and was apprehensive accordingly.

Blueskin did not keep him long in suspense.

Having made him thus secure, he mounted to the driver's seat, and took the long horsewhip from its socket.

He gave it a preliminary swish in the air, which sounded most unpleasantly in the man's ear, and caused every hair upon his head to bristle up with anticipated torture.

Again and again did Blueskin crack the whip, so as to get used to the feel of it in his hand, and so as to be able to use it with the utmost advantage.

Each time the man gave a sympathetic start, and in imagination he almost felt the pain which the blow would produce.

"Now then," said Blueskin, "you shall have some idea of what retribution is, and I hope the punishment I am about to inflict will make you hesitate before you attempt the abduction of another girl."

A dismal howl followed these words.

Blueskin swung the whip round his head.

It was one of first-rate quality.

Crack it came down upon the man—crack—crack—each blow coming with greater speed and force than its predecessor.

His cries were terrible.

He writhed about like a serpent, but all in vain.

He tugged at the scarf round his neck until he had pulled it so tight that he was all but strangled.

Maddened with the pain, however, he gave yet another snatch, and then the knot gave way, and he fell with his face on to the ground.

But Blueskin's blood was up, and he felt he had by no means done with him yet.

Our friend's indignation knew no bounds, and he could think of no fate bad enough for such a wretch.

When he fell, therefore, he continued to rain blows upon him.

Shrieking with pain, the man started to his feet.

A cut with the whip, however, dexterously applied, sent him down upon his knees.

Another made him start up again.

Then he set off at full speed, with Blueskin after him, who never thought of giving up the chase.

But he was no match for the man in fleetness of foot.

Besides, there was this difference, he was flying from unendurable torment, and he knew that the only means by which he could escape would be by using some extraordinary exertions.

Away, then, he went, bounding over the roadway like a hunted hare.

Blueskin kept well behind him, swinging the whip all the time, and, when he could, administering a cut.

Suddenly, however, the man lost his footing, and, with a loud yell, fell with a tremendous splash into a stagnant ditch.

Then Blueskin thought he had had enough, and he returned to the coach.

He found the young girl waiting for him, with her hands clasped in an agony of terror.

"Fear nothing," said Blueskin, "fear nothing. I have punished the scoundrel in a manner he richly deserves and will not easily forget. Now, tell me, what I can do for you. I am entirely at your service, and determined not to leave you until I have seen you disposed in some place of security."

The girl burst into tears.

"You are very good," she said, "and very kind. How am I to recompense you?"

"Say nothing at all about it. Let me assist you into the chaise. There—sit down; you will be more comfortable now."

As he spoke, Blueskin handed the young girl into the chaise again.

"And you," she said. "What will you do?"

"I will find the coachman. He is somewhere close at hand, and he will drive us to London. I shall not leave you until assured that you are in safety."

"You are very kind," said the young girl, her tears flowing afresh.

But Blueskin did not wait to hear what she said.

He busied himself in looking for the driver.

That he was unhurt, with the exception of such injuries as he might have received in falling from his seat, he felt certain.

When he fired, he had aimed at a spot many feet above his head.

He had, doubtless, fallen from cowardice merely.

Such was the case.

Blueskin looked about the spot where he had fallen, but he had disappeared.

Perhaps crawled a little way, and hid himself under the hedge.

Raising his voice to its highest pitch, Blueskin shouted—

"Coachman, come this way and drive us to town. If you refuse you are a dead man. I will count three, and then, if you do not come towards me, I will fire. One—two—"

"Stop—stop! Mercy—don't fire! Don't. I am here, good sir—I am here! Don't fire!"

From under the hedge on one side of the road there crawled a human figure, which, when it stood up to its full height, Blueskin recognised as being that of the coachman.

Trembling in every limb, he came towards Blueskin, who said—

"Mount—mount, I say, at once, and drive us to London. I will give you the address presently."

"Oh! yes; very good, sir; oh! yes. I will drive you where you like, but spare my life—oh! do spare it!"

"Your life is spared," said Blueskin, "provided you at once, and without the slightest hesitation, obey all commands."

"I will obey them all, sir."

"Mount, then."

The coachman had been making abortive attempts to ascend to his box while this little dialogue was going on, but he trembled so excessively that he found it impossible.

Blueskin touched him up with the whip

That made a wonderful difference.

He clambered up somehow when that little incentive was behind him.

Then took the reins in his hands.

Blueskin, having succeeded so far, tied his own horse to the back of the post-chaise, so that he could run after it.

This done, he entered the vehicle himself, and sat down on the seat opposite to that which was occupied by the young girl, and told the coachman to drive on.

He obeyed the order at once, and, in a little while, he recovered from his trepidation, when he found that no harm was intended him if he only drove properly.

"And now," said Blueskin, after a few minutes' pause, "now that all is well so far, tell me, if you will, how it is I found you here in the condition I did."

"I will, sir; for at least you have a right to claim that at my hands. I am the only daughter of poor but honest parents, who died shortly after my birth, leaving me in the wide world alone."

Blueskin was instantly interested.

"As soon as I was able, I began to earn my own living, and continued to do so up to the present time. I lived at a little village near Hertford, and the means by which I gained my bread was by plaiting straw ready for the use of the manufactory."

Blueskin nodded.

"I lived in a cottage with a poor family, who all earned their living in the same manner, and with our united gains we were nearly always able to keep ourselves supplied with the necessities of life."

"It was our custom always to sit outside the cottage, and as we worked we could see the passengers and vehicles pass by."

"One day, about a week since, two gentlemen, mounted upon horses of beautiful form, paused before the cottage, for what purpose I don't know."

"I had seen them both before. One was the squire of the manor, and the other was his confidential attendant or companion, Colonel ——. I forget his name."

"Something was said by these two horsemen, but what it was I was too far off to hear. However, the colonel pointed either to me or the cottage and made a remark, to which the squire assented, and then both of them rode away."

The girl paused, but Blueskin did not offer to interrupt her. He wished to hear how this incident was connected with the abduction.

"I did not see them again; but to-night, just as it was getting dusk, I was standing at the little garden gate, looking up and down the road, for I had finished my day's work."

"Suddenly I saw a cloud of dust, betokening the approach of some vehicle."

On it came, and then I saw it was a post-chaise—the very one, indeed, in which we are now sitting."

"I understand."

"But judge of my surprise when, instead of continuing on its way, the post-chaise suddenly stopped before the gate."

"The door was suddenly flung open, and a man sprang out."

"He had something black in his hand."

"It was the black scarf which you found tied over my mouth."

"With great dexterity and swiftness he flung this over my head, and (how I can scarcely tell you) lifted me from my feet and placed me in the chaise, which was immediately set in rapid motion."

"I had no chance to scream. Indeed, I almost fainted at the suddenness with which everything occurred, and when I was more recovered, the scarf was twisted over my mouth in such a manner that to cry out was an impossibility."

"But, quick as he was, I recognised the person who had made me prisoner. It was the squire's companion, the colonel."

"In a little while he spoke to me, and told me that he was taking me to some one who loved me, and who would make me the happiest being on the face of the earth, and more to the same end."

"But I doubted him. A thousand vague fears sprang up in my mind, and I struggled desperately to get free."

"Finding that I would not be pacified, he bound me in the manner in which you found me, and then indeed I felt truly helpless and resigned myself to my fate."

"It was soon after this that I heard you cry out, and I made a desperate attempt to speak loud enough to attract your attention. Fortunately, you heard me."

"I did, and thought it my duty to interfere."

"Heaven bless you for it! for you have been the means of saving me from a fate I tremble at."

The young girl ceased.

Such was the narrative she poured into Blueskin's ears.

The simple and artless manner in which she told her story, and, above all, the beautiful musical voice in which she spoke, charmed Blueskin, and he was not surprised that the unprincipled squire should seek to make so dangerous a creature his own.

"And now, having told me this much, where shall I take you to, for we shall soon be in London?"

"Alas—alas!"

"Why do you weep?"

"To think that I am compelled to leave the little cottage where I have been so happy, for I feel that it would not be safe for me to live there any longer."

"I fear not, for the poor have no chance with the rich. You will now be looked upon as the possessor of a dangerous secret."

"I have an uncle and aunt in London," continued the poor girl, "and if you will take me to them they will doubtless advise me what I am to do."

"Are they friendly with you?"

"Oh! yes."

"Then go there, by all means. Where do they live?"

"In a small street leading out of the City-road."

"Could you find it?"

"Oh! easily."

"That is well, then. I propose that on reaching the City-road we discharge this chaise, and then proceed the remainder of the distance on foot."

"As you will."

"My reason is this. The driver of the chaise is unquestionably linked with your persecutors, and it is necessary to keep from them all knowledge of your whereabouts."

"How thoughtful you are."

"Caution is needed. In dealing with such men you cannot take too many precautions. I have, however, got one great satisfaction."

"What is that?"

"I have bestowed upon the rascally colonel, who doubtless suggests to his employer things of which he would never think, and puts temptations in his way—I have, I say, the satisfaction of knowing that he has received some little punishment for his wickedness. It will be a long time before he forgets me."

"I tremble when"—

At this moment the chaise came to a sudden halt, which made the young girl stop in the middle of the speech she was about to utter.

CHAPTER CCLXIV.

RETURNS TO JACK SHEPPARD AND EDGORTH BESS IN THE BOAT ON THE THAMES, AND RELATES HOW THEY WERE PURSUED BY THE RIVER PIRATES.

WE doubt not that the reader feels curious to a degree to know what has befallen Jack Sheppard and Edgorth Bess after their narrow escape from the bullets of Jonathan Wild and his men.

They succeeded in pushing off into the river with their treasure-laden bark just in time to escape injury from the volley so recklessly fired at them.

Since [that time we have never had an opportunity of recording their actions, and even now to do so we are compelled to leave Blueskin in a situation of peculiar interest.

In writing a romance it is an impossibility to keep the whole of the characters upon the page at one time.

Events in the natural order of things must occur to cause a separation, and then the only course which can be pursued is to take the threads of the narrative, one after the other, and continue them to a certain point.

In this way it often happens that, in order to preserve the synchronism of the narrative—a thing of paramount importance—one set of characters has to be left at some interesting point while the doings of other characters are placed before the reader.

Thus, in the present romance, the characters may fairly enough be divided into three sets.

All are separate and distinct.

Yet all, to a certain extent, tending to the same end.

In the first place, we have Jonathan Wild and his myrmidons in search of those he is so desirous to capture.

In the second, Blueskin, who has, by a stroke of good fortune, been separated from his two companions.

And, lastly, we have Jack Sheppard and Edgorth Bess upon the Thames.

Now, although it is quite possible to chronicle all that happens to these three sets of characters in different places, it cannot be done at once, any more than a man could run in three different directions at the same time.

Each has to be taken in its proper turn, and the chronological sequence of the story thus preserved.

For some time past we have been occupied with Blueskin, but, having pursued his adventures to a certain point, he must perforce give place to those who have been neglected, and come before the reader in his proper time.

We shall now occupy ourselves with those two of our characters in whom it is presumed the reader feels the greatest amount of interest, and who are in a situation of more than ordinary difficulty and danger.

In an anxious tone of voice, Jack spoke as soon as the report of the pistols had died away.

"Bess, dearest," he said. "Speak—oh! speak. Tell me if you are wounded."

"No. I am unhurt. And you?"

"Not scratched."

"Are you sure?"

"Quite sure."

"Thank heaven, then, for that danger safely passed through."

"Amen," responded Jack. "Steer for the bridge, dearest. I must row for our lives."

"Blueskin, where is he? What can have become of him? Is it possible that he has fallen into the hands of our arch-enemy?"

"I fear so—but I trust not."

"Alas—alas!"

"Be of good heart, dear one. Do not fear for Blueskin. He is a man of many resources, and no doubt alone will be able to avoid even Jonathan Wild."

"I hope so."

"Mind the piers of the bridge. Gently. Now we are safe. The surface of the river is as dark as pitch, and our foes do not seem to have attempted to pursue us."

At this moment the little vessel passed in safety beneath the arches of old Westminster-bridge.

More at ease with himself, Jack now only pulled gently, allowing the boat to drift with the stream.

He was puzzled to know how to act.

Where should he land?

Where should he convey the treasure to, which was so heavy as to somewhat overload the boat, and increase its risk of capsizing?

He had no idea.

He wanted Blueskin with him to suggest and advise.

It was not long before Edgorth Bess noted the state of indecision his mind was in, and she questioned him as to the cause of it.

"Do you think we are not pursued, Jack?"

"I am almost sure of it."

"Then, I should think the best thing you can do is to hover about this spot. If Blueskin escapes from Jonathan Wild, he is almost sure to come down to the water's edge to find us."

"Very true," said Jack.

"Do you think that best?"

"Assuredly. It is, indeed, the only course open to us."

Cautiously Jack Sheppard changed the course of the boat, and returned towards to the spot from which they had so recently been driven.

But though they went as near to the land as they dared, they were unable to see anything of their faithful comrade.

Wearily, indeed, did the time pass to them, and yet, as minute after minute passed away, Jack Sheppard's anxiety kept rapidly increasing.

Morning would come, and then what were they to do?

It seemed as though the treasure taken from Jonathan Wild was destined to do them no good.

The curse of blood appeared to be upon it.

It had been a trouble to them from the first.

Oh! if Jack Sheppard could only have been persuaded to consign that treasure to the bottom of the river and land upon the shore nearest to them, what an amount of suffering and horror would have been spared them.

But alas! fate decided otherwise.

That treasure was destined to be their destruction.

We must not anticipate, but content ourselves with relating events in the precise order in which they occurred.

An hour passed.

During that time Jack kept rowing up and down past the spot where Blueskin had promised to make his appearance.

But there were no more signs of him now than at first. Poor Edgworth Bess was terribly fatigued.

She was neither fitted bodily nor mentally for such scenes and trials as she had had to go through, and they had all left a visible impression upon her.

Jack could see, and his heart ached when he saw it, that she was now little more than the shabow of her former self.

Her cheeks were pale, her eyes sunken, and her whole frame terribly emaciated.

A hollow cough, too, which seemed as though it would rend her lungs, made itself heard at short irregular intervals.

These symptoms alarmed Jack more than he liked to confess, even to himself.

But his companion made no complaint—uttered no word, to say how she was suffering.

Alas! she felt that she was the victim of a cruel and remorseless fortune, and that everything was being done for her that could be done.

Without the aid and protection of Jack Sheppard and Blueskin, she would long ere this have fallen a victim to the machinations of her enemies.

Blueskin did not come.

In vain Jack Sheppard rowed the boat to dangerous proximity to the shore and strained his eyeballs to catch a glimpse of his companion's form.

Then he would lay off again, and once more wait with patience.

The dense night-mist still hangs upon the surface of the river.

It will only be dispersed when the sun pours down his ardent beams upon it.

But what is that which, like some great monster of the deep, seems to rise slowly through the mist.

Its form is huge.

Its outline shadowy.

Higher and higher it seems to rise, plainer and plainer it becomes, though it loses not its dim undefined character.

What is it?

Neither Jack nor Edgworth Bess see it, or observe its stealthy, silent approach.

Their regards are concentrated upon the shore.

Their vision is strained to the utmost, in the hope that, after all, they might see something of Blueskin.

Nearer and nearer comes the strange-looking object.

It seems to increase in size, and now it can be seen, a mass of something black, and partially defined from the thick mist environing it.

There arises no sound to warn Jack and Bess of what is coming.

They see it not, and it nears them rapidly.

What was it?

Another moment answered the question.

A slight puff of wind blew across the water, and in its course it took the mist with it.

Then was revealed a boat of large size, containing several men.

The mist, however, seemed to magnify it, for now that it was properly seen, it was much smaller than it had at first appeared to be.

It had lost altogether the gigantic appearance it had worn.

Suddenly Edgworth Bess uttered a loud shriek.

She had turned round, and her gaze had fallen upon the boat which had so imperceptibly approached them.

Jack turned round with the swiftness of lightning to ascertain the cause of this cry, for it echoed and re-echoed far over the surface of the water.

So greatly was Jack himself taken by surprise that a cry burst from his lips also, but he stifled it.

A second glance removed the awful feeling that was about his heart that it was Jonathan Wild and his men who had stolen so unawares upon him.

Those in the boat presented no resemblance to the boat-taker's janizaries, save in the expression of ferocity which was stamped upon all their features.

That was a load off Jack's heart.

But let them be who they might, the attitude which they assumed towards our friends was decidedly a hostile one.

"Boat ahoy, there," said a rough voice. "Heave to, or we'll scuttle you."

A boat-hook was raised by one of the men, who Jack saw had a sailor-like aspect.

The intention was to hold the little wherry with this, but, quick as thought, Jack plied the oars, and the frail vessel shot far over the water.

Oaths and imprecations came from the men in the boat, and they renewed their fierce cries to the fugitives to heave to.

But this command Jack altogether disregarded.

The only effect it had upon him was to cause him to increase his speed.

The men in the large boat, however, soon started in pursuit, and it could be seen at once that, for every foot Jack went, they went two.

The result of such a race as that could not be doubtful.

Still Jack plied his oars with uncommon vigour.

He had the tide to assist him, though not much, for it was close upon the turn.

In a little while the water would come surging up in the opposite direction.

Edgworth Bess was in an agony of terror.

"Oh! Jack—Jack," she cried. "What will become of us? Who are those dreadful men in the boat?"

"I think I could give a pretty good guess."

"They—they are not Wild's men."

"Oh! no."

"What are they, then?"

"Quite as bad."

"No—no."

"I am afraid so."

"Then we are lost."

"No," said Jack. "I won't consent to that. We are in danger, I know, but not lost."

"Who are these men?"

"River pirates."

"River pirates?"

"Yes. I can tell by the tone of voice in which you repeat my question that you do not quite understand my meaning."

"I do not. Are there pirates on the river?"

"Oh! yes. The Thames swarms with them, as they would tell you on board any vessel."

"How shall we escape them?"

"I know not. They seem to be gaining on us fast."

"They do."

"They are ferocious villains, and we shall have a poor chance if we fall into their hands."

"Oh! heaven have mercy upon us!"

That was the simple ejaculatory prayer which Bess uttered.

Jack bent his back to the oars, and considering the little practice he had had with such instruments, he did wonders.

The little wherry seemed to skim over the water like a bird.

But behind it—keeping ever in its wake—came the large boat; looking like some huge shark in pursuit of some small finny inhabitant of the deep.

Jack's eyes were all the time fixed upon it.

They were certainly gaining ground upon him, and rapidly too.

He saw a figure stand up in the pursuing boat.

"Heave to," he heard a voice cry—the sound coming over the water to his ears with perfect plainness. "Heave to, or we fire!"

Of this threat Jack took not the slightest notice.

He redoubled his exertions.

"Stoop, Bess—stoop," he cried. "Crouch down as low as you can in the boat. They are going to fire."

"And you, Jack—and you. What shall you do?"

"I will try to avoid their aim by changing the course of the boat continually. It is for you I feel afraid. Stoop down."

Trembling in every limb, and fairly sick at heart, Edgworth Bess did as she was bidden.

At that very moment Jack saw a bright flash, which was succeeded by a report.

It was a pistol which had been fired.

[THE THREE FRIENDS SEEK SHELTER WITH THE GIPSIES.]

The bullet, however, did no injury.

It was as ineffectual as their cry to heaven to.

But now the boat containing the Thames pirates—for Jack was quite right in his conjecture—approached with surprising swiftness.

Over the water it came like a race horse, and soon Jack saw, with a painful tightening at his heart, that in a few minutes it must reach him—that a contest and collision would be inevitable.

Cursing his unlucky fate, he still kept rowing, though his back ached fearfully and the perspiration fell in drops from his brow.

He would not give in without a struggle.

Edgworth Bess raised her head a little way and ventured to take a peep at what was going on.

"Oh! heaven!" she exclaimed, in a voice of terror. "We are indeed lost!"

CHAPTER CCLXV.

JACK SHEPPARD AND EDGWORTH BESS ARE MADE PRISONERS BY THE THAMES PIRATES.

LONG prior and subsequent to the period of which we are writing, the river Thames was infested with a body of men who went by the name of river or Thames pirates.

The doings of these wild lawless men have many a time been chronicled.

During the night they would go on board a boat in rather strong numbers, and direct their course to one of the numerous vessels which are always moored between London-bridge and Gravesend.

On reaching the bark, which was generally selected beforehand, they would board her, overcome the men who had been left to take charge of her, and strip the vessel of everything valuable that was at the same time portable.

Nothing came amiss to them.

In general they preferred to do their work secretly, and this was one of the modes often practiced by them.

At night such craft as are moored on the river are generally left in charge of one man as watchman—sometimes two or even more, according to the value of the cargo.

Now these pirates would dress themselves in ordinary sailors' clothes, and, whenever they could, obtain the job of watchman for one of these vessels.

When this was the case, his confederates were able to make an easy prey of the boat and get off undetected, taking their accomplice with them.

But this got found out, and the greatest caution was exercised by the owners of boats in engaging watchmen.

Still, however, the pirates continued their depredations, and at length to such an extent did they carry on their nefarious traffic, that a special police called the river-police was organized to suppress them.

Their proceedings were now rendered more difficult, but still they thrived.

Dark stories were told of the terrible deeds committed by the Thames pirates, and many a time had Jack in his boyhood been dismayed by a recital of their doings.

Every one dreaded them.

It was, indeed, a body of these desperadoes who were in pursuit of Jack and Edgworth Bess.

Whether they had learned by some means what the boat contained, was more than they could say.

With great speed they came on, but Jack would not give in.

He strained his muscles to the utmost.

It was in vain.

One more vigorous sweep was given to the oars by the men in the large boat, and then one who stood up with a long pole at one end, to which a hook was attached, swung it round, and brought it down upon the gunwale of the wherry.

So violent was the shock that the little boat heeled over, and almost capsized.

It righted itself, however.

Seeing the desperate emergency in which he was placed, Jack Sheppard sprang up in the boat with one of the oars in his hands, and strove to strike himself clear of the hook.

But to no purpose.

Other hooks were fixed, until the little wherry was drawn close to the large boat.

Half-fainting with terror, Edgworth Bess shrank back to the further extremity of the little bark, but Jack, armed with the ponderous oar, right manfully did battle with his foes.

Their numbers were, however, too great for him to stand the ghost of a chance even.

He was quickly surrounded and overpowered.

Then a heavy blow on the head rendered him insensible.

In this condition he was thrown into the large boat.

Seeing the fate which Jack had met with, and fully believing he was killed, Edgworth Bess fell into a swoon. She was seized in a moment by one of the pirates—a man of most sinister aspect—and thrown into the large boat beside Jack.

It was then that the pirates made the discovery that the little wherry was laden with silver ingots.

Their exultation knew no bounds.

They had never expected such a booty.

They had seen Jack and Edgworth Bess in the wherry, and had attacked them merely in the hope of obtaining such valuables as they might have about them.

Then there was the boat which was worth something.

And not only that, they had a darker and more horrible reason for taking them prisoners after they were attacked.

It was that they might plunder them of every article they had about them—even to their clothes—and then dispose of their bodies to the doctors for dissection.

At the time when these events occurred the science of anatomy had not reached that point of perfection to which it has since attained.

But that perfection was only obtained by making patient examination of many subjects.

Now all doctors at that time had the greatest possible difficulty in obtaining bodies for dissection, owing to the repugnance to such a proceeding which was felt by the survivors of the deceased.

Medical men were therefore compelled to resort to other means to obtain what they required.

They soon became careless as to how the subjects were got—that was no business of theirs—they paid for them when they were brought, and there, they considered, was an end of the matter.

In this way numberless persons mysteriously disappeared, and it was not until long afterwards that the truth came out.

Such was the horrible fate for which Jack and his fair companion were designed.

We shudder and the flesh creeps upon our bones as we think of their terrible situation.

Against so many men what chance had they?

None whatever.

Bruised and insensible, they were unable to do anything to avert their frightful doom.

The thoughts of the pirates were now, however, completely occupied with the treasure upon which they had so unexpectedly fallen.

It was not often they had such a slice of luck as that.

By the directions of the one who had the command—a most ferocious-looking fellow he was, with a ragged beard and moustache—the little wherry was put in tow behind the larger one.

Without any one in it, it floated easily enough in their wake.

The order was now given to make all speed with the oars, and the vessel floated down the river in the direction of London-bridge at a rapid rate.

It would seem, however, that the villainous pirates had not been unperceived while thus engaged.

Ere long, the practised eye of one of the men, whose duty it was to keep a sharp look-out, gave warning to his comrades that something which looked like a police galley was bearing down dead upon them.

Hasty glances were cast in the direction indicated, and they found the words uttered by the look-out were quite correct.

A boat manned with the new Thames police was in full chase of them.

"Row on—row on," cried the captain, in a suppressed tone of voice to his piratical crew. "We will avoid the bluebottles if we can; if not, why?"

He interrupted himself to laugh hideously.

The remainder of his sentence, though not uttered, was clearly understood, as was proved by the manner in which the pirates chuckled.

But they bent their backs to their task, and pulled till the boat cracked again.

The speed they made was really prodigious, and would have been much greater than it was only the tide had just turned, and they were compelled to row against it.

The police galley could be distinguished with tolerable ease.

About a dozen men were seated in it.

Suddenly there was a bright flash and a report.

A pistol had been discharged in the air by the police.

That was a well-understood signal among all the craft on the river, and meant that they were to heave to and allow the police to come up with them.

But although the pirates understood the signal well enough, they never made the least attempt to comply with it.

Very soon, however, it became clear that their foes were gaining upon them rapidly, in spite of all the exertions they could make.

Perceiving this, the captain ordered the men to take it easy, and not fatigue themselves.

Since they were to be overtaken it was better at first than at last, when the strength of his men would be spent.

Besides, the captain was rather inclined than otherwise to court an engagement with the police, for he had recently devised a new mode of attacking them, and was anxious it should be tried.

At a much slower rate, then, the pirate vessel surged through the water.

The police galley came up hand over hand.

They now fired another pistol, and this time the pirate captain told his men to heave to.

He was obeyed immediately.

The police galley came on, but not quite so rapidly as before.

They had their suspicions of the pirate bark, but they might be unfounded, and it behooved them to be careful in what they did.

"Hullo!" cried some one, in a loud voice.

"Hullo!" responded the pirate captain.

"Heave to."

"Ay—ay. Here we are. Who are you?"

"Thames police."

"All right."

These words threw the police in a great measure off their guard, and they began to think they must have made some mistake.

Gently they surged through the water, until they were almost side by side with the pirate boat.

But, in the meantime, the villainous captain's crew had been busy, though they moved as quietly and stealthily as possible, so as not to attract attention.

At the bottom of their boat was a large piece of iron about a foot square.

The weight of it was enormous, for it was quite solid.

To two of the sides of this cube were fixed two long poles, which served for handles whereby the huge mass could be raised.

Slowly the pirate crew raised it up.

The police saw they were doing something, but they knew not what.

The two boats were only about three feet apart, and a touch with the oars would have brought them alongside.

Suddenly that touch was given by the pirates at a signal from their captain.

Then the men who had hold of the ends of the poles which were fixed into the iron weight rose to their full height.

They swayed the iron backwards and forwards once.

Then let go.

With a horrible rush the mass went through the air.

A cry of horror came from the lips of the police.

Too late they saw the frightful danger with which they were menaced.

There was a crash.

A scream of horror.

The next moment the piece of iron broke through the bottom of the police galley, and precipitated into the water those of its occupants who were not slain.

A triumphant yell came from the throats of the pirates when they saw how well the plan had succeeded.

At one fell swoop they had annihilated the enemy.

The police-officers swam to the edge of the pirate boat, and, catching hold of it with their hands, strove to save themselves from sinking.

But the barbarous crew mercilessly hacked their fingers until the sinews, being at length severed, they were compelled to let go.

Of all the dozen police-officers only two were left struggling on the surface of the water.

Not content with the havoc he had already caused, the pirate captain fired until the black specks disappeared.

Of the police galley all that remained was a few fragments of timber, and they were rapidly floating out of sight.

"Hurrah! my mates," said the captain, in an exultant tone of voice. "Fortune favours us to-night. She gives us victory and booty. Hurrah! for the Thames pirates!"

The boat was now in good earnest set in motion, and London-bridge at length gained.

Fortunately for them, Edgworth Bess and Jack Sheppard still continued insensible, so they were spared the horror of being spectators of the wholesale butchery we have described.

Shooting under old London-bridge, as passing under the narrow arches was called, the pirates rowed their boat through the pool, past the Tower, and so on, until the shore near Rotherhithe was reached.

At that time this place was quite separated from London, and consisted chiefly of wooden houses built here and there irregularly upon a large waste piece of ground.

Nothing could be imagined more desolate and wretched than this shore.

The ground was low, and flat, and marshy.

An aspect of squalor pervaded it everywhere.

But it was when approached at night that it presented the most disagreeable appearance.

In this region, and at the time when they approached it—about an hour or an hour and a half before daylight—it was wholly deserted.

Not a single living thing was in sight.

It was at this moment that Jack recovered from the effects of the blow he had received upon his head.

As might be expected, his faculties were very much confused, and it was a long time before he could comprehend his position.

However, he had the good sense to lie still, and not betray by the least movement that he had gained possession of his senses.

He was lying on his back, and when he opened his eyes he could see the dark cloudy sky above his head.

Then with a rush recollection came over him.

He was a prisoner, and he soon found he was lying in a boat which was filled with men.

And where was Edgworth Bess?

At first he did not dare hardly to turn his eyes round in search of her, for fear he should be noticed and perhaps subjected to some fresh ill-usage.

He could feel he was unbound, and that all his limbs were at liberty.

Slowly he moved his head from side to side, and strove to pierce the darkness with which the body of the boat seemed filled.

Presently his eyes fell upon what looked like an undistinguishable mass of clothing.

His heart, however, told him that it was the companion of his misfortunes—poor Edgworth Bess.

CHAPTER CCLXVI.

JACK SHEPPARD HAS SOME RATHER REMARKABLE ADVENTURES IN THE RUINED MILL.

AN inaudible groan came from Jack Sheppard's lips when he thought of the manifold dangers which the poor girl had passed through.

Fain would he, if it had been in his power, have shielded her from all harm, to have tended her, waited upon her as he would upon some rare exotic plant too delicate to bear the blustering winds to blow upon it.

Instead of that, however, he did nothing but bring her into additional peril.

Suddenly Jack felt the boat's keel grate upon the shore, and then he rightly enough imagined his journey was at an end.

The boat was moored, and the men hastily got out of it.

The captain saluted him with a kick, and a groan came from Jack's lips.

"Get up, will you?"

Jack struggled to his feet.

He was still suffering rather severely from the blow on his head.

"Now, then, out of the boat with you. Wright and Harris!"

"Ay—ay, sir."

"Look after the prisoners, and see them safely bestowed. Take care of them. No bruises, you know."

"All right, captain."

The two men approached.

One lifted up Edgworth Bess, and carried her in his arms as though she had been a feather.

The other caught hold of Jack rather roughly by the arm, and he was compelled to follow.

The captain busied himself in looking after the ingots, and seeing that his men did not appropriate any of them to their own uses.

Looking around him, in order if possible to discover whereabouts he was, Jack saw just before him a ruined mill.

It was built close to the water's edge.

Its appearance was neglected in the extreme.

Indeed, it seemed as though a puff of wind of more than usual force would blow it down at once.

But that was illusory.

The old mill was, on the contrary, as firm and strong as could be wished.

It had weathered many a gale, and the probability was it would weather a great many more.

It was towards this mill that the two men directed their steps, so Jack came to the conclusion that that was their destination.

And so it was.

It is quite certain, though, that Jack would never have submitted so quietly as he did if it had not been for Edgworth Bess.

It was for her sake he made no effort to free himself from his captor's grasp. He might have escaped alone, but he never thought of that. He could not have rescued Edgworth Bess, and he preferred captivity with her to freedom without her.

A few minutes brought them to the ruined mill.

There was a crazy-looking staircase, or rather ladder, which reached half-way up the mill, and then abruptly terminated.

It seemed as though the upper portion had been broken off.

To all appearances, the remaining part was so frail that no one would have thought of risking their neck by ascending it.

Besides, there was no motive to induce them to run into so much danger, for the steps did not lead anywhere.

At least, visibly they did not.

But, as the reader doubtless suspects from the trouble we have taken, there was a mystery connected with that staircase.

Its frailness was nothing like so great as it appeared to be.

It had been made to purposely look so, however, for the express purpose of deterring any stranger from ascending it.

And it answered the purpose admirably, for no one had as yet been rash enough to attempt it.

On reaching the bottom, however, the man who carried Edgworth Bess shifted her from one arm to the other, and ran up with the agility of a squirrel.

When within a few feet of the top, he paused and tapped in a peculiar manner upon the woodwork of which the mill was built.

In a moment an opening was disclosed by the slipping away of several planks.

Through this opening he passed.

Jack was told to ascend before his captor, and he did so.

Passing through the opening, he found himself at the top of some more steps which led downwards.

The opening was closed up as soon as his captor was inside, and then all was in profound darkness.

"Descend!" was the word uttered in Jack's ear as the man resumed his hold upon his collar.

As Edgworth Bess had gone before him, Jack was only too glad to follow.

He was anxious in the extreme not to let her be one moment out of sight, for fear that during the brief interval some mischief might be done her which his interposition would prevent.

Accordingly he descended, and with rather more rapidity than his captor thought necessary, so he checked him.

"You need not be in such a hurry to go down, my young spark; you will be glad enough to have a chance to come up, I know."

Jack did not deign any reply to this, but he felt certain that they were going down much lower than they had come up.

And in this he was right, for he was now below the level of the earth, and among the foundations of the old mill.

At length the descent was stopped, and after proceeding a few steps along a passage, they emerged into a place, the appearance of which was curious enough.

It was a large place, but crossed in every direction with huge beams of wood.

These were used to support the structure overhead, and in their existence lay the secret of the mill continuing to stand while in so ruinous a condition.

Jack looked about him with great curiosity.

The place was tolerably well lighted with a large fire which was blazing in the centre of the apartment, for so, for want of some other name, we are compelled to designate it, and as far removed from any of the beams as was possible.

To Jack's joy he saw that Edgworth Bess was near this fire, where the man had placed her, and he also saw that she was giving signs of returning consciousness.

The two pirates, to whom, of course, Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess were perfect strangers, evidently considered they were not capable of doing much harm, for they released him, and the two were left to themselves.

Jack's first impulse was to rush to the side of the poor beirress and to strive by all means in his power to calm her, to soothe her agitation, and restore her to her proper self.

It was only natural that the pirates should have a poor idea of Jack's prowess, for he looked very slim and boyish, and as though quite incapable of striking a blow in his own defence.

And he retained this remarkable juvenility of face and form up to the day of his death.

For a long time all his efforts to restore Edgworth Bess were quite in vain, but eventually he succeeded.

They were interrupted by the arrival of the captain and the rest of the band, bringing with them the treasure.

But that fatality of which we have spoken still seemed to continue to attach itself to it.

It brought nothing but misfortune upon its possessors. We shall see how the pirates fared with it.

Jack could not help feeling much chagrined when he saw the ingots he had had so much trouble to obtain.

But he ought to have rejoiced to think the ill-fated treasure was about to pass away from him.

There was a feeling of great elation about the hearts of the pirate captain and his band, and it showed itself in their countenances.

It was perhaps for this reason that they behaved more leniently to Jack and Edgworth Bess than they generally did to their prisoners.

At ordinary times such individuals as unfortunately fell into their clutches received the harshest of treatment.

But, looking upon Jack and his companion as a mere boy and girl, they omitted to take such precautions as they generally did.

A carouse was unanimously called for.

A large table was made by placing a broad piece of wood on the tops of some barrels.

Other barrels of a smaller size furnished them with seats.

Spirits were then produced and pipes lighted.

Then the carouse fairly began.

Such a boisterous one had perhaps never been known among the foundations of the old mill.

Shrinking down by the fire as far out of the way of the pirates as possible, our two friends watched their every movement with the greatest anxiousness.

Whenever he could do so Jack whispered words of consolation to the poor trembling girl by his side.

He showed her that they were far indeed from being quite lost; that they had their limbs at liberty; and Jack spoke confidently of making his escape.

And Edgworth Bess felt her spirits cheered by the words he spoke, for she had great faith in his capabilities.

Morning dawned, but they had no idea of it, for no ray of daylight ever found its way to the pirates' subterranean haunt.

Presently one of the men who had been seated with the rest rose from his place and approached the fire.

His comrades scarcely noticed him, but our friends watched him closely and eagerly.

On reaching the fire this man gave the embers a poke, which caused them to burst into a flame.

Then, putting his hand in his pocket, he drew forth a small piece of paper.

Why they felt their gaze so riveted upon that piece of paper, Jack and Bess would have been puzzled to say, but they gazed upon it with an all-absorbing interest.

Slowly the man unfolded it, and then they saw that something was printed upon it in rather large letters.

The man perused it.

When he had read for a minute or two, he raised his head and looked earnestly at Jack, whose face and form, as well as his companion's, were plainly revealed by the ruddy light of the fire.

Jack's anxiety changed to uneasiness.

It increased when he saw the man resume his reading, and then fall to a perusal of Edgworth Bess.

The man read the paper once more, and then, with a satisfied look on his face, he restored it to his pocket.

Probably our two friends alone noticed his actions.

Certainly they were the only two that attached any importance to them.

The carouse lasted a long while, but at length it came to a conclusion.

Hours passed by.

The pirates for the most part slunk into out of the way nooks and corners, where they laid down to sleep off the effects of their debauch.

From the time the man had read the paper, Jack scarcely took his eyes off him for a moment.

But presently he slunk off like the rest.

At length there remained but one man in sight, and he seemed drowsy to a degree.

It would appear, however, that he had been appointed as a watch over the two prisoners.

Doubtless, the difficulties in the way of any stranger making an escape from that place were very great.

Upon such a supposition only can we account for the pirates leaving our two friends as they did.

A profound silence prevailed in the place where for so long there had been such boisterous behaviour.

The man on guard sat on a cask, nodding his head backwards and forwards in a somnolent sort of way.

It was now that Jack considered he had a favourable opportunity of speaking to his companion, and he availed himself of it.

She was clinging tightly to him, as though for protection against any peril that might assail her.

"Bess," said Sheppard, in a low, faint whisper. "Bess!"

"Yes, Jack."

"Speak to me in a whisper, dear one, for fear we should be overheard."

The young girl nodded.

"We must escape," continued Jack.

"How?"

"I know not yet. In the best manner we can. It is imperative we should do so, and that at once, or we shall fall into the hands of our ferocious foe."

"Jonathan Wild?"

"Even he!"

Edgworth Bess cast a terrified glance around her.

"How could he come here?" she asked.

"Hush! I will tell you my suspicions. Did you notice one of the men come to the fire and stir it?"

"Yes."

"And then did you notice that he took a paper from his pocket?"

"Yes," replied Edgworth Bess, "and he unfolded and read it."

"He did," said Jack; "but did you notice as he read it that he from time to time interrupted himself to look at us?"

"I remember he did look at us strangely, now you mention it."

"Ah! Then I can see, dearest, that you do not share my suspicions."

"What are they?—what are they? Oh! tell me—tell me at once!"

"I will. That paper he was reading contained an accurate description of both our persons, and the reason he kept looking up to us in the manner he did was to compare the description with us, and then see whether it agreed."

"Oh! Jack, you fill me with a thousand fears! How could he have a printed description of us? for it was a printed paper he held in his hand. I saw some of the letters myself."

"So did I. In fact, I was able to make out one word which stretched right across the paper."

"What was that?"

"Reward!"

"Reward?"

"Yes."

"Tell me all, Jack, tell me all. This suspense is very dreadful."

"I can give you my suspicions in a few words. If I mistake not, that man is a spy in the employ of Jonathan Wild."

"Oh! heaven!"

"Hush! hush!"

"I am still."

"Pray keep so, or we may find it quite impossible to escape."

"I will! I will! Go on, Jack, go on!"

"I say, then, it is my conviction that the man we are speaking of is a spy in the employ of Jonathan Wild—that the paper he read contained an accurate description of ourselves—that he has recognised us—and that he is now on his way to Jonathan Wild, to inform him where to find us; and in a little while we may expect to see him here, with a troop of janizaries at his back.

Edgworth Bess glared into Jack's face as he uttered these words with an expression of speechless dismay.

For a moment she felt as though she should swoon, but with a great effort she recovered herself.

"Oh! Jack! Jack!" she moaned, "we are lost! What can we do?"

"Escape!" said Jack, in a hoarse whisper! "Escape!"

CHAPTER CCLXVII.

JONATHAN WILD IS MADE ACQUAINTED WITH THE WHEREABOUTS OF JACK SHEPPARD AND EDGWORTH BESS.

As it so happened, Jack Sheppard's suspicions were perfectly well founded and correct.

The man who he had seen come to the fire was, indeed, no other than one of Jonathan Wild's spies.

We have often adverted to the extensive system of espionage which the thief-taker kept up.

He had spies, as one might say, everywhere.

It was the duty of these men to report anything important which came under their notice, and they were sure of having a good reward for doing so.

This was tolerably well known, and it may be stated with precision that no body of men of any number ever assembled, either in or about the metropolis, without numbering amongst them one of the spies.

In fact, in every place where there was the remotest probability of their being of any use to him, there was a spy to be found.

Now Jonathan Wild, in his anxiety to capture our three friends, had taken what he considered were some very effective steps indeed.

And so they were.

He had some bills privately printed, offering thirty pounds reward.

One of these he had placed in the hands of every one of his spies, whose particular instructions were to make themselves well acquainted with the contents of it.

These bills contained—

A close and accurate description of Edgworth Bess, Jack Sheppard, and Blueskin.

Knowing them so well as he did, Jonathan was able to describe them with very great exactness.

The terms of the bill were as follows.

The reward was divided into three equal portions of ten pounds each, and these sums would be given to any one who pointed out the position of the fugitives.

If one was seen, the man who saw him only had to go to Jonathan with the information and receive the reward.

Now, this pirate we have referred to had received a bill in common with the rest, but, considering he stood not the slightest chance of meeting with the persons described, he had paid very little attention to it.

But, while sitting carousing with his mates, the idea all at once came into his head that the prisoners they had taken were two of the persons Wild wanted.

If so, he was, of course, entitled to the sum of twenty pounds.

It was worth a little trouble to ascertain this, so he watched his opportunity, and, going to the fire, read the paper in the manner we have described.

The description given of Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess so entirely corresponded with the two persons before him, that he had not the shadow of a doubt even left upon his mind.

Accordingly he folded up the paper and returned it to his pocket.

He had resumed his seat with his comrades, but he took care to drink with far greater moderation than they did.

At length, when the carouse was over—he knew it would have attracted notice, if not suspicion, had he left before—the man withdrew along with the rest, for the ostensible purpose of lying down somewhere and sleeping off the effects of what he had drunk.

Instead of doing this, however, he had made his way to the passage leading from the mill.

He passed by a sentinel who was asleep on his post, and ascending the steps, left the mill by means of the crazy-looking ladder.

Upon emerging into the open air he found it much later than he could have thought.

Eveing was fast drawing in, and already the more distant objects around him were involved in gloom.

But at that time of the year the days are short, and on this particular day it was darker much earlier than usual, for a dense mist that had risen from the river spread itself over the land.

Fain would this spy of Jonathan Wild's have adopted some additional means of keeping the two prisoners secure, but that was a matter in which he felt he dared not interfere, so he was obliged to leave things as they were, and trust to them not being able to escape.

He made the best of his way to the thief-taker's residence in Newgate-street.

But it took him some time to reach it, and when he arrived it was quite dark.

He knocked at the door, and was answered by Tonks, who told him Jonathan was at home.

The spy then took the bill from his pocket, and said—"Please to give this to Mr. Wild, and tell him I am waiting for an answer."

The spy knew very well that he should be understood.

Breathless Tonks came into the hall.

"Upstairs," he said; "go upstairs. He is in the front room on the first-floor. Mind you knock before you go in."

With this friendly caution, Tonks stood aside and allowed him to ascend the stairs.

The spy easily enough found the door to which Tonks had directed him, and he knocked at it in a very humble manner indeed, having first pulled his hat off.

He heard a growling sound follow his knock, and he translated it into "come in," so he opened the door accordingly.

The room was quite full of tobacco-smoke, so that he could scarcely see across it.

Through the mist, however, he presently discerned the form of the thief-taker, and that of some other person seated at the table.

That was the thief-taker's son.

The precious pair had been smoking for some time, and occupying themselves with the concoction of fresh villainies.

The reader will remember that when we referred to Wild and his son last, they were both engaged in speculating upon the same point.

The result of their reflections was this.

Jonathan Wild made up his mind that he would trust his son, but no further than was necessary.

On the other hand, George had come to the determination to join his fortunes to his father's, carry out all his instructions, and be faithful until he could see a time when his purpose would be best answered by betraying him.

Such was the hollow kind of understanding which had been come to between the precious pair.

Two such clever ones as they were were not at all suitable for partners.

We shall see how events progressed.

At present they were on the best of terms with each other.

With these words of explanation we will resume.

"You sent me this paper," said Wild, senior. "And I to understand by that that you have some information to give me respecting the people described?"

"Yes, Mr. Wild, sir, if you please."

"I do please, villain."

"Then, Mr. Wild, I humbly ask for the reward."

"What reward?"

"Twenty pounds."

"Ya—ah!"

"I have found two of the persons described there."

"Where are they—where are they? Tell me where they are, and you shall have the reward."

And Jonathan put his pocket-book on the table.

"Take it easy," interposed his son. "You know easy always does it."

"Easy be d—d!"

"All right, guv'ner. You're going to fail again."

"Stop your jaw."

"I might just as well, for you are as obstinate as a pig, and it's not a bit of good talking reason to you."

And Wild, junior, relapsed into silence—resuming his pipe with great energy.

The spy looked with something like wonder at the young man who had dared to treat the great thief-taker in so defiant and off-hand a manner.

But of course he said nothing.

Jonathan Wild took two ten pound notes from his purse.

"Now," he said, "here's the reward. You shall have it the moment you tell me which are the two you have found, and where they are."

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

"Which are the two?"

"The boy and the girl."

"The boy and the girl?"

"Yes."

"Oh! I know. All right. Go on. Where are they?"

"I can take you to them at once. But I should like to give you some particulars."

"Go on."

Having received this permission, the spy proceeded to state how he had been in the boat on the Thames along with the Thames pirates, and how they had captured a wherry with two prisoners in it and a quantity of silver ingots.

With a yell, Jonathan sprang to his feet.

"Mine, at last," he cried. "Mine, at last! All mine—all!"

"Easy does it, guv'ner. Easy does it," interposed Wild, junior, again. "It appears to me, you have got some very important information indeed."

"I have—I have."

"But don't make a rumpus. Give the man his reward if he has earned it, and then we can talk over matters."

"Yes—no."

"I'm d—d if you ain't going mad, guv'ner. What do you mean by yes and no?"

"Silence, idiot."

"The same to you."

"I meant yes, I would give the man his reward, having fairly earned it, and no because I should not stop to talk matters over."

"Oh! very well, guv'ner. Have things your own stupid way, and be d—d to you."

"George."

"What?"

"While you behave as you do we shall never get on."

"You mean yourself."

"Bah!"

"I have had occasion to remark, at least twenty times you are the d—dest fool alive."

"Cease this folly, I say. You waste too much time in useless deliberation. That is how we missed them. Give me prompt action."

"So say I, guv'ner, but, before I begin a thing, I like to know what I am going to do."

"But, can't you see? Don't you understand? The boat we fired at fell into the hands of these Thames pirates. They made the two persons in it prisoners, and have conveyed them and the treasure to their secret haunt, which is well known to me. What could be more simple? I will summon my men, and set off in pursuit."

Jonathan did not wait to hear what his son said to this, but banged away with his bludgeon on the table at a furious rate.

Tonks was not long before he made his appearance.

The order was then given to assemble all the men he could in the shortest possible space of time, and for them to bring spare horses to the door.

"Shall I go with him, Mr. Wild?" asked the spy.

"Yes, and get a horse for yourself, so as to accompany us. Stay, here is your reward."

Jonathan handed the man the two ten pound notes he had taken from his purse.

Then he disappeared along with Tonks.

In the meantime, Jonathan Wild very deliberately knocked the ashes out of his pipe, and proceeded to look to his weapons.

His delightful son followed his example.

"Now, George," he said. "Come with me."

"All right, guv'ner. I'm a coming."

"And don't treat me to so much of your jaw. I don't like it."

"Then you shan't have it, guv'ner. There, now, that fixes you, and you can't get beyond that. Lor', now, if you would only take things easy like I do. But you are so very violent, and fly into a passion about nothing at all."

"Bah.

"You don't like to be told of your faults. Very few do. I wouldn't myself. But, gov'n'r."

"What?"

"How are you going to act?"

"How I said."

"Shall you attack these pirates, or ask them to give up their prisoners?"

"Attack them."

"Oh!"

"Don't you see, George, I shall not only accomplish my own individual ends, but I shall also get credit with the authorities as well."

"A very desirable thing, I should think."

"Oh! very. I don't stand in quite such good odour with them as I did a little while ago."

"This is a chance, then, gov'n'r."

"It is. You see, while securing Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess, I shall capture a strong band of Thames pirates."

"Did you know of their existence?"

"Oh! yes; from the first."

"You are a wonderful man, gov'n'r, after all."

Jonathan pretended not to notice this compliment, but continued—

"Only it never answered my purpose to apprehend them—never having been in my way, you understand—but now the case is quite altered."

"It is."

"Why, I shall win renown in this achievement. By delivering up these offenders to justice who have so long defied the laws, and set at nought every attempt to capture them, I shall obtain such a reputation, and make my position so secure, that I shall be able to defy all my numerous enemies."

While this little conversation had been going on, neither Jonathan Wild nor his son were what could be called idle.

They occupied themselves with their weapons and in storing ammunition about their persons, as well as making necessary alterations in their apparel.

By the time they had concluded, they heard the clattering of horses' hoofs on the stones in the street below.

"Come, George," said Wild. "The horses are waiting."

"I am ready, gov'n'r. At least, have you got a sword in the house?"

"What for? You have one by your side."

"I know I have."

"What more do you want?"

"Why, I suppose it is one of yours, and it is a great deal heavier in the blade than I like."

"I have a lighter one here."

Jonathan opened a cupboard-door as he spoke, and disclosed a great number and variety of offensive and defensive weapons.

George Wild soon found a sword that would suit him, and being thus provided he followed his father down the staircase to the front door of the house.

Two of the bull-dogs were holding a couple of spare horses by the bridles, and Wild and his son vaulted into their saddles without delay.

CHAPTER CCLXVIII.

JONATHAN WILD ATTACKS THE PIRATES IN THE RUINED MILL.

OUR readers must understand that the events we have just recorded took place on the day which followed the night when Blueskin had his extraordinary adventure in Westminster Abbey.

That day which Blueskin had passed the greater part of asleep at the little coffee-house in Westminster, where he had some refreshment.

The reader will be able to call to mind that when he rose it was just getting dark, and that he set out to Newgate-street in the hope of being able to pick up some information respecting Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess.

By the time he arrived opposite the thief-taker's residence it was quite dark, and night had fairly set in.

It was while here that Blueskin heard the trampling of horses' hoofs, and drew aside into the shadow of a contiguous doorway, in order to observe what took place.

He was rewarded for his trouble by seeing the band of bull-dogs ride up, and Jonathan and his son emerge from the house and mount the two steeds provided for them.

To Blueskin the person of George Wild was very well known, and he recognised him instantly.

He recollected, too, quite well the circumstances under which he had left his father's house, and he marvelled greatly at his return.

And more still at the palpable fact that he was on good terms with his rascally parent.

This afforded Blueskin matter for much uneasy thought.

Jonathan had got an ally.

He had been treacherous, but what of that? Perhaps he would not be again.

Blueskin watched Jonathan and his son mount.

He saw them turn their horses' heads and go in the direction of the city.

Then, as we have elsewhere related, Blueskin went into a stable for the purpose of procuring a horse, and then missed them.

We will follow Jonathan and his myrmidons.

At a very rapid pace he led the way in the direction of London-bridge, crossing over which he proceeded through the village of Bermondsey to Rotherhithe.

The spy took upon himself the office of guide.

At length the old mill was reached.

The pirates were within, drinking and carousing, and little dreaming of the attack which was about to be made upon them.

They had everything to fear from such an attack.

Their treacherous comrade would point out to the assailants the weakest part in the defences.

He would lead them into the citadel.

The force Jonathan brought with him was a strong one, considering the pirates he was about to attack did not number more than a dozen men.

Such being the case, he was able to post several as sentinels without weakening the main body too much.

This he did.

Then when every preparation was made.

When every man had his weapons ready for immediate service.

Jonathan Wild and his son followed the spy up the rickety flight of steps on the outside of the mill.

So far all was well.

Now the difficulties of the enterprise would begin.

The spy tapped on the piece of woodwork in the side of the mill in the peculiar manner which would be recognised by the sentinel inside.

The piece of wood slid away in a moment.

The spy had made Jonathan and George stand back, so that when the door opened the man inside should not see them and give the alarm.

In a quiet way the spy stepped through the doorway into the little landing inside the mill, and the moment he did so, instead of descending to the room below as the man on guard fully expected he would, he turned round and grasped him by the throat so tight that the man could make no articulate sound.

"Silence," he said, "or you are a dead man. If you offer to move or speak I will plunge this knife into your heart."

The man was cowed by the stern, determined way in which these words were uttered, and he became passive at once.

Jonathan Wild appeared at the opening.

He could not see inside the mill on account of the intense darkness which prevailed there, but the spy could see him plainly enough, because his body was much darker than the night sky behind it.

"All right, Mr. Wild," he said, in a whisper. "I have got the sentinel a prisoner. Here he is."

The spy dragged the man forward as he spoke, and Jonathan caught hold of him.

It was the easiest matter in the world for the thief-taker, gifted with such extraordinary strength as he was, to take hold of this man by the neck and drag him through the aperture on to the ladder.

The man, who fully believed his last hour was come, and who was besides a coward, offered no resistance.

When he had got him on the ladder, Jonathan roused him down to his son, who in his turn handed him to the man who stood next.

It was in this way that the spy reached the ground, and upon his arrival there he was immediately strongly secured.

The spy now bade Jonathan follow him, describing the nature of the place as he did so.

Jonathan complied.

Then the descent of the interior staircase was commenced and accomplished in safety.

At the bottom of these stairs, the reader will recollect, there was a passage.

In this Jonathan came to a halt, and, as noiselessly as possible, assembled his men in a body, so that they would be in a condition when he gave the word of command to rush forward in a mass and take the pirates by storm.

The sounds of drinking, shouting, singing, swearing, all reached their ears in a bewildering chorus.

At length the men were properly assembled, and then the spy pointed out a door that was before them.

It could be seen, because there was a strong light within which made itself visible through numerous crevices both in and around it.

The spy led the way.

He knew just where the fastening of the door was situated, and he placed his hand upon it.

In suppressed tones Wild said—

"Forward."

The men made a rush, and the same moment the spy, flinging the door open, allowed them to pass.

The interior of the apartment presented much the same appearance as it did when we last described it.

That is to say, the table was put up, and the pirates were seated around it carousing.

But at the trampling of feet and the sight of Wild's men, they rose to their feet in the greatest dismay.

Their weapons had been laid aside, for nothing was further from their thoughts than that an attack would be made upon them.

"Surrender!" yelled Wild, at the top of his voice. "Surrender. You cannot escape, and if you give in at once your lives will be spared. Surrender, I say—surrender!"

"Never!" said the pirate captain, in tones a good octave higher than Wild's. "Don't believe him, my gallant comrades. Down with him. Seize your weapons Hurrah!"

The pirates, who had just drunk enough to make themselves valiant, responded to the hurrah their leader had uttered, and then hastily possessed themselves of their arms.

Seeing this, Wild instantly gave the word for an attack to be made upon them.

A terrific conflict ensued.

The table and the barrels under and around it were overturned.

Foremost in the fray—brandishing his huge heavy hanger around him as if it was a straw—Jonathan Wild personally proved the most deadly foe the pirates had to encounter.

George Wild seconded his efforts in a manner which showed that, let his vices, deficiencies, and failings be what they might, cowardice was not one of them.

The pirates, however, gave no symptoms of submitting and paid not the slightest attention when they were called upon to surrender.

Jonathan's men suffered severely.

The contest was chiefly a hand to hand one with swords, very few pistol shots being fired.

At length, after fighting for nearly a quarter of an hour, those few pirates who survived flung down their weapons and sued for quarter.

This was immediately given, for Jonathan would much rather have had them alive than dead, so they were securely bound.

Having succeeded thus far, Jonathan had the most important part of the business to do.

That was to secure the two prisoners.

When he had done that, his triumph would be almost complete.

When the spy flung open the door, the first thing he did was to look in the direction of the fire, where he had left the two captives seated.

They were no longer there.

A dread was in his heart that, after all, he should be baulked of the additional reward which would fall to his share provided they were captured.

Familiar as he was with the intricacies of the place, he darted at once among the timber supports and began an ardent search.

Every step he took, though, only served to confirm him in the idea that the prisoners had escaped.

It was not long before he had made a close examination of the underground apartment, but the result of it was that they were nowhere to be found.

It was just as he felt sure of this, and emerged from among the timber, that Jonathan Wild, having achieved a complete victory over the pirates, turned to commence the search.

His eye fell upon the spy.

"The prisoners!" he yelled. "The prisoners! take me to the place where they are confined. Quick! quick! I say."

"Mr. Wild"—

"What, villain?"

"When I left here to seek for you they were seated there, close to the fire."

"Ha!"

"And now they are nowhere to be found, although I have closely searched the place in every direction."

"A thousand curses! Disperse—disperse, all of you! Take torches from the fire, and leave not a nook or corner of this place unvisited; they have doubtless hidden themselves during the affray."

The men obeyed.

"Mr. Wild," said the spy, catching hold of the thief-taker by the skirt of his coat, and arresting his further progress; "Mr. Wild."

"What?"

Jonathan turned round suddenly.

An angry look was in his eyes.

"Would you permit me—humbly permit me—to offer you a suggestion?"

"What is it? Speak."

"During my absence the pirates may have thought the prisoners not altogether safe."

"Ha! I see."

"And they may have adopted some precautions to keep them in safety. I would recommend you to speak to the chief, and question him about them."

"I will—point him out to me."

The pirate captain was a prisoner and rather severely wounded.

Jonathan strode up to him.

In a voice of assumed calmness he spoke.

"You took two prisoners last night in a boat on the Thames?"

The captain nodded.

"I want them."

The captain shook his head.

"Tell me where they are—show me where you have placed them, and your life shall be spared. I promise you that."

The captain again shook his head.

Wild grew impatient.

He held his sword in a threatening attitude.

"Now tell me where they are," he said, "or you die instantly."

The pirate captain made several very powerful efforts to speak.

He opened his mouth and a gush of blood came from it.

Then he managed to articulate the one word—

"Escaped!"

"Escaped!" yelled Wild, in a voice of frenzied fury.

"Escaped!—how, when, where?"

But these questions were not replied to.

The head of the pirate captain suddenly fell forward on his breast.

The muscles in his neck appeared to have lost their rigidity.

He was dead.

The men who held him found he became a dead weight in their grasp.

They released him.

He fell headlong to the floor.

To describe Jonathan's rage would be altogether impossible.

[THE THREE FUGITIVES HALT AT THE SUICIDE'S GRAVE.]

He cursed, he swore, he tore about the place like a madman in the direst extremity of delirium.

These repeated defeats were trying in the extreme to Jonathan's temper—never one of the gentlest and most amiable.

Had fate determined that he should be for ever baffled and defeated in all his attempts against these two persons?

It looked like it.

But Jonathan would not have it so.

Taking a large piece of pinewood from the fire, the shape of which was something like a torch, and which was blazing brightly, he held it aloft above his head, and dashed into the recesses in the foundations of the old mill.

Narrowly and closely did he search, for Jonathan Wild was of course quite an expert and proficient at that sort of thing.

He never went over the same ground twice, and he left no place unvisited.

But the numberless beams of wood, crossing and recrossing each other as they did in every direction, were rather bewildering even to him.

In and out he went—up and down—followed at every step by his men.

In their closest search, however, they were unable to find a trace either of those of whom they were in search or of any outlet to the place.

Jonathan looked as closely after one as the other, and when he could not find there was any means of egress from the underground apartment besides that by which he had entered, he came to the conclusion that the two fugitives were only hiding somewhere.

If they were in the mill, Jonathan determined to have them.

They could not leave it if they had not already done so, for the place was surrounded on the outside by his men, who would not on any account permit them to pass.

CHAPTER CCLXIX.

THE ADVENTURES OF JACK SHEPPARD AND EDGORTH BESS IN THE RUINED MILL.

LEAVING Jonathan Wild and his band of janizaries, as he loved to call them, to prosecute their search among the intricate foundations of the old mill, we will turn our attention to Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess themselves, and relate what took place after we saw them last.

When last presented to the reader, they were seated close to the fire which was now fast expiring.

The furious carouse in which the pirates had been indulging had come to a conclusion.

One by one they had slunk away into odd nooks and corners, in order to sleep off the fumes of what they had drunk.

The spy had started to find Jonathan Wild, and to betray his comrades.

One man had been left as a kind of sentinel or watch over the prisoners.

He had partaken rather freely of the contents of the cup, and he was more fit to join his comrades in their slumber than anything else.

Every now and then his eyes would close, and his head drop upon his breast, but with a start he would recover himself and look around him.

He struggled manfully against the combined soporific tendencies of what he had drunk and the fire before which he sat.

Jack and Edgworth Bess had taken advantage of this state of things to have the little conversation with each other which we have already placed before the eyes of the reader.

The former had communicated to his companion the suspicions which the behaviour of the spy had engendered in his breast, and, as we are aware, had come to a tolerably correct conclusion concerning the whole matter.

Then, when Edgworth Bess, in a voice of the utmost terror, and almost ready to swoon, had asked him what they should do, Jack had replied, in tones of resolution, by twice uttering the word—

“Escape!”

That was, indeed, the only course open to them, but how were they to achieve such a feat?

Jack could not have told himself.

He was not blind to the difficulties and dangers in the way; he kept his eyes open to them all; but he would not permit them to be magnified, and so be the means of causing him unnecessary alarm.

He looked every one of them, as one might say, calmly in the face, and considered in what way he should be best able to overcome them.

In the first place, there was the man who was keeping watch.

In what way should he be dealt with?

It would seem as though, ere long, he would fall off into a deep sleep.

The coast would then be clear.

It was almost too much to hope for, though.

The man might struggle against slumber for a long time—so long that the prisoners would be unable to avail themselves of it in the manner intended.

He must be prevented from giving an alarm.

Jack Sheppard was little more than a moment in arriving at these conclusions.

His invention was fertile, and he quickly hit upon a plan of making this man secure.

Noticing that he was in a half-dozed, Jack abstracted from his pocket a quantity of rather thick twine.

He motioned to Edgworth Bess to remain still, and on no account to move.

The poor girl obeyed, and watched what he was about to do with anxious, wondering eyes.

Having selected a portion of the twine, which was several feet in length, he doubled it four times and twisted it.

This done, he gently changed his position.

He sank down until his body was on a level with the floor, and then cautiously crept forward like a snake.

He held the piece of twine in his hand.

He had not to creep more than a yard before he came to where the man was sitting.

His feet were close together upon the ground.

With great dexterity and caution Jack slipped the twine round his ankles.

In one end of it he made a running noose, so he was able to gradually draw it tight and then secure it.

Edgworth Bess watched him with bated breath and a beating heart, for she every moment dreaded that the man would wake up sufficiently to become aware of what Jack was about.

But he did not.

He moved uneasily now and then, and shifted his position slightly.

At such times as those Jack took care to remain profoundly still, and not to move in the least.

Presently his legs were firmly bound together, and then, with a triumphant expression on his countenance, Jack crept back to the side of his fair companion.

But he held his finger on his lip as a sign for her to remain silent.

He had done much, but he had a great deal more to do.

Emboldened, however, by his previous success, some more twine was selected.

A slip-knot was also made in this.

Jack now prepared to creep forward again.

Edgworth Bess seemed much terrified, and expressed as much by her gestures.

Jack, however, by a smile strove to reassure her, and made her a sign to give him a thick shawl which she wore round her shoulders.

Unable to imagine for whatever purpose this could be required, the girl, with looks of great curiosity, took it off and handed it to him.

Thus provided, Jack crept forward again.

But this time he did not go in a straight line to the half-sleeping sentinel.

On the contrary, he seemed to crawl away from him, but Edgworth Bess soon found out what were his intentions.

He was creeping round, so as to get behind him.

It seemed a weary time while he was doing this.

But Jack was cautious and stealthy in his movements, and consequently slow.

He was all but noiseless.

At length Jack was fairly at the back of the sleeping man.

Then he cautiously rose to his feet, until he stood at his full height behind him.

Jack had the thick shawl over his shoulder.

In both his hands he held the piece of twine, which was already in the form of a noose.

Gently, then, and scarcely breathing as he did so, Jack slipped the noose over the sentinel's head, and allowed it to descend until it was in such a position that, by drawing the knot tight, he should be able to bind the man's arms tight to his sides just above his elbows.

With his heart beating at a faster rate than usual, Jack proceeded to draw the string tight.

Bit by bit he drew it in, until at last, to his inexpressible satisfaction, he had the man secure.

To a great extent he was now powerless.

His hands and feet being secured in the manner we have described, it was out of the question that he should be able to do anything towards arresting their flight.

There was only one thing that he could do, and that was to raise the alarm by uttering an outcry.

But Jack Sheppard had not omitted that contingency in his calculations.

He had provided the thick shawl for the purpose of precluding all possibility of that.

Having done so much, and scarcely daring to draw his breath, Jack took the ends of the shawl in his hands, and, having folded it properly, with great swiftness put it over the man's head, and tied it tightly at the back.

It covered not only his mouth but his ears, and nose, and his eyes, thus depriving him at once of hearing, seeing, and speaking, and permitting him to breathe in only a limited manner.

No sooner was the shawl tied thus than the sentinel made a desperate effort to shout out and then to rise.

But in both of these, it may be said, he failed utterly, for his voice came no louder than a murmur, and on springing off his seat, he fell heavily on the ground.

No sound loud enough to attract attention or to cause an alarm followed this, and Jack Sheppard made a hasty sign to Edgworth Bess to leave her crouched-up position by the side of the fire, and come towards him.

Trembling in every limb, and scarcely daring to breathe, the poor girl obeyed him.

She was terrified to a degree by the man Jack had so skilfully bound, and who continued to writhe and contort himself upon the floor in a manner quite astonishing to behold.

Edgworth Bess had been in an agony of terror during the whole of Jack's proceedings, and now she seemed as though her limbs would sink beneath her.

Jack saw the state of agitation she was in, and sprang forward to her assistance, but not until he had divested the sentinel—if such he could be called—of his sword and other defensive weapons.

Thus provided, Jack felt himself in a position to do battle with as many of the poor heiress's foes as chose to present themselves before him.

One arm encircled the persecuted girl's waist.

She leaned her head upon his shoulder and clung frantically to him with her arms.

But Jack reassured her, and spoke encouraging words, by which means he succeeded in calming her agitation.

Then he glanced coolly around him, and, as well as the faint fire-light would permit him, took in the general aspect of the place.

How he was to really escape from the mill and gain the open air, Jack had no definite idea.

But he meant to do it somehow or other, and, if he failed now, he might say farewell to ever succeeding at a future period.

He had noticed how the pirates had retired in all directions among the timber, and he was naturally afraid of encountering some of them, when, of course, an alarm would be immediately given.

It was quite in vain, though, that Jack tried to indicate the spot where he had entered by means of the little door, which was not visible from the interior.

The only thing he had to guide him was the direction which the spy had taken.

The gloom of the place was very great, and, after a momentary hesitation, Jack took a blazing brand from the fire, and determined, at all risks, to make use of it to aid him in his explorations.

He had nothing else about him which would answer his purpose.

With some little difficulty he persuaded his terrified companion to carry this light, but it was not until he told her the true reason of his wishing her to do so that she complied.

It was in order that Jack might still continue to hold his arm round her waist and support her steps, and so that he could have his right hand to grasp his sword, and so be in a position to defend himself from any attack that might be made upon them.

It was not until he had told her this that she complied, and then, struck with the obvious necessity of such a course, she took the extemporized torch, though her hand trembled so much as she held it that its extinguishment seemed imminent.

Slowly and silently Jack Sheppard now led the way across the strange underground apartment.

All was still.

It was evident that as yet no suspicions were excited.

The man by the fire, from some cause or other, had ceased his struggles and contortions.

Perhaps the shawl fitted just a little too closely over his nose and mouth.

Jack was not likely to trouble himself much about that. The beams of wood, if they had been erected for the express purpose of confusing anybody, could not have been designed better for achieving that end.

When he passed among their mazy intricacies, Jack was fain to confess himself fairly bewildered.

But he pushed on, and presently, no less to his astonishment than his delight, he saw before him a rudely-made wooden door, which he concluded at once must be the one through which he had been dragged by his captors.

The reader must be kind enough to remember that Bess did not recover from her swoon until she was placed beside the fire they had just left, so, of course, she had not the remotest knowledge of the route by which she had been brought to that subterranean region.

But with Jack Sheppard the case was entirely different.

To be sure his intellect was somewhat confused in consequence of the heavy blow he had received on the top of his head, but still he was sufficiently in possession of his senses to take notice of everything.

He knew, therefore, that, should this prove to be the door through which he had been brought, he should find a passage on the other side of it, and, at the further end of the passage a flight of steps leading up to the little door by the side of the mill, where a man had sat on guard.

With these facts fresh in his mind, Jack had some data to go upon.

A glance at this door showed him that the fastenings upon it were of the commonest description.

It gave him not the least trouble to open.

He passed through quickly, taking his companion with him.

Then he closed the door.

Edgworth Bess held up the firebrand as high as she could, so as to diffuse its light as much as possible, and by the aid of this Jack saw he was in a passage which, so far as he could tell, was the very one through which he had formerly passed.

He said as much to Edgworth Bess, and then added—

"If this is so, dearest, I must leave you here a moment with the light while I creep forward in the darkness and reconnoitre. Do not be afraid to stay; I shall soon be back, and shall not run into any danger. For our mutual safety I implore you to do this."

Thus adjured, Bess could not refuse compliance, although she would have gladly done so.

Had she known of the sentinel at the top of the steps, she would not have given her consent.

But, happily, she was ignorant of it.

Again imploring her not to move upon any account, but to keep quite still for a moment close to the door, Jack Sheppard, with the stealthy and noiseless tread of a Red Indian, crept along the passage in the direction of the flight of steps.

With straining eyes, Edgworth Bess looked after him until he became invisible.

CHAPTER CCLXX.

JACK SHEPPARD AND EDGWORTH BESS SUCCEEDED IN MAKING THEIR ESCAPE FROM THE RUINED MILL, BUT NOT WITHOUT INCURRING GREAT DANGER.

JACK SHEPPARD was fully impressed with the necessity and importance of ascertaining whether there was still a sentinel at the top of the steps.

If there was not, well and good. His course would then be clear and open before him. But, if there was? What then?

Simply this.

He must be effectually prevented from detaining the escaping prisoners, and also from giving the alarm to his slumbering comrades.

And it was in anticipation of this latter alternative that Jack had crept forward in the manner we have described, leaving Edgworth Bess half-fainting with terror at the end of the passage farthest from the steps.

Jack's heart was stern and firm.

He was determined that no single man, let him be whom he might, should stand between him and freedom.

He found the bottom of the flight of steps easily enough, and commenced the ascent with even more caution than he had yet displayed.

Up—up he went—trusting to find the man sleeping at his post, because, if he did so, he should, in all probability, be spared the necessity of taking his life.

The staircase was a great height, much higher than he thought it was, but then it would seem so to Jack, for he paused at every stair he ascended.

No sound, however, of any kind came upon his ears.

But he did not abate his caution in any way.

At length Jack heard a faint sound.

He stopped instantly.

It was as though some one had moved.

The place was in the profoundest darkness, so, of course, he could see nothing.

He had only his ears to depend upon.

The faint sound was as though some one near him had moved.

The next moment he heard some words muttered in a low and half-sleepy tone.

The sentinel was, then, at his post.

Jack drew in his breath, and set his teeth hard together.

He now became conscious that the place was gradually getting lighter, and he could not at first account for the phenomenon.

The illumination was very faint, and would scarcely have been apparent to any but one who had for some time been in total darkness.

The light came through the various chinks, and slits, and cracks that were in the sides of the ruined mill.

But, dim as the light was, it enabled Jack to see about him.

He proceeded now with much greater confidence, and, after mounting a few more steps, he was able to distinguish the outlines of a man.

He was seated in a huddled-up sort of fashion, and was, to all appearances, asleep.

He had probably been partially aroused by some slight noise made by Jack in his ascent, and then dropped off to sleep again.

Jack was yet in hopes that he should be able to approach him unperceived.

But in this he was mistaken.

No sooner had he got close to the top of the staircase than the sentinel started to his feet.

In another moment he would have given the alarm.

But Jack, seeing the imminent danger of discovery with which he was threatened, made one bound forward, and clutched the sentinel tightly round the throat with his left hand.

With his right he flashed the sword before his eyes, and in a suppressed voice he said—

“Utter a word, or make the least resistance, and I will assuredly run you through with this sword.”

The man heard the words.

He happened, however, to be possessed of a courageous spirit, for he paid no heed to them whatever, but, without speaking a word, he seized Jack with both hands, and twisted his leg round his foe's.

Then, giving himself the necessary impulse, he fell backwards, of course carrying Jack with him, who was completely taken by surprise by the suddenness with which the manœuvre was performed.

Jack dropped the sword, for in such close quarters it would be of little service.

He would do better with his right hand at liberty.

A desperate struggle now commenced.

Jack still retained the firm clutch he had taken of the man's throat, who, though he strove to shout for aid, found himself unable to do so.

Inarticulate murmurs only came from his lips.

Over and over they rolled upon the floor, each of them instinctively keeping away from the staircase.

The place upon which the struggle took place was very limited in its area, and more than once the combatants overhung the staircase in an alarming manner.

Jack Sheppard found that the man to whom he was opposed was much his superior in size and strength.

But he would not allow this disadvantage to daunt him.

The struggle might be a protracted one, but he determined not to yield.

They now rose partly to their feet, still grappling with each other.

Jack put forth his utmost strength, determined to make one great and final effort.

He pressed the man backwards.

But he did not know how close he was to the steep staircase.

As he pressed the man back he overbalanced, and the two, still holding one another in a desperate grip, rolled headlong down, their bodies striking with a sickening crash against the steps and against the sides of the mill.

The bottom was reached in an incredibly short space of time.

With a tremendous crash, which seemed to shake the building from its roof to its foundations, the combatants fell upon the floor, and lay there without either of them exhibiting the least signs of life or motion.

A piercing shriek came from the lips of Edgworth Bess as they fell down.

Unable to restrain her impatience, she had disobeyed Jack's injunctions not to move from the door, and had, step by step, made her way along the passage in the direction of the stairs.

Upon reaching here, however, she fortunately did not attempt to ascend, but stood listening.

Faintly came to her ears the sound of the conflict going on above.

Then the two bodies came tumbling down.

Instinctively she drew back, and the scream came from her lips when she recognised Jack.

That scream had both a good and bad effect.

It awoke Jack from the state of half-insensibility which his fearful fall had produced, and he sprang quickly to his feet.

But it also awoke the echoes of that subterranean place, and rang with remarkable distinctness in the ears of the slumbering pirates, who, one and all, sprang to their feet with a confused consciousness that something was amiss.

Upon uttering the scream, and seeing Jack spring to his feet, Edgworth Bess felt all her strength suddenly leave her—a mist floated before her eyes, and she fell backwards into a swoon.

Luckily Jack saw what was about to happen, and he sprang forward and caught her just before she reached the ground.

The man at the bottom of the staircase, although the injuries he had received were very much greater than those sustained by Jack, began to show unequivocal signs of returning animation.

From the rear, too, came fierce shouts and cries, the clashing of weapons, and the trampling of feet, all telling that the pirates were thoroughly aroused.

Jack's position was a perilous one.

Not for a moment, however, did he lose his presence of mind.

All would depend upon the next few minutes.

He had powerful incentives for him to make every exertion.

Raising the inanimate form of Edgworth Bess in his arms, he made a dash towards the staircase, trampling down again to the earth his late antagonist.

He was just in time, for the door was flung open, and the pirates in a body rushed into the passage.

They were all well armed, and most of them carried lights.

They were, however, in a state of great indecision, for not one of them could take upon themselves to say precisely what was the matter.

Jack's strength was quite inadequate to the task of carrying Edgworth Bess up the steep flight of stairs.

He knew it, and every moment he felt as though his legs were giving way beneath him, and that he was falling down.

But the desperate nature of his situation, and the nature of the peril in which he was placed, nerved him with strength of a fictitious character, which made him equal to the emergency.

Up he went.

He staggered from side to side.

He halted now and then.

But still he kept upwards—upwards, until the little landing-place close to the sliding panel was reached.

Here he halted, and drew his breath painfully.

He wiped the clustering drops of perspiration from his face.

Just then his foot struck against something.

It rang with a metallic sound.

Jack knew what it was, and, with a joyful cry upon his lips, he stooped and picked it up.

It was the sword which he had dropped a little while before.

He made one slashing cut with it at the little sliding panel which intervened between him and the daylight.

The cut was an effective one.

The panel sunk down in a moment.

Quick as thought he passed through, taking his insensible burden with him.

But the pirates, now conscious that their two prisoners were escaping, and knowing what dangerous information they possessed, were crowding up the staircase, anxious to recapture them at all hazards, alive or dead, though they would have preferred the former.

But Jack had the start.

How he got down the crazy, ricketty ladder on the outside, Jack never exactly knew.

But he was conscious he reached the bottom, and at that moment the idea darted into his head that he had the means at his disposal of impeding the pursuit of the pirates, and that for a considerable period.

What more easy than, with a few vigorous slashes with his sword, to cut away the frail and ruinous ladder?

Without stopping a second to reflect upon this matter, he allowed Edgworth Bess to slide out of his arms on to the ground, and, with the agility of a squirrel, he ran up the steps again.

When he had ascended about half of them, he saw the heads of the pirates appear at the aperture.

The foremost of them gained the ladder and commenced the descent.

To be of any real good, he must be speedy in his actions.

He swung the sword round his head, and brought it down on one side of the staircase.

The woodwork was severed at a single blow.

One more blow on the other side completed the work of demolition, for the extra weight upon the top assisted him in a great measure.

There was a sudden crackling sound, and then, with a crash, which mingled with the cries that came from the lips of the pirates, the upper half of the staircase gave way, and those who were upon it were violently precipitated to the ground.

With the quickness of thought, Jack, finding himself so completely successful, descended the steps again.

In another moment he was by the side of Edgworth Bess.

The change of position and the fresh cool air had recovered her from her swoon.

She knew Jack instantly, and clung to him tightly.

As yet recollection had not fully come back to her, and she did not realize her position.

Jack Sheppard caught her up in his arms.

Turning round, he saw at the aperture near the top of the old mill, a crowd of anxious, bloodthirsty-looking faces.

He must have been seen by them, for a volley was fired.

Happily, without inflicting any injury either upon him or his companion.

Those pirates who had fallen to the ground along with the ladder, lay just where they had chanced to drop, incapable of motion.

Jack turned and fled.

To his great satisfaction he found that a dense mist had risen from the river and overspread the land.

It increased in thickness and opacity every moment.

A more favourable occurrence than this could not well have happened to him, because he should be able to get out of sight of his foes so much sooner.

In less time than one could have deemed possible, the mill was entirely out of sight.

A gush of joy came over his heart when he became conscious that he had really escaped—that he had succeeded in saving himself and the poor heiress from the frightful peril which menaced her.

His voice was faint and almost inarticulate, but he managed to keep repeating in the ears of Edgworth Bess—

"We have escaped—we have escaped!"

The poor girl heard him, and clung to his neck without fully comprehending the purport of the words he addressed to her, and yet she knew that, for the present, they were really out of danger.

Jack staggered more than once, but still he kept bravely on.

Suddenly, and before he was aware of it, he found himself close to the water's edge.

He would probably have walked into the river, for the mist was so thick that he could not see its surface, only his attention was attracted by a voice saying, in hoarse tones—

"Boat—boat, your honour? Want a boat? I'll take you to London-bridge for a shilling. Boat, your honour, boat? Take the boat? I want to get back to London, but not empty-handed. Only a shilling. Will you go, sir?"

"Yes," said Jack faintly; "yes. To London-bridge. You shall be well paid for your trouble."

CHAPTER CCLXXI.

EDGORTH BESS AND JACK SHEPPARD REACH LONDON BRIDGE IN SAFETY.

JUST for a few moments we will leave Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess, and return to Jonathan Wild.

The reader will understand, then, that it was about a couple of hours after the occurrence of the incidents which we have just described that Jonathan Wild and his band arrived at the old mill.

By that time the pirates, who deemed it futile to look for the two escaped prisoners in the mist now that they had once lost sight of them, had repaired the damage Jack had done.

Some of those within the mill descended to the foundation, and returned with a rope, which they fastened securely to the structure, and used as a means of reaching the ground.

Being sailors, they were able to slip down the rope without any trouble.

Two men had fallen with the fragment of the ladder, and the fall had injured them seriously, so much so that they were unable to move hand or foot.

The rage of the pirates at this defeat knew no bounds.

The pirate captain, however, was a man who always took care to make the best of a bad job.

Instead of uselessly raving about his misfortune, he called his men together and told them to repair the staircase in such a manner that no suspicion should be excited by any one who might chance to notice its altered condition.

The men set about this labour cheerfully enough, because they were well aware that the safety of their haunt depended entirely upon its being kept a secret.

Hence was it, that upon the arrival of Jonathan Wild and the spy about two hours afterwards, no trace was left of what had taken place.

The staircase had been restored, and as soon as this was over the captain had recompensed their labour and atoned for the bruises they might have received by broaching a cask, and inviting them to a general carouse.

To this they immediately consented, because it was congenial to their feelings, and they were in the height of their glee when the door, which they fancied so secure, was burst open, and the much-dreaded thief-taker, Jonathan Wild, rushed into the apartment.

In a previous chapter we have minutely related what took place after Jonathan's sudden irruption—how the pirates had been vanquished and the greater part of them taken prisoners, and how the pirate captain had expired through the injuries he had received, after communicating to Wild the important and unexpected intelligence that the two prisoners had escaped.

How and when the captain did not live long enough to inform him, and we have seen how Jonathan, with that energy which formed so prominent a trait in his disposition, had set about searching the foundations of the mill.

That the search could have but one result, and that an unsuccessful one, so far as the thief-taker's interests were concerned, the reader must already be aware; for which reason it would be tedious and unnecessary to give a lengthened account of Wild's proceedings, since the ultimate result of them must be known.

Let it suffice to say that, after a long and minute search, he was obliged to admit his failure, and come to the conclusion that his prey had again escaped him, though he was unwilling in the extreme to do so.

Such being the case, he called his men together and mounted his own steed.

Then at the head of his band and his prisoners, he meedily made his way back to London.

He spoke but few words for he was busy with his thoughts.

In a most unexpected manner, almost the whole of his stolen treasure had come back to him.

Then there was the piratical crew he had prisoners.

He quickly made up his mind what to do with them.

He would lodge them in prison and appear against them, when he would be able to give such an exaggerated and glowing description of the manner in which they had been captured, that everybody who heard it would be deluded into the idea that he was the most wonderful police-officer that ever existed.

His plans were settled with them so far, and he justly calculated by doing this that he should blind the eyes of the authorities to the various little irregularities in his conduct which might have come under their notice.

And this it is that chiefly accounts for the length of time Jonathan was permitted to carry on his depre-datory operations.

Then the government was at that time notoriously the most corrupt that ever had or has existed—which the reader must recollect is saying a great deal—and these unworthy administrators felt the want of an unscrupulous agent like Jonathan Wild.

They made him their tool in many a dark and nefarious transaction, until at length they were placed in his power and afraid to take any very energetic proceedings against him, for fear that by so doing he should in revenge disclose certain particulars which would inevitably bring ruin upon them.

Fortunately, such a state of things could not now possibly exist, though the country was threatened with something almost as bad a short time since.

Jonathan Wild was an excellent tactician, however, but then he was one who never troubled much about what he did.

He managed to keep in with the government, with the opposition, and with the people at large, though of course there were a great many acquainted with his enormities, but they could not make themselves heard against the redoubtable thief-taker.

But his monstrous villainies had now reached their culminating point, as succeeding events will quickly show.

While upon the subject of the Thames pirates, we may as well refer to their ultimate fate, which will save all further trouble.

In due time they were brought up for trial, and were found guilty upon the testimony of Jonathan Wild, who, "from information he had received," had attacked them in their secret haunt, and, after a desperate conflict, had succeeded in vanquishing them, and taking them into custody.

They were found guilty, of course, and a few days afterwards executed at Tyburn, very much to the advantage and popularity of Jonathan Wild.

We must now request the reader to return with us while we describe the remainder of the proceedings of Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess upon that eventful evening.

The sound of the man's voice asking him whether he wanted a boat, came most welcome upon the ears of Jack Sheppard, who was scarcely cognizant of anything save the fact that he was staggering somewhere with his burden.

The voice, however, and the words it uttered, completely restored him to consciousness, and in faint tones he managed to gasp out a request that he should be taken to London-bridge, coupled with the assurance that the waterman should be well paid for his trouble.

This was enough.

The boatman, who had come down there from London-bridge with a fare, was anxious to return, but, at the same time, he did not wish to go empty-handed.

He would have been glad to take Jack for a very small sum, but when he heard him offer to pay a liberal fare, he was most avaricious.

He jumped out of the boat, and came towards Jack.

"I am hurt," gasped Jack, in a still fainter voice, for he felt that all his strength was leaving him. "I am hurt, and this young girl has fainted, take her with you."

"No," replied Edgworth Bess, struggling to her feet.

"I have recovered now. Where are we now, Jack?"

"Never mind, dearest. Be content—th this amount of knowledge—you are in safety."

"Thank heaven."

The boatman assisted the poor girl into the boat, and Jack followed as well as he could.

He had the greatest difficulty in keeping himself from falling into a swoon.

"Push off," he said to the boatman; "and the sooner you reach your destination the better."

"All right, sir; but I shall have to be careful. Do you see what a thick fog there is upon the river? It would be no joke for us to run foul of any craft larger than ourselves."

Jack Sheppard looked around him as the boatman spoke, and probably, for the first time, noticed that so dense a vapour hung upon the water that they could not see a boat's length before them.

To navigate the river under such circumstances would require the exercise of very great skill and caution, for that part of the Thames was always thronged with various vessels riding at anchor, and he would have to thread his way through their intricacies.

"By all means be careful," said Jack, as he saw the danger with which they were threatened. "Be careful by all means. I am afraid you will have much ado to avoid a collision."

"Leave that to me, sir. If you will be content to sit apart a little, and allow me to have my own way, I shall be all right."

Jack had no objection to this course, so he at once turned his attention to Edgworth Bess.

He found she was sobbing and crying bitterly.

That, however, was but the reaction produced by the various and violent excitements she had undergone.

Jack spoke to her, and she soon grew calmer.

"We have escaped from the pirates, and are beyond all reach of their pursuit. We are now in a boat upon the Thames, and, ere long, I trust we shall reach London-bridge."

"Oh! Jack, how comforting to hear those words. Are you sure you are not deceiving me?"

"Deceiving you?"

"I mean, I hope you are not trying to make out that things are better than they really are."

"No, indeed I am not."

"Then I rejoice. But, Jack, your voice is faint, and your breathing laboured. You are hurt. I am sure you are hurt, Jack. Tell me at once."

"I am shaken a little."

"Oh! I recollect now; I had forgotten it. There was that fearful fall down the steep flight of steps. Is it possible you live? I made sure it had killed you."

"Yes, I live, dearest. I am bruised and sadly knocked about, but a little rest will soon put that all right."

"I trust so, but I fear your injuries are greater than you would like to confess them to be."

"No—no; do not think that, dearest. But I am not one to sink under a hurt, or to make more of it than I ought."

"Nor enough. But, Jack, where are we now?"

"Somewhere on the Thames. I have hired this man to take us to London-bridge."

"But do you see how thick the fog is? I cannot see a couple of yards around us. How is the waterman to find his way?"

"That is his business. I have little doubt he will be able to steer clear of all obstacles."

"I hope so; but, Jack."

"What, dear one?"

"You said we were going to London-bridge."

"Yes."

"What shall we do there?"

"I have scarcely thought yet. We must consider."

"What made you think of London-bridge at all?"

"I did not think of it."

"Not think of it?"

"No. After we got out of the mill we were pursued, and I caught you up in my arms and ran as fast as I was able. The fog was dense, as you see it now. Moreover, I felt myself dizzy and blinded, and I was scarcely conscious of where I was going. Suddenly I was hailed by this waterman. His voice recalled me to myself. I then found I had ran to the river's brink. He called to me, and asked me whether I wanted to go to London-bridge. Can you imagine how readily I seized upon this chance of escape?"

"Oh! yes, Jack, I understand all now quite well. Alas! what an evil fate is ours. We seem doomed to nothing but trouble and misfortune. Surely after all this strife and danger there will come a long period of repose."

"I hope so, dearest—indeed I hope so, for I feel almost sick at heart at these perpetual struggles against adverse destiny. Were it not for you I should have succumbed long ago."

"Do not talk of failure, Jack. Consider what we had better do upon our arrival at London-bridge."

"I should like to find Blueskin."

"But where is he?"

"I have no idea. I have not seen him since he landed at Westminster."

"I fear he must have fallen into the hands of the villain Wild."

"That is what I dread."

"And I, too."

"But we must not give up. We must try to find him. On many an occasion he has proved himself a match for Jonathan Wild, and I am not altogether without a hope that he has succeeded in escaping from him."

"How shall you ascertain whether he is Wild's prisoner?"

"That is the difficulty, but if we think the matter over, doubtless some idea will suggest itself to us."

"The treasure has gone," said Edgworth Bess, after a pause.

"I know it. Fain would I have carried that away with me, but, alas! it was impossible. We were all but recaptured as it was."

"I must have been insensible nearly the whole of the time, for my remembrance of what took place is exceedingly confused."

"You were insensible for a long time. Perhaps it was all for the best."

"We will try to think so. But, you know I said we have lost the treasure?"

"Yes."

"Do you know the effect of that loss? We are penniless."

"We are, for those rascally pirates took everything valuable we had about us."

"They did. I have a purse in my bosom with a little money in it, but that is all."

"It is better than nothing, at any rate. We shall be able to pay this man his fare."

"But what are we to do? How are we to escape Wild without money?"

"We must do the best we can. If we can find Blueskin, I have no doubt all will be well."

At this moment the waterman cried out—

"London-bridge, your honour. London-bridge. Here we are safe now, your honour."

The keel of the boat grated on the shore at the bottom of the steps, for it was low tide.

Jack gave the man a liberal fare, and then assisted his companion to land.

Hand in hand they ascended the steps, and directly afterwards stood upon old London-bridge, uncertain which way to turn.

CHAPTER CCLXXII.

BLUESKIN RATHER UNEXPECTEDLY MEETS WITH JACK SHEPPARD AND EDGWORTH BESS.

TURN we now to the proceedings of Blueskin, who we left in rather a peculiar situation.

He was seated in the post-chaise with the young girl who he had saved from a fate that was ten times worse than death itself, and he had just finished listening to the story of her wrongs when the vehicle came to a sudden halt.

What could be the cause of this he was at a loss to think, but, dreading the occurrence of some fresh misfortune, he let down the window of the post-chaise and projected his head through it.

He was unable to see anything in the shape of an obstruction, as he had quite expected.

"Hullo, coachman!" he cried. "What is the meaning of this?"

But no one replied, and, upon looking round him Blueskin found himself in a very strange place indeed.

The reader will doubtless recollect that when Blueskin entered the post-chaise along with the young girl, he had tied his horse to the back part of the vehicle, and directed the coachman to drive towards London, saying that he would presently give him the address to which he was to go.

He had compelled the coachman by threats to mount the box and to drive on.

Then he became so deeply interested in the narrative which the young girl related to him, that he quite forgot to look in what direction they were going, or whether they passed any familiar objects upon the road.

That was very near becoming a fatal oversight.

The driver, who was deep in the confidence of his rascally employer, and who was well aware of all the particulars of the transaction, made up his mind before going very far to try whether he could not drive to his original destination, and reach it before the inmates were aware of what he was about.

He put his intention into practice, and instead of going where Blueskin had ordered him, drove to the house where the squire was waiting for his panderer and his victim.

It was a house on the outskirts of London, surrounded by grounds of considerable extent.

He drove through the lodge gates unquestioned, because the arrival of the post-chaise was expected.

The gates were closed again and fastened up for the night.

The carriage-drive up to the house was as wide, or nearly so, as an ordinary road, and was bordered on both sides by tall trees.

Along this, then, the carriage rolled, Blueskin being all the time unconscious of where he was going.

Then, as we have related, the chaise stopped.

The moment it came to a standstill the coachman descended from the box with perhaps more agility than he ever had in his life before, and running round to the back of the vehicle, untied Blueskin's horse, and sent him off at a gallop over a spacious lawn.

His hoofs made no sound upon the soft turf, so Blueskin was quite unconscious of it.

The coachman, considering he had made things as secure as lay in his power, ran towards the house, the front door of which was thrown open before he could reach it, thus indicating with tolerable plainness that the chaise had been heard to stop.

This was what Blueskin saw when he put his head out of the chaise window.

Before him a house, the outlines of which could be only imperfectly distinguished, and from the open door of which there came a bright light.

He saw, too, several persons standing on the threshold.

Around him he could see the spacious grounds belonging to the residence in front.

He comprehended all in a moment.

He was angry with himself for having been so incautious.

It was time, however, for prompt action if he wished to yet save the young girl who had put faith in his powers to aid her, and if he wished to escape with his own life, for he rightly enough judged that those who would abduct a young and innocent girl, would not stop short at any means, however desperate, of achieving their ends.

Without staying any longer than it took him to give a hasty glance around and comprehend his position, Blueskin turned the handle of the chaise door and sprang out on to the ground.

He called to the young girl to follow him, and he assisted her to alight.

Those persons who had appeared at the front door now uttered loud cries, and came running with hostile manifestations towards the chaise.

Blueskin, recollecting his horse, ran to the back where he had fastened it.

His design was to mount, taking the girl on the saddle with him, and effecting an immediate retreat, for single-handed he could have had no chance against the numbers opposed to him.

To his dismay he discovered that the horse was gone.

How was he to escape?

There was no time to answer the question, for about half-a-dozen men were close to him.

The young girl, although she did not thoroughly comprehend her danger, yet understood enough of it to be aware that she had much to dread, so she clung with terrified tightness to Blueskin's arm.

"Fly—fly!" she said. "Oh! fly!"

"A good thought," said Blueskin. "We will escape them yet. Be of good cheer, and all will be well. Keep hold of my hand, and run with all the speed you are capable of."

[THE CAPTURE OF BLUESKIN BY JONATHAN WILD AND HIS MYRMIDONS.]

The inmates were all in bed, but, at length, he had the satisfaction of seeing the door opened, and the girl received by her relatives with every manifestation of pleasure.

To their pressing request to stay Blueskin replied that important business required his immediate attention, and that he had already sacrificed more time than he could well spare.

They urged him no more.

Hastily bidding them farewell, and with the pleasant feeling about his heart which the knowledge of having done good invariably produces, Blueskin dismissed the incident almost entirely from his mind, and directed the whole of his thoughts to a consideration of his own position.

He had failed to do what he had determined upon, namely, to follow Jonathan Wild.

Now where was he to look for his two companions in misfortune, Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess?

CHAPTER CCLXXIII.

JONATHAN WILD MISSES HIS PREY BY A HAIR'S BREADTH.

PERHAPS at that very moment, he thought, and the reflection was maddening in the extreme, they might be attacked by Wild, and unable to defend themselves any longer against him, when, if he was there, the aspect of affairs would be completely altered.

The interposition of his strong arm might save them from death or capture.

But what trace or clue had he to their whereabouts? What hope could he have of meeting with them?

None whatever.

In a despairing sort of way he turned round and round upon his heels, uncertain which way to take.

To him all roads appeared to be alike.

Little did Blueskin imagine the real facts of the case, and, though he pictured his two companions in trouble, how far did the imagination fall short of the reality.

At length Blueskin, who felt that no good could be done by remaining in such a state of indecision on that spot, turned towards London.

At that lone and silent hour of the night all the streets were deserted. It was only now and then, and at long intervals that he met a pedestrian, hurrying along as though his life depended upon his speed.

The state of Blueskin's mind is quite indescribable. Knowing as we do that he has the interests both of Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess at heart, we can only faintly conceive his mental confusion and dismay.

From the words which he had heard Jonathan Wild utter when that worthy set out upon his expedition, he came to the conclusion that Jack and Bess were not yet in his power; and still those words might not have had reference to them at all, but to some other persons whose capture the thief-taker desired.

Perplexed, bewildered, completely lost in a maze of thought, Blueskin continued on his way.

He had paid little or no attention to the route he had taken. He was aware that he had walked a long way, and that he was still in London, but that was all.

Suddenly he looked around him, in order to ascertain his precise position.

Somewhat to his surprise, he found himself on old London-bridge.

Seeing this, he thought in a moment that it was higher up the Thames that he had lost his companions, and with a slower step he walked across the bridge to one of the embrasures in the parapet, from which a view of the river can be obtained.

As in the present structure, there were seats in these embrasures where those who were tired could sit down.

When he entered the one nearest to him, Blueskin noticed that two persons were seated in it who shrunk back into the shadow as soon as he made his appearance.

It was very dark, and there were few objects which could be distinctly seen.

He mounted on to the seat, and, standing upon it, leant his arms upon the stonework and looked over the water.

It was while thus occupied—straining his eyes vainly over the dark surface of the water, that he was startled by hearing one of the two persons speak he had noticed occupying the embrasure before he entered it.

It was not, however, the words which produced the effect upon him, for they were uttered in too low a voice for their import to reach him.

It was the tones of the voice.

He recognised them.

By no movement, however, or other sign, did he betray his recognition.

He kept profoundly still, bending all his faculties into the one of hearing.

Faintly he heard the two persons speaking, and though he could only just catch a word or two here and there, he was quite sure he knew the voices of both the persons who were conversing.

And then, to set all doubts at rest, he heard his own name pronounced.

The reader understands all.

When we last left Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess, after their rather perilous journey in the little wherry, they ascended the slippery stone steps, and at length stood upon London-bridge.

Which way they were to turn they knew not.

Edgworth Bess, too, felt tired and weary.

That they must come to an understanding of some kind was quite evident, and it was Jack who proposed that they should both sit down in the first embrasure they came to and recover themselves somewhat from the exertion they had undergone, and at the same time arrange some definite plan of action.

This they did.

It was while they were engaged in this manner that they were startled by the entrance of a man, who, however, appeared to take no notice of them, but got upon the seat as far away from them as he could.

That man was Blueskin.

How strange a chance it was that he should have found them in this manner.

He was sure it was their voices, and yet it seemed so impossible that he could not do otherwise than doubt.

So he remained for some moments after he recognised them like one who fears to move lest an illusion should be dispelled.

But he soon found this to be a state of things that could not possibly continue.

It was no illusion.

It was reality.

His two lost companions, who he had almost despaired of finding, were there within reach of his arm.

And at liberty.

By some means it was clear they had escaped Jonathan Wild.

Little did Jack and Edgworth Bess think while they were talking about their absent comrade that he was so close to them.

The discovery would be a startling one.

Blueskin knew this, and he did not wish to startle them any more than he could help, for fear that in their astonishment they should give vent to an ejaculation which might reach unfriendly ears, and be the means of bringing danger upon them all.

Without moving from the position he occupied, he said, in a low voice, not much above a whisper—

"Jack."

The well-remembered tones struck home to Jack Sheppard's memory the instant he heard them, although spoken so quietly.

He started to his feet, to the consternation of Edgworth Bess, and asked—

"What—who is that?"

"Hush, Jack," continued Blueskin, still immovable, and speaking in the same faint tone of voice. "Hush, Jack, for fear you should give the alarm. I am here. Hush, all is well. We have met, though it is more than I hoped for."

Jack Sheppard clasped his hands over his eyes.

He fancied he must be dreaming.

Blueskin got down off the seat, and came towards him, still crying—

"Hush—hush."

It was Edgworth Bess who first comprehended the affair.

With a faint cry of joy, for she had heard Blueskin's caution to be silent, she sprang forward, and grasped him tightly by the arm.

At the same time she said—

"Oh! joy—joy! Jack, here is Blueskin! He has found us."

And then Jack removed his hands from his face, and, finding the occurrences of the past few moments to be no dream, as he feared they were, he, with the utmost gladness, seized Blueskin's hand, and pressed it warmly between his own.

Over the scene which followed their singular reunion we need not linger. We are already acquainted with all the singular adventures which befel them during their separation, and therefore we have no need, as they have, to relate what happened in the past.

The time was occupied in mutual explanations.

The loss of the treasure very much troubled Blueskin, and he almost felt inclined to encounter the pirates single-handed in their secret haunt, and endeavour to wrest it from them, for, of course, neither he nor Jack knew a word about Wild's attack.

Blueskin had placed great reliance and importance upon the possession of that treasure, and now that it was gone he felt thrown aback, and he knew not what to do.

He knew, too, the risk and danger they had passed through to obtain it, and now it was all swept away from them, and none at all left.

All the money the three possessed if put together made but an insignificant and trifling sum.

With so little as that in their pockets, how were they to do battle with so powerful an adversary as Jonathan Wild, who had unlimited means at his disposal?

They had all along found it a hard struggle, but now the difficulties were much increased.

Friendless, homeless, almost penniless, hunted by the law, with a price set upon their heads, liable to instant apprehension, what were they to do?

The enemies they had were so unscrupulous.

Unquestionably the plan which Blueskin had devised of obtaining a sum of money and then going abroad until Edgworth Bess came of age was a good one, but, alas! the fates willed that it should never be carried out.

But we will not anticipate the progress of events. That plan must for the present, however, be abandoned, because one of the essential principles of it was now deficient.

What were they to do?

The question was an all-important one, and they found it was no easy task to frame an answer to it.

They must, too, shortly move from their present place of shelter—it was a wonder they were allowed to remain unmolested for so long—for in a little while it would be daylight.

Already the clouds in the eastern quarter of the sky had assumed a dull gray tint, announcing that the morning was now close at hand.

It was Blueskin who called the attention of Jack and Edgworth Bess to this circumstance.

"We must get away from here," he said, "and that as quickly as possible. I am convinced that Jonathan Wild has got a spy in almost every street in London, and that it is impossible for us to move without being seen."

"What do you propose, then?"

"To get out into the country. There, where the dwellings are far apart, and people seldom met with, I should think we should be safest from Jonathan Wild."

"So we shall," replied Jack. "That is a good thought, Blueskin, and we will act upon it at once. In some out-of-the-way country place we shall be as safe from Jonathan Wild as if we went abroad."

"I don't know that exactly. You see, we want the means of living; but I will not put the worst face on things. Come! I should recommend you to start at once."

"We will."

"Are you ready?"

"Yes."

"Come on then. No, stay! Hark! What is that?"

The loud trampling of many horses' feet came to the ears of the three fugitives as Blueskin uttered these disjointed ejaculations.

"Back—back," he said. "Who these horsemen can be, I know not. They are coming this way. Let us shrink back into the shadow until they are past, and then we shall be on the safe side."

As he spoke, Blueskin pushed his two companions further back into the embrasure, while the sounds of the horses' feet beating on the hard roadway became more and more audible.

Anxiously and curiously the three fugitives peered forth from their dark hiding-place.

Old London-bridge was lighted with oil lamps, or rather it was supposed to be lighted, for the amount of illumination was so feeble that each lamp looked like a star, and nothing more.

Then the buildings, which at that time covered the bridge, cast a deep black shadow.

They did not anticipate, therefore, having an opportunity of seeing, with any degree of distinctness, what horsemen went by.

Still they looked.

Tramp! tramp! came the hoof-beats, each one seeming to cause the structure to vibrate beneath their feet.

At length the foremost horseman in the throng came in sight.

They were all riding in a dense throng.

The eyes of all three of the fugitives were riveted upon this first horseman in the troop.

Despite the dark shadows of the houses.

Despite the insufficiency of light emitted by the oil lamps.

Despite the speed with which he swept by them, he was immediately recognised by all three, though neither moved nor spoke, nor in any other way betrayed their knowledge.

Too often had they seen that form, and under so many varying circumstances for them to make any mistake.

It was Jonathan Wild.

What a strange chance it was, that at that particular hour of this most eventful night, that the chief actors in this terrible drama should all be within so short a distance of each other—that indeed they should all stand upon London-bridge at the same moment!

And yet such was the case.

Jonathan Wild was returning from the mill.

He was followed by his son, his janizaries, and those pirates he had taken prisoners.

He was in a very gloomy state of mind indeed, and Wild, junior, finding there was no prospect of getting him into conversation, fell back, and let him go on by himself.

Not for one moment did the idea cross the mind of the great thief-taker that those three persons who had given him so much trouble were so near to him. Little did he think that he should pass them on the road.

Little did he think that their position was such that escape would have been an impossibility.

Had he been aware of their hiding-place, his men could have surrounded it, and then those within must either have surrendered or adopted the only other alternative left open to them, that of jumping into the Thames.

But Jonathan remained in ignorance, and rode by unsuspectingly.

Gloomy—reserved—muttering occasional curses—and planning the execution of fresh villainies—the notorious thief-taker took his way in a direct line to his own house in Newgate-street.

CHAPTER CCLXXIV.

BLUESKIN DEVISES A PLAN FOR BAFFLING JONATHAN WILD.

ALL three of the fugitives drew a long breath of relief when this imminent peril fairly passed by them.

But they did not venture to emerge from their place of concealment until the sounds of the horses' feet had entirely died away.

Then Jack spoke.

"That was what I call a narrow escape," he said. "If we had left this embrasure he would, in all probability, have seen us."

"He might have done so."

"Let us take encouragement from this occurrence."

"We ought to take advantage of it."

"How so?"

"Why, we happen to know just where our enemy is. He has taken the road just opposite to the one I had fixed upon in my own mind, so there will soon be a considerable distance between us."

"I understand you. It is your wish to start at once."

"This moment."

"And which way shall you go?"

"The nearest to the open country."

"That will be down the Borough."

"Just so. As I said, in exactly the opposite direction to that taken by Jonathan Wild. Come at once."

As Blueskin spoke he stepped out of the recess where he had been concealed on to the pavement of the bridge.

He was quickly and closely followed by Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess.

It took them but a few minutes to cross the bridge, and then, in accordance with Blueskin's intention, they took their way down the Borough, that being the route by which the country could be soonest gained.

Blueskin walked a little in advance, but not so much so as to make conversation inconvenient.

Edgworth Bess and Jack Sheppard walked together.

It was the latter who broke the silence.

"You have made up your mind to get into the country, Blueskin, but have you thought at all about the means by which we are to get there?"

"I was just doing so when you spoke."

"Well?"

"I was considering the difficulties that stood in the way."

"What are they?"

"Very great. In the first place, the move would do no good if we left any trace by which we could be followed."

"I suppose that is the chief difficulty."

"It is, for of course you understand that if Jonathan knows where we are we shall not be any better off than we were before."

"We shall be worse."

Certainly we shall, because in the country we should not have the same facilities of concealing ourselves as we have in London."

"Very well, then. That only serves to show you the absolute and imperative necessity of not leaving the least clue behind us."

"You are right! But what do you propose?"

"I thought at first that we might perhaps take places in the stage-coach, but a little reflection showed me that such a course would be about the most dangerous we could adopt."

"I should not have thought so."

"I will tell you my reasons. I had the idea that Jonathan Wild had established a very elaborate spy system, and what you told me about the bill with 'Reward!' printed at the top of it convinces me that I am right."

"But what of that?"

"A great number of those bills would, beyond all doubt, be put into circulation, and, in anticipation of our leaving London, Jonathan would be cunning enough to give one to the guard and driver of every coach that leaves London, and so you see we should be almost sure to be detected, for though the guard himself might not interfere with us, yet he would know whereabouts he put us down, and what would be easier than for him to communicate that piece of intelligence to Jonathan Wild?"

"I see now."

"I am of opinion that the risk would be by far too great for us to incur, so that the idea of making our journey by stage-coach must, I think, be abandoned."

"But, if so, what are we to do? As we have told you, the pirates have left us almost penniless, and you say that your pecuniary position is far from good. What then are we to do?"

"I will tell you what I consider the only safe course left open to us."

"What is it?"

"To walk."

"Walk?"

"Yes."

"But we cannot."

"Why not?"

"There is Bess"—

"Do you think I have omitted the fact of her being with us in my calculations?"

"But the poor girl is already worn out with fatigue, and is, I am quite certain, incapable of a long journey on foot."

"How about yourself? Are you capable?"

"Yes."

"Well, then, all is easy."

"Explain."

"Willingly. In the first place I should propose that we all three walk as far as we can without completely exhausting ourselves. In this way I hope to get out of London."

"Yes."

"When we once get amongst the country lanes there are, as you must be well aware, heavy waggons drawn by a team of horses, both going to and from the city."

"But the objections you have made to riding in the stage-coach would apply equally well to them."

"Hear me out, if you please."

"Go on, then."

"We shall be out of London before we attempt to notice one. We should then look out for a waggon returning home empty, in which people often ride."

"I know all about that."

"Well, then, suppose we see one of these waggons coming."

"Yes."

"My advice would be that we give Edgworth Bess money and leave her in the road while we hide behind the hedgerows. Then, when the waggon comes up, Edgworth Bess must stop it and ask for a ride. The waggoner's suspicions, seeing her alone, will not probably be excited. She will be allowed to enter the waggon. Now do you understand?"

"Perfectly. We shall then follow on foot, taking care not to be seen ourselves, and yet not allowing the waggon to be one moment out of our sight."

"That is just it. What do you think of the plan?"

"It is a very good one. A better could not be devised, and, what is more, it can be carried out with the utmost ease."

"Then we are agreed upon that point?"

"Yes, if Edgworth Bess is."

"Oh! I am. In the matter of our mutual safety I shall always fall in with any arrangements you may propose. I have no objection to the plan, if I could only feel sure, as Jack has just said, that the waggon was never a moment out of your sight."

"You may rely upon that."

"Then I consent gladly."

"That's well. You see while we have been talking we have already walked a considerable distance, and almost unconsciously."

"We have."

"Courage, then. We shall very soon be fairly out of London, and when we are you shall enter the first empty waggon going in our direction. We shall easily be able to keep up with it, because its speed is sure not to exceed four miles an hour."

In such like talk as this the tedium of their long walk was chased away.

The new day came.

The sun rose in all his majesty in the eastern sky, and tinted the earth with his glowing beams. He mounted higher and higher in the heavens, and still found our travellers upon the road.

London was fairly left behind, and the beautiful open country gained.

Edgworth Bess bore up bravely.

She was very weak and very much exhausted by the exertions she had already made.

Still she cheerfully kept on.

Whenever they could they rested her, sometimes by sitting upon the trunk of a tree lying by the roadside; at others, by sitting on the banks beneath the hedges, or on stiles leading over into fields.

For the time of year, the day was a very warm one, and one would scarcely have thought the season so far advanced as it was.

The sky was cloudless—of an intense blue colour very rarely seen in England, and the sun shone with great power and brightness.

Autumn had tinted the leaves upon the trees, and gave them a yellow tinge, but on this fine day they looked like grain gradually ripening in the sun, and not as though they were in one of the stages of decay.

All seemed beautiful.

The birds sang, and flew blithely in the air.

Who would have thought there was such a thing as trouble and unhappiness, when all around looked so joyful?

Our friends having been cooped up so long in London, looked upon the beauties of the country with sensations of the keenest delight.

To them the scene had the greatest of all charms—that of novelty.

At the next village they came to Blueskin determined to purchase some provisions, a portion of which Edgworth Bess could take with her in the waggon.

To have all three entered an inn they felt would have been too dangerous. It would have seemed like courting detection.

This resolve Blueskin put into execution, and was fortunate enough to make his purchases without raising the least suspicion.

They went on some distance further, until the village was left behind, and then they sat down by the wayside, for all three acutely felt the pangs of hunger.

The repast was a rude one, but they were satisfied with it.

A large portion of the provisions was made up into a bundle for Edgworth Bess to take with her, for they determined she should not walk further, but wait until the next waggon passed.

All the money they individually possessed was counted up into one total, and then divided into three equal portions.

This done, they sat down and waited.

Behind where they sat was a tall hedgerow, in which was a most convenient gap, through which Jack and Blueskin could make their way at a moment's notice.

They then sat and rested for nearly an hour, all the time listening intently for the approach of a waggon, but none appeared.

Presently, however, the faint tinkling of bells reached Blueskin's attentive ears, and then he knew that the waggon was coming, for in those days a musical, jingling bell formed a part of almost every cart-horse's harness.

"Quick, Jack," he said; "out of sight. We must not be seen, and, least of all, seen hiding ourselves. Come."

Then turning to Edgworth Bess, he said—

"You quite understand what you have to do?"

"Oh! yes."

"When the waggon comes you must call out at the top of your lungs to the driver, and ask him to give you a lift. You must get in in the best manner you can."

"But," asked Edgworth Bess, "suppose he should ask me where I am going?"

"You need not tell him. Say you are going a few miles along the road."

"Very well; and there is another thing."

"Be quick, then, for in another minute or two the waggon will be in sight."

"I wanted to know how I was to find out when you required me to alight and go no further."

"How fortunate that you should think of that. I confess it had escaped me. I will tell you. When you hear three loud whistles close together, coming from somewhere near you, understand by that that there is some reason why you should alight."

"What shall I do then?"

"Walk slowly along the road after the waggon, and continue to do so till we overtake you."

"Very well."

"You quite comprehend all our instructions?"

"Oh! quite, and I will remember them. There is only one thing which gives me uneasiness."

"What is that?"

"I am fearful you should miss the waggon, and that we should be unlucky enough to be separated again, and you must recollect that alone I should be defenceless and incapable of taking my own part."

"Dismiss from your mind all apprehension on that score. Believe me, such fears are utterly groundless, so do not allow them to give you any uneasiness."

"I will rely upon you."

"Do so—do so. We must part now, but only in appearance. You need not fear any danger, because you can depend upon our being close at hand to defend you."

"Thanks—thanks! You are very good to me. Indeed, if I had not two such friends as you are, my lot would be a pitiable one, indeed. There is only one thing that reconciles me. I think a time will come when I shall be able to display my gratitude."

"Farewell—farewell! We must begone, or the waggoner will see us, and then he would be suspicious at once. Rely upon our watching over you."

With these words Blueskin and Jack Sheppard left Edgworth Bess, and crawled through the gap in the hedge into the field.

Here they were able to lie down at full length and be sure that no one could see them from the road, while at the same time they were easily able, by looking between the intricate roots, to see the road and everything upon it.

They could see Edgworth Bess as she sat upon a log of wood. The sun shone brightly upon her, and invested her with a wondrous beauty. It did, indeed, seem a world of pities that one so young and lovely should be the victim of such unrelenting persecution.

CHAPTER CCLXXV.

THE THREE FUGITIVES SEEK SHELTER WITH THE GIPSIES.

THE jingling of the bells upon the horses' heads now sounded very plainly, and mingled with the pleasant sound there came the heavy lumbering of wheels.

The fact is, the waggon would have come in sight much sooner than it did but for the circumstance of there being a bend in the road, which prevented anything from being seen until it was close at hand.

Suddenly, then, the unwieldy vehicle came in sight, and then Edgworth Bess rose to her feet.

There was a feeling of great security about the young girl's heart, produced by the assurances which her two protectors had given her.

Indeed, it might be said that she felt scarcely any fear.

The fresh pure air, too, of the country had revived her to a wonderful degree, and, though she had travelled so many miles, she did not feel so fatigued even as she did when she left London-bridge.

On came the waggon, the horses nodding their heads violently at every step they took, and causing the bells to ring.

Very much to the astonishment of our heroine, she was unable to see any signs of a driver.

The horses appeared to have it all their own way, and to be going along quite independently of anybody.

Edgworth Bess was not aware of the mode in which the drivers of heavily laden waggons looked after their teams.

The driver was quite comfortable—asleep under the canvas covering.

The horses were asleep, too, in all probability.

Edgworth Bess did not know what to do. It seemed ridiculous to shout when there was no one to shout to.

In a whisper, for he saw her hesitation, Blueskin told her to cry "stop!"

It was, perhaps, the first time the young girl had ever cried "stop!" to anything on the king's highway.

However, she now shouted out with right good will, and repeated her cry again and again, until at length the lazy driver made his appearance, and stopped his team.

Edgworth Bess, according to her instructions, proffered her request to be allowed to ride a little way because she was tired and weary.

The man, struck perhaps by her beauty and the gentle, winning manner in which she made her request, at once gave his consent, and actually got down and assisted her into the waggon.

There were two canvas flaps which hung down and covered the ends of the waggon, but the driver drew these aside and fastened them in that position by means of a strap.

The interior of the waggon was littered to a depth of several inches with fresh, clean straw, which was all that it contained.

Edgworth Bess found she had quite a comfortable seat, and by sitting close to the end she was able to see a long way down the road.

The waggoner was one of those rough but kind-hearted men which are so frequently met with employed in such pursuits.

He made himself friendly with the poor heiress at once, and, having set his team in motion, he talked to her upon various subjects, and thus beguiled the tediousness of her journey.

From time to time she looked down the road, and at the hedges on either side, but on no occasion did she catch a glimpse of either of her two protectors.

Indeed, she scarcely expected to do so, although she kept looking with a forlorn sort of hope, for she knew how sedulously they would keep themselves hidden from the driver's view.

Hours passed by.

The sun which the poor girl had seen rise that morning she now saw descending in the western sky.

She had produced her little bundle of provisions, and invited the driver to share them with her.

They passed through many villages, none of which were known to Edgworth Bess.

The signal had not reached her ears, so she came to the conclusion that all was well, and that her two friends were following the waggon, which they would be easily able to do, for it went over the ground at a very lazy rate indeed.

As it grew dusk, the driver, who had never, perhaps, kept awake for such a long time at a stretch as he had done since he picked up Edgworth Bess, now dropped off into a slumber.

A few minutes after Edgworth Bess unconsciously joined him in it.

The poor girl was thoroughly worn out, and sleep was just the thing she required.

To be sure, her repose was none of the soundest or easiest, but still she slept, though the least thing in the world would have roused her.

How long she slept she knew not, but it was for some time.

The sun sunk.

Darkness came over the earth by slow and imperceptible degrees.

Suddenly the waggon stopped.

The cessation of the uneasy motion had the immediate effect of waking Edgworth Bess and the waggoner as well.

"Dang it!" he said, "I s'pose we's reached home, then."

Edgworth Bess was rather confused for a moment, and then she recollected where she was.

"Don't you go any further, then?" she asked.

"No, miss," replied the waggoner, "I am at the end of my journey now. I wish I wasn't if you have any further to go."

"You are very kind," said Edgworth Bess, smiling at the man's rude compliment. "I have not much further to go, however. You have stopped very conveniently for me."

"That's lucky, miss, for I should not like you to go far such a night as this."

"I am exceedingly obliged to you for your kindness," replied Edgworth Bess, who was touched to the heart by the waggoner's behaviour. "I shall not forget you."

"All right, miss," said he, giving his whip a tremendous crack.

Edgworth Bess slipped some money into his hand, and then hastened along the road.

She did not go further, however, than just to get out of sight of the waggon.

According to her arrangement, she sat down there and waited for the coming of Jack and Blueskin.

Despite their assurance that they would not let the waggon be out of their sight for a single moment, she could not help feeling anxious and uneasy.

She started at every slight sound that came to her ears.

It was profoundly dark.

The hour was somewhere about midnight.

Dense lead-coloured clouds covered the heavens, and now and then the squally gusts of winds that blew at short intervals would bring with them a dash of rain drops.

Presently Edgworth Bess heard her name pronounced in a faint tone by a well-remembered voice.

She replied gladly enough.

The next moment there was a crackling sound, and Blueskin and Jack Sheppard broke through the hedgerow on one side of the road.

With one bound they were at her side.

The meeting was as glad a one as though they had been separated for years instead of a few hours.

"The waggon has reached the end of its journey, then, it seems," said Jack Sheppard. "We were at first somewhat in doubt about it, for we could hardly tell whether such was the case, or whether the man had made a call upon the road."

"No," he said that was home."

"So we found, and then we made all speed here. Did you find your ride a comfortable one?"

"Very, and the driver was very kind to me indeed."

"Do you feel rested?"

"Quite. But how are you?"

"Well—rather tired."

"Have you followed the waggon on foot all the time?"

"Yes."

"Since we started?"

"Yes."

"And you have been walking ever since before day-break, surely you must be completely worn down?"

"We are, if we only confessed the truth. At last we had some trouble to keep up with you."

"And I was riding while you were so tired."

"What of that?"

"It does not seem right."

"But it is. We had, however, made up our minds to seek shelter somewhere or other as soon as we see our opportunity."

"Oh! do so—do so."

"Come, then. We will walk a little further along the road. We may, perhaps, come to some place where it would be safe for us to ask for a night's lodging."

"What is that?" asked Jack Sheppard, pointing with his finger as he spoke.

"What?"

"Cannot you see a bright light yonder?"

"Yes."

"What is it?"

"I cannot make out. It is nowhere on the high-road I fancy. It seems to me, to be right away over the fields."

"It does."

"Stop a moment, and I will try to make out what it is."

The three fugitives halted, and Blueskin put his hands up to his eyes in such a manner as to prevent all extraneous rays of light from falling on them, and looked long and earnestly at the light.

"I have it," he said, at length.

"What do you make it out to be?"

"A fire."

"A fire?"

"Yes, I can tell by the tone in which you ask that question that you do not understand me. It is the fire belonging to a gipsy encampment."

"Are you sure?"

"Oh! yes, I caught sight of the canvas tents."

"Then, Blueskin, my friend," said Jack Sheppard, "that is the thing for us."

"You would seek shelter there?"

"Yes."

"I should think it would be safe?"

"I should think so. At any rate, it is worth our while to try. If they will only consent to allow us to sleep along with them in their tents we shall be all right. There will be no fear of their betraying us."

"Let us try the experiment, then, for, if you will believe me, I am so weary that I can scarcely bear to put my foot on the ground."

"I too am weary," said Blueskin; "for I have gone through a great deal of fatigue since I slept last."

"You have, indeed."

While speaking, the three worn out fugitives took their way in as direct a line as possible to the light which indicated the presence of the gipsy encampment.

The high-road they found intersected a common, of the size of which they could form no definite idea.

It was somewhere on this piece of waste land doubtless that the gipsies had pitched their tents.

As they went nearer the fire appeared to increase in brightness, and our three friends could see, not only the tents of which Blueskin had spoken, but also several dusky-looking figures.

When within about a hundred yards of the fire, a man suddenly sprang up from the ground, and planted himself directly in their path.

In a gruff voice he desired to know where they were going, and what they wanted.

Blueskin replied—

"We are three poor fugitives, wearied unto death, and outcasts from the house-dwellers. We want to know whether the Zingari will give us shelter for one night beneath their tents?"

"You are spies," said the man with the gruff voice.

"Begone!"

"No, we are not spies. We are what we tell you—friendless, wandering outcasts. We are not penniless, however, though we are poor; and if you will grant us the accommodation we really very much require, you shall have all we can afford to spare to repay you for your trouble."

"You speak fair," said the man. "The Zingari is not one to turn his back upon others. He knows what it is to be friendless and alone. Come with me. I will take you to the tents, and present you to our queen. Whether she will allow you to stay, I know not."

As he spoke, the gipsy turned abruptly on his heel, and led the way to the encampment.

Our friends followed him.

The common was very rough and full of treacherous holes, while here and there stunted gorse-bushes stuck up, to the imminent danger of the pedestrian who came upon them unseen.

Edgworth Bess stumbled several times, and narrowly escaped a heavy fall, so Jack made her take hold of his arm.

After a few minutes the encampment was reached. Somehow or other, the scene which presented itself appeared a very comfortable one.

The bright fire looked doubly cheerful when contrasted with the large expanse of common which surrounded it, and its light fell with a pretty and picturesque effect upon the tents and upon the clump of elm trees, beneath whose shadow they were pitched.

The fire-light fell with a Rembrandt-like effect upon the swarthy forms and countenances of the gipsies who were seated around it.

To our three tired fugitives the scene before them was one of rest and comfort, and they were pleased with it accordingly.

The man who had acted in the capacity of guide now addressed some words to his companions in a language quite incomprehensible to the fugitives.

With some anxiety they waited for the reply.

At length it came.

They would be allowed to stay there that night upon their taking an oath not to betray them.

This the fugitives readily enough did, for they had no intention of doing such a thing.

After this, bread was broken between them, after which they were safe.

They were invited to sit down.

Gladly enough did they do so.

The warmth of the fire was very acceptable, for the night was chilly.

Three wooden sticks, secured at the top, and placed in the primitive triangular position, suspended a large three-legged pot, from which savoury steams arose.

The three friends were happier that night than they had been for a long time.

They felt a sense of great security.

They partook heartily of the supper along with the gipsies as soon as it was ready, and then all retired to rest in the various tents, with the exception of those whose duty it was to perform the part of scouts, and apprise the main body of the approach of any foes.

CHAPTER CCLXXXV.

BLUESKIN, JACK SHEPPARD, AND EDGORTH BESS ARRIVE AT THE SUICIDE'S GRAVE AT THE FOUR CROSS-ROADS.

The night passed away calmly and quietly, and without the occurrence of any incident whatever.

In the morning the three fugitives were aroused by the gipsies, but their fatigue was so great that they entreated them to allow them to rest a little longer.

Their request was granted, but the piece of information was added that they were about to strike their tents at sunset, and proceed in the direction of London.

All three of the fugitives were very sorry to hear this. They were in hopes they should have been able to protract their stay, but this townwards movement put an end to all such ideas at once.

There is very little question that, if they could have joined a band of gipsies who intended to make an excursion into the interior they would have been tolerable safe, for the trace they left behind them would be one which even Jonathan Wild himself would have some trouble in following.

But they were doomed to be thrown altogether upon their own resources, and denied even this amount of safety.

Towards sunset they were again aroused, and this time they had no choice but to rise.

They were, however, wonderfully rested.

Indeed, they felt themselves endowed with unusual strength and spirits.

"It is, perhaps, all for the best, Jack," said Blueskin, alluding to their departure from the gipsies' tents. "We are a great deal too near London to be safe. Jonathan might track us thus far with ease, and he would not be likely to pass by a gipsies' encampment without thoroughly searching it."

"Perhaps it is for the best."

"The advantages of a stay here would be many and great, but we must get further away from London. We are now rested and refreshed, and I advise that we should pass the night in walking. We must trust to providence to find us another shelter."

"I leave you captain of this campaign, Blueskin. I am sure you will do all for the best."

"Let us prepare to start, then. You see the gipsies are already beginning to move their things, and I should not like to trespass upon their kindness."

"Certainly not; they have behaved very well to us."

"They have. Now go and call Edgorth Bess."

The poor girl was in company with the female gipsies belonging to the tribe, and Jack hastened off to fetch her.

He soon returned, and then, having bid adieu to the friendly gipsies, they resumed their toilsome journey.

By the time the sun started the sun had set, and darkness had begun to cover the earth.

There were indications, too, by the look of the clouds on the horizon, that the night would be a stormy one.

A moaning wind came rushing by, and the tree-tops dashed together and rustled with a melancholy sound.

Every now and then, too, there would come a threatening splash of rain.

Blueskin observed these indications of elemental strife with an uneasy mind.

He knew what they foreboded.

It was not for himself that he cared, but Edgorth Bess.

He knew her constitution was not one that would bear with impunity the inclemency of the weather.

Still he resolved to push on.

There was no place close at hand where they could have stayed, and the threatened storm might perhaps hold over until the morning.

Edgorth Bess uttered no word of complaint.

She took hold of Jack Sheppard's arm to assist herself.

In this way they walked on for some time, until, indeed, the middle of the night was reached.

By that time the sky had assumed an appearance angry in the extreme.

Threatening black clouds had piled themselves up, and made the darkness doubly deep.

The moaning of the wind, too, increased in loudness, and the splashes of rain came with greater force and frequency.

Nowhere could the fugitives see a dwelling-house of any kind. All around them was dark, drear, and desolate.

They were, in fact, pursuing a cross-country road that was but little frequented.

Suddenly the rain broke forth with all its fury.

There were a few premonitory heavy drops, which fell with a sudden clash upon the earth, and then the rain came down in torrents.

Our three friends were wet through to the skin instantly.

Rain would they have withdrawn into some place where they could have at least obtained something like shelter from the rain.

But no such place presented itself to their view.

There were hedgerows on either side of the road, but they were so low and thin that they would not have afforded the least protection.

The rain did not seem to come down in drops, but in one huge sheet, as though a cloud had suddenly dissolved into moisture and precipitated its contents bodily upon the earth.

Then came the thunder.

Faint muttering and far off at first, but gradually increasing until it seemed to shake the very ground beneath their feet.

And the lightning was both vivid and incessant.

The three friends cowered down before it.

But Blueskin and Jack Sheppard both directed the chief part of their attention to their fair companion, and strove to make her position as little miserable as possible.

How grateful she felt for all their kindness!

Suddenly, in the deep obscurity, Blueskin perceived some shadowy-looking object.

What it was, Blueskin could not take upon himself to say.

It seemed to occupy the centre of the roadway.

Its outlines were dim and indistinct.

It looked like a huge mass of black cloud.

At the next flash of lightning Blueskin hoped to be able to make out what it was.

He pointed it out to his two companions, and bade them fix their eyes upon it also, and to take all the advantage they could of the transient flash of light.

They did so.

They did not have long to wait for the coming of the next flash.

They succeeded each other at very brief intervals.

Flash!

The intensely brilliant blue light shot across the sky, and momentarily illuminated all things.

Then there was darkness.

The three fugitives had not been able to glean much knowledge respecting the strange object in the road before them.

It looked huge and black.

What could it be?

They crept forward to ascertain, for although the rain poured down in such heavy torrents their curiosity was much excited.

They were not without the hope, too, that it might prove a shelter of some kind.

Hastening forward in a crouched-up attitude—for the violence of the storm made them cower down before it—they directed their steps to the mysterious object.

It was not far in advance, so they soon reached it.

Just as they arrived there came another flash of lightning more vivid and enduring than any they had yet noticed.

The object before them was then fully revealed.

They saw it with distinctness for the first time only.

In the very centre of the road was piled up a huge mound of stones.

What the motive could be, our friends were at a loss to imagine.

There was no regularity in the manner in which the stones were heaped, nor in the size of the materials which were used.

Some were small pebbles and others huge fragments of rock which would have taken three men to lift.

The only thing seemed to be that, whoever had done this, had desired to raise a mound of stones in the road, and was by no means careful how he did it, and cared little about the shape which the whole mass might assume.

Standing close to it as they did, our friends were able to see it with tolerable ease and distinctness without the aid of the lightning, for the rain had fallen upon the stones and given them a shining, phosphorescent appearance.

Looking up to the top of this mound of stones Blueskin saw something projecting from it, and then, for the first time, he had an idea of what the strange spectacle before him signified.

Sticking up from the centre of the mound was something which looked like a piece of wood.

As soon as he noticed this, Blueskin turned his attention from the mound to a contemplation of the spot upon which he stood.

He looked around him closely, and then the suspicion which had entered his mind was confirmed.

Jack had noticed his motions and so had Edgworth Bess, and both in one voice asked him the meaning of what they saw.

"I will tell you," he said. "You may neither of you have seen such a thing before, but I can assure you they are very common. We are now standing where two roads cross each other at right angles."

"You mean four cross-roads?"

"Yes. Four cross-roads. Now, perhaps, you understand?"

"No, I do not."

"Then, by the law of the land, those who put an end to their own lives are buried in the centre of four cross-roads without any burial service read over them. A long hedge-stake, sharpened at one end to a point, is driven through their breasts into the ground; thus, in a manner of speaking, pinning them to the ground. Then the earth is shovelled into the hole, and a lot of stones piled round the stake just in the manner you now see before you."

These terrible words which Blueskin just uttered with respect to a disgusting custom, brought back to the minds of both his hearers the fact that they had, in times long back heard of such things but they had not known whether to believe them or treat them as fables.

Now, however, there was no room for scepticism.

The dread, stern, horrible reality was before them.

It was an odious and abhorrent ceremony.

It is wonderful however it could have been otherwise to civilized organizations.

Even the most brutal and ferocious savages forbear from desecrating the body of the dead.

What good could it do to wreak such a vengeance upon a senseless corpse?

What knowledge had it of the indignities inflicted upon it after death?

The sensitive mind of Edgworth Bess shrank back in horror from such a close contemplation of so dreadful a thing.

Yet there it was palpable before them.

It is not too much to say that the interest and attention of the three fugitives was so absorbed by the contemplation of this strange spectacle, that they were for a time oblivious of the fact that the storm raged with undiminished fury.

To them the unhallowed grave of the suicide possessed a fascination which they could not shake off.

A thousand thoughts and questions rushed into their minds to which they were totally unable to frame any reply.

Who could have been the unhappy individual who had come to sad an end?

That probably was more than they would ever know.

"This is horrible," said Edgworth Bess; "most horrible. Until this moment I had no idea that such atrocities could be sanctioned by the law."

"It is so," said Blueskin; and I am not afraid to say that the civilized inhabitants would rise up to a man were any alteration proposed in the existing law!"

"No—no. I will not believe that."

"It is true."

"Where are their hearts?"

"If you mean where are their pity and their feelings, I should say they were just about as deficient of both as these rough stones which are heaped up over the suicide's grave."

"Good heavens! can it be possible?"

"It is true. But come, this is not exactly the time to stand talking upon such a subject, no matter how deep an interest we might feel in it. It is quite time we looked for and found some shelter."

"It is indeed. I am soaked through to the skin."

"But," said Jack Sheppard, "I can see no signs of any place which will afford us shelter. We seem to be in an uninhabited region."

"So we do. But there are four roads, and surely one of them must lead to a dwelling."

"Which one shall we take?"

"We must look and see which one appears to be most frequented, and take that."

"Good."

"Go on, then."

At this moment there came a flash of lightning of such extraordinary vividity, that it seemed to scorch the very eyeballs of the three fugitives.

Instinctively they clasped their hands over their faces to shut out the fearful brilliancy.

No sooner, however, had they done so than the thunder pealed forth with ear-splitting loudness.

It seemed as though the hollow reverberations would never cease.

At last, however, they died away.

Then there came a gush of wind, bearing upon its wings certain sounds, which, however, reached the ears of Jack alone.

"Hark!" he cried to his his companions; "hark! hark!"

They listened eagerly, for they knew not what it was to which Jack wished them to hearken.

All was still.

"What is it?" they asked.

"I heard the tramp of many horses' feet."

"No—no! Impossible!"

"I did. The sound came to my ears quite distinctly. The wind seemed to blow it in. But I can hear the sounds no longer."

"It must have been fancy."

"No—no, I am sure it was not. Stay a moment. I will lie down and place my ear upon the ground, and listen if I can hear anything."

As he spoke, Jack Sheppard sank down, and placed his ear upon the ground.

His two companions remained profoundly still.

Oh! how anxious they felt to know the result, for the dread was upon them that Jack was right, and that Jonathan Wild was hard upon their track.

[JACK SHEPPARD AND EDGORTH BESS SEE AN APPARITION IN THE RUINED FARM-HOUSE.]

CHAPTER CCLXXVII.

BLUESKIN, JACK SHEPPARD, AND EDGORTH BESS SEEK A TEMPORARY REFUGE IN THE RUINED FARM-HOUSE.

JACK SHEPPARD was well aware, from previous experience, that the expedient he had adopted, of lying down and placing his ear close to the ground, would enable him to say with tolerable certainty whether any horsemen were upon the road, or whether his sense of hearing had played him a trick.

Very distant and faint sounds are by this means made quite audible.

Anxiously, then, Jack listened.

He rose up on his feet, however, almost immediately.

"I was right," he said. "I thought I had made no mistake. There are horsemen on the road."

"Are you sure?"

"Quite sure. Listen for yourself."

Blueskin placed his ear upon the earth and listened.

The intelligence Jack had given him was indeed too true.

Horsemen were on the road, and in rather large numbers, too.

That it must be Jonathan Wild they felt certain, though they had no very clear grounds for such an assumption.

Still it was a likely one, for Blueskin and Jack both well knew that Jonathan would not relax his efforts to capture them.

That the horsemen were approaching the spot upon which they stood soon ceased to be a matter of doubt.

It was no longer necessary to lie down on the ground to listen. The sounds came quite plainly to their ears, and each moment grew louder.

"We must begone," said Blueskin, "and at once."

"But which way shall we take?"

"That I know not, but I would fain seek the shelter of some dwelling-house, if only for the sake of Bess."

"And I, too."

"It will not be safe for us to take any of these roads, I am afraid, because it is a matter of impossibility for us to say which road Jonathan may take."

"Just so."

"Ere long we shall come to a stile or a gate, or a gap in the hedge, even; and I should advise that we adopt either of these means to gain the meadows."

"What then?"

"We will strike across them, and endeavour to find some habitation."

"Agreed."

"We will shelter there as long as we can, and trust to Jonathan not discovering us."

"We can do nothing else."

"Come on, then, for, if we stay here undecided much longer, we shall have them upon us."

"We shall, indeed."

The violence of the storm had now in some degree abated.

The rain no longer fell as it had done, and the thunder only muttered at distant intervals.

The three fugitives were therefore able to proceed with much more comfort than before.

Blueskin did not hesitate about the choice of which of the four roads he should take. He was content so long as it led away from Jonathan Wild.

They ran down one of the roads, then, and ere they had gone a dozen yards, they saw on the right hand a five-barred gate.

They stopped at once, for it was just the sort of thing they wanted.

Through the bars of the gate they could see the grass in a meadow beyond.

When he got close to the gate, Blueskin was astonished to find what a neglected appearance it presented.

Its ruinous condition was even perceptible in the darkness of the night.

The upright posts or supports on either side of it were both far out of the perpendicular.

The gate hung by one hinge merely, and where it ought to have been shut close and fastened, there was a large crevice.

Then the bars of the gate were broken and decayed, while over the whole there grew some vegetable excrement of a moss-like character, and which felt soft and clammy when touched.

Blueskin noticed these things in a moment—while he was pushing the dilapidated gate open, in fact.

There was something very extraordinary in a gate being left in such a condition as this, opening as it did from the road, and Blueskin felt convinced that there must be some mystery in connexion with it.

From the difficulty he had in pushing the gate open far enough to allow them to pass through, he came to the conclusion that a long time must have elapsed since it was touched.

He could not understand it.

There was not just then any time for surmises, though, of course, he could not shut his eyes to the obvious peculiarities of the place.

However, he got his companions through as quickly as possible, and then, with some little trouble, he restored the gate to as near the same condition as possible as he found it.

This done, they struck across the meadow in a direction at right angles to the road, and keeping all the time in the shadow of a tall hedge.

As he proceeded, the neglected appearance which he had noticed became more and more apparent.

The grass in the meadow was an enormous height, and very rank in quality.

It was quite certain it had not been mowed that summer at any rate.

The hedge, instead of being trimmed, and presenting the neat appearance which hedges always do present, had shot out straggling branches in all directions, while long trailing shoots extended themselves upon the ground.

These last were perplexing, and made their onward course very difficult, for each moment their feet were catching in them.

At a tolerably rapid rate, however, they left the road behind them, and soon the trampling of horses' hoofs, which had so alarmed them, subsided into silence.

Still they kept on with unabated speed.

Two large meadows were passed through, the condition of both of which was precisely similar.

Entering the third field, the fugitives saw before them in the distance the dark and shadowy outline of something which looked like a human habitation.

In the hope that this surmise would prove a correct one, they hastened their steps.

As they approached more closely, they saw, to their infinite delight and satisfaction, that it was indeed a dwelling-house.

No light, however, appeared in any part of it, but they were not surprised at that, because they knew it was the custom of country people to retire early.

The outbuildings were first reached, and, from the appearance of these, it became tolerably evident that it was a farm-house they were approaching.

As they came close to them, however, they found they had just the same ruinous appearance as the other objects they had passed.

Blueskin, however, alone appeared to notice it, and, finding this to be the case, he attracted Jack's attention by saying—

"Look at these buildings, Jack. Do you see what a ruinous condition they are in? They do just stand, and that is all."

"I see it now; but, until you pointed it out, I had not noticed it."

"I thought you had not. It strikes me that the house we see yonder is uninhabited."

"I hope not."

"It does not matter. We shall, ten to one, be safer if such proves to be the case."

"We shall have to trust no one."

"Very true; and, consequently, we do not run the risk of being betrayed. But come, quicken your steps, and let us put an end to all doubts upon the subject."

At an accelerated speed, the three fugitives now made their way through what was doubtless originally the fold-yard.

Then a few more steps brought them close to the house.

They found Blueskin's suppositions completely verified. The house was uninhabited and in ruins.

A glance at the half-open door would have proved that instantly.

The walls, too, were crumbling away, and they had collapsed in many places.

There was something repugnant about the place, and all three halted on the threshold.

All around was as silent as the grave.

The rain still fell heavily, and with a steadiness which did not promise it to be of short duration.

Shelter was therefore very desirable.

Still all shrank from crossing the threshold, though why, not one of them could have precisely told.

A vague kind of feeling came over them that all was not well.

It was Blueskin who first recovered from this feeling, and starting forward, he pushed the door open.

It creaked dismally upon its hinges as it swung back for a short distance, and then stopped.

The interior of the farm-house, for such it was, was in absolute darkness.

Not a single thing was distinguishable.

Blueskin nevertheless crossed the threshold, and as he did so, he said—

"Come in out of the rain. I won't keep you in the dark a moment; I will light my lantern."

Blueskin produced a bottle of phosphorus while he uttered these words, and soon had a match alight.

The tiny flame of this he communicated to the wick in his lantern, and there was soon quite enough light to enable them to see about them, and ascertain what kind of place they were in, while, at the same time, owing to its passing through a lens, there was not much danger of its being seen by any one at a distance.

The scene which the lantern revealed, as Blueskin flashed it round him, was indeed a dismal one.

It was the wreck of what had once been a comfortable apartment.

But now one universal aspect of desolation pervaded the whole.

The plaster had fallen in huge flakes from the walls, and on the floor the moisture had collected into sickly-looking pools.

The fire-place was one of an old-fashioned make, consisting of a hearth-stone, upon which the fuel to be burned was heaped, and over which was the large mouth of a chimney.

But even this was in ruins.

There were a few articles of furniture in the place, and among them a rickety table.

On the side facing the door was a wide staircase with massive balustrades, which the action of time had turned completely black.

The look of this deserted and dilapidated apartment struck a chill to the hearts of the three fugitives as soon as their eyes had embraced its details.

Still it seemed to offer them a shelter from the storm, and perhaps even from their enemies.

Blueskin turned round and shut the door close, though he had to exert himself to press it into its frame.

Then, turning round, he strove to speak such cheering words to his companions in misfortune as he was able to utter.

"Come," he said, "do not look so down-hearted; this is not the most comfortable place in the world, but there are many worse."

"I am very wet and cold," said Edgworth Bess, with a shiver.

"I do not doubt that; we are in the same condition. It is very hard that you, above all others, should be exposed to the inclemency of the weather."

"Do you think there would be much risk in lighting a fire?" asked Jack. "I am perished with cold, and, besides, we should be able to dry our clothes a little."

"I don't see where the risk is at all," replied Blueskin. "The only question is, where are we to find fuel?"

"There is Jonathan Wild."

"I know there is, but I think we have given him the slip completely. But, if he is hovering about, I don't see that a fire would direct him here."

"Not without he knew this place was uninhabited."

"I don't think it at all likely that he possesses that piece of knowledge."

"He cannot know everything."

"Certainly not."

"Then look about, and, if we can find some dry wood, we will soon have a fire."

Blueskin gave the lantern to Edgworth Bess, and began looking round the apartment for fuel.

To seek it on the outside of the building would be foolish, for all that he found would be sure to be soddened with the rain.

They had not to seek long.

The farm-house had been built in a great measure with wood, and Jack and Blueskin in a few minutes collected quite a heap, which they piled up on the hearth.

It was then set fire to.

The wood was very dry, and consequently burnt into a bright blaze.

The warmth diffused was very agreeable.

Blueskin searched for more wood, and this time selected larger pieces than he had before.

These were placed upon the others, and then they had a fire which would burn for a long time without replenishment.

The three fugitives dried their soaked clothing before it, and warmed themselves thoroughly.

Their blood even had become cold.

At intervals Blueskin and Jack repaired to the door and listened.

Upon no occasion did they hear any sound which indicated the proximity of their foe.

The rain, however, still continued to fall at a steady rate, and the heavens were everywhere covered with a huge black cloud, in which not a single break or rift could be seen.

It was strange to see what an alteration the presence of the fire and of our friends made to the deserted kitchen of the ruined farm-house.

It began to assume quite a cheerful look.

Edgworth Bess was very weary, and as soon as her apparel was dried somewhat, she sat down close to the fire.

Her two protectors persuaded her to sleep if she could, but this she found to be impossible.

The fire crackled and splattered as the rain-drops came down the chimney.

CHAPTER CCLXXXVIII.

BLUESKIN SETS OUT ON HIS RECONNOITERING EXPEDITION, AND MEETS WITH A MISHAP.

COULD Jonathan Wild but have had a peep at the interior of the ruined farm-house, how his heart would have throbbed with glee.

At the head of his band of janizaries he would have rushed into the place and taken them prisoners.

But he had no idea they were located there.

There was a faint prospect that the three fugitives would be allowed a few minutes' rest and peace.

Ere long they overcame the inconvenience which the wet state of their clothing occasioned them, and then they looked more cheerfully around them.

The ruinous and neglected state of the farm-house and the grounds surrounding it, filled them with surprise and conjecture.

It was in vain they tried in various ways to account for what they saw.

They were unable to frame any tangible hypothesis.

The huge kitchen in which they were appeared to form the whole ground-floor of the dwelling.

It was not an uncommon thing for houses to be built in such a manner.

What was overhead they knew not, and as for the stairs, they looked too crazy and rickety for anyone to feel the least inclination to ascend them.

Some more powerful impulse than mere curiosity would be required for the purpose.

At length, after a rather long pause, during which each of the three was busily occupied in thinking over the prospect which the future presented, Blueskin broke the silence.

"We seem to be quite safe here, and free from interruption. I am weary, and so are both of you. What do you say to our passing the night here? In all probability we shall be more safe than elsewhere."

"I was thinking of the very same thing at the moment you spoke," replied Jack. "As you say, I am weary, and a night's rest would be everything to me."

"Oh! stay—stay," cried Edgworth Bess. "We shall be as safe from our persecutors if we remain here than if we go away; perhaps more so, and you and Jack must not forget how necessary it is for you to have rest."

"I am inclined to think it will be best," said Jack.

"At any rate, Blueskin, let us stay. It may be a long time before we get into such comfortable quarters again."

"Comfortable quarters? Not very, I should think."

"The place has greatly changed in its appearance during the short time we have occupied it."

"True, so it has. But Jack."

"What, Blue?"

"If we decide to stay, there will be two necessary things to be done."

"What are they?"

"One is, to obtain provisions. If the truth was told, we are all three more in want of food than we are of repose, even though, goodness knows, we want that bad enough."

"We do, indeed, Blue. But what is the next thing necessary to be done?"

"Its importance is second only to the first."

"I am impatient to hear it."

"It is to reconnoitre the premises, and be sure that none of Jonathan Wild's men are about."

"I understand you, but I am afraid the task will be difficult."

"I am ready to undertake it."

"I do not doubt that, but you must permit me to carry it out."

"No—no."

"But I say yes—yes."

"And I say no again. Jack, you must give way to me in this. Without self-flattery, I may say that I am more fitting to perform this task than you are."

"Perhaps so; but"—

"I can listen to no reasons of yours, Jack. I will tell you what I have determined upon doing. You will please to recollect that you have yourself constituted me captain of the campaign."

"If you will not listen, of course it is no good for me to speak. In my opinion it will be much better for me to go."

"I daresay such is my opinion. But listen. I will tell you what I intend to do. I shall accomplish both my errands at the same time. That is to say, I shall purchase some provisions and ascertain whether Jonathan Wild is in the neighbourhood."

"You will find it a difficult matter to perform your task without exciting suspicion."

"I know that, but you leave it all to me. You may do so with all confidence. I have had experience in matters of this sort, and I know how to set about them. I cannot rest until I have satisfied myself that all is secure, and therefore I go at once."

"But when will you return?"

"That is rather uncertain. I may be back directly—I may be absent for several hours. It is impossible to say what may occur. Do not feel alarmed if I do not return, but wait till daylight."

"And then?"

"Why, then, you may conclude I have got into trouble. But don't trouble your head about that. It is not worth your while. I mention it merely because it is within the bounds of possibility that such a thing may happen."

"I dread to separate from you," said Jack.

"Very likely. I have a similar feeling in my own breast. It is, however, quite certain that we cannot all three go upon this errand, and equally certain that we cannot all three remain here without obtaining some further information respecting the movements of our enemies than we now possess."

"I understand fully the force of all your arguments, and yet"—

"You have a feeling of dread. It is a natural one. Believe me, I have felt the same sensation steal over myself. Now, Jack, I am going. I must—I shall be back soon."

"And I too."

Blueskin looked to his weapons, and having placed them in such a condition as to be ready for immediate use if required, he went to the door, and, opening it, looked out.

He was by no means sorry to see that the rain had almost ceased, and that there were indications in the sky of fair weather.

He lingered a moment at the door of the ruined farmhouse, and then, after repeating his injunctions to his companions, he crossed the threshold, and passed out into the night air.

Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess stood at the open door watching his departure, but as soon as he observed this, Blueskin made them an hasty and imperative sign to close it and retire.

He was fearful that the bright light of the fire within should attract attention.

It was solely against their inclinations, but Jack and Edgworth Bess obeyed the instructions of their companion.

Blueskin looked back, and waited until he saw the door shut.

Then he began to look about him.

The enterprise which he had taken upon himself was one which was by no means easy to execute.

It was to find out whether Jonathan Wild was really lurking in the vicinity.

It will be remembered by the reader that our friends entirely took the alarm from hearing the sounds of horses' hoofs upon the roadway.

This was very far indeed from being an uncommon event, and yet, as we have seen, they jumped to the conclusion that it was Jonathan Wild's approach which was thus heralded.

Whether they were correct in this conclusion they knew not. They had beat a precipitate retreat, and obtained no further information.

It might be that their alarm was altogether groundless. But, on the other hand, it might have been Jonathan they heard, and, if so, the necessity was very great to know where he was, and how he was employed.

Blueskin kept close under the shelter of the hedges, and crept forward stealthily.

It was much lighter than it had been, though it was still night, and he could see with tolerable ease and comfort about him.

The neglected state of the grounds surrounding the farm-house was, therefore, more perceptible than ever.

The farm seemed one of large extent, but, as far as he could see, one universal aspect of desolation pervaded the whole.

What could be the cause of such a state of things was hard to say.

Blueskin felt that he should receive no small satisfaction if the mystery was cleared up.

Occupied with these thoughts, he made a complete circuit of the house, but nowhere could he see the least signs of Jonathan Wild.

He began to indulge in the hope that they had needlessly alarmed themselves, and that he was nowhere near.

Besides, Blueskin asked himself, how could he have obtained a clue to their present whereabouts?

He thought he had really left no trace, but then his old foe had come upon him with even more unexpectedness.

Blueskin made two circuits of the house—one rather close to it, and the other at a greater distance.

Then he emerged into the road, where they had entered such a short time before.

He looked up and down, but all was still.

Finding this to be the case, he turned to the right down the road.

If he had turned to the left it would have taken him to the suicide's grave.

As it was, he fancied before he got far he must arrive at a village of some sort.

In this supposition he was quite correct.

Very soon he saw before him a mass of buildings.

He approached these cautiously.

The houses he found were small, and all shut up.

For the first time now the thought struck him that at so late an hour he should have the greatest difficulty perhaps in making any purchases.

It is easy to conceive Blueskin not thinking of this before. He had lived nearly all his life in London, where things are procurable at all hours.

Not a soul was anywhere about, nor was there at any of the windows the faintest glimmer.

His only hope now was to find some inn open.

But after walking quite through the village, that hope was frustrated.

He passed two public-houses, but they were closed, and the inhabitants evidently all in bed.

What to do now he knew not.

He was tired, and almost ready to sink to the ground with hunger.

In the vague hope of finding something, he still wandered on along the road, until the village was left behind.

Finding himself once more in the open country, he turned back.

It was the only thing he could do.

One part of his enterprise had been unsuccessful.

As for the other, he had not seen anything of his enemies.

Suddenly, however, as he was taking his way wearily towards the village, he was startled by a loud cry.

Then there was the hasty trampling of horses' feet.

At the time this happened he was just passing the end of a narrow shady lane, which branched off from the main road upon which he was travelling.

The shout and the trampling of feet came from this lane.

Blueskin turned round with great quickness.

Danger was at hand.

But ere he could do more than become conscious of this, he felt himself struck down as if by lightning.

He fell in the roadway upon his back.

He had a dim consciousness of a loud report like that of a pistol ringing in his ears, but that was all.

He lay on the road at full length, bereft of sense and motion.

It was a pistol shot which had laid him low.

The report was succeeded by a voice, which the reader will recognise instantly.

"D—n me, guv'nor! It's done this time, and no mistake. Pop down he goes. Easy does it."

As he spoke, Wild, junior, for it was no other than that worthy, descended from his steed.

His words were succeeded by a volley of the most horrible imprecations which could come from human lips.

One person only possessed the ability to utter such a speech, and that person was the celebrated thief-taker, Jonathan Wild.

"Easy does it, guv'ner," said his son again, in his usual impassible manner. "Easy does it, guv'ner. Your schemes are all d—d fine, but I thought I would just show you how to do business."

"Ten thousand curses!" yelled Jonathan Wild. "Is he dead?"

"I daresay he is, guv'ner."

"No—no. Tell me anything rather than tell me he is dead. He must live. I must not be cheated thus. I will have my revenge—my revenge! Watson, look at him, and tell me whether he is alive."

Jonathan Wild was accompanied by his janizaries, and the one he had named now hastily dismounted from his steed and proceeded to the spot where Blueskin lay prostrate on the ground.

"Now, guv'ner," said Wild, junior, "how can you be so unreasonable? Take it easy. If he is dead he is out of your road, and let that content you."

"But it will not content me. I will not be balked of my revenge in such a manner. Curses on your officiousness; why did you not leave him to me? I would have captured him alive."

"Don't be a d—d fool."

"Take care, George," said Wild, balefully.

"I say, don't be a d—d fool," repeated his son, undauntedly. "Captured him alive! Stuff and rubbish! You mean you would have let him go like you have done many a time before! You are a regular idiot, guv'ner; you are indeed. Here's your man! I see him! Pop! and down he goes! What more do you want?"

"He is alive, Mr. Wild, I think," said Watson, who, assisted by his comrades, had made an examination of Blueskin's body, and ascertained the extent of his injuries. "He is alive, sir, I think."

"Pour some brandy down his throat," cried Jonathan; "and see if that will have any effect."

"Where is there any brandy, sir?"

"Here," said Wild, and, as he spoke, he pulled a flask out of his own pocket and threw it to the men.

George Wild caught it, and, taking out the cork, he placed the flask to Blueskin's lips, and poured as much as he could down his throat.

Blueskin was on his back, so this was made much easier than it would have been.

The effects of the brandy were rather extraordinary.

Blueskin turned almost black in the face, and gasped once or twice.

Another moment and he would have been suffocated, but Wild, junior, rather roughly turned him over on to his face.

The brandy gurgled from his mouth, but otherwise Blueskin exhibited no signs of life.

CHAPTER CCLXXXIX.

JACK SHEPPARD AND EDGORTH BESS SEE AN APPARITION IN THE RUINED FARM-HOUSE.

"JACK, I feel so strangely—there comes such a strange sensation over my heart! What can it mean? It seems like a presentiment of coming danger. Ever since I have been here—ever since I crossed the threshold of this gloomy and deserted habitation—there has been an oppression at my heart which I have tried in vain to shake off, and, now that Blueskin has gone, it has increased tenfold in intensity."

It was Edgworth Bess who spoke these words, as, holding Jack by the hand, she turned away from the door after Blueskin made a sign to them to close it.

Jack Sheppard did not make any immediate reply to her speech, but led her back to the seat she had occupied by the side of the blazing fire.

The words she had just uttered fully expressed the state of his own mind.

Ever since he had entered the farm-house, a dread of impending evil had crept over him, and he had never been more sensible of it than he was at that moment.

It was not his intention, however, to cast a further gloom over the mind of his companion by telling her this. She was sufficiently depressed already, and any increase might be attended with the worst circumstances.

Assuming, then, a tone of voice which he fully intended should be a light-hearted one, but which really was not, he said—

"You must dispel these gloomy thoughts. They will also only have the effect of unnerving you, and making you unfit for whatever is in store for us."

"I cannot help it, Jack. If you will believe me, I have tried my best to shake it off, but the effort is altogether a vain one."

"You speak in a very desponding tone of voice. You must rouse up and be more cheerful, indeed you must. It is wrong of you to allow yourself to be so influenced by circumstances."

"I cannot help it, Jack."

"I fancy it is the absence of Blueskin which has had the most to do with it."

"Perhaps so. You see he has rejoined us such a little while, and now he seems to be gone again."

"He will soon return."

"I wish I could be sure of that."

"You ought to feel sure. You must know enough of Blueskin by this time—you must have seen enough of him to know that he is no ordinary man. He will pass through a danger scatheless where another would be crushed. As yet he has invariably proved himself a match for Jonathan Wild."

"There is some consolation in that reflection, but still my heart is full of fear."

"All will be well, believe me, all will be well. When you come to think of it, the enterprise upon which Blueskin has gone is not at all a dangerous one."

"I should not think it so if we were all three together, but it is the separation which I dread."

"That is only natural."

"Oh! how hard it is that we should be persecuted like we are. And for what? Because I wish to regain possession of that which is rightfully my own, and, what is worse than all, both of you are involved in my persecutions because you have taken part with me against my powerful enemies."

"Do not grieve about that."

"But I do, and I cannot help it. But for me, and your unfortunate championship of my cause, how different would have been your fortunes!"

"I shall not listen to you if you begin to speculate upon that point. I am content with what I have done, and I am sure Blueskin is content also."

"You may be so; but if by renouncing my fortune and expectations I could procure your safety and pardon for the various offences against the laws which you have committed, believe me I would gladly—gladly do so."

Jack was much affected by these words.

About their sincerity he had no sort of doubt.

It was a minute or two before he could command his voice sufficiently to speak.

And then his utterance was husky and indistinct.

"It would not matter how willing you would be to make so great sacrifice," he said, slowly. "For my own part I could never consent to it, and I think I could speak with as much confidence regarding Blueskin."

"And would you pain me by refusing to accept to receive the only recompense I could make to you for what you have done?"

"We wish no such recompense. I could not rest with the knowledge that Jonathan Wild had achieved such a triumph. No—no. Dismiss the thought. Besides, if you were to make the offer, Jonathan would not accept of it."

"Why not?"

"He would not."

"It is my wealth he wants."

"But he wants revenge, too; and he would be villain enough to pretend to accede to your wishes and then betray you all."

"Oh! heaven. How can such monstrous iniquity exist?"

"It does; but why I know not."

As he spoke, Jack rose, and going towards the door, he opened it, in the hope of hearing or seeing something of his old comrade.

But he was disappointed.

He looked all around him, but not the least signs of him were to be seen.

Edgworth Bess rose, too, and came to the door.

She rested her hands familiarly upon Jack's shoulder, and looked out into the darkness with him.

"Is he coming?" she asked.

"I cannot see or hear anything,"

"Nor I."

They were again silent.

The wind whistled through the dilapidated outbuildings of the farm-house with a melancholy sound.

A chill air swept over the face of the earth, and Jack and Bess shuddered before it.

As they looked around them, there came back to their minds a more distinct recollection of the scenery they had lately passed through.

Like Blueskin, they speculated upon the condition in which they found the house and grounds, but without being able to arrive at any reasonable conclusion.

"What a strange thing that was we saw in the lane just before we came here!" said Edgworth Bess, after a short interval of silence.

"Do you mean the suicide's grave?"

"Yes."

"It was a strange sight."

"It was indeed, and such a one as I should not care to look upon again. I wonder who the unhappy being was whose remains find there a last resting-place."

"That I know no better than yourself, though I confess I would fain learn something more respecting it than I know at present."

"And I too. It is an awful thing when you reflect upon it, and how close it is to this strangely deserted place."

Jack startled slightly as Edgworth Bess thus spoke.

It had never occurred to him to connect the grave of the suicide in the four cross-roads and the scene of desolation which he now beheld together.

The novelty of the idea startled him, and the conviction that there was really some kind of connexion between the two, took firm hold upon his mind.

"It is close to this place," he said, half-musingly. "It seems scarcely a stone's throw from it. I should say with certainty that this is the nearest habitation."

"It seems so."

"I never thought of connecting the two as you have done, but no doubt if we could solve the mystery of the one, that would unriddle the other."

"Perhaps so."

"But speculation is idle. We have nothing tangible to go upon. You shudder too. It is cold for you to stand here. Let us go in again."

"Listen for Blueskin first."

Jack did so, but no sound came to his ears.

Turning away, then, he once more closed the door.

As they approached the fire—which, during their temporary absence had burned away to a dull red—both were startled by distinctly hearing a sound which could be likened to nothing but a long-drawn sigh.

Jack recovered himself almost instantly.

But not so his companion.

She clung tightly, and with every appearance of the utmost terror, to his arm.

"What—oh! what was that?" she gasped. "Tell me! Speak to me at once!"

"What?" asked Jack, with as much composure as he could muster, and professing ignorance of what she meant, although he knew so well. "What has alarmed you?"

"Did you not hear it?"

"What?"

Edgworth Bess passed her hand over her forehead.

"I thought I heard something—like—like a deep-drawn sigh."

"Indeed?"

"Did you not hear it?"

"I fancy it must have been the wind," replied Jack, evasively, "whistling through some crevice in the wall."

"There—there! again! Oh! what was that? You heard it, then?"

Another sigh like the first, such a one as would come from some grief-stricken heart, came to the ears of Edgworth Bess, and to the ears of Jack Sheppard, too, as she could tell by the start he gave.

There could be no mistake as to the character of the sound. Nothing but a sigh could have sounded like it.

A sensation, such as he had never before felt, crept over Jack as he heard it.

His breath came short and thick.

As for his companion, her agitation was extreme.

Again she asked her former question.

Her voice was low and faint.

"What was that, Jack? Oh! tell me what it was. I feel terrified to death."

"Quiet your apprehensions. You have nothing to be alarmed at. What I heard certainly sounded like a long-drawn sigh; but, as I said before, it is almost sure to be the wind."

A dull, red glow came from the fire smouldering on the hearth.

It lighted up indistinctly and imperfectly the whole apartment.

By the aid of this illumination, then, Jack Sheppard looked about him, but he could see nothing more than he had seen before.

"Sit down," he said to his companion. "Sit down, and compose yourself. Your alarm is groundless. Sit down, I pray you."

Thus urged, Edgworth Bess assumed a half-sitting, half-crouching position by the fireside.

Jack drew his sword, and stirred the embers of the fire together.

A bright blaze sprang up, and once more the whole apartment was thoroughly lighted up.

Edgworth Bess glanced timidly around her, but she saw nothing to excite her terrors.

"You see," said Jack, "that your fears had no foundation. Unquestionably the sound we heard is to be ascribed to the cause I mentioned."

As he spoke, there came for the third time a prolonged sigh.

There was in reality no mistake about the character of the sound.

It was such a one as would be produced by the inhalation and exhalation of breath from the lungs.

In fact, a sigh.

Jack knew this, but he dreaded to confess as much to Edgworth Bess, for fear her alarm should be increased thereby.

A cold, chilly feeling was about Jack's heart; he was oppressed with a vague indescribable sensation of terror of he knew not what.

Edgworth Bess drew close to him, and clung tightly to his breast.

She felt safe while she did so.

Suddenly Jack felt her grasp upon him increase in tightness, and, looking down, he saw that her face was convulsed with horror.

Her lips were open, and moved slightly.

But no sound came from them.

Her eyes were intently fixed in one direction.

Instinctively his eyes followed her gaze.

They rested upon the dilapidated crumbling staircase which we have already described.

But there was nothing in that to produce the effect he witnessed.

Looking more closely, however, he saw, close to where there was a bend in the staircase, a shadowy-looking figure.

When he first saw it the outlines were so faint and indistinct that it was scarce to be distinguished; but, as he gazed with a strange kind of fascination, he saw the outlines become clear and sharp, though much of the shadowy misty appearance which the figure presented still remained.

It seemed to be the figure of a female, for Jack could perceive that the lower half of it was enveloped in long flowing garments.

With straining eyes, and a heart beating at thrice its ordinary rate, Jack looked at this strange apparition, if such it was.

He seemed spell-bound.

As for Edgworth Bess, the whole of her energies were employed in gazing at the figure.

More and more distinct it became, though by what means they scarcely knew.

Not only could the whole outline of the form be now perceived, but that it was indeed the figure of a female—and a young one, too.

The face was plainly visible.

It was one of rare loveliness.

But ghastly white.

There was, too, upon it an expression of the most unutterable anguish.

Her hands were small and white.

One seemed to rest upon the massive balustrade of the old staircase.

Her dress was one such as Jack could dimly remember his grandmother having worn, and doubtless it was at that epoch that they were fashionable.

There was something very interesting in the appearance of this figure, and something very harmless, too, for who, looking upon those grief-stricken features, could have dreamt for a moment that the possessor of them would have done harm to any one.

CHAPTER CCLXXX.

JACK SHEPPARD OBTAINS A CLUE TO THE DESERTION OF THE FARM-HOUSE BY FOLLOWING THE APPARITION. The silence which prevailed in the ruined farm-house while the singular scene we have been describing took place is something which cannot be properly realized.

The breathing of Jack and his terrified companion was so slight as to be perfectly inaudible.

No sound came from the staircase where the figure of the young girl could be seen.

No sound had heralded her approach.

She seemed to grow out of the darkness.

And now there she stood, silent and immovable.

Jack Sheppard had heard much respecting apparitions, but he had disbelieved all the tales which had been told him respecting them.

Now he felt his disbelief in their existence rather shaken, for what could be the mysterious object before him but a spectre?

Moreover, the presence of an apparition would at once account for the ruinous and uninhabited condition of the farm-house.

When a dwelling gets the reputation of being haunted, it quickly lapses into decay.

Indeed, it would soon present all the appearances which that place presented.

Anxiously and eagerly, then, Jack watched to see what was coming next.

It could not be said that he was exactly frightened by what he saw; indeed, it is questionable whether fear ever really found an entrance to that bold heart.

Curiosity was what he really felt.

He was anxious to know how the adventure would terminate.

Edgworth Bess, however, whose mental organization was much more delicate and sensitive, was terrified to such a degree that she could scarcely contain herself.

She clung to Jack with a tightness which he would have found it impossible to shake off, if he had wished to do so.

The figure of the young girl moved.

But so slowly and so gently as to be all but imperceptible.

Still she did move.

Jack and his companion first became conscious of it by perceiving not only that more of the figure was revealed, but also that it was much lower down the stairs than it was when they first saw it.

It was descending, but with a slow, gliding movement, as though the apparition floated in the air just an inch or so above the stairs.

It certainly descended.

Now it was on the bottom stair but one.

As it approached, Edgworth Bess shrunk slowly back before it, until she was prevented from going any further by Jack, who stood close behind her.

The interest and curiosity which Jack had hitherto felt were redoubled.

In his earnest contemplation of the spectacle before him he forgot everything.

Forgot the peril of their situation.

Forgot the peril in which his comrade was, no doubt, placed.

In a word, every other feeling was absorbed in the contemplation of what was taking place before him.

He wondered whether the spectre was coming close to him, and then he asked himself, with some anxiety, what kind of power such a supernatural being would be likely to possess.

He felt that if she did come—if the apparition really chose to place her hands upon him—he could not help it. A strange kind of fascination rooted him to the spot.

Upon reaching the foot of the stairs, however, the apparition became stationary.

At the same moment the fire crackled, and a bright blaze sprung up.

The spectre was then revealed with greater distinctness than ever, and there could now no longer linger in the mind of Jack Sheppard the least doubt respecting the reality of what he saw.

It was no delusion of the senses.

There it stood, plain, and apparently tangible.

Moreover, it was seen not only by himself, but by Edgworth Bess, and it was quite impossible for them both to be victims of the same illusion at the same time.

With unabated interest, fearful of moving his eyes for a second, and straining them until they smarted and ached unbearably—Jack continued to watch.

The figure now turned half-round, as though it would ascend the stairs again.

But this movement, like all the others which it made, was perfectly inaudible.

There was not the least rustle or disturbance of the air.

And now, as she stood there in this fresh position, the apparition raised her right arm from her side, against which it had been placed.

Then, looking with a sorrowful and entreating gaze into the faces of Jack and Edgworth Bess, she beckoned to them with her hand, as though she wished them to follow her.

At least so they both interpreted the action.

Again and again did the spectre repeat the movement.

Then she ascended the staircase a little way, and, turning round, beckoned to them again.

This put all doubts completely on one side as to the indentments of the apparition.

Seeing, however, that Jack and Edgworth Bess made no attempt to move, a look of still deeper anguish appeared upon the countenance of the apparition, and she repeated her signal to them with less equivocation than before.

And, perhaps in order that there should not be any doubt about her wishes, she ascended the stairs a little higher, beckoning with her hand at the same time that she did so.

The curiosity which Jack had felt now took a fresh and still more interesting turn.

It was evident, he thought, that, for some reason or other, the spectre wished him to ascend the stairs.

Perhaps there was something to be seen above that would well repay a visit.

We have said that Jack felt no fear.

There was nothing in the appearance of the spectre to excite such a feeling.

He resolved to follow it, no matter where it led.

As soon as he made this resolution he moved slightly, but he found himself quite unable to shake off the grasp of Edgworth Bess.

He struggled, however, until he stood fairly upright.

"Release me," he said, in a whisper. "Release me. See, she beckons to us to follow her, and I will do so."

Bess did not speak, but looked at Jack with an expression of the greatest terror on her countenance, and shook her head.

"But I must go—I will," said Jack. "It may be that there is something to be seen which it is necessary for us to see. And it may be that the time will come when we shall wish that we had gone to look, and thus put an end to all uncertainty upon the matter."

"Oh! Jack, I am afraid."

"Afraid of what?"

"Of following her."

"Why so? There is nothing terrible in her appearance. She could not harm us if she would, and I don't think she would have the least inclination."

Bess was silent.

"Come," he said, soothingly; "there is nothing to fill you with so much alarm—nothing at all. Will you stay here by the fireside, and allow me to follow the apparition upstairs alone, or will you prefer to accompany me?"

"I would rather neither."

"But one must be. Look, she beckons us again to come. Let me assist you to your feet. That is it. Now come with me, and take my word there is nothing to fear."

Edgworth Bess permitted Jack to raise her to her feet. He put his arm around her.

"Fear nothing now," he said. "I can and will defend you from all harm. Let us prosecute this adventure to the end. Come."

Bess looked in the direction of the staircase.

There stood the apparition of the young girl, in the same position as she had last seen it.

It looked brighter and more distinct, she thought, and the expression of sorrow seemed much lessened.

Seeing her look in that direction, the spectre renewed its intreating gestures for them to follow her.

"Wait a moment, dearest," said Jack. "Blueskin's lantern is here. I will take it with me. Perhaps we shall have need of it."

"Oh! yes—yes. Take the lantern. It will at least be a consolation to us if we enter any dark place."

"It will."

Jack took Blueskin's lantern from the place where it had been deposited and lighted it.

Then, holding that in his right hand, and putting his left arm round the waist of his trembling companion, they both moved towards the bottom of the broken staircase.

A faint smile appeared upon the countenance of the young girl when she saw that Jack was really about to follow her, and she glided up the stairs until she was lost to sight where they curved round.

Courage and daring are, like cowardice and fright, contagious, and so it was that Edgworth Bess succeeded, in a great measure, in freeing herself from those terrors which had weighed so heavily upon her.

It seemed to her that, the higher up she went, the more free she became.

Upon turning the bend in the staircase they looked up and saw the same girlish, shadowy figure standing at the top of the stairs, and still beckoning with her hand for them to come on.

And now Jack was glad he had thought of bringing the lantern with him, for the portion of the staircase they were now ascending was profoundly dark.

The apparition glided away as they approached, all the time taking care to preserve the same distance between them.

When they stood on the landing at the top of the stairs, they found the spectre standing near a door.

Once more beckoning to them it disappeared.

Jack made a bound forward and flashed the light of the lantern upon the panels of the door.

There was no trace of the form of the young girl to be seen.

The door through which she had passed was close shut.

Up to this moment something like an idea that what he saw was not altogether supernatural had held possession of Jack's mind, but this seemed to dissipate it altogether. The door had not been opened and closed again, he was quite sure about that.

And if the figure had not passed through that door, where was it?

It had stood before that door and disappeared.

But where could it have gone?

That seemed to be a mystery, without Jack felt inclined to take it for granted that this was a supernatural visitation, and he was very loath to do that.

Edgworth Bess trembled, and her old fears came back to her.

"Oh! Jack—Jack!" she said, "do not let us tempt our fate any longer; let us fly from this spot, and leave it to those spirits who appear to have taken possession of it."

"No—no."

"Why do you say 'no'?"

"Supposing that what we see is supernatural, should you like to oppose yourself to those of whose powers of mischief you can form no proper estimate?"

"What do mean, Jack?"

"Just what I say, and no more. I think it perfectly clear that it was the wish of that figure that we should follow it here."

"I think so too."

"Then, do you not consider that it would be far wiser for us to obey the wishes of this mysterious form, so far as we are able, than to refuse what they require, and by so doing incur their resentment?"

"I did not think of that, Jack."

"Then I am glad I suggested it to you, for it may be the means of inspiring you with fresh courage."

"But, suppose this figure should lead us into some danger?"

"We must keep a good look out, and, when we see anything perilous, then will be the time for us to draw back."

"I understand you."

"So far we have come in perfect safety, and why not further?"

"Look—oh! look."

"Ha!"

While they were speaking, an undefined something, like a vapoury cloud, appeared before the door which faced them.

It was, however, only for a moment that it retained this cloud-like appearance.

It gradually solidified itself, so to speak, and there stood before them the same figure they had previously seen.

There was not visible upon her countenance any expressions of impatience at their delay.

On the contrary, she looked smiling and encouraging to them, as though she wished to persuade them to follow her.

Again she beckoned.

Jack stepped forward.

He anticipated what was about to come—he was able to do so now—and he fixed his eyes most steadfastly upon the apparition.

He was determined that not a movement that it made should escape his observation.

He directed the whole of the rays which came through the lens of the lantern upon it.

Then went a step or two forward.

Again the spectre disappeared.

She seemed to melt away, and pass through the door in the form of an impalpable vapour.

It was closed as before.

Jack felt not a little bewildered.

But now, wrought up to the highest possible pitch of excitement, he dragged his trembling companion towards the door.

He dashed himself against it.

It was fast.

Perspiration started on to his forehead, and streamed down his face.

No longer could there be any scepticism about the matter.

By no human agency could any one have passed through the door in such a manner.

This was enough to cause hesitation even in a bold breast.

But Jack did not falter.

Releasing his hold of Edgworth Bess for a moment, he passed the lantern from his right to his left hand.

Then he felt up and down the door for a fastening.

His hand quickly encountered one of those rude drop-latches, such as are even now to be found in old-fashioned country houses.

He pressed upon the thumb-piece, and found the latch rose freely up.

It was an anxious moment.

The least pressure, and the mysterious door would swing open.

CHAPTER CCLXXXI.

THE MYSTERIES OF THE RUINED FARM-HOUSE AND FULLY REVEALED TO JACK SHEPPARD AND EDGORTH BESS.

What was beyond?

That was the question which involuntarily rose up in Jack's mind.

Naturally enough, now that he felt he had the power to do so, he hesitated for a moment before he opened the door.

Strange thoughts crowded thickly in his mind.

But, banishing them by an effort, he flung the door open.

It creaked back mournfully upon its hinges.

A kind of faint twilight filled the room, and Jack was quite at a loss to think from whence it came.

Just over the threshold he saw the same figure once again.

[JONATHAN WILD TAKES BLUESKIN A PRISONER TO LONDON.]

She still motioned them to follow.

Urged on by an irresistible curiosity, Jack once more placed his arm round his companion's waist, and led her forwards.

Once over the threshold of the door, the light was revealed.

In the room above there was a large breach, through which the night sky, covered with drifting clouds, could be seen.

Jack cast a hasty glance around him, and saw that the place in which he stood was an ordinary-looking chamber, though of rather unusual size.

It seemed to be almost destitute of furniture.

The apparition glided along the floor of this room, followed by Jack and Bess, feverishly impatient to know the sequel of this strange adventure.

In one corner of this room was what looked like a large closet or cupboard.

Towards this point the spectre appeared to direct her steps.

She halted, however, when within a few paces of it.

Jack and Bess halted, too.

The figure turned round towards them, and then, raising her right hand, she pointed, with a significant gesture, to the cupboard.

Having done this, she turned away, and glided in the direction of a dark corner.

Jack followed her, fearful that he should lose her, and things be left in their present unsatisfactory condition.

The corner, too, was not suffered to remain long in darkness, for he directed the beams of his lantern into it.

He could see nothing, however, but a confused heap of something, but of what he could not say.

Towards this indistinguishable heap the spectre pointed, and then began gliding rapidly across the room.

Fain would Jack then and there have stepped forward and ascertained what it was that lay in the corner, but he feared to take his eyes off the spectral form for a single moment, and, when he saw it going in the direction of the door, he followed it.

From time to time the young girl turned round and beckoned them on.

Jack told himself that there was something more to be seen.

Supporting his half-fainting companion, for the scene we have described was too much for Edgworth Bess to stand, Jack followed the apparition out of the room on to the landing, from the landing to the stairs, and down the stairs into the apartment in which they had previously been sitting.

The fire upon the hearth was now almost burnt out for want of fuel.

If it was not quickly attended to, it would expire altogether.

The light that now came from it was quite insignificant, so that the lantern was again useful.

Jack stopped at the bottom of the stairs.

The apparition glided across the kitchen in the direction of the fire.

Upon reaching this she paused.

The red light of the fire shone upon her with a strange and weird-like effect.

Once more she turned her face towards Jack and his companion, to make sure their attention was fixed upon her.

Then, with precisely the same movement, she raised her arm, and pointed down upon the hearth in the same way as she had pointed twice before upstairs.

She stood in this attitude for a moment, and then faded away like an evening vapour upon the surface of a lake.

Jack Sheppard uttered an exclamation, and, at the same moment, Edgworth Bess fainted away.

His attention was thus instantly distracted.

He had no thought now for anything but his insensible companion.

He carried her towards the fire, and laid her down at full length upon the floor.

He had no means at hand for recovering her from her swoon.

Quick as thought Jack ran to the door, and passed out into the night air.

He recollected how heavily it had been raining, and he thought he should find water somewhere very close at hand.

In this expectation he was not disappointed.

Some kind of stone vase lay just outside the door, and in this a quantity of water had collected.

The vase was too heavy for him to lift, so Jack took off his hat and dipped it in.

It was made of felt, and was waterproof.

In this he carried the water.

A few drops sprinkled into the face of Edgworth Bess had the effect of restoring her to consciousness.

As soon as this happy result was attained, Jack raised her up.

The poor girl passed her hands confusedly over her eyes, as if by that means she could clear her mental vision.

"I—I have had such a dreadful dream, Jack—such a dreadful dream! I am so glad it is only a dream!"

"Are you, dearest?"

"Yet no; I recollect all now. Memory has properly come back to me. It was no dream, Jack—it was no dream! I remember. It was no dream; was it?"

"I am not quite sure what you allude to."

"I mean, Jack, it was no dream that we followed that figure upstairs into the room above. That was no dream; I remember all the circumstances too well."

"No, it was not a dream," replied Jack, "without we are dreaming now."

"And we certainly are not."

"We are not."

"Oh! would that Blueskin would return, so that we could leave this dreadful place! Where, oh! where can he be?"

"Calm yourself, dear one. You are in a state of dreadful excitement—calm yourself. Blueskin has not returned, but I expect him every moment. Perhaps he has had to go a long way for provisions."

"He has been absent a long time."

"He has, indeed, but we must wait here until his return. He told us not to be surprised if we had to wait until daybreak."

"I know he did."

"Then, again I say, be calm. You have really nothing to fear. You swooned; that was all."

"That form! Oh! Jack, what does it all mean? What do you think of the strange things we have seen?"

"Try to be less agitated, and then we will talk together upon this subject, and endeavour to come to a conclusion."

"I am calm now, Jack—I am, indeed. Talk to me—pray talk to me."

"I will. Do you remember how we heard the sighs, and how we saw the figure of a young girl upon the stairs?"

"Oh! yes; I remember every incident connected with it. Jack!"

"What, dearest?"

"Can it be possible that there are such things as spirits—apparitions—call them what you will?"

"I have always been taught to disbelieve in their existence."

"And so have I."

"But numberless well-authenticated cases are on record which go far to prove the contrary; but there are many who disbelieve these narratives."

"What are we to think of what we have seen?"

"There is the mystery. It may be that we are to settle the question beyond all doubt. What we have seen is very strange, and was witnessed by both of us at the same time."

"Oh! yes; and, therefore, it is impossible that we should both have fallen into the same error."

"Just so. Now, if you were willing, there is something which I should very much like to do."

"What is it, Jack?"

"To investigate this matter thoroughly."

"In what way?"

"I will explain to you."

"Do so."

"The behaviour of the figure we saw was very extraordinary."

"It was, indeed."

"How desirous it seemed to be that we should follow it upstairs, and how pleased it seemed to be when we moved towards the bottom of the staircase."

"I think there can be no doubt about the desire of the figure."

"None, I think. And now, what do you make of its actions?"

Bess shuddered.

"The door," she said.

"Ah! the door. That is a difficult point. The figure passed through it at pleasure while closed."

"And that seems to prove the supernatural character of this visitation."

"At first sight it does, but I should not like to take it for granted that it was so on such grounds alone. The figure certainly passed through the door, and now do you remember what the figure did after we crossed the threshold of the room?"

"I think I do."

"You seemed to be in a half-fainting state, and I thought perhaps you might only retain in your mind a confused and imperfect recollection of what took place. The figure glided towards a cupboard at one side of the fireplace. Then, halting a few paces from it, she turned round and looked at us, and then pointed to it with her finger."

"She did."

"Then, apparently assured that we had seen her, she glided to a dark corner in which I could just distinguish a mass of something, and she pointed at that too."

"I remember it."

"Then we followed her downstairs, and, going to the fire, she repeated the same actions and disappeared."

"Then, Jack, then I must have fainted."

"You did, dearest, and I restored you to consciousness as quickly and as well as I was able. Now is there not something very mysterious about the behaviour and actions of this figure, independently of the strangeness of its appearance?"

"Very, indeed."

"I think so. You may depend there was and is a deep meaning in it all."

"But what?"

"That is just what I should like to find out."

"How?"

"I will tell you, and I hope you will not oppose me in any way. First, however, I ought to state my belief that the figure meant by showing us those different places, that we were to explore them."

"That—that is the interpretation which I put upon it."

"It is, I fancy, the only interpretation that can be put upon it. You will understand what I wish now. It is to first of all go to the cupboard upstairs at which the figure pointed, and find out what it contains."

"Oh! Jack. Who knows what peril and danger there might be in such a course, or what terrible sights might meet your eyes?"

"Never mind that. Or, if you wish it, I will leave you here while I go upstairs alone."

"No—no. I cannot consent to that."

"I thought you would not. There is, then, but one other alternative, and that is, to ascend with me. I should like you to do so very much. Come!"

"I will, Jack. I feel timid and apprehensive, but curious. I should like to know what there is to be found."

"And I. If we were to leave this place without making the exploration I speak of, it would haunt me to my dying day."

"I will come with you."

Jack was glad that Edgworth Bess gave her consent.

He did not like to do anything to which she was opposed, and he would not have felt at ease in his mind if he left her downstairs while he went above.

He lost no time now, for fear she should change her mind, and, moreover, he was impatient in the extreme to know what discoveries awaited him.

He fully anticipated finding something which would amply repay him for his trouble.

The lantern was still alight, but burning dimly.

Hastily, however, he retrimmed the wick and closed the slide.

Edgworth Bess trembled excessively.

She could not control the tremor of her limbs.

Such agitation, under such circumstances, is nothing but natural.

Jack put his left arm round her waist, and then she experienced a feeling of safety which nothing else could have produced.

She had great faith in Jack's power to save her from all harm, and it is to this fact that we must account for her consenting to accompany him in his search in the room above.

There are few, we fancy, who would have behaved with greater coolness, under such circumstances as we have described, than Jack Sheppard.

He had preserved his coolness throughout the adventure, though he might fairly enough have been pardoned if he had lost it.

With a clear head and mind he had weighed every event, and arrived at his conclusions by logical deductions.

His heart, however, now beat at a more rapid rate as he walked towards the foot of the staircase with the lantern in his hand.

The silence of the place now seemed to increase, and every movement they made became painfully audible.

Edgworth Bess had some difficulty in preserving her composure, but by continual efforts she succeeded in doing so.

More than once they paused in their ascent and listened, as some faint sound would fall upon their ears.

At length the landing was reached.

After a moment's hesitation it was crossed.

Then they entered the mysterious room, in which something more startling and terrible than Jack even conceived awaited them.

A chill struck to them—seeming to penetrate to their hearts—as they crossed the threshold, and through the hole in the roof they could hear the wind whistling mournfully.

Unheeding this, Jack took his course in a direct line across the blackened flooring to the cupboard door, nor did he pause until he stood close before it.

Then he cast the beams of the lantern more fully upon it.

What would that cupboard-door disclose when he opened it?

His heart beat fast as he asked himself the question.

CHAPTER CCLXXXII.

JACK SHEPPARD DISCOVERS IN THE CUPBOARD THE CONFESSION OF THOMAS DOLEMAN.

A CLOSER examination of the cupboard door, by the aid of the lantern, showed Jack that it was shut but not fastened, and that he had nothing more to do than to insert his fingers in the crevice, and pull it back upon its hinges.

The action would be a simple enough one, but yet Jack hesitated to perform it.

The probability is, that if he had had some difficulty in unfastening the door—if he had had to use some violence, this feeling would have been wanting.

It was the consciousness that he had so little to do that made him for a moment draw back.

Ashamed, however, of his hesitation, and determined to give way to it no longer, he put out his hand and flung open the cupboard.

No words can portray the eagerness with which both he and his fair companion glanced into the recess which was disclosed.

To their disappointment and vexation, however, nothing but bare shelves met their gaze.

What they had expected would be hard indeed to say. Perhaps no very definite idea filled their minds, but certainly they were not prepared to see nothing.

Dust had accumulated in large quantities, and the interior seemed pitchy dark.

Beyond that there was nothing to be seen.

Jack Sheppard drew a long breath and stepped back a pace, as he said—

"What does this mean?"

"There is nothing there," said Edgworth Bess; "you see there is nothing there. Come away, Jack. We have been played upon in some way and deluded. Come away!"

And as she spoke, she strove to draw him away by main force.

"No—no," he cried. "I cannot, will not believe that all we have seen is mere jugglery—at any rate, not until I have more direct proof than I have at present. Release me. I must look more closely into the cupboard. Its secrets may be hidden."

Jack released himself from the feeble grasp of his companion, and was at the cupboard door in a moment.

Edgworth Bess kept close behind him.

He flashed his lantern into the cupboard, and the broad ray of light disclosed its inmost recesses.

But he could see nothing.

The walls were bare and broken.

The shelves had not a single article upon them.

Suddenly, however, his eye lighted upon a small packet or parcel.

It was not at all wonderful that it escaped him when he made his first examination. The wonder was rather that he should have seen it at all.

It lay on the middle shelf, and was quite close to the edge.

It was small and flat, and covered with dust like the shelf upon which it rested, and this it was that made it so difficult to be perceived.

A corner sticking up attracted Jack's attention.

He seized it in a moment, and then he saw the packet was a paper one.

It looked like a bundle of letters, and was tied round the middle with either a piece of tape or a piece of fine twine.

Hastily wiping away the accumulated dust, Jack looked more closely at the packet.

His eye caught some words written on the outside.

They were very faint, and assimilated so closely with the colour of the paper as to be almost indistinguishable.

By the aid of the powerful light which he threw upon it, Jack was able to decipher the following words—

"The dying confessions of Thomas Doleman."

He read them aloud.

Edgworth Bess read them, too, for she looked over his shoulder.

"Here is what we were to find," said Jack. "Beyond all doubt this is what we were to find. Let us find out the contents."

"Not here," said Edgworth Bess. "Not here. Let us go down into the room below."

"Agreed," cried Jack. "Take charge of it. I will look once more into the cupboard and assure myself whether that is all which it contains."

Jack did so.

But, though he made the closest search, he could not find anything else.

Although Jack had given his immediate consent to read downstairs the document he had found, he did not intend to leave the upstairs room just yet.

There was something more to be found.

He had noticed the corner to which the figure had directed its footsteps.

He had seen the dusky mass which lay there, and he resolved to make himself acquainted with its character.

Without saying a word to his companion, he walked steadily towards it.

She followed him.

Impatient to solve this part of the mystery, he projected the light of the lantern before him.

Not for long was he left in doubt as to the nature of the dusky mass.

A shriek of horror, which came from the lips of Edgworth Bess, told him too plainly that she also had seen it.

It was the body of a man.

But so far resolved into the elements of which it was composed, as to retain but few traces of humanity.

There were some, however, and the most prominent was the skull, which, as is well known, will remain intact when all the rest of the body has perished.

But here there was a loathsome mass, upon the exterior of which portions of clothing were visible, and it was these which indicated the sex.

Sickened and disgusted at this unexpected sight, Jack turned away.

The mysteries of the ruined haunted building were becoming more and more manifest.

Jack yet had hopes of fathoming the mystery completely, and learning how and why it was the farm and the farm-house were in the condition in which he found it.

Without speaking a word, however, he led the way to the staircase, which he descended.

Upon reaching the room below, they found the fire almost out.

But Jack stirred it, and replaced more fuel upon it, and then sat down to read the confession, which he was most impatient to do.

So impatient that he forgot to notice the length of time which Blueskin had been absent, or, if he did, he affected not to do so.

That some strange and startling narrative was about to be unfolded he could only reasonably expect, after what had taken place.

Resuming their seats, then, near the fire, Jack untied the bundle of papers.

There were several letters, but these he allowed to fall fluttering to the ground.

His attention was concentrated upon the top one in the packet, and which bore the superscription we have already cited.

It was a large sheet of paper, and much faded and discoloured with age.

Jack opened it hastily, and saw that it was covered with small fine writing.

In a hushed voice Jack began reading aloud, while Edgworth Bess looked over his shoulder and listened earnestly, while from time to time she would assist him to make out the obscurer portions of the document.

He read as follows—

"I have crawled to this place—the scene of my monstrous iniquities and crimes—to die.

"The hand of death, I can feel, is on me. I have but a few hours, perchance, to live. Those few hours I will occupy in writing a confession. When it is finished, I shall deposit it somewhere where it may be found easily; and then, at last, justice will be done to her who has suffered so much from my villainy and wickedness.

"Execrations will, no doubt, be heaped upon my head when the dark transactions of the past are thus laid bare to light, but I have at least the consolation of knowing that I shall not hear them, let them be ever so loudly uttered.

"That consideration which has caused me to keep silent for so long will exist no longer, and now I will do what tardy justice I can.

"It does not lie either in my power, or in the power of any living man, to bring the dead back to life; or I would gladly—oh! how gladly!—make reparation for my crimes by so doing.

"That being denied me, however, I must do all I can.

"Unluckily for me, that all is but little.

"I can remove the load of infamy which rests upon the fame of one who was really spotless.

"I can remove it from the breast of the innocent one upon which it now rests, and place it where it deserves to be.

"When I have done that, I shall feel that I can die more content.

"There will be many who will recollect when this farm was one of the best kept and most productive in the county; and when its owner and occupier, Thomas Doleman, was a well-to-do and respected man.

"But there are few indeed who would recognise him in the miserable wretch who has crawled into this place to die.

"And yet it is so.

"I will begin my confessions by relating the principal facts of my life just as they occurred, and without any exaggeration whatever.

"That they are every one true, I solemnly swear.

"I do this and say this because many of the facts are already well known, but they are nearly all clouded with misrepresentations, while some are stated which are utterly false and without foundation.

"All doubt and uncertainty will then be removed.

"To begin. This farm, which has been so long neglected and left to ruin, is mine—mine by inalienable right—I inherited it from my father, whose only son I am.

"For a long time all went well with me. I was lucky with my crops and farming-stock, and everything seemed to prosper that I took in hand. I bore an excellent character, and was respected by every one for miles and miles round.

"That was a happy time.

"As my circumstances were so good, and as I was a young man of five-and-twenty, I received plenty of invitations from those who dwelt around me, and I have reason to believe that I should not have been unacceptable to any of their marriageable daughters.

"But I turned my back upon all of them—my affections were already fixed.

"The object of my devotion was, however, very far beneath me, so far as worldly circumstances are concerned, but she was rich in beauty, and in all those qualities which adorn a woman.

"At the time when I first felt a passion for her she was about eighteen years of age—that period when a woman's personal attractions are in the meridian.

"This young girl then fulfilled a menial position in my household.

"But, though her station was now so low, it had not always been so. Her family had been reduced by misfortune, and now she was forced to earn her own livelihood.

"So far as birth was concerned, she was quite my equal.

"I thought of all this at first, and determined, if I could win her affections, to marry her honourably.

"Would that I had kept to that good resolution, but my evil spirit prompted me to depart from it, and I listened to his suggestions.

"As I had prospered in all my other undertakings, so did I prosper in this. The young girl, although she was pleased with my advances, recalled to my recollection the difference in the position there was between us.

"But I need not linger over this part of my story. It can do no good, and I have not the patience to write it. Let it suffice to say that I won her love, and that I promised her marriage.

"At the time I made that promise, I now, after all that has occurred, solemnly declare I was perfectly in earnest, and that my intentions towards her were strictly honourable.

"In a little while, however, when I was quite sure I had taken a hold of her affections, as I have already hinted, I listened to the promptings of my evil genius.

"I continued my attentions to her, but no longer in the same honourable spirit. What need was there, I asked, to marry her?"

"When I once got to this frame of mind, you will be able to guess the rest. After a long struggle and protracted resistance, I overcame her virtue, though I did not throw off the mask as yet.

"I still promised her marriage, though I had not the remotest intention of adhering to that promise.

"In a word, she became mine, and, at length, she by degrees learned the truth.

"She learned that I had acted like a villain to her.

"At first she was frantic, but by degrees the violence of her grief abated.

"Time passed on, and then a child was born.

"Her shame could now no longer be concealed, but the birth of her boy seemed to reconcile her to her fate.

"Things went on thus for four years, and then a circumstance occurred which altered the whole aspect of affairs.

"Some very wealthy people came down from London to reside in a large house which they had built for their own occupation on a piece of ground which adjoined my farm.

"I soon became acquainted with them.

"They had one child, a daughter—a young girl just budding into womanhood.

"She was, of course, the sole heiress of all their wealth.

"No sooner did I see her than I fell violently in love with her.

"She was not only very beautiful, but rich.

"And I was tired of my victim.

"At least, I became so as soon as I saw the heiress.

"As her parents and herself were strangers in the country, they knew nothing of my child and my mistress.

"It would never do for any knowledge of them to reach their ears.

"I was convinced if they did there would be an immediate and final end to my suit.

"The inference from this I thought was clear.

"Both she and her child must be disposed of.

"But how?"

"That was the question that occupied my mind day and night, and to which I vainly sought to frame an answer.

"My evil spirit soon appeared, however, and put a diabolical scheme into my head, by which I could achieve my purpose!"

CHAPTER CCLXXXIII.

THE CAUSE OF THE DESERTION AND SUPERNATURAL VISITATION OF THE RUINED FARM-HOUSE ARE LAID BEFORE THE READER.

JACK paused.

He had read all that was contained on the first piece of paper—closely written as it was.

He drew a long breath.

His interest in the strange story he was becoming acquainted with was most intense, and it was with a feverish eagerness that he turned over the other papers in the packet in order to find where the confession was continued.

The interest felt by Edgworth Bess was by no means less than her companion's, and she was quite as anxious as he was to find the next scrap of paper.

At length they discovered it, and then Jack resumed reading.

"The plot which I conceived, and which was elaborated in my mind with fiend-like rapidity, was of such an awful character that I shudder when I describe it.

"But it can be described in a few words.

"I determined to murder the child, and contrive to have her accused and convicted of the crime.

"No sooner had I resolved upon this devilish plot, than I resolved to put it into execution.

"One night I took opportunity to obtain possession of the child, and, having done so, I murdered it.

"Yes, that is the word—I murdered it. I destroyed its little innocent life, and so far I, told myself, I had succeeded in my plans,

"My next step was to get my victim accused of the crime, and in doing this I was also successful.

"In vain she protested her innocence, and was distraught with grief. She was not believed, but hurried to a cell, and there left.

"I fancy now, in thinking over the past, that she must have either known or suspected the truth; but, if so, not a word did she utter concerning it.

"On the morning following her incarceration her cell was visited, and then it was discovered that, during the night, she had committed suicide.

"She was quite dead.

"I had not anticipated this. I then looked upon it as a stroke of good fortune. I was comfortably rid of mother and child, and I had nothing more to do than to prosecute my suit with the heiress.

"I was spared the hazard of a trial, for I had reckoned upon it, and had calculated upon her execution.

"My blood turns cold in my veins now that I recall the thought of the past, and it seems impossible that I could ever have been guilty of such deeds in thought or act.

"But it was so.

"There was, of course, an inquest upon the body of the poor mother.

"The verdict of the jury was, that she had committed suicide while fully conscious of her actions.

"The result of such a verdict is, of course, known to all.

At midnight her poor remains were consigned to a grave rudely dug in the centre of four cross roads. A hedge-stake was driven through her breast, and a stone placed over her face.

"Then the grave was filled up, and a mound of stones placed over it, so that all might know it was the grave of a suicide.

"I was a fool to think, as I did, that I should not reap the consequences of my evil deeds. I thought I should have gone on prospering, but I soon awoke to a consciousness of my mistake.

"In vain I strove to banish from my mind all recollection of the murdered mother and her child.

"By day—by night—every moment, sleeping or waking, their images appeared before me, until earth became hell.

"The aspect of the farm became hateful to me. There was scarcely a part of it that did not command a view of the desolate spot where she lay buried.

"Over and over again did I repent what I had done, but, like nearly all repentance, it came too late.

"Then there came losses, which succeeded each other with bewildering rapidity.

"The crops failed, and the cattle died off by hundreds in the fields.

"In a word, ruin came on with tremendous strides, and at length I fairly abandoned the spot where I fully thought I should live and die.

"I became a wanderer on the face of the earth.

"I have roamed through many lands, and many years have elapsed since the occurrence of the events I have described, and my crime has never been discovered, nor will it while I live, for the hand of death weighs with increasing heaviness upon me.

"But do not let any person delude themselves with the idea that, because my crime has been undiscovered, I have escaped punishment; that would indeed be a deplorable error for any one to fall into.

"What I have suffered no tongue could possibly tell; I have known what it is to have the curse of Cain upon me.

"My punishment could not be greater than it has been. I have felt that it would be a satisfaction and release to have the hangman's cord about my neck.

"But I have been compelled to live an outcast from my fellow-creatures, and shunning every look.

"What I have suffered no human being, save myself, has the least idea. My sufferings are, however, approaching a termination. My hour has almost come. I shall sit down in some obscure corner and there wait for death, having first deposited this confession in some place where it will be safe and yet easily found.

"No one knows of my return, and therefore how long the farm may be allowed to go to ruin I know not. The place has got an evil name, and it is believed that I am a resident abroad.

"I have no heirs, and I hope that the old place will never be disturbed, but allowed to crumble and rot away.

"And this I declare to be my last dying confession.

"Along with it will be found some other papers.

"There are three letters which I received from my poor victim, and also two different printed accounts, one of which charges her with the murder and the other describes her burial at the four cross-roads.

"And all the above I solemnly swear to be the truth.

"THOMAS DOLEMAN."

Jack ceased.

The confession was ended.

He allowed the paper to fall into his lap, and he gazed into the face of his companion for some minutes without speaking a word.

The narrative, with the particulars of which they had just become acquainted, was of so awful a character that they did not know how to comment upon it.

As for Edgworth Bess, she was quite overcome with horror. Never in all her life had she heard anything so terrible.

"What do you think now?" asked Jack, at length.

"Of what?"

"Of the strange visitation?"

"I know not what to think."

"We cannot consider that figure as a delusion of the brain. You see, we were taken to the place where this confession was deposited; otherwise, we should never have found it."

"No; and the awful figure in the corner?"

"Yes; and that, too. Evidently it was the body of the man who penned this confession. He says that he should lie down in some corner and die."

"And he appears to have done so."

"He does. There is little doubt about that, I fancy. There is one point, however, that yet remains to be cleared up."

"You mean the hearth where the figure disappeared."

"Yes. There is something to be seen there, if we only knew where to look. I am convinced of it, because the figure pointed there just in the same manner as she did upstairs."

"It is strange no mention is made of the hearth in the confession you have just read."

"It is rather so. I quite expected to hear something concerning it. There is no mention, however, made."

"Not the slightest."

"You were right, dearest, when you connected the suicide's grave with these ruins; for that the figure we saw was that of the young girl who lies buried there, I am afraid we shall be forced to admit."

"It is very terrible. Can it really be that there are such things as spirits?"

"I shall always believe so after what we have witnessed to-night. There is one point, however, upon which I must satisfy myself, and that is to ascertain what is beneath the hearthstone."

"But you have no tools."

"Then I will try what I can do without them."

As he spoke, Jack kicked the fire off the hearth, leaving the stone bare.

He had a sword by his side, and, drawing this from its sheath, he began to pick away the earth round the edge with it.

The ground was soft, and the point of the sword sharp, so that Jack soon had the stone loosened all round; then, inserting his sword-blade underneath it, and using it as a lever, he succeeded in raising it from its setting.

As soon as he could, he got his fingers underneath it, and then, exerting all his strength, he lifted the stone up and turned it over.

Some dark-coloured earth, pressed tightly down, was now disclosed.

Still making use of his sword, Jack turned this over, and dug down to some depth.

As soon as the ground was loosened, he would stoop down and lift the soil out with his hands.

Presently the point of the sword struck against some hard substance.

Upon being exposed to view it was seen to be a bone.

A small one, too.

Gently Jack removed the superincumbent earth, and then he discovered the almost entire skeleton of a child.

Edgworth Bess turned away with sickening disgust.

She could not bear to look upon it.

Jack, too, turned away.

The mystery of the ruin and desertion of the old farmhouse was no longer a mystery to him.

He comprehended the whole of the affair from first to last.

The one point which troubled him was the apparition of the young girl.

He did not like to admit the existence of spirits.

He clung as much as he could to the disbelief in their existence.

He would now much liked to have found that the figure he saw was mere flesh and blood, like himself.

And now something struck Jack which had before escaped him.

He had seen the skeleton buried beneath the hearthstone with great distinctness, but his thoughts were so much engrossed that he failed to notice where the light came from.

Now, however, he did notice.

It came down the chimney, which was wide and straight, so that anyone standing underneath it could see the sky above.

The light that came was daylight.

As soon as he saw this, he became suddenly conscious of the length of time which had elapsed since Blueskin had left them.

He had taken no notice of the lapse of time, but now he found the night had passed away, and that the morning had fairly come.

As soon as he made this discovery, his thoughts underwent a complete change.

He forgot in a moment all those things in which he had felt so great an interest.

Everything was absorbed in the uneasiness he felt respecting Blueskin's fate.

Where could he be?

What could have befallen him?

He surmised the worst.

He had long exceeded the time he had given for them to expect his return.

Full of uneasiness and alarm, which plainly appeared upon his countenance, and which communicated itself to Edgworth Bess, he hastened to the front door of the ruined farm-house and flung it open.

The fair and beautiful morning sunlight fell upon all things.

The new day had really begun.

Uneasiness now gave place to alarm.

Something must have happened.

Jack Sheppard passed his hands repeatedly and confusedly over his forehead.

What was he to do now?

The forebodings which from the first had found a home in the breast of Edgworth Bess, were now fully realized.

She had dreaded the separation, and it seemed to have produced the worst results.

In what way were they to direct their footsteps, or what course should they adopt for the best?

Sadly, then, with his arm round the waist of Edgworth Bess, Jack Sheppard stood at the door of the lone farmhouse, and cast a glance over the whole landscape spread out before him.

No living creature of any kind met his view.

With respect to Blueskin's non-return, all was mere conjecture.

He had nothing to guide him to a conclusion.

What had befallen him was hard to say, though he feared he had in some way got into the power of Jonathan Wild.

And this, as the reader knows, was just the fact.

But Jack Sheppard had faith in Blueskin.

He had seen him extricate himself from positions of great peril with an adroitness that was really wonderful, and even at the worst, he told himself, Blueskin could but be a prisoner in the hands of the thief-taker.

If so, all was not lost—there were chances, and many, too, of his making his escape.

But the desirableness of ascertaining whether Blueskin was a prisoner or what had precisely befallen him was well before Jack's mind, and he knew that that point must be solved before he decided upon any ulterior course.

The difficulties in the way of this were, however, many and various.

How was he to follow in his companion's track?

How was he to ascertain in what direction he had gone? Still he did not despair of finding this out.

In an encouraging voice he spoke to Edgworth Bess, and endeavoured to raise her drooping spirits.

Then a brief consultation was held as to whether they should remain where they were during the day, or whether they should set out upon their discoveries at once.

Edgworth Bess urged an immediate departure.

Not only was the farm-house hateful to her, but she was impatient in the utmost degree to learn what had become of Blueskin, in whose power to protect and aid her she had great faith.

CHAPTER CCLXXXIV.

BLUESKIN IS MADE A PRISONER, BUT EFFECTS A DARING ESCAPE FROM HIS CAPTORS.

No doubt the reader will think it time we took a glance at the proceedings of Blueskin, who we left in such a dire extremity, and accordingly we will turn from Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess, and devote a little attention to him.

It will be recollected that upon their arrival at the suicide's grave, Jack Sheppard had heard the sounds of approaching horses' feet, and he fancied they were no other than Jonathan Wild and his gang.

Acting upon this belief, they had beat a precipitate retreat, and sought shelter in the ruined farm-house, in which they had such strange adventures.

Jack's supposition was, however, a correct one.

It was indeed Jonathan Wild and his gang, coming at full speed to that spot, and well for them was it that he did not find them there.

By his usual means he had ascertained their whereabouts, and got upon their track.

The rain poured down in torrents.

The lightning flashed.

The thunder rolled.

But Jonathan Wild cared very little for this elemental strife upon this occasion.

His mind was too much occupied with the thoughts of his revenge to heed anything else.

Then, as for his men, it was more than their lives were worth to lag behind, and they followed on in anything but an amiable frame of mind.

Wild, junior, too, accompanied the troop.

He had started of his own free will, but, now the weather had turned out so adverse, he heartily wished he had stayed at home.

He remonstrated with the "gub'n'r" upon the subject, and desired him to seek a shelter somewhere until the violence of the storm abated.

But his paternal relative had spoken to him in reply in such a hyena-like manner, that George drew back and said not another word.

If, however, the great Jonathan Wild had chosen to take shelter just where his son wanted him, the aspect of affairs would be rather curious.

The nearest place of shelter would have been the lone farm-house, beneath the roof of which our three friends at that moment were.

As it happened, however, they passed by, and so our friends were safe.

And now there is another thing which illustrates the perplexity and contrariety of human affairs.

Blueskin sought safety by leaving the cottage to reconnoitre, but, so far from finding what he sought, he only ran into danger.

If he had only remained in the farm-house, all would have been well.

Jonathan would have been baffled, for a short time at least.

Such, however, was not to be.

Jonathan kept on his way, and passed the farm-house when he ought to have entered it.

Blueskin left it when he ought to have remained.

The result of this is already to some extent known to the reader.

Jonathan Wild, after searching closely in every direction, at length came down a lane which would bring him into the high-road.

Just at this spot he paused, and called to his men to halt, while he made up his mind in which direction he should proceed next.

While considering this point, there came to his ears, and to the ears of his son also, who was standing close to him, the sound of a footstep upon the road.

In a general way there was nothing wonderful in this, but there was on the present occasion.

The country road was very quiet, the storm was over, and there was scarcely a breath of air stirring.

Consequently this footstep could be heard with very great distinctness.

Jonathan recognised it.

It is well known that no two persons walk just alike.

Now, in years past, Jonathan had heard Blueskin walk hundreds of times.

He could always tell, when he sat in his office with the door closed, whether it was Blueskin who approached or not.

Jonathan had not forgotten the peculiar sound.

In a faint voice he communicated his suspicions to his son, and bade him keep a sharp look-out, in case it should prove that he was not mistaken.

Wild, junior, did not say one word, but took a pistol from his belt and quietly cocked it.

Then he looked with the utmost intentness at the little bit of road which the lane disclosed.

He made up his mind if Blueskin should make his appearance, not to have any more trouble with him, but to shoot him down at once.

But not a word did he say to his father concerning his intentions, because he knew he would never have consented to them.

Wild, junior, however, was tired of the manner in which his father was carrying out the business, and he determined to act a little upon his own responsibility.

He had no patience with elaborate systems of revenge. When he had a foe he was satisfied with his death, no matter how it was inflicted.

Blueskin was well known to him.

If he appeared he should fire.

Jonathan was too intent keeping watch to notice these movements of his son.

It was Blueskin who was approaching.

No sooner did he appear, and almost before he was quite certain who it was, Wild, junior, pulled the trigger of his pistol, and fired.

There was a loud report, and, when the smoke had died away, there lay our friend Blueskin at full length upon the roadway.

We have already related what ensued consequent upon this, and, therefore, there is no reason for us to repeat it here.

Some brandy from Jonathan's own flask was poured down Blueskin's throat, and had the effect of almost choking him.

But he recovered from his swoon, and the brandy having run partly out of his mouth on to the ground, and partly down his throat, he overcame its effects.

The wound he had received was really a trifling one, although it had produced insensibility.

The bullet had struck him on the head, and made a long furrow over his scalp.

In no place, however, was the skull fractured.

A quarter of an inch lower, however, and the bullet would have buried itself in his brain.

There was some water in a little stream that ran by the roadside, and one of Wild's janizaries filled his hat with the fluid, and poured it over the wounded man's head.

This had the effect of thoroughly restoring him to consciousness.

Still, at first, Blueskin had but a confused idea of what had taken place.

Gradually, however, all came back to him.

Then the harsh sounds of his enemy's voice let him know into whose hands he had fallen.

Summoning all the strength he possessed, he sprang with great suddenness to his feet, before any of Wild's men were aware of it.

With the same swiftness he drew his sword, and commenced a furious attack upon the bull-dogs who surrounded him.

How the contest would have terminated is unknown, but before Jonathan could interpose Blueskin felt his strength fail him.

His eyes grew dim.

Clouds of blood seemed to be floating before him.

His brain spun round.

Then his feet slipped from under him, and he fell half-senseless to the ground.

While in this state and while in this position, his arms were firmly bound behind him, so as to prevent the recurrence of such an attack.

"To London with him. Follow me to London!" yelled Jonathan; "and if he escapes your own lives shall pay for it."

"How shall we take him?" asked the men.

"You had better bind him securely," said Wild, after a few seconds' thought.

"We have done that, sir."

"Well, then, you can put him on one of the horses, and some one had better get up before him, and let the two be strapped together round the waist."

There was no demurring against this order, though, as the reader may be sure, the men were not very well pleased with it.

Some little hesitation was expressed as to who the person should be to whom Blueskin should be fastened, and Wild, perceiving some sort of discussion going on, guessed its character, for he said—

"You will take it in turn for your horses to carry double. You, Howell, will take him first."

Howell was, of course, obliged to give in.

He mounted his horse, and then Blueskin, with his hands firmly tied behind him, was lifted up and placed behind him.

It was perhaps intended as an additional indignity, or perhaps it was for the convenience of securing him to Howell's back.

Be it how it may, that was the mode adopted.

Blueskin was not altogether unconscious of what was going on.

He had a dreamy sort of notion that he was lifted on to a horse's back, but that knowledge seemed to content him, bereft as he was of all power of motion.

His arms were already secured, and he was attached to Howell by a couple of leather belts, which the man wore in such a manner that it was impossible for him to fall off the horse.

When all was ready, Jonathan Wild gave the word for the troop to set itself in motion.

He seemed now to have but one idea, and that was, to get to London with his prisoner as fast as possible.

It is rather wonderful that he should have done this, for he must have known that Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess was somewhere close at hand.

It was mostly owing to his son that he did this.

George Wild was one who liked to be on the sure side, and knew how to be content with a little.

He was quite satisfied now that he had captured Blueskin, and he judged the best course would be to lock him up at once.

There was a possibility, if they went off chasing the others, that Blueskin would find an opportunity to escape.

He knew him of old as being a slippery customer.

There was, then, a good deal of prudence and safety in the course thus adopted.

Away, then, they went to London—not at a very fast pace, because their cattle were already knocked up, but still they soon got over the ground.

After going some distance, Jonathan called for a halt, and then Blueskin was transferred to another horse.

The jolting he had received had gone a very long way towards recovering our old friend from his state of insensibility.

Still he attempted no struggle when the men came to lift him off.

He knew he was not strong enough for a struggle to be of any advantage to him.

Accordingly he remained quite passive, making not the least resistance.

But it must not be inferred from this that he had given up all hopes and ideas of making his escape.

The idea of doing so was topmost in his mind, and he was only waiting for his opportunity.

His wrists were handcuffed together.

But the handcuffs seemed to be large ones, and Blueskin thought it was just possible that he might slip his hands out of them.

There were very few though, who would like to make the attempt, for the feat could only be accomplished at the cost of great pain.

Steadily, however, he set himself to the work.

He slipped them over his wrists down on to the backs of his hands.

But he could get them no further.

It was in vain he tugged; he only tore the skin off, and caused himself the most intolerable pain without doing the least good.

In despair he placed his hands together, and then, with an exertion of strength, forced them apart.

The act was done in mere passion, but he was much surprised and gratified at its results.

There was a snap.

His hands were free.

The connecting link between the pair of handcuffs had snapped.

How it was he could scarcely tell; he did not appear to have put forth any extraordinary amount of strength.

There might have been, and probably was, some defect in their manufacture, or they might possibly have been tampered with, or weakened, or strained upon some previous occasion.

But, be that how it may, they broke, and Blueskin had his hands at liberty.

He was careful, however, to disguise the fact a little while.

The man behind whom he rode appeared to hear the snap, or else to feel that Blueskin had moved, for he turned round suspiciously.

But Blueskin took no notice, and never moved his hands once.

He kept still for some little while longer, and then he felt, if he was to make his escape, or, rather, if he was to have any reasonable prospect of doing so, now was the time.

The night was fast passing away, and already in the eastern horizon could be discerned a faint ray of light, which told of the approaching dawn.

Gradually Blueskin removed his hands from each other.

There was nothing now that confined him but the leather belt around his waist.

Gently he stole one hand into his pocket, and drew forth a knife, which he passed behind him.

While in this position he opened it.

The blade he knew was strong and sharp.

One vigorous stroke and the belt would be severed, leaving him so far at liberty.

His task then would be by no means easy, but he did not look too much at his difficulties and get cowed by them.

Holding his knife firmly, then, he placed the edge upon the belt.

Then he drew it across once.

The belt was severed.

The man to whom he was secured uttered a cry.

But, before he had properly given vent to it, Blueskin had slipped off the horse on to the roadway.

CHAPTER CCLXXXV.

JONATHAN WILD RECAPTURES BLUESKIN, AND CONVEYS HIM TO LITTLE NEWGATE.

BRUISED and half-stunned, Blueskin reached the ground.

The two men who were following passed him with a rush, but, fortunately, they did not ride over him.

With the consciousness before his mind of the paramount necessity of being quick in his actions, he sprang to his feet.

But he staggered, and almost fell.

Recovering himself, however, with a violent effort, he started forwards along the road at a run, taking the route which he had just come, and which would take him away from Jonathan Wild.

That worthy heard the cry of alarm which came from the lips of his janizary, and, with a notion of what had occurred, he drew rein and turned round.

The remainder of the troop came to a halt.

"The prisoner—the prisoner!" they gasped. "He has escaped!"

A storm of curses came from the lips of the great thief-taker.

[BLUESKIN RETALIATES UPON JONATHAN WILD.]

"After him—after him!" he yelled. "Ten thousand curses! After him! He cannot go far on foot without your overtaking him. After him, I say!"

"Easy does it, guv'ner," said Wild, junior. "We shall have him again, never fear; he can't go far, and we must be quickest."

Without waiting to hear what his son said, Jonathan Wild struck his spurs savagely into his horse's sides, and galloped back in the direction Blueskin had gone.

His men opened right and left to allow him a passage through their ranks, but they were not quite quick enough in getting out of the way, for he rode up against some of them in his blind speed.

The result of the collision was another volley of curses, such as seemed always on the tip of Jonathan Wild's tongue in readiness to be uttered.

This produced a little delay, though not much.

Still every moment was of importance to Blueskin.

Hastily the janizaries formed themselves into a kind of troop, and rode after the thief-taker down the lane.

The wound in Blueskin's head, though not much more than a graze, still was sufficient to produce a very confusing sensation about his brain.

But that was owing to the quantity of blood he had lost. It still flowed from the wound, though not very rapidly. This was because it had coagulated into a large mass.

His hair was saturated with the crimson fluid, and it trickled down into his eyes and ears.

Headless, however, of this, Blueskin, as soon as he found himself fairly upon his feet, ran down the lane with all the speed which his enfeebled body rendered capable.

His course was very devious and uncertain.

At one time he seemed to be running full tilt at the banks on either side of the road, but he would turn aside just before he reached it.

In this zigzag manner he blundered on.

He was half-blinded and partially unconscious.

He knew, however, that he was running away from Jonathan Wild, and that piece of knowledge alone was sufficient to call forth all his energies.

And now upon his dull ear there came the most unequivocal sounds of pursuit.

He did not turn round to look behind him to ascertain how far his pursuers were distant.

A fresh accession of strength seemed to be imparted to his falling limbs.

Louder and louder, however, became the sounds, thus telling him only too plainly that his foes were fast gaining upon him.

But, animated with the power of a hunted creature, he sped along the ground with a swiftness that was incredible.

The rapidity of his motion, however, caused the wound in his head to break out afresh, and blood in large quantities began to flow from it.

This increased his weakness.

Each time, however, that he staggered, he would utter a cry, and bound forward with renewed fierceness, enraged at these symptoms of failure.

He ran on for some distance further, and then his strength suddenly and wholly left him.

He dropped down in the road as though struck by a bullet in a vital part.

At this moment Jonathan Wild rode up.

He had goaded on his exhausted horse, and got some distance ahead of his troop.

He was full of anxiety and dread lest Blueskin should escape.

As soon as he saw by the faint early light the prostrate figure in the roadway, he reined in his steed with so much suddenness as to almost throw him down.

The tired creature recovered itself, however.

Almost before it had fairly stopped, Jonathan sprung from the saddle, and placed his foot upon Blueskin's breast, as he would upon the head of some venomous reptile.

Once more he felt he had him securely in his power, and, as he made this reflection, he assumed a corresponding triumphant expression.

He folded his arms over his breast, and looked down the road after his followers.

They were soon upon the spot.

"How comes this?" roared Wild. "How comes this? Who was riding before the prisoner, and allowed him to get free?"

The janizary behind whom Blueskin had been placed shrank back when he heard these words, for he dreaded the worst.

His companions, however, who severally wished to disclaim having had any share in it, stood aside, and exposed him fully to the view of the thief-taker.

"Oh! it's you, Bumford, is it?" cried Wild, as soon as he caught sight of the janizary. "How was it the prisoner escaped?"

"I don't know, if you please, Mr. Wild."

"Bah! I don't please. You lie; you do know. He could not have escaped without your connivance and assistance."

"But he did, Mr. Wild, indeed he did. I felt him move about a bit, but I thought nothing of that, for I knew he could not be very comfortable; and then all at once he slipped off, and, as soon as he did that, I raised an alarm."

"And do you think I am going to believe such an unlikely tale as that?"

"It is the truth, sir."

"Well, it is lucky I have recaptured him. If he had escaped, your neck would have paid the penalty."

"Easy, gov'nor!" cried Wild, junior. "Perhaps what Bumford says is true. Let us see what kind of condition Blueskin is in, and whether it would have been possible for him to have slipped off the horse unaided by any but his own exertions."

"A good thought," said Wild, senior; and, as he spoke, he removed his foot from Blueskin's breast, who began to show signs of returning animation.

Jonathan himself turned our old friend over upon his back.

Then, stooping down, he picked up one of his arms, which he saw was at liberty, although they had been handcuffed together.

And, in fact, the ring of the broken handcuff still encircled Blueskin's wrist, and when he saw where the iron link had been fractured, Jonathan could not withhold his admiration.

Then Jonathan looked for the belt by which Blueskin had been secured to Bumford.

It was gone.

In the hands of the prostrate man, however, there still remained the knife by which the strong leather had been severed.

It now became tolerably clear that what Bumford had said was quite correct.

Blueskin had escaped without the assistance of any one but himself.

And now he was recaptured.

Jonathan determined that he should not escape a second time.

He called for a horse, and, when it was brought to him, he had the saddle removed.

When this was done, Blueskin was, by his directions, lifted on to the bare back of the steed, and, in a Mazeppa-like fashion, secured to it.

His legs and arms were securely tied to the horse, in such a manner that he could not by any means release himself.

The man who had thus been deprived of his steed, was commanded to take it in turns to ride double behind his comrades until they reached town, from which they were still distant.

Jonathan took hold of the bridle of the horse to which Blueskin was secured, and, mounting his own steed, resolved to lead him himself.

He thought, by the adoption of this means, to make sure of the safety of his prisoner.

Once more, then, the troop was set in motion.

Jonathan Wild rode first, leading the horse upon which Blueskin was tied.

His son rode close behind him.

The janizaries brought up the rear.

It was a singular-looking cavalcade.

Morning had now fairly come, and different objects could be plainly distinguished, but as yet the hour was too early a one for people to be abroad.

Very little was said on the journey.

It is almost needless to say that it was now quite impossible for Blueskin to make another escape.

Indeed, for the greater part of his journey, he remained insensible.

He did recover slightly towards the last, but only slowly.

The vital principle was very strong in Blueskin.

He was one not slain easily.

Upon him wounds seemed to make no more impression than they did upon the great thief-taker himself.

It was approaching mid-day when London was reached.

Many people stopped to look at the strange procession, and Jonathan soon found that he should have a mob at his heels by the time he reached Newgate-street.

This was certainly what he by no means wished.

A hackney-coach came lumbering along the Old Kent-road, up which Jonathan was proceeding, and Jonathan hailed it with sensations of the greatest pleasure.

The driver stopped, of course, and then he recognised who it was that had hailed him, for Jonathan Wild was as well known to the inhabitants of the city as the monument or London-bridge.

He was all obsequiousness instantly.

Jonathan dismounted, and released Blueskin from his hands.

In a state of almost perfect insensibility, he was placed inside the coach.

Jonathan got in after him, and by the direction of his father, Wild, junior, entered too.

The doors were then closed. The driver told to drive straight to Newgate-street.

The janizaries were to follow the coach as a kind of guard.

In this manner Jonathan succeeded in reaching his abode without attracting the amount of attention he certainly would have if he had persevered in his former course.

Blueskin was placed on that seat in the coach which is nearest the driver, and Jonathan and his hopeful son sat facing him.

Our hero looked about as helpless as any one possibly could.

He lay at full length upon the seat, and did not betray the slightest signs of life.

He was literally covered with blood, which still flowed, though very slowly, from his wound.

Wild's eyes glistened over his victim, and his heart filled with pleasure.

His foe was in his clutches at last, and powerless to raise his arm in his defence.

It was evident that Wild, junior, took upon himself all the credit of the achievement, and considered that he was the person to whom his father's thanks were due, for as the coach rolled on towards Newgate, he said—

"What do you think of it now, guv'nor, eh?"

"Think of what?"

Wild, junior, pointed with a significant gesture to the ghastly and bleeding figure of Blueskin.

Jonathan grinned.

"I told you which was the best way, guv'nor, and you see I was quite right. Just think what a desperate fellow he is. I don't wonder at your failing. He would hardly give in at the last."

"He has a brave spirit."

"He is a d—d troublesome fellow, if that's what you mean. Why, if it had not been for my little bit of a pop at him, you would never have caught him!"

"I don't know that," growled the thief-taker, who by no means relished being outgeneralled by his son.

"But I do, though. Supposing, however, that you had, he would have got clean away when he broke the handcuffs and cut the belt, if it had not been for the bodily weakness the effects of my shot occasioned."

"As it has happened, however, everything has turned out for the best. But, if you had killed him, George, I should never have forgiven you."

"Fiddle-de-dee."

"I should not—I could not."

"Just because you want him hanged?"

"Perhaps so."

"Have you some other reason?"

"I have."

"What is it?"

"I do not despair yet of binding him to my purpose."

George shook his head.

"You don't think there is much chance of that?"

"With all due deference to you, guv'nor, I don't."

"Why not?"

"He is too determined a character. But you've got him, guv'nor, which you wouldn't if it had not been for me, and now I leave you with him to do just as you like."

"You have certainly been instrumental in his capture, George."

"Well, I should rather think I have, guv'nor. That's d—d cool, blest if it isn't. Instrumental indeed!"

"It was at this moment that the hackney-coach stopped opposite the regular prison of Newgate."

"Not there," roared Wild, projecting his head from the window. "Round the corner. Stop at my house. Not Newgate-street."

"All right, your honour."

CHAPTER CCLXXXVI.

BLUESKIN REVENGES HIMSELF IN A SLIGHT DEGREE UPON JONATHAN WILD.

ONCE more the crazy vehicle was set in motion.

But it required a very vigorous application of whip to make the horses start.

The distance they had to go, however, was but short, and they quickly turned the corner of the Old Bailey into Newgate-street.

With a jerk they pulled up in front of Jonathan Wild's residence, which adjoined the prison wall.

The thief-taker alighted, and was quickly followed by his son.

The janizaries hastily dismounted, and one of them knocked loudly at the door.

It was opened instantly by the man on the lock.

The people in the street who happened to be passing by stopped to look at what was taking place.

But a few of Jonathan's hyena-like growls, and questions as to what they wanted, had the effect of dispersing them, so great was the fear in which Jonathan Wild was held.

Blueskin was partially sensible.

So much so, that he comprehended what was said to him when he was told to alight, for he obeyed with promptitude.

He was giddy and sick, but he descended from the vehicle, and under a strong escort he was marshalled into the house, and the front door closed.

The coach drove off, and then not a trace remained to show what had so recently taken place.

By Wild's direction Blueskin was deposited on a bench in the hall, and Mr. Snoxall was sent for, and told to come with all speed.

Nothing would have vexed Jonathan so much as for Blueskin to have died.

He would have considered he was cheated of his revenge.

Therefore, as we have said, he did not at once consign him to the cells, but allowed him to wait in the hall until the arrival of the apothecary.

Very death-like indeed did Blueskin look, as with half-glazed eyes he looked vacantly about him.

Jonathan paced up and down the hall, scarcely removing his eyes from him for an instant.

He was thinking over his plans, and determining what course of action he should pursue with regard to Blueskin.

Through his politic brain flitted all manner of schemes, but none of which suited him exactly.

In the midst of his ruminations Mr. Snoxall arrived, for the apothecary was at home, and his shop was not two minutes' walk from Wild's house.

He started when he perceived what a spectacle Blueskin presented, and then gravely shook his head.

Jonathan touched him on the shoulder.

"Heal him. Make him well in a couple of days, and you shall have ten pounds for your trouble."

"Impossible."

"You will find it true."

"I don't mean with respect to the money, Mr. Wild; I know that's all right. You always behave very liberally to me."

"Very well. Do what I told you, and you won't have cause to change your opinion. If you fail, why, then?"

"What, Mr. Wild?"

"It will be the worse for you."

"I will try my best, Mr. Wild, and nobody can do more than that."

"I know—I know. But when a man tries his best he succeeds."

"But, Mr. Wild."

"What?"

"My patient is at the brink of the grave, and yet you give me only two days to restore him to health."

"You don't know him. He will soon show the effects of your treatment; he is not one of a dying sort."

Mr. Snoxall again shook his head.

He said nothing more, because he knew its futility by experience.

Gravely shaking his head, he called for several articles, which were supplied him.

They were water, vinegar, a sponge, and linen for bandages.

Soaking the sponge in the water, he carefully bathed Blueskin's head, and soon discovered the extent of the wound.

He found it to be a very trifling one, although it had bled profusely; and he began to have hopes that, if his patient was really possessed of a sound constitution, he should be able to do what Jonathan required of him.

There were some symptoms of inflammation, but not very serious ones.

He continued to bathe, and, with a pair of scissors he took from his pocket, cut away the hair.

All this time Blueskin sat quite still on the bench upon which he had been placed.

He knew what was being done, but beyond a dim and vague idea of this, he knew nothing.

He was in a state resembling that which is known as being between sleeping and waking.

Mr. Snoxall now poured the vinegar on the sponge, which was already partially saturated with water, and with this he began to bathe the gaping wound.

But the moment the keen acid came in contact with the nerves in Blueskin's head which the bullet had left bare, a result ensued which rather startled all present.

No one was prepared for it.

We say the contact of the sponge soaked in vinegar with the wound in Blueskin's head produced a startling result.

Uttering a yell so awful that it was quite sufficient to dismay any one, he sprang to his feet like one who is suddenly galvanized.

His consciousness was restored to him, but he was maddened to such an extent that he did not know what he was about.

As he sprang up he overturned Mr. Snoxall, who fell sprawling on the ground.

Jonathan Wild had been pacing up and down, but the awful yell which came from Blueskin's lips had the effect of arresting his footsteps and confusing his faculties a little.

Before he could recover himself in the remotest degree, Blueskin made one tremendous bound and stood before him.

With the swiftness of lightning Blueskin raised his arm, and before his old foe could be aware of his intention, he struck him a tremendous blow on the side of his head with his clenched fist.

The blow was well delivered.

There was a sharp sound, and then Jonathan Wild measured his full length upon the floor of the passage.

Blueskin would have thrown himself upon him and continued his assault—with what result it would be hard to say; but the janizaries, who had by this time recovered from the first shock of their astonishment, darted forward and seized him.

When they did so, they found him as strengthless as a child.

The fictitious vigour which the vinegar had produced vanished with as much suddenness as it had been called into existence.

Finding this to be the case, they simply laid him on the bench from which he had risen.

They then devoted their attention to their master.

He lay on the floor of the passage, just where he had fallen, without exhibiting the least signs of animation or returning sensibility.

George Wild, who had gone into one of the rooms on the ground floor, hearing the uproar, emerged.

All the surprise he felt was expressed upon his countenance.

He looked at the prostrate form of his delightful father lying close to his feet.

Then his eyes wandered to Blueskin, who, looking more lifeless than ever, was extended upon the hall bench.

Then upon Mr. Snoxall, who was struggling to his feet.

Finally his eyes reposed where they had first rested—upon the body of the thief-taker.

This done, he gave vent to a characteristic exclamation.

"Well, I'll be d—d!"

Beyond this he did not trouble himself; but, putting his hands in his pockets, he leaned up against the doorpost, contented to watch the progress of affairs, which seemed to promise to be very entertaining.

The janizaries raised Jonathan Wild's head a little, and then they saw that he was rapidly recovering from the injuries he had received.

The bull-dogs, therefore, took good care to put themselves on their guard against any sudden attack which he might make upon them while only in partial possession of his senses.

And this caution was really requisite.

A howl came from his lips that would have done credit to the most ferocious and blood-thirsty animal ever created.

Then, with a bound, he stood upon his feet.

His men withdrew to a safe distance.

Jonathan glared around him.

Blinded with rage and passion as he was, he did not know what he was about.

The first person upon whom his eye lighted was the unfortunate Mr. Snoxall, who was coming towards him.

Impressed with the idea that this must be his antagonist, Wild rushed at him, and with one blow laid him prostrate, to the infinite enjoyment of his son, who could not forbear laughing aloud.

That laugh seemed to sober Wild's senses, if we may be allowed such a remark, and he looked more calmly around him.

A full recollection of what had taken place now dawned upon his mind, and, with his heart almost bursting with anger, he looked round for Blueskin.

Had our friend been at all conscious, it is probable that the thief-taker would have sacrificed him on the spot, at the expense of his more elaborate plan of revenge.

But when he saw the inanimate form lying on the bench, and presenting every appearance of death, his whole thoughts changed, and he became anxious once more that he should be restored to life.

Mr. Snoxall was more frightened than hurt by the blow he had received, and he now sat up, rubbing his head in a very lugubrious manner indeed.

"Get up!" roared Jonathan, with such tremendous lungs that the apothecary was on his feet in a moment.

"Get up, and attend to your patient."

Mr. Snoxall did not speak. He knew Jonathan Wild too well to think of saying one word.

He busied himself with attending to Blueskin, whose condition now looked more desperate than ever.

Jonathan resumed his moody walk up and down the hall.

He saw his son leaning against the doorpost, with his features distorted with a derisive grin, and he frowned angrily.

Of this manifestation of displeasure, Wild, junior, took not the slightest notice, except to say—

"Why, gav'nor, what the devil are you about? Who knocked you down, eh? Well, curse me, if you ain't a rum 'un!"

Jonathan made no reply, but his brow contracted into a yet blacker frown.

Finding that he could not irritate his father into making some reply or other, Wild, junior, once more withdrew.

As he paced up and down, Jonathan took care not to remove his gaze for a single moment from the countenance of Blueskin.

Mr. Snoxall's attempts at revivification seemed on the present occasion to be vain ones, but, at length, he had the satisfaction of seeing his patient open his eyes and gaze languidly about him.

Jonathan Wild saw this, and ceased his monstrous pacing up and down.

He came and stood before him.

Blueskin's eyes soon lighted upon the countenance of his ancient foe.

They sparkled and burned with fresh lustre.

He made one effort to rise, but it was a vain one.

He could not have been kept down more effectually if a mountain had been placed upon his breast.

And yet, when he made the effort, he thought it one sufficient to lift even a mountain, and he was surprised to find that he did not raise himself the thousandth part of an inch.

"The patient is very weak and bad, Mr. Wild," said the apothecary; "and all this excitement will have the worst effect upon him."

"What is to be done?"

"He must be kept quiet."

"Is his life in danger?"

"Great danger."

"But he must not die! He must live! I say he must live!" roared Jonathan.

Mr. Snoxall bowed.

"I will try my best. But it is a bad case—a very bad case."

"If he dies," muttered Wild, significantly, "it will be the worse for you."

"Then I must have him left entirely under my own control."

"So you may."

"Very well. I must have a quiet room, to which no one is to be allowed access but those I think proper to allow."

Jonathan hesitated.

He scarcely liked the idea of trusting to Blueskin being confined in a room.

"You need not fear his making his escape," said Mr. Snoxall, who appeared to read what was passing in his mind; "he is quite unable to lift a finger, and I will give you timely notice of his returning strength."

"Be it so, then," said Wild. "I have a room at the top of the house which I fancy is tolerably secure, and thither I will have him carried."

"That is the only chance he has, Mr. Wild. I must insist on perfect rest and quiet."

"Enough; you shall have them. I would not have him die for—the world. He will be valuable to me for some time yet. When he ceases to be so, he can die, and welcome."

Mr. Snoxall felt a disagreeable shudder pass over his flesh as Jonathan uttered these words.

Somehow he thought they were suggestive of himself. What would be his fate when he ceased to be of any service to the thief-taker?

This was a thought of too unpleasant a character to be long dwelt upon, so he banished it from his mind.

Under his directions Blueskin was gently lifted up, and carried with all care upstairs to the room which Wild designed for his reception.

There was a miserable pallet in this chamber, and on this Blueskin was laid, and left to the skill of Mr. Snoxall.

CHAPTER COLXXXVII.

JONATHAN WILD MAKES A STARTLING PROPOSITION TO BLUESKIN.

WE should not be doing the apothecary credit if we did not candidly avow that he possessed very great surgical skill, and that in the treatment of wounds he was second to none, having succeeded in cases when any one would have stated recovery to be impossible.

We need not look further for an instance than to the unfortunate Steggs, of whom we have for a length of time lost sight.

The reason of this is twofold.

Firstly, attention has been required to events of the utmost importance; and secondly, Steggs was not nor had not been in a condition to appear upon the scene of action.

The wound which Jack Sheppard so thoughtlessly and hastily inflicted upon him as he was about to warn them of the approach of Jonathan Wild, was as near being a mortal one as any wound could possibly be which did not actually result in death.

He seemed beyond all hope of recovery, but he was placed by Jonathan Wild in the care of Mr. Snoxall, who did not despair of effecting his recovery.

The reader will be at no loss to divine the motives which prompted the thief-taker to be so solicitous about the preservation of Steggs's life.

His acute mind enabled him to penetrate far beneath the surface of men's actions, and he judged that, if he should recover, he should learn some very important particulars respecting Edgworth Bess.

That he was in the confidence of her and Jack Sheppard he felt almost convinced.

At any rate, he wished him to live, even if it was on that mere chance.

But there was another reason, which we cannot at present communicate to the reader.

We will return to Blueskin, whose position is at once sufficiently desperate and critical as to demand all our attention.

The various excitements and exertions he had undergone since he had received the wound were quite sufficient to change its character.

We said at first it was but a trifling one, and such was really the case.

Now, however, the case was different.

His system had been almost drained of blood.

This would produce fever and its train of concomitant evils, and heighten the inflammation which was already visible about the wound.

Mr. Snoxall, however, on the present occasion put forth all his skill, and the result was gratifying to no ordinary degree.

Some portion of the result must, however, be attributed to Blueskin's uncommon vigour of constitution.

We have lately had some notable examples of it.

Under the care of the apothecary, then, he mended rapidly, and by the time the second day arrived he was able to move slightly.

Mr. Snoxall earnestly exhorted him to remain still, assuring him that, if he did so, his recovery would be proportionably rapid, and adding, further, that his state was then precarious in the extreme.

Blueskin had the good sense not only to listen to all this, but to attend to it.

In a word, he obeyed Mr. Snoxall's instructions in every particular.

It was some time, though, before he could distinctly call to mind what had happened to him, but at length the transactions of the past came clearly before his mental vision.

His present situation did not give him so much uneasiness as one might have expected.

It was chiefly on account of Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess that he felt anxious.

He knew how they would expect him, and how alarmed they would be when they found he did not return.

He dreaded, too, that this very alarm would be the means of bringing them into additional danger, and that they might fall into the hands of the thief-taker.

But he ascertained from Mr. Snoxall, who was afraid to cross him in any way, that Mr. Wild had not brought in any fresh prisoners.

Finding himself wounded and helpless, and learning also that the thief-taker ardently desired his recovery, he resolved, very wisely, to remain where he was until he had thoroughly recovered his strength.

Then, and not till then, he considered would be the time for action.

The many solitary hours he passed, he spent in thinking over his condition, and the prospect which he had before him.

On the third day he felt wonderfully better, but as far as possible he concealed his rapid improvement from Jonathan Wild, who came perpetually to see that he was safe.

Blueskin feared that, as soon as he was well, he would be transferred from his present quarters to one of the cells, from which place he would have all the more difficulty in making his escape.

Still Jonathan could see he was approaching convalescence, and he looked with increasing distrust upon the chamber in which he was confined.

He had it closely watched, however; and in this way tolerably well made up for its want of strength.

Blueskin now began to revolve in his mind various plans of making his escape, so that he could decide upon the one which promised best.

He must not delay the attempt too long.

What were Jonathan's ultimate intentions he had no very clear idea.

They boded no good to him he felt certain, for the thief-taker was the last man on earth to overlook what had passed.

The room in which he lay was, as we have previously stated, at the top of the house, it being, in point of fact, neither more nor less than a garret.

Blueskin knew this, not only by the general appearance of the room, with which he was perfectly familiar, but by the shape of the ceiling of it.

It was a strong room, though.

The window was strongly barred both within and without, and seemed to defy all attempts at removal.

Then the door was of massive oak, and strongly secured with every variety of fastening in existence, several of which had been added during his stay there.

It was only while he was wounded and weak that he was considered safe in this place.

Had he been only slightly hurt, he would have been chained in one of the strongest dungeons beneath the house.

Not for long, however, was Blueskin allowed to think over the various means of making his escape, for Jonathan as usual came into the room.

This was on the third day.

There was little to be gleaned from the ferocious countenance of the thief-taker, though Blueskin looked eagerly at it while pretending not to do so.

He looked much the same as he always looked.

He approached the bed upon which his prisoner lay, and for a few moments regarded him in silence.

Then he spoke.

"Blueskin," he said.

That was all.

Our friend took no notice, except to turn his face away. "Blueskin," said Wild again, "you are better now, and quite well enough, Mr. Snoxall tells me, to listen to what I have to say to you. I want to come to an understanding with each other."

Still Blueskin took no notice.

He never moved nor spoke.

But Jonathan's voice so changed the next word he spoke, that he feared if he did not respond in some way, he should be laying himself open to the ill-usage of the thief-taker when he was so weak as not to be able to defend himself from him.

Turning over, then, upon his side, he looked Wild in the face, and said—

"What do you want with me?"

"A little talk," replied Jonathan, with a calmness that had the immediate effect of putting Blueskin upon his guard.

He knew from experience that the thief-taker was most to be dreaded in his calmest moments.

That he had some deep-laid scheme in his head of which this was only the preliminary, he was certain, and with an amount of curiosity which he vainly endeavoured to repress, he prepared to listen.

"I am here, Jonathan Wild," he said, "and, thanks to you, in such a condition of weakness and exhaustion, that I cannot oppose you in any way. Say on; I am prepared to listen."

"I am glad to hear it, Blueskin, and I hope you will give attention to what I am about to say to you. It is a long time since we had anything to say to each other, but never mind the past. Are you listening?"

"I am."

"Very well. In the first place, there are a few circumstances to which I should much like to direct your attention."

"Go on."

"I would recall the past—I mean things which happened a very long time ago—not those which have lately taken place. Do you recollect what a many years we were friends, and the circumstances under which our friendship commenced?"

"I recollect perfectly."

"Very good. That will save me the trouble of repeating it. We were very intimate friends. I made you second to myself, and took you into my confidence upon every subject, and all went well. Am I right?"

"Quite."

"All went on smoothly, then, until an unfortunate day both for you and for me you introduced that young fiend in human shape, Jack Sheppard. Curses on him! From that time all has gone wrong. Our friendship and partnership came to an end. And there has been nothing but danger and distrust to both of us ever since, without either reaping the slightest profit."

"I am listening," said Blueskin, perceiving that Wild paused.

"I will take your silence, then, as an acquiescence in the truth of what I have just stated. From that unlucky day all has gone wrong, and from friends we became changed into deadly foes. I have often thought of this, and wished it were otherwise, and ever since then have I felt the want of some trustworthy and confidential person upon whom I could rely. Let me get to the end of this long preface and come to the point. I will tell you what I am willing to do, provided you are willing likewise. I am willing to overlook all the differences that have latterly occurred between us, and reinstate you in your former position. What do you say to my offer?"

"I reject it."

"Pho—pho! You have not had long enough to reflect."

"I have."

Wild frowned.

"What is the reason?" he asked. "Why do you refuse my offer?"

"Because I know there will be such conditions attached to it as to make my acceptance impossible."

"If that is all you fear, dismiss the thought from your mind. The conditions I require you to accede to are so simple that I am quite sure you will not hesitate."

"What are they?"

"Before I mention them I will make a slight addition to my offer. I have promised you shall be restored to your former situation, which is now indifferently well filled by Quilt Arnold. In addition to this, you shall receive a thousand pounds, and nine thousand pounds more when some little services are performed which you can easily execute."

It is probable that Jonathan Wild calculated upon dazzling the imagination of Blueskin by the offer of so large a sum, but, if such was his intention, he failed signally.

Our friend knew him too well to place the least reliance upon his words.

Observing that he remained silent, Wild continued—

"What do you think of my offer?"

"I should like to hear the conditions."

"They are these. You must place in my power Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess."

"Is that all?"

"It is all. And you consent?"

"Never."

"Eh?"

"I say, never. Jonathan Wild, I have heard you to the end for two reasons. One is because I lay here unable to move, and the other because I felt a curiosity to know what your proposal really was. I have heard it, and, I now repeat, that never again can we assume the same relative positions as we have done. We have been foes—are foes still—and foes we must continue. You would be unable to trust me—I should be doubtful of you."

"Then it would be without a cause," said Wild, with hypocritical sincerity. You would have no cause to doubt me while you yourself remained faithful. Reconsider your decision, and weigh well my proposition. I am anxious that you should do so, and do not hesitate to confess it, because, in the event of your giving your consent and joining your fortunes to mine, it will make things much better for both of us. Therefore, I say again, reflect before you decide."

"I have reflected, Jonathan Wild, and I have decided, and no additional amount of reflection would have the effect of causing me to alter my mind. We must continue foes."

An angry look came across Wild's face as Blueskin thus spoke with so much calmness and determination, and there was a baleful sparkle in his eyes as he said—

"I will press the matter no further now. I will leave you, and you can occupy the interval with thinking over what I have said. As yet I have presented but one side of the case, the other will do on the next occasion. Once more, I say, reflect, and reconsider your rash decision."

Blueskin made no reply to this speech, but languidly turned over on his bed; and Jonathan Wild, imagining, doubtless, that he had achieved sufficient at a first interview, turned on his heel and left the room, carefully securing the door after him.

CHAPTER CCLXXXVIII.

JONATHAN WILD MEDITATES THE EXECUTION OF FRESH AND IMPORTANT SCHEMES.

By this time the reader, if he happens to be possessed of any penetration whatever, must have obtained a tolerably good insight into the character of Jonathan Wild.

He will, therefore, doubtless be able to place a proper value and estimate upon the offer he had just made to Blueskin, and which, it must be admitted, was of rather a dazzling character.

Not for one moment did Jonathan Wild expect he should succeed in achieving his purpose on the first occasion.

He wished chiefly to give Blueskin's thoughts an impulse in that direction, so that, in the quiet of his chamber, he should be able to meditate upon the advantages he held out to him.

And then the thief-taker was provided with stronger arguments than mere persuasion.

But these he should not at present resort to, but avail himself of them from time to time, as occasion might require.

Slowly, then, he descended the stairs, until he reached his own parlour on the first floor, which he entered.

With a sigh of relief he saw that it was empty.

He half-dreaded to find his son there.

Somehow or other, Jonathan did not like his hopeful son.

His manners and his speech jarred upon him.

But dismissing as well as he could all recollection of him, the thief-taker seated himself at the fireside, and began to smoke.

From time to time he moistened his lips with brandy.

It could easily be seen that Jonathan Wild was in deep thought, though upon what dark project his mind was engaged it would be impossible to tell.

He was revolving a scheme in his mind, and now and then he would give vent to half-uttered exclamations.

But they carried no meaning with them.

His actions will shortly make the reader acquainted with the subject of his thoughts.

For some hours he thus sat and meditated, during which time his privacy was not once intruded upon.

When he sat down it was just beginning to grow dusk, but now darkness had completely descended upon the earth.

There was no light in the room save that which the fire afforded, and this was blazing bonnily.

The flames were stimulated now and then by being poked vigorously by Wild.

A strong, ruddy light was diffused over the apartment, and by the aid of this illumination Jonathan sat and thought.

The fire crackled.

It was the only thing in the room which had a cheerful appearance.

Dark thoughts were fitting through the mind of the great thief-taker.

The scowl upon his brow and the compression of his lips betokened this.

"It must be so," he said at length, rising from his seat. "It must be so, and to possess that knowledge I am determined."

As the thief-taker spoke, there came with great plainness to his ears the chiming of a church clock.

Involuntarily he listened and counted the strokes.

It was the clock in the belfry of St. Sepulchre's church on the opposite side of the way striking the hour of midnight.

Slowly the solemn sounds died away.

"So late!" muttered Jonathan, who, deeply occupied with thought as he had been, had forgotten to note the flight of time. "No matter, this hour is as suitable as any other."

As he spoke, Jonathan went to a cupboard by the side of the fireplace, and opening it, he rummaged for some time among the miscellaneous contents at the bottom of it.

At length he found what he sought.

It seemed like a stick about fourteen inches in length.

Its true character, however, became apparent when he thrust one end of it between the bars of the grate and ignited it.

It was a flambeau, or torch.

At first it spluttered a great deal, but it soon burst out into a steady flame.

A brace of large holster pistols lay on the table, and these Jonathan crammed into his coat pocket.

Then he poured out another bumper of brandy, and, having drank this off, he prepared to leave the apartment.

The house was profoundly silent.

Probably there were only two janizaries awake—the one who was on the look at the front door, and the other who kept guard at the grating.

Slowly Jonathan Wild descended the stairs.

The light of the torch sent a red and unsteady glare around.

It fell on the face of the man at the grating, and awakened him.

Wild gave a suspicious look round as soon as he reached the bottom of the staircase.

But, finding all looking just as he considered it ought to look, he turned round, and walked towards the grating.

He made an imperative and hasty sign to the man who sat there.

He instantly responded to it by springing to his feet, and inserting the ponderous key in the well-oiled lock.

There was a sharp click, and then the iron door swung open.

The flight of stairs leading to the cells, which must be so familiar to the reader, was then disclosed.

Down these he went with his usual deliberation.

As he went, he still kept muttering disjointed sentences, which carried no meaning with them.

He passed by the cell doors, and some of those gloomy recesses must have contained inmates who, aroused by the unusual glare of light, or else by the heavy footstep of the thief-taker, gave vent to loud shrieks and supplications for release.

Some cried for food, and others for water.

Jonathan Wild, however, stalked on, apparently without taking any notice, but he drank in every sound with a feeling nearly akin to delight.

At length he paused before one of the cell doors, and, after a moment's consideration as to whether it was the right one, he produced a master-key from his pocket, and, inserting it in the lock, flung the door open.

It creaked dismally upon its hinges, and, when that dreary sound had died away, it was succeeded by the rattling of chains and the rustling of straw.

Jonathan held the torch as high above his head as he could, in order to diffuse its rays as much as possible.

But it no longer burned with the steady radiance it had done hitherto.

Now it gleamed with a sickly lustre, for the foul air which poured out of the dungeon into the comparatively purer air of the passage, was but ill-adapted for the purposes of combustion.

Still the torch gave forth a very tolerable amount of illumination, and was amply sufficient to light up the small pestiferous cell.

It caused the massive stone walls to gleam with sickening brightness as it played upon the fungic exhalations with which they were covered, and upon the moisture which trickled down in streams, and collected in stagnant pools upon the flooring of the dungeon.

It revealed in one corner, nearly opposite to the door, a something which it would have required a second glance to pronounce was a human form.

But such indeed it was; so emaciated, so disgusting in its appearance, that we cannot describe it.

This human being, whoever he was, endeavoured to rise to his feet when he saw Jonathan Wild appear upon the threshold of the dungeon, but he found the strength he possessed was far from being sufficient for the purpose.

With a hollow groan, or moan rather, he sank back again upon his straw, and glared at the thief-taker with eyes in which the fierce fire of insanity seemed to burn.

He clenched a few pieces of straw tightly in his hands.

For some moments Jonathan Wild looked at the spectacle before him in perfect silence.

He did not move.

At length, however, finding that the prisoner did not speak, he said—

"You don't seem well, my lord."

There was something horrible in these words.

The mockery was hideous, and so, too, was the tone of voice in which Jonathan pronounced them.

The idea of such a loathsome and revolting object as that, which now crouched upon the dungeon floor, being a lord!

And yet such was the title that he bore—though wrongfully.

The reader, without further description, will recognise who this miserable being is.

Lord Donnull.

One of the thief-taker's victims.

It will be recollected how Jonathan enticed him to the cells and confined him there.

Since that moment he had never seen the light of day nor tasted a mouthful of wholesome food.

The reader can imagine the effect of this.

Surely Lord Donnull must now have been brought to the belief that there was something like retribution, even in this world.

What he had suffered during his long incarceration, no tongue, not even his own, could tell.

Too late had repentance found a home in that guilty soul.

Too late did Abel Donnull see how foolishly he had acted in taking the thief-taker into his confidence.

The mocking words which Jonathan uttered seemed to rouse his utmost fury, and rage lent him strength enough to rise to a half-sitting posture.

"Jonathan Wild," he said, in a faint, husky voice. "Jonathan Wild."

"I hear you, my lord," repeated the thief-taker.

"Release me, villain! Release me, I say!"

"And do you think you are likely to gain your freedom while you speak thus to me? You are safe enough now. No more attempts at escape, eh? No. Sound enough in all conscience."

"Release me," cried the wretched man, his voice now changed to the most abject entreaty.

"What can you offer me by way of inducing me to do such a thing?" asked Jonathan, calmly.

"Set me free—only set me free, and you shall have all I possess—everything."

"Ha! ha!"

"Why do you laugh?"

"At the idea of your promising me something which I have already. All that you possess is mine."

"All?"

"Yes, all. Yet, stay; there is something you have which I want. Give it to me, and you shall soon be free."

"What is it?"

"You need not ask the question, since you must know from my repeated applications what it is that I do want."

Lord Donnull—we may as well, for convenience sake, call him by that title—was silent.

"You have secreted somewhere a bundle of papers of the utmost value to me. They consist of the will of your brother, together with other documents, all of which clearly identify the young girl as being your niece, and the rightful heir to the estates. Those papers, I am convinced, are in existence; but you have secreted them in some place where hitherto I have been unable to discover them. Tell me where they are, and you shall be set at liberty."

"Never, Jonathan Wild."

"Never, did you say?"

"I did."

"Obstinate fool! You cannot comprehend the purport of your words. Did you not desire your freedom, and yet you reject it when offered to you?"

"Jonathan Wild."

"What, my lord?"

"Call me no longer by that hateful title, which was once so delightful to my ears."

"As you please."

"I know you, then, too well. Unfortunately, that knowledge has been purchased at a high price—that of experience. Still, I know you, and should never dream of surrendering the papers upon the bare faith of your word to set me free when I had done so."

"What will convince you?"

"Nothing. I have resolved that no torture which you can apply shall extort the secret from me of where those papers are concealed; they are where you would never think of looking for them, and so they are safe—quite safe."

"Is this your determination?"

"It is."

"Are you sure?"

"Quite sure."

"Then you are a fool. What harm can it do you to place the papers in my hand?"

"None to me, for you could not harm me more than you have done; but I have resolved that justice shall be done to my brother's child, and above all will I take care that you do not juggle the vast possessions into your hands. I will take care of that."

"Insensate fool!" cried Jonathan Wild, furious with passion. "Give up those papers, and save your miserable life. Refuse again, and the next moment shall be your last."

"Then the secret will die with me. No, no, Jonathan Wild; that was an idle threat. The only guarantee that I have for my life, the secret of the whereabouts of those papers affords me. Do your worst. I defy you, and will not deliver up those papers."

"You will not?"

"I have said it."

"Then, Lord Donnull—or Donnull without the lord, if you like that better—I tell you this. It may be that you think you have realized to its fullest extent the meaning of the word suffering. But I shall prove to you that, as yet, you have but a slight conception of it. Depend upon it, you will soon change your mind."

"Do your worst," cried the miserable tenant of the dungeon. "Do your worst."

Uttering a howl of rage, Jonathan Wild shut the cell door, and relocked it.

CHAPTER CCLXXXIX.

JONATHAN WILD TAKES HIS SON INTO HIS CONFIDENCE, BUT THE WHEREABOUTS OF THE PAPERS REMAINS A MYSTERY.

"CURSES on his obstinacy!" muttered the thief-taker, as he took his way along the passage towards the grating again. "Curses on his obstinacy! Why does he not deliver up those papers, or rather tell me where they are? I never anticipated so much trouble with him. But those papers I must and will have. They are indispensable to me. Once in my possession, all will be well."

He ascended the stairs as he spoke, and passed through the grating.

Without pausing or speaking, he made his way up to his own room again.

The fire was still burning, though very dimly. A vigorous poke, however, set that all right, and then Jonathan muttered again—

"Is it possible that he so well comprehends his position as to know that while he refuses to disclose the locality of those papers his life is safe? It seems so. But he shall be deceived. I will stir earth and hell but what I will discover them."

He banged upon the table as he spoke.

That was his usual mode of summoning any one.

Tonks appeared.

"Where's George?"

"Do you mean your son, Mr. Wild?"

"Of course I do, fool. Where is he?"

"Upstairs, I believe, Mr. Wild."

"In bed?"

"I think so, sir."

"Then go and find him, and tell him I want to speak to him."

Tonks withdrew without a word, glad enough to escape unharmed from the lion's den.

But he had another disagreeable course to go through.

George Wild was not of a much more amiable temper than his delightful parent, and if he was really asleep, Tonks rather dreaded the task of waking him.

With a slow step, then, and looking like a man who is on his way to be executed, Tonks ascended the stairs, and made his way to the bed-chamber which was occupied by Wild, junior.

The door was closed.

Tonks tapped gently at it with his knuckles.

The summons was disregarded.

He repeated it.

This time louder.

Still the same result.

"Perhaps he isn't here," thought Tonks, and to settle that point he stooped down and placed his ear against the key-hole.

The moment he did so, he heard a tremendous snoring sound, which told pretty clearly that Wild, junior, was in the room, and resting himself after his late fatigue.

Tonks's heart sunk within him.

He did not dare to disobey the orders of the thief-taker. And he had an almost equal dread of waking Wild, junior.

However, he knocked again at the door, and, rendered desperate by his position, with so much loudness that he made all the house echo.

He awaited the result with a beating heart.

Some inarticulate grunts followed, and then he said—

"Mr. Wild—Mr. Wild."

"What now?"

George was awake.

"Mr. Wild wants you, if you please. He's downstairs in his room, and wants to see you directly."

"Eh?"

"I say, sir, that your respected father wishes to speak to you immediately."

"Go to the devil."

"You must come."

"Tell him I'll see him jolly well d—d first. Do you think I am to be woke up out of a comfortable sleep, and fetched out of bed in the middle of the night just to please his d—d foolery? Tonks!"

"What, sir."

"Tell him to go and be d—d, and that I'll see him as far in h—l as he is out of it before I'll come: there now."

And George Wild, having thus delivered himself,

[JACK SHEPPARD PROTECTS EDGWORTH BESS FROM THE ATTACK OF THE MAD DOG.]

turned over on his bed, and complacently went to sleep again.

But here was a dilemma for Tonks.

What on earth was he to do?

He did not dare stop.

Yet he hesitated.

He feared to knock at the door again.

He was recalled to himself by hearing Jonathan banging on the table.

He was getting impatient at the delay.

Tonks turned round and round.

At one moment he thought he would go one way.

The next another.

At last, with his knees shaking under him as though they would never sustain his weight, he went downstairs, and knocked hurriedly at the door of Jonathan's room.

The thief-taker roared out for him to come in.

Tonks opened the door to the extent of a few inches only, and then projected the upper part of his head into the room.

Jonathan glared at him.

"Where's George?"

"If you please, Mr. Wild"——

Tonks paused.

"Well, villain? Come into the room. What the devil do you mean by poking your head in like that? Come in, villain, or"——

Tonks did not wait to hear the enunciation of the threat, but came into the room at once.

He shook in every limb.

"If you please, sir," he said, hastily, "he's asleep."

"Wake him, then."

"I did, sir. He answered me."

"What did he say?"

"I don't like to tell you, sir."

"Ya—ah. If you don't,"——

And Jonathan assumed such an awfully diabolical look, that Tonks cried—

"He told me to tell you that he'd see you jolly well d—d before he'd get up in the middle of the night, and that he'd see you stuck as far in h—l as you are out of it, and then he wouldn't."

The expression of Jonathan's face while Tonks made this communication was really a picture to see.

He pushed his wig almost off his head, and staggered back several paces.

Tonks could not help enjoying his consternation, though he did not dare to allow it to be visible.

"He said that, did he?" gasped Wild, at length.

"He did."

"Then go upstairs again, and say that, unless he comes down this moment, I will have him kicked out of the house. Do you understand?"

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

"Be off, then."

Tonks once more departed upon his most unpleasant errand.

Once more he knocked at the door, but this time with firmness.

He heard a storm of imprecations from within.

The next moment the door was thrown open, and George Wild appeared upon the threshold, with nothing on but his shirt.

"Take that!" he cried; and, as he spoke, he threw something with great force and suddenness at Tonk's head.

Providentially, however, he saw the missile coming, and he ducked his head just in time to allow what was thrown to pass over him harmlessly.

There was a tremendous crash as it struck against the opposite wall.

"What the devil do you mean?" he roared.

In a voice at least an octave higher, Tonks cried—

"The guv'nor says he'll have you kicked out of the house if you don't come down and speak to him."

There were very few persons who knew Jonathan Wild so well as his son did.

He knew just how far he could go with safety.

This was no idle threat, he felt certain; and, as he did not wish to come to a rupture just at present, he hastily slipped on his garments, telling Tonks to say he would be down in a moment.

This message was delivered.

Wild, junior, however, felt far from pleased with being thus disturbed in his first sleep, and he muttered some very awful curses as he descended the stairs.

"D—n me! guv'nor," he exclaimed, as he entered the room in which his father was sitting, "this is a new move, ain't it? Cuss me, if I like it."

Jonathan frowned, but did not speak.

"What is it, guv'nor? Speak up! What have you got in your mind? If I can give you easement, I am sure I will."

"Don't be a fool, George. When I sent up to you I wanted you particularly—you might have been sure of that."

"It's d—d fine for you to talk like that. I believe you can live without sleep, but I can't, and there's an end of it. It ain't very pleasant to be woke up with some one tabbering at the door, and telling you to get up."

"George."

"What, guv'nor?"

"Are you willing to listen and pay attention to what I am going to say to you?"

"Of course I am."

"Sit down, then, and pour out a glass of brandy."

George did as he was bid, and for the first time, began to feel curious about what his father could possibly want him for.

"I'm paying every attention, guv'nor," he said, as he seated himself.

"Very well, George. Now, I have been rather pleased with the manner in which you carried out the little affair with Blueskin."

"Oh! you are."

"I am."

"Cut along, then. So am I."

"Your success encourages me to set you upon another enterprise; and, if you succeed in that,"—

"Don't promise, guv'nor. Tell me what I have got to do, and, when I have done it, I shan't be backward in asking payment, never fear."

"Well, then, I think you pretty well understand all about the girl I want to get rid of?"

"Edgworth Bess?"

"Yes, that is the name by which she is known."

"What then?"

"She is an heiress."

"Well?"

"Now there are in existence certain documents which incontrovertibly prove her identity, and also prove her rights to a large fortune. Do you understand?"

"Perfectly."

"Down below in one of the cells I have a prisoner who knows where those papers are. He has hidden them, indeed, but he refuses to tell me where. I have tried every means possible to get the information from him. I went down to-night. He is almost starving with hunger. I offered him immediate freedom if he would surrender; but he refused, and apparently with greater firmness than he ever has before!"

"Oh! and suppose he was to tell you. Should you set him free, according to promise?"

"Do I look like a fool?"

"I must say, at times you bear a strong resemblance to one."

"Pho—pho! This is trifling. The moment I obtained the information I sought I should slay him on the spot. He would be of no use to me then, and it would be decidedly unsafe to set him at liberty."

"Well, guv'nor, you don't tell me who this prisoner is, so I am compelled to ask this question. Does he know you?"

"The prisoner?"

"Yes."

"Of course he does."

"I mean, does he know your capacity for treachery, and that you are not to be trusted on your oath?"

Jonathan scowled.

"Its plain talking, I know," continued his son, "but does he know you?"

"He ought to."

"That is enough, then. He is aware that the only chance he has of his life is by keeping his secret, and so you may depend you will never know it—by his telling, at any rate."

"You think so?"

"I do."

"So do I."

"I am glad to find you of the same mind. What next, guv'nor?"

"I want to find those papers. If I discover them, the prisoner dies!"

"You are sure they are in existence?"

"Quite certain. I have seen them."

"And they are not destroyed, you think?"

"Oh! no. And now, George, where do you think it likely such papers would be hidden?"

"Can't answer that question, guv'nor."

"Where should you think?"

"Don't know enough of the particulars to say."

"I will tell you more, then. You must understand that this girl has an uncle who contrived to usurp her rights and title—no matter by what means. This uncle is my prisoner."

"The devil!"

"And he has repented."

"Ha! ha!"

"He wants to restore to the girl that which rightfully belongs to her; and that it will by no means answer my purpose to allow him to do, because, in a word, I intend to have the lot myself."

"You are a wonderful man, guv'nor. There's no sort of mistake about that."

Wild grinned.

"It is this uncle who had possession of the papers I have referred to, and who has secreted them somewhere. Now, where should you think would be a likely place?"

"How do you know he has hidden them?"

"Because he says so."

"Bah!"

"And I cannot find them."

"Where have you looked?"

"I have had his person thoroughly searched, and am convinced he does not carry them about with him."

"Had he any suspicion that you were about to make him prisoner?"

"No."

"You took him by surprise?"
 "Quite."

CHAPTER CCXC.

JONATHAN WILD AND HIS SON MAKE CLOSE SEARCH FOR THE MISSING PAPERS.

"It is a strange thing," said Wild, junior, after a few minutes' rumination. "Had this uncle any motive for secreting these papers?"

"No motive that I can think of."

"Well, then, I can't make it out."

"No more can I. But think the matter over, George. It is very important that those papers should be in my possession."

"I don't doubt that. You say you took this uncle prisoner at a moment when you believed he least expected it."

"Just so."

"And then you immediately searched his person?"

"Immediately."

"You did not let him go out of your sight a moment after you made him prisoner, until you searched him?"

"Well, I can't exactly say that."

"Why not?"

"You see, the first thing I did was to shut him up in one of the cells downstairs, but, as soon after as possible, I went down and had him searched."

"And then the papers were nowhere to be found."

"Nowhere."

"Did you search the cell?"

"Every square inch in it; and as that, like all the rest, was constructed under my own supervision, I am able to say positively that the papers are not in the cell."

"I am afraid you will have to give them up."

"No—no. I must and will find them."

"That's always the way you talk. You have searched his house, of course?"

"Oh! yes."

"And unsuccessfully?"

"Certainly."

"Well, then, gov'nor, I confess myself beaten. You may depend this uncle had a pretty good idea of what kind of man he was dealing with, and therefore, suspecting you might some day make him a prisoner, he has hidden the papers; and, depend upon it, without having the least clue, it would be folly to think of discovering them."

"But I cannot give up anything of such vast importance as this so easily, George. I do think the prisoner knows that he only has a chance of his life while he retains the secret of where the papers are hidden, but I don't think he suspected beforehand."

"Well, maybe he did not."

"Now, George, suppose you had something you wished to hide, where should you place it?"

"I don't know: in the most unlikely place I could think of."

"Most likely it would be somewhere in your own house, if you had one."

"Certainly."

"Then that may be the case with this uncle."

"There seems a probability of it; but what are you driving at, gov'nor? You told me you had searched the house."

"And so I have."

"Very well, then."

"But still, I fear, not with that care with which it ought to be searched."

"I see."

"So I want you to accompany me at once, and we will have one more good look about us."

"But it's a rum time of night, gov'nor."

"There could not be a time more suited to our purpose."

"Where is the house?"

"In Piccadilly."

"Is it occupied?"

"No; since the disappearance of the owner of it, it has been shut up."

"We shall have to break in, then?"

"That will not be much trouble."

"Not if you know the ins and outs of the place it won't, gov'nor."

"Well, I will manage all that. Just array yourself, you need do no more."

"You will see to the rest?"

"Yes."

"All right, then; I am ready."

"Wait a moment."

Jonathan Wild stowed about his person several burglarious instruments, in the use of which he was quite an expert.

He was soon ready, and having drank a parting glass of brandy, the pair set out upon their expedition.

The man on the lock looked rather surprised to see them both go out together.

As they crossed the Old Bailey they heard the different churches in the metropolis chiming the hour of one.

London was quite empty and deserted at that hour a century and a half ago, except, perhaps, in the neighbourhood of such places as Covent Garden-market.

A steady, drizzling kind of rain was falling, too, and had been falling for some hours, and this materially contributed to clear the streets of people.

As they proceeded they did not even so much as meet with a solitary watchman.

Those guardians of the night were all snugly ensconced in their boxes, and fast asleep.

The distance from Jonathan Wild's house in Newgate-street to the mansion recently occupied by Lord Donnull, in Piccadilly, was rather considerable, but Jonathan and his son walked at a brisk pace.

Jonathan Wild was anxious in the extreme to obtain possession of those papers.

Could he but once obtain them, he felt he should be quite master of the situation.

He should fear nothing, and the accomplishment of his fiendish scheme would be easy enough.

The difficulties that stood in the way, however, were rather great.

The reader should understand that he had all along confidently calculated upon extorting from the lips of Lord Donnull the secret of their hiding-place.

But we have seen how totally he failed in doing this, although the means he had employed to wrest a confession from him were, one would have thought, ample enough.

He was now thrown back upon his own resources, for he quite believed that he should never be able to extort a disclosure from his prisoner.

He was anxious to possess the papers, too.

Time was of great importance, and he made up his mind that, should he be successful in his present enterprise, Lord Donnull should not survive another day.

And as he strode along the silent and deserted streets he occupied his mind in devising schemes by which he would put the unfortunate man to death.

George Wild, on the contrary, was busy thinking about these papers.

"They must be of great importance," he muttered mentally, "or else the gov'nor would not be in such a fidget about them. All I can say is, if I once get hold of them he will have some trouble in persuading me to give them up again!"

In about half-an-hour Piccadilly was reached.

Jonathan Wild well knew which was the house occupied by Lord Donnull, and he directed his steps to it without hesitation.

It faced the park railings.

Jonathan went straight to the front door, which, according to the fashion of the times, was a large and overhanging one.

When they stood beneath it, they were completely hidden from observation.

It was not Jonathan Wild's first visit to this place.

When the house had been closed, every part of it had been securely fastened, with the exception of the front door, which was locked.

The reason of this was obvious.

It would be impossible for the bolts to be shot into their sockets from without.

Knowing this, the thief-taker inserted a skeleton-key into the lock; which, being of a very common description, yielded at once.

Like two shadows, the precious pair glided through the door, which Wild, senior, carefully closed after them, and relocked.

He did not anticipate any interruption, or having to beat a speedy retreat.

The interior of the house was intensely dark.

The first thing Jonathan did, then, was to set about procuring a light; and, as he had provided for this, he was not long about it.

Some phosphorous matches were first produced, and with these he lighted a small dark lantern, which diffused a brilliant light, in consequence of the excellence of the lens, and the brightness of the reflector behind it.

A broad beam of light came through it, and, wherever this fell, all objects were distinctly visible.

"Let us begin at the beginning, guv'nor, an' we are to search the house."

"How do you mean?"

"Why, let us go right up as high as we can, until we can go no higher, and then begin to look; gradually descending to the ground, and leaving no place without closely examining it."

"I should have adopted that course myself."

"So much the better, then, since we shan't fall out about that. But, if we are to search the house thoroughly, it will take us a long time."

"Never mind that, so long as our trouble is rewarded."

"That's all very well; but I mean we shall have to make several journeys here to do it."

"I don't know that. It will all depend upon circumstances."

"So it will."

"Let us hope we shall succeed."

"With all my heart. Do you know the way up to the top, guv'nor?"

"Oh! yes."

"Lead on, then."

Jonathan Wild crossed the passage to the foot of a broad flight of stairs, and up these they proceeded with all speed.

The house was a high one, and some minutes elapsed before they reached the top story.

But at length they arrived.

The policy or mode of action recommended by Wild, junior, was excellent, and well calculated to ensure success.

Indeed, if the papers were concealed in the house, and the search conducted properly, they must inevitably have been found.

There were indications that the rooms on the top-floor had been used as sleeping apartments for the servants, and they had been left in a condition of the greatest disorder.

With a patience scarcely credible the two Wilds carefully and severally examined every loose article.

Then when this was done, the walls were sounded, the cupboards searched, the boards on the floor examined, with a view to ascertain whether they presented any signs of recent disturbance, and the chimney was poked up to see whether anything had been concealed there.

Then, after all this had been done without producing any result, they searched every drawer there was in the place, and took the bedsteads to pieces.

Both worked with right good will, but still a good deal of time was consumed.

At length, however, they prepared to ascend to the next floor, with the satisfaction, if satisfaction it could be called, of being quite confident that the papers they wanted were not concealed on the top story.

Over these operations we need not linger.

Let it suffice to say that the other bedrooms in the house were searched, with the like result.

And yet they allowed no place, no matter how unlikely or how ill adapted for the purpose of concealment, to pass unexamined.

At length a spacious room on the first-floor was reached, which was magnificently fitted up as a library.

Here there seemed a better prospect of success, and although by this time the dawn of the new day had fully come, Wild and his son set about their task with unabated vigour.

Their previous failures, so far from disheartening them, only seemed to have the effect of endowing them with fresh courage.

But it may be that they entertained great hopes of being able to find what they sought in the library, and the appearance of the room was well calculated to foster such an idea.

Papers were strewed about in great abundance, and in every direction.

The inside shutters of the mansion were closed and the curtains drawn over them, so Jonathan had no fears about exhibiting a light.

Accordingly, he ignited several of the wax candles which were stuck in the chandelier depending from the ceiling. Then, with praiseworthy patience, he sat down to his task.

Some papers lay upon the floor, but these were carefully gathered up.

One by one, then, they took every scrap of paper up, examined it, and cast it on the floor.

But the last paper was raised and dropped with no better result than the first.

Several books lay upon the table, and these they turned over leaf by leaf, in order to be sure that what they sought was not contained between any of them.

Still no use.

But Jonathan was not baffled yet.

One by one he took the books down off the shelves, and subjected them to the same process; and when, in this manner, several hundred books had been examined, he carefully looked at the shelves upon which they had stood.

Wild, junior, now began to look heartily tired of his work, but not so his father.

Opening a kind of cupboard, he saw within it a number of boxes, such as are made use of for the reception and preservation of papers.

He gathered fresh hope from this, and commenced an examination of their contents.

CHAPTER CCXCI.

JONATHAN WILD BELIEVES THAT HE HAS AT LAST HIT UPON THE PLACE WHERE THE PAPERS ARE CONCEALED.

If anything, however, this proved to be a longer job than any of the preceding ones, and it terminated with no better result.

Papers were there in plenty, but not the documents they required.

When the last one fluttered from his grasp, Wild, junior, looked up at his parent with an expression on his face that would be very hard to describe.

Some idea may, perhaps, be formed of it when we set down the words to which he at the same time gave utterance.

"Guv'nor," he said, "we're a couple of d—d fools."

Jonathan looked up surprised.

For his son to say such a thing of himself seemed strange.

By way of emphasis, however, George repeated the expression.

"What do you mean?"

"Just what I say."

"Explain yourself."

"Why, we have been looking all this time in the wrong place."

"In the wrong place?"

"Yes."

"But you advised coming here."

"I know I did."

"Well?"

"And that's why I am a d—d fool."

"I cannot understand you."

"Well, then, I will explain. It's no good our looking in this house for the papers we require."

"Why not?"

"Because they are not here."

"How do you know that?"

"Is it at all a likely place? Guv'nor, I'll tell you what we've done."

"What?"

"Why, in seeking the profound we have overlooked the superficial."

"You are talking Greek to me."

"Then I'll speak plain English. Do you understand this? Had Lord Donnall—for such I find by these papers is his name—had he a lawyer—solicitor, you know."

"Of course he had."

"Do you know his name?"

"I can't call it to mind."

"Should you know it if you were to hear it?"
 "Yes."
 "Was it William Mudford?"
 "Yes; and his office is in Pump-court, Temple."
 "Just so."
 "But how did you know his name?"
 "I turned over a letter of his just now."
 "What about?"
 "A mortgage: nothing concerning our business. And he is or was this Lord Donnull's solicitor?"
 "Yes."
 "Then, you may depend, he keeps all the family papers."
 "I dare say he does."
 "Then those we want are amongst them."
 Jonathan shook his head.
 "You don't think so, guv'nor?"
 "I don't."
 "Why not?"
 "Because the papers are of such a character that he would never trust them to a lawyer."
 "I don't know that."
 "I do."
 "But, look here. Now, suppose he had some doubts and suspicions of you—and it's d—d odd if he didn't"—
 "What then?"
 "He might have made these papers up into a packet and carefully sealed it, then delivered it into the hands of the solicitor, with particular instructions."
 "He might have done such a thing," said the thief-taker, thoughtfully.
 "Of course he might. And suppose the instructions given were something to the effect that, if he did not turn up after a certain time, the solicitor was to open the packet, and act according to the instructions contained in it."
 Jonathan leapt to his feet as though galvanized.
 "By heaven, George!" he cried, "I believe you have hit it!"
 "Easy does it, guv'nor—easy does it."
 "Easy be d—d."
 "Listen to me."
 "You need not speak. I can see all now plain enough. You may depend that is what he has done. By no other means can I account for his braving and defying me in the manner he has done. Yes, that is it."
 "I shouldn't wonder."
 "It is—it is; and, perhaps, by this the time has expired—perhaps it expires to-day—and the lawyer will open the parcel. If so, then all is over—all—
 "Easy does it, guv'nor," said Wild, junior, again.
 "Why don't you take it easy?"
 "Who could be easy? You would not, with all your affected philosophy, if you knew what was at stake."
 "Well, guv'nor, look here a minute."
 "What is it?"
 "Supposing it should turn out that what I say is right? What does it matter? We can find the lawyer, and, if he's got the papers, we'll d—d soon have them."
 "That must be it. We will do so. It was a lucky thought of yours, and quite took me by surprise. It never occurred to me. It accounts for everything."
 "Does it? Then I am very glad to hear it."
 "We will be off at once, George, to this lawyer's chambers in the Temple—at once. Come."
 "Stop a minute, guv'nor."
 "No—no!"
 "But I say, yes—yes! Just listen to what I have got to say for a moment, will you? It's worth hearing."
 "Speak, then."
 "Do you think it will be wise to allow ourselves to be seen coming out of this house, and by this time there are sure to be people abroad."
 "Oh! yes. I forgot the shutters are closed, and the curtains drawn, which fills this room with darkness, but out in the street it is quite light."
 "Just so."
 "I have been so intently occupied upon what I am about, that I forgot to note the flight of time."
 "It's half-past nine now, guv'nor, as near as may be."
 "You are quite right, it would be injudicious in the extreme for us to be seen leaving this house during daylight. And yet to wait here—"
 "You don't like the idea of that, do you?"

"I don't; but it would be no good to go to the lawyer's chambers before night, would it?"
 "No good at all, guv'nor; so we may as well pass the time here as anywhere else."
 "There are beds to sleep in, and I am weary."
 "Ditto, guv'nor. Recollect, I was woke out of my first sleep."
 "D—n your first sleep."
 "Very well. Look here, guv'nor. You are so uncertain in your movements, and I have suffered so much lately from being hungry and having nothing to eat, that I never come out now unprovided."
 As he spoke, Wild, junior, produced from one of the side pockets in his coat a parcel, which, on being opened, disclosed a package of comestibles.
 These he began to eat with great relish, and asked his father to share the meal with him.
 He did so, and produced a huge flask of brandy, for that was a thing Wild, senior, never travelled without.
 This being the case, the two got on very well, and it did not take them many minutes to demolish all that was before them.
 When they had finished, Wild, junior, was for lying down and having a nap, but Jonathan would not listen to it.
 The meal he had made had invigorated him, and he was now ready to go through a fresh lot of fatigue.
 "I don't think we ought to take your supposition for granted, George."
 "What's up now, guv'nor?"
 "Why, as we are here, and must stay here some time longer, I don't think we can do better than finish searching the house, and then we shall know whether the papers are here or not."
 "That would be a satisfaction."
 "It would. Come, George, we shall never have a better opportunity than the present."
 "Go on, old 'un; I am ready."
 This being decided upon, both rose from the seats upon which they had been sitting, and recommenced their search.
 In this manner several hours were passed away, but without their finding the least trace of what they sought.
 Still, as the thief-taker said, it would be a satisfaction to know they were not there.
 It must not be thought, however, that on this account the search instituted was any the less vigorous or exact.
 Every spot was searched with the same care and minuteness as before.
 The papers were not discovered, and at length, thoroughly wearied and tired out, they ascended to the bed-rooms, and flung themselves down on two beds, dressed just as they were.
 In a few moments, so thoroughly were they fatigued, that they fell off to sleep, as the melodious concert from their noses would have testified to any one within a reasonable distance.
 The reader doubtless will be of opinion that the suggestion put forth by George Wild carried upon the face of it a great deal of plausibility and probability.
 As Wild said, should such prove to be the actual fate, it would at once account for the obstinate behaviour of Lord Donnull.
 He could well afford to defy him and tell him to do his worst.
 Jonathan's sleep was disturbed by various images connected with the operations in which he had recently been engaged.
 How long they slept they knew not.
 The thief-taker was the first to wake.
 He immediately called his son, who was snoring away at a furious rate.
 However, he got up.
 Upon consulting their watches, they found they had lain much later than they had intended.
 It was, in fact, a few minutes past eight in the evening.
 "Curse that!" said Jonathan.
 "Never mind, guv'nor; it can't be helped now. What's the first move?"
 "I must go back home, first."
 "What for?"
 "I have been absent a great many hours, and I could not rest any longer without knowing whether all was safe or not."

"Very well; it won't take long to ascertain that, and we shall be in plenty of time even then."

"Of course we shall, and I shall be able to provide myself with tools and such like."

"Then we will say agreed to that, eh, guv'nor?"

"Come on, then."

"I am coming."

Without further delay, the pair descended the stairs to the front door, and Jonathan, having extinguished his lantern and put it out of sight, prepared to open the door.

Two minutes afterwards they found themselves in the street.

It was quite dark.

A hackney-coach came lumbering by, and Jonathan hailed it and got in.

It was hardly worth while to fatigue themselves unnecessarily.

They had doubtless got a pretty good night's work before them.

Upon arriving at their destination, Jonathan got out, and gave a hasty summons at the door.

It was opened instantly, for the man on the lock, aware of his long absence, was on the look-out for him.

"Is all well?" asked Wild.

"Yes, sir."

Jonathan growled, and passed on.

In the passage he met Quilt Arnold, who had heard his arrival, and who was hastening towards him.

The thief-taker renewed his question, and received the same satisfactory reply.

Doubtful of the reality or correctness of such good news, however, he hastened upstairs to the room in which he had left Blueskin, and about whom he felt the greatest anxiety.

He was about to enter when Mr. Snoxall came forth.

He held his finger on his lip.

"Speak in a whisper, Mr. Wild," he said.

"Is he worse?"

"Yes."

"How is that?"

"Well, I can hardly tell you. I would hardly give a pin for his life now."

"But you told me he was going on all right."

"So he was."

"What has caused this relapse?"

"He has been getting up, and trying to make his escape I expect."

"Is he safe?"

"Look for yourself."

Mr. Snoxall gently pushed open the door of the room, and allowed Jonathan Wild to take a peep at the interior.

There lay Blueskin, extended at full length upon the bed, and looking by far more like a corpse than a human being.

But Jonathan was satisfied.

His prisoner was safe.

Still, when he descended he renewed his caution to Quilt Arnold respecting the guard, and strictly bade him keep good watch.

Then, going upstairs to his room on the first-floor, he provided himself with such articles as he thought he should require.

These preparations occupied an hour, but he had still some time to spare, so he sat down to deliberate and make up his mind as to just what he would do.

While thus engaged, his son George, who had fully equipped himself, came into the room.

"Are you ready, guv'nor?" he asked. "Oh! you're taking it easy at last, I see."

CHAPTER CCXCII.

JACK SHEPPARD ESTABLISHES ANOTHER CLAIM UPON THE GRATITUDE OF THE PERSECUTED HEIRESS, EDGORTH BESS.

It is, we confess, with quite a feeling of pleasure that we turn from narrating the proceedings of Jonathan Wild and his son, to occupy ourselves with the fortunes of Jack Sheppard and Edgorth Bess.

The reader will recollect that when we left them last they were standing hand in hand upon the threshold of that ruined, haunted farm-house in which they had had so strange and terrible an adventure.

They were watching, but, alas! vainly, for Blueskin to make his appearance.

At that very moment he was in the power of Jonathan Wild, although they knew it not.

Sadly they cast their glances all around the horizon, in the faint hope of seeing the advancing form of their absent comrade, but, alas! they were doomed to disappointment.

And though his own heart was chilled and heavy, not merely in consequence of the absence of his friend, but from the impression which the supernatural visitation made upon his mind, Jack Sheppard, with a choking voice, endeavoured to utter words of consolation to his more feeble companion, whose eyes he could see filled with tears every moment, and who, with the greatest difficulty, controlled her emotion.

The effort was almost greater than he could accomplish.

The horrors of their situation pressed with full force upon him, and almost drove him to distraction.

That Blueskin had been either captured or slain, he felt confident, for nothing else would account for his long absence.

Wearily, starving, penniless almost, what were they to do?

No word of complaint came from the lips of his poor suffering companion, although he knew full well she must be suffering much agony.

Very many hours had elapsed now since either she or he had partaken of a morsel of food, and the cravings of their stomachs, which at first seemed unendurable, degenerated into a deadly sensation of sickness and nausea.

They felt, too, giddy and faint.

To them the bright rays of the morning sun, and the smiling, peaceful-looking landscape, appeared nothing but a mockery.

The contrast made the misery of their situation more glaringly apparent.

Sadly, then, their eyes roamed all around, and they rested upon nothing that gave them the least hope.

"Do not despair, dearest," said Jack Sheppard to his companion, and pressing her hand as he spoke. "Do not despair. Although the prospect before us is so very dark and gloomy, we must strive to go on cheerfully, and await with patience the dawn of better times."

"I have not the strength of mind, Jack, that you have," replied Edgorth Bess, her tears threatening every moment to obtain the mastery over her. "Difficulties and dangers do not have such a depressing influence upon you as they do upon me, but I cannot help it; and now, although it will pain you to hear it, I am becoming thoroughly heart-weary, and beginning to lose all hope."

"Do not speak so sadly, dearest," said Jack, "or you will break my heart."

"Forgive me, I am weak."

And, as she spoke, the poor suffering girl broke into a flood of tears, that made Jack's breast swell and ache until it was almost more than he could endure.

He felt that it would be a relief to his own overburdened heart if he could mingle his tears with hers, but a kind of pride would not permit him to do this.

But he felt himself incapable of doing anything to assuage the poor girl's grief.

He merely stole his arm around her waist, and drew her head down upon his shoulder.

Here she wept in plenty.

During this time, Jack occupied his thoughts with a careful consideration of their position, so that he might be able to say what should be done.

This he found was no very easy matter.

Between them they only possessed a very small sum of money, which would just keep them from perishment but for a short time only.

Despite the great confidence he felt in Blueskin's resources and ability to free himself from any position of danger, he could not help feeling full of apprehension as to his fate.

Should he be dead?

There were things far more unlikely, but this was a contingency of so dreadful a character that he did not dare to speculate upon it.

It was possible that the ruined farm-house would form an excellent place of refuge for them, and doubtless it would be to that spot that Blueskin would repair as soon as he was able.

But, after what had taken place within that lonesome and dismal habitation, Jack felt that it could no longer be a place of refuge for them.

The bare ground would be better than that roof under which so many dire atrocities had been perpetrated.

Those were his own feelings in the matter, and he was quite sure that his companion would share them in even a greater degree than himself.

In which direction to look for Blueskin he knew not.

There was no clue, no trace as to the route he had taken; and Jack was well aware that to institute any inquiries respecting him would be dangerous in the extreme.

Then, again, in the event of Blueskin having been made prisoner, and succeeded in freeing himself again, the first place to which he would naturally come to look for Bess and Jack would be the ruined farm-house in which he had left them.

This seemed to indicate a necessity of hovering round about that spot, and on no account going far from it.

Otherwise they would miss each other.

Then, on the other hand, there was the dread that, if Jonathan Wild had captured Blueskin anywhere in the vicinity, he would extend his researches, under the belief that where one was the others would be also.

On the one hand, then, if he remained he should be menaced by the danger of discovery by Wild.

If he left and wandered away, he would run the risk of losing Blueskin.

Truly was he between the horns of a dilemma, and he had only a choice of evils.

By the time he had reached this point in his reflections, Edgworth Bess had ceased weeping, and now she looked up into his countenance with an air of greater resignation.

Never in his life, perhaps, was Jack so sensible of the great responsibility which had been cast upon him by having this young girl so fully under his protection, than he did at the present moment.

"I am better now, Jack," she said. "Don't be angry with me for crying so. I could not help it. What shall we do now?"

"That is what I have been trying to decide."

"And I am so dreadfully faint for want of food, Jack. Where shall we get any? I believe I shall die if I do not have some soon."

"It breaks my heart," said Jack, "when I think to what privations and sufferings you have been subjected through the villainy of that man whose existence is a foul spot on the fair surface of creation."

"I cannot think how it is that such monstrous villainy as his can remain so long unpunished."

"And I. And yet I have a feeling within which tells me that the day of his utter downfall and confusion is not far distant."

"But, Jack. Let us, at all events, leave this place. Surely in this part of the country we shall not be likely to be recognised."

"Yes, come with me, for I cannot see you die of hunger before my eyes. Thank heaven! I have the means of obtaining provisions for to-day, though I fear we shall have some trouble. But never mind that. Come!"

"And Blueskin," said Edgworth Bess, as she lingered a moment. "How shall we find him if we go away from here—or, rather, how will he find us?"

"We must not think of that just at present. It will be better if we can buoy ourselves up with the hope that while we are on our way to the next village we may meet with him."

"I trust we may, but I fear there is little ground for entertaining such a hope. Oh! Jack, tell me truly what you think has become of him."

"I am almost afraid to think."

"I dread the worst."

"And, to speak frankly, so do I. You remember I heard the sound of horses' hoofs upon the road while we halted near the suicide's grave."

"Oh! yes," replied Edgworth Bess, shuddering at this allusion to the ill-omened place. "Oh! yes. I recollect you said that Jonathan Wild was on the road."

"Such was my suspicion, and I fear it is out too true a one. It may be that Wild pounced upon Blueskin by surprise, and made him a prisoner before he was aware of it."

"Perhaps he has put him to death."

"I do not fear that. I know he reserves Blueskin for a particular fate."

"What is that?"

"A favourite mode of disposing of people Wild has. It is of having them executed at Tyburn."

Bess shuddered.

"At times," she said, "I can scarcely bring myself to believe that he is a man."

"It would be fortunate for the credit of humanity if it could be proved that he was not. But come, we will not linger here. Take hold of my arm. Lean upon me. It is true I am weak, but still I am stronger than you are."

Edgworth Bess was glad enough to accept of this assistance, for she felt that she was scarcely able to walk without a support of some kind.

In this way, then, they made their way through the neglected fields which surrounded the farm-house, and in a short time reached the gate that led into the high-road.

Through this they passed, and, quite unconsciously, followed in the exact footsteps of Blueskin, for that was the very route he had taken a few hours before.

"We will stop at the first inn we come to," said Jack, "and there obtain some refreshment. Ah! look. Tell me whether my eyes deceive me. Is not that a sign which I can see in the distance, swinging lazily to and fro in the wind?"

"It is, Jack."

"Oh! joy—joy. You have not far to go now. I hope we shall have the good fortune to meet with some kind persons."

"So do I. But, Jack!"

"What, dearest?"

"Will it not seem strange for us to be seen wandering thus together?"

"It may have a strange look."

"It may be the means of generating suspicion."

"It may."

"How can it be avoided?"

"I know but of one means."

"What?"

"For us to pass ourselves off for brother and sister, and invariably address each other by that title. Thus I shall be brother John, and you will be sister Elizabeth."

"Very well, Jack; let it be so. How I wish that I had a brother!"

The forlornness of the poor girl's situation, bereft as she was of all relations, struck deeply home to Jack's heart.

"I will be your brother," he replied, in as cheerful a voice as he could assume; for Jack was afraid to allow her thoughts to dwell upon that subject. "I will be a brother, and perform a brother's duty."

She pressed his hand affectionately as he spoke, but remained silent.

A walk of a few minutes brought them to the inn.

It was a rude, old-fashioned building, built on the outskirts of the village.

Looking up at the sign, Jack saw that it was called "The Well of Content."

He pointed it out to his companion, and expressed a hope that it would prove to be such to them.

There was a comfortable, homely look about the place, and Jack felt quite pleased with it.

He could not help envying those whose lot it was to live there so peacefully.

There was an air of repose all around, from the cat that was basking on the wall to a couple of horses which were drinking from the trough in front of the door.

With an easy, confident step, Jack led his companion to the front door of the inn.

He ascended the two well-worn steps before it, and walked a few steps down a passage into a large kitchen, in which a fire was blazing, and casting a comfortable warmth around.

A woman came forward, and, Jack conjectured, was the landlady.

He was favourably impressed with her appearance in a moment.

He could tell by her beaming face that she possessed a kind heart.

"We are travelling to London," said Jack to her, "and this is my sister. We are hungry, and want rest and refreshment. We are not rich enough to ride, but still we can pay for our accommodation."

The landlady was favourably prepossessed by the appearance of Edgworth Bess, and she at once invited them into the kitchen.

They sat down upon a screen by the fireside, and a tempting meal to the hungry wayfarers was laid upon the table before them.

To this they did ample justice.

Afterwards Jack, having given her a caution not to say too much, confided Edgworth Bess to the care of the landlady, in order that she might make some alterations in her toilette.

CHAPTER CCXCIII.

JACK SHEPPARD SHOOTS THE MAD DOG IN THE LANE,
AND SAVES THE LIFE OF EDGWORTH BESS.

It was about two hours after this that Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess bade farewell to the friendly landlady and left the inn.

Both felt much better, both bodily and mentally, and as they walked along the high-road they discoursed with lighter hearts upon the dangers and difficulties of their situation.

But the prospect before them was dismal enough to depress the spirits of any one.

The day, however, was very fine—unusually so for England; and the sun's warm rays seemed to have a beneficial effect upon their minds.

Jack and Edgworth Bess passed through the village, but not without attracting a great deal of attention; for it was a remote, out-of-the-way place, where to see a stranger was quite an event.

It may be imagined, then, that our friends were glad enough when the hamlet and all its prying inhabitants were left behind, and they once more got out into the open country.

They walked along briskly, for each felt as though they had received a fresh lease of life.

Jack, finding no traces of Blueskin, endeavoured to persuade his companion that the best thing they could do would be to proceed direct to London.

But Edgworth Bess seemed to shrink with horror at the bare idea of returning to the metropolis, which had ever been a place of so much danger to her.

"Let us stay here a little longer," she said. "It is not worth while to be too precipitate. If Blueskin is a prisoner we cannot aid him, and you said just now you had no doubt about his ability to effect his escape."

"I did, but"—

"And we have no proof that he is a prisoner. It may be that he strayed so far in the darkness as to miss his road, and he may at this moment be at the farm-house."

Jack shook his head at this supposition.

"We ought not to stray too far from it," he said, "for fear some trivial circumstance may have occurred to prevent Blueskin from returning. If such prove to be the case, the first place to which he would make his way would be the farm-house."

"Of course it would. No, Jack, we will not go to London—at all events, not yet. Let us give Blueskin a chance of rejoining us."

"As you will, dearest. I will never do anything which is contrary to your inclinations; and I fancy that, after all, I shall be doing best by consenting to your opinion."

"I cannot banish the thought that we shall ere long meet with him."

"I hope we shall, for suspense and anxiety are two things I am ill-calculated to bear. I would give much for some definite information."

"It would be satisfactory."

At this moment they heard a crashing noise, and under the influence of surprise they came to a sudden stop.

It was as though some one had forced a way through a dense mass of vegetation.

The sound was exactly like the rustling of boughs, and they sprang back to the place from which they had been removed.

And this was really it, for before either had time to make any remark whatever, one of the largest dogs they had ever seen dashed through the hedgerow that skirted the right-hand side of the road.

Our friends did not move, nor did they particularly notice the dog.

Their principal attention was fixed upon the gap in the hedge through which he had burst, and through which they expected the owner of the dog to make his appearance.

But no one came, nor was there the least sound to indicate the approach of any one.

Struck with surprise at this—for Jack was sufficiently well acquainted with the habits of the dog to know that he is rarely seen alone—he turned his attention to the huge animal.

It was certainly the largest he had seen.

It was crouching down by the side of the road close to the gap in the hedge through which he had come.

His tongue was lolled from his mouth, and his lips were covered with white, flakey foam.

His eyes were expressive of the greatest ferocity, and there was something intimidating about his whole appearance.

Edgworth Bess was much alarmed, and clung tightly to Jack's arm for protection.

The dog fixed his eyes upon them, and it was pretty certain that they would not be able to make the least movement without attracting his observation.

Still Jack saw nothing to produce alarm in the look of the dog.

He seemed much exhausted, as though he had run a long way and got heated.

His fiercely gleaming eyes, however, produced a rather uncomfortable sensation.

But he by no means shared in the alarm of his companion.

"Do not be afraid," he said. "The dog will not harm us if we do not interfere with it. Lean upon me. I will walk past him on the opposite side of the road. He will not harm us then."

"Oh! Jack, see how fierce he looks—how like a wild animal he seems."

"He does indeed; but I should be a match for him, never fear, if he attempts to interfere with us."

And as he spoke, Jack took from his pocket a loaded pistol, which he calmly placed upon half-cock.

He knew that the priming was in proper order, because only a short time had elapsed since he placed fresh powder in the pan.

However, he loosened it, for fear it should have caked in any way, and then held the weapon in such a position as to be ready for immediate service.

The dog had fixed his eyes upon Jack in the peculiar manner for which the animal is remarkable.

He did not lose sight of one of Jack's motions.

Whether it was that he felt they were of a threatening nature to himself, or whether there was something in Jack's face which his instinct told him boded no good to him, would be hard to say; but, certain it is, that he gave utterance to a low growl, in which, however, there was much fierceness.

Of this, however, Jack took no sort of notice.

Passing his arm round the waist of his companion in such a manner as to support her steps and lead her on, he advanced a few steps.

But though he got as far on the side of the road opposite to that upon which the dog was as he could, the fierce-looking brute growled still more loudly, and seemed determined not to allow them to pass.

And now Jack saw, as he looked towards him, that his eyes were bloodshot, and gleamed with an unnatural kind of lustre.

His jaws, too, seemed as though they were fixed open.

Still, although he saw these signs, Jack had no idea of what they meant.

Had he done so, he would have adopted a far different course of action to what he did.

He would shrink not only from encountering such a frightful danger himself, but also from exposing Edgworth Bess to it.

The dog was mad; suffering, indeed, under that strange disease known by the misnomer of hydrophobia.

Jack spoke to the dog in a manner which he calculated would soothe it, but the brute only evinced fresh signs of fierceness.

Still Jack advanced.

It would not do for their progress to be stayed by a dog.

[JONATHAN WILD AND HIS SON IN THE LAWYER'S CHAMBERS.]

Edgworth Bess felt a fresh accession of terror.

Jack, however, fixed his eyes constantly upon the brute. Hitherto the dog had been lying down, but now he rose to his feet.

His size was immense.

His breed seemed to be some kind of mastiff.

Suddenly, and just when Jack and his companion arrived opposite to where he stood, he uttered one fierce, sharp howl, and darted forward.

Of the hostility of his intentions there could be no kind of doubt.

Passing by Jack, who probably he rather shrank from encountering, he sprang upon Edgworth Bess.

The poor girl threw up her arms, and to that circumstance she probably owed her life.

The dog fixed his teeth in her thick dress.

More than this he had not time to do, for, though Jack was taken aback by the suddenness with which the attack was made, he quickly recovered himself.

He cocked the pistol, and, taking a careful aim, pulled the trigger.

To have missed would almost have been an impossibility. There was a loud report, and, ere its echoes had died away, the dog lay at full-length on the ground.

The bullet had passed through his brain, thus causing instant death.

The alarm of Edgworth Bess was naturally very great, and it was with great difficulty that she kept herself from fainting.

It was only a consideration of Jack's danger that enabled her to do so.

But, as soon as he saw there was nothing more to be apprehended from the mad dog, Jack restored the discharged pistol to his pocket, and turned all his attention to soothing the apprehensions of his companion.

In this he succeeded in a few moments, and Edgworth Bess cast a shuddering glance at the lifeless form of her antagonist.

"You have another claim upon my gratitude," she said, as she looked up into Jack's face with an expression that sent a thrill of pleasure through his whole body.

"Do not mention it," he said. "Lean upon me, and walk on. I am thankful things have been no worse. I had no idea the dog was mad."

"Nor I. Do you think he was?"

"I am quite sure of it. He had every symptom of raging madness."

Bess shuddered when she thus realized the full extent of the danger to which they had been exposed.

"You are unhurt, Jack, are you not?" she asked, with the greatest anxiety perceptible in her tones.

"Oh! yes; I am not hurt in the least. He did not attempt to attack me. Are you sure that you have received no injury from his fangs?"

"Quite. He has torn my dress, but done no further mischief."

"Let us be thankful for this narrow escape," he said. "We have need to be, for the danger was a terrible one."

"I tremble when I think of it."

"But, happily, it is over now, and we have no further cause for apprehension. And now, Bess, what are we to do?"

"I would rather leave that to your judgment."

"Nay—nay. I do not wish to rely upon myself, but to obtain your opinion and advice. Alas! what can have become of Blueskin?"

"What, indeed?"

"I sadly fear that he has fallen into the hands of our arch foe; and, perhaps, at this moment he is perishing for the want of such assistance as we should be able to give him."

"Do not surmise anything so horrible. Let us cling to hope until we are able to cling to it no longer. Perhaps he returned to the ruined farm-house immediately after our departure from it, and is now either waiting for our return, or else is searching for us."

"I am afraid that is but a frail hope."

"Still it is a hope."

"It is. Shall we return, then, to this farm-house, and see whether we can discover any traces of him?"

"I think so."

"Well, agreed. I should not have proposed such a thing myself, because I consider the place associated with too much terror."

"Our adventures there were terrible," said Edgworth Bess, "and I should be very loath to spend another night in such a place."

"And I too. I would not go for worlds."

"But it is daylight now, Jack. Suppose we were to linger about the vicinity of the farm-house till nightfall, and then, if Blueskin does not return by that time, we will make up our minds as to what we will do next."

"Agreed. I am pleased to find you able to talk over our position with so much calmness. It would be better, too, I think, if we were to travel by night, since we should then be more likely to avoid suspicion."

Having come to this conclusion, they turned round and retraced their steps.

But Jack did not wish to pass through the village again, so he made a considerable detour on purpose to avoid it.

He gained the high road again, and continued to pursue it until the gate was reached.

It did not seem to have been opened since they had last passed through it.

An air of silent desolation seemed to hang over the whole.

It was enough to strike a chill to any heart, and upon the poor fugitives it had a more than ordinarily depressing influence.

With a slow step they made their way up the weed-grown path which led to the main building.

On arriving, they could see no traces of a recent visit.

Pushing open the door, they entered the kitchen.

It was empty.

The wind moaned through the crevices in the walls with a mournful sound.

Otherwise, all was still.

There was something so depressing to the spirits about the appearance of this deserted kitchen that Jack could not prevail upon his companion to enter it or even to linger upon the threshold.

The last faint hope which had found a resting-place about her heart was now destroyed.

Blueskin was not there, nor could she bring herself to believe that he had been there during their absence.

She felt the disappointment keenly, for she had all along fancied he would return.

As for Jack, he could scarcely be said to feel disappointed, for he had not anticipated finding his companion there.

But when he saw that he really was not there, all those dark forebodings which had hitherto found a home in his heart returned with redoubled force.

That, by some means or other, he had fallen into the clutches of Jonathan Wild, he felt confident.

If so, he would then be in London.

Jack feared to communicate to his companion the full extent of his fears, but as the young girl looked up into his countenance she was able to tell with tolerable certainty what was passing there.

She resigned herself to the worst, and burst into a flood of despairing tears.

CHAPTER CCXCIV.

JACK SHEPPARD AND EDGWORTH BESS RESOLVE TO SET OUT FOR LONDON IN SEARCH OF BLUESKIN.

THOSE tears fell like drops of molten lead upon Jack Sheppard's heart.

He saw how sad and dejected his companion was, and he was saddened by the knowledge that there was nothing that he could do that would alleviate her distress.

And so he made no effort to check her tears.

After a little time, however, Edgworth Bess recovered herself, and she looked up into Jack's face with a smile.

But it was such a sad one that it almost broke his heart to see it.

Every time he looked at her, too, his bosom swelled with grief, for he could not avoid noticing what havoc her perils and privations were making of her health.

She was now little more than the shadow of what she was when Jack saw her first.

But no word of complaint came from the heroic girl's lips—she endured all her agony in silence.

Jack was not the less aware of it, though.

But he was powerless to effect any change.

He viewed with alarm the deathly pallor of her cheeks—her sunken and lack-lustre eye—her pale, thin lips, and her emaciated form.

By the desire of Edgworth Bess, they remained in the vicinity of the haunted farm-house until nightfall.

She could not yet bring herself to abandon all hope.

They did not enter the ill-omened building, but for the greater part of the day sat down upon a log of wood, which commanded a view of the front door.

Here they watched and waited during the long hours of the day, but not a single footstep came to disturb them in their solitude.

The place was shunned by all the inhabitants of the district.

All knew something of the terrible tragic circumstances connected with it, and they would not have ventured near for any consideration.

The fugitives were, then, safer here than they possibly could be elsewhere.

But, great as their security might be, they could not bring themselves to remain there while the situation of their comrade was involved in so much doubt.

Both Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess placed great reliance upon his resources and advice.

At length night came.

It set in cloudy, and when the sun sank, a chill wind swept over the earth and moaned among the tree-tops.

It came afterwards in short and sudden gusts.

A kind of preternatural darkness seemed to obscure the heavens, threatening a night of storm.

Jack Sheppard looked upon these symptoms of bad weather with the greatest uneasiness.

His companion was not in a fit state to be exposed to its inclemencies.

She importuned him as soon as it was dark to leave the haunted house; nor was he unwilling to do this, for the prospect of spending another night near it was far from agreeable to his feelings.

They had resolved to go back to London.

It was, so to speak, running into the jaws of the lion, but both felt they could no longer endure the suspense and anxiety they felt with regard to Blueskin's fate.

At whatever risk, they determined to know the worst. They rendered their own chance of capture ten times greater, but neither of them cared individually for that.

Having come to the determination to set out at nightfall on their road to London to ascertain their comrade's fate, they were both calmer, and when the time came they rose and set out upon their journey.

There was one circumstance which Jack did not mention to Edgworth Bess, but which gave him the greatest possible amount of uneasiness.

The money he had paid to the landlady of the "Well of Content" for their accommodation and refreshment had exhausted his purse.

He had but a few coppers left.

Edgworth Bess, as he knew, had no money whatever.

They were a long, long way from London.

Penniless, hungry, and tired, how were they to reach it? This was the circumstance which gave Jack so much uneasiness.

Edgworth Bess, he was confident, was quite unequal to the task of walking to London.

Even if she set out, she would break down before she had proceeded far.

Then, there was the length of time which this tedious mode of progression would necessarily consume.

Time was an object, and a very important one too.

He wanted to reach London at the earliest moment, otherwise he would arrive too late to attempt even to intercept Jonathan Wild's plans.

What was to be done?

Money must be procured somehow and from somewhere, otherwise they would perish.

Silently and moodily, then, Jack Sheppard walked on by the side of his companion, who in vain endeavoured to draw from him the reason of his abstraction.

After gaining the high road, they proceeded for some distance towards London.

The road was deserted, or nearly so.

Suddenly, however, there came upon their ears a heavy, rumbling sound.

Almost at the same moment that they were conscious of it, they perceived before them at some distance two faint, starlike lights.

Jack knew in a moment that some vehicle was approaching, probably a stage-coach.

He informed his companion as much.

The huge vehicle came rolling along at the rate of full twelve miles an hour.

As it came nearer, Jack Sheppard drew aside, and got as close to the hedge as possible.

He was anxious for the safety of his companion.

As the vehicle came nearer, Jack Sheppard's supposition was found to be a correct one.

It was a stage-coach that was approaching.

But it was coming from London, not going towards it.

There was a flash of light, a rattle, and a rush, and then the ponderous affair swept past them.

Jack made no remark concerning it, but his thoughts were busy.

They ought to be in the stage-coach.

Edgworth Bess would then be able to reach London in comfort.

But, alas! they they had not the means.

There was only one mode by which Jack saw he could obtain them.

And that was by waylaying and robbing the next traveller they met.

But Edgworth Bess, he knew, would never consent to the adoption of such a course as that.

Still, Jack did not despair of putting it into execution.

He considered his position was desperate, and that desperate means were requisite to overcome it.

At present, however, he could not conceive how he was to put his design into execution without the knowledge of his companion.

But he trusted that the chapter of events would favour him.

It may now be said that Jack had fully made up his mind to stop the next passenger he met and take from him what money might be required to pay their passage by the stage-coach.

He was quite right in thinking that Edgworth Bess would oppose herself to such a course of action, and therefore he forbore to say a word to her about it.

He endeavoured to distract her attention by talking upon other subjects.

It seemed, though, that he was not to have an opportunity of putting his design into execution.

They did not meet with a single person, either mounted or on foot.

Jack determined to stop no one but the latter.

The former would be too hazardous.

And now, as they continued on their way without meeting with a single living creature, the courage and strength of Edgworth Bess appeared to ebb away, and she hung heavily on Jack's arm.

It was clear that she would not be able to proceed on foot much further.

The poor girl was wearied to death, for though she had had rest, it was not of the proper kind to recover her from fatigue.

Oh! how anxiously did Jack look out for some traveller to make his appearance.

He was afraid, too, that he should hear the stage-coach pass before he was prepared to hail it, and if so he felt that his vexation would exceed all bounds.

A long time would have to elapse before the second coach made its appearance.

Perhaps twelve hours.

The reader may then be able to picture to himself the anxiety which Jack suffered.

At length, however, to his inexpressible joy, he saw in the distance a light of some kind, though at first he was unable to make out what it was.

It was some distance in advance.

Two things connected with it, however, soon became evident.

One was that the light was in motion.

The other was that it was approaching them.

Edgworth Bess saw it, and pointed it out to Jack.

But he had seen it already, though he did not think fit to tell her so.

With a curiosity equal in both, they looked towards this light, and endeavoured to make out what it was.

But this they were unable to do.

From the height the light was from the ground, and from the manner in which it was waved about, they conjectured that it must be carried by some one who was walking.

But, if so, the individual must have been walking in a very extraordinary manner, for the light cut many fantastic capers.

At one moment it would appear to be stationary; then it would advance; then retrograde; while its height from the ground varied to an extraordinary degree.

Jack's curiosity was strongly excited, so much so, that he almost forgot his original intention.

A very short time elapsed, however, before the mystery was cleared up, though what Jack saw elicited no small amount of surprise.

There were two persons approaching.

The first carried in his hand a lighted torch, which flickered about in the wind, and threatened every moment to go out.

This man was dressed in the livery of a servant.

His behaviour and manner exhibited the utmost degree of servility and obsequiousness.

He bowed at almost every step he took, and walked backwards the whole of the way.

This accounted for the extraordinary motions of the light.

The person who followed him appeared by his dress and the behaviour of the servant to be of very great distinction indeed.

It was evident he thought so, too, for he walked along in what he doubtless thought was a very dignified and imposing sort of way.

In his own mind he was clearly a man of great importance.

His countenance bore an expression of deep vexation, as though something had occurred which had displeased him mightily.

He was addressing the obsequious servant, and, as he drew nearer, Jack heard him say—

"Curse it! How much further have I to go? I thought you told me when the carriage broke down that we were only a quarter of a mile from an inn, and here we have come half-a-mile now, if we have come a yard. I can't see any signs of the inn. Curse you, James, where is it?"

"A little further on, worthy and respected sir," replied the servant, in the oiliest terms imaginable. "Only a little further."

"Curse you! you have done nothing but say that all the while."

"Have I, Sir William? I am very sorry if I have done wrong in any way, sir, very sorry indeed. I am sure no one could regret more than I do the occurrence of the unfortunate accident; but then, ever honoured sir, accidents will happen."

"But where's the inn, I say? Curse walking, say I! James, d—n you, why don't you throw a light on the ground, so that I shan't soil my dress by stepping into the mud? Oh! d—n it, what's that?"

The elegant gentleman had suddenly and unexpectedly put his foot into a puddle, and the dirty water splashed up on to his white silk stockings, and completely spoiled the look of his magnificent shoes.

James immediately put on a look of great concern.

"Oh! dear," he said, "what a sad pity!"

"Sad pity be d—d! it's all your fault, you villain! Now, what am I to do with my clothes in this state? Answer me that, you villain, what am I to do?"

"Honoured sir, I know not; but perhaps at the inn the damage may be repaired."

"Oh! curse the inn! I wish I could see it."

"It's close at hand now, worshipful sir."

"Go on, then, and mind you show a light on the ground, so that I can see where I am walking."

"Yes, Sir William."

The strange pair passed on without either of them taking the slightest notice of the fugitives.

It might be that they were both so deeply occupied with themselves that they did not really see them.

"What do you think of that for a fine gentleman?" asked Jack, with assumed cheerfulness.

"I think him a contemptible wretch. How anyone can be so affected I cannot conceive."

"It does seem ridiculous, but it is such creatures as James who make these men what they really are."

"I suppose so. How he frowned upon him!"

"He did."

"But the gentleman was beautifully dressed!"

"He was, indeed. Doubtless he was on his way to some party or other when his carriage broke down, and that is the occasion of his vexation."

"Very likely."

"He is a wealthy person, I should think, judging by the respect with which he was treated, and the valuables he carried about him."

"Yes, and did you notice what a beautiful watch-chain he had? I saw it very plainly, for it fairly glittered in the torch-light."

"Yes, I saw it too, and that reminds me"—

"Of what?"

"He has got a good way down the road now, but it don't matter."

"Whatever do you mean?"

"I wish I had asked him what time it was, but it isn't too late. You wait here a moment, and I will run down the road after him. I will soon find out what's o'clock."

CHAPTER CCXCV.

JACK SHEPPARD MAKES A GOOD BOOTY FROM SIR WILLIAM, TO THE DISMAY OF EDGORTH BESS.

BEFORE Edgorth Bess could say a word, or make any attempt to detain him, as she assuredly would have done, Jack Sheppard darted off down the road in the direction the gentleman and his servant had taken.

Seeing this, she did what was certainly the best thing she could do, and that was to obey Jack's hasty injunctions, and wait where she was until he returned.

At first no suspicion entered her mind that Jack's errand was anything different to what he had stated it to be.

But presently doubts began to cross her mind.

A turn in the road hid the gentleman from sight, and Jack soon disappeared.

Her doubts, having once commenced, rapidly increased in strength, more especially when some sounds, which sounded like those of conflict, reached her ear.

Although she dreaded the worst, she was too terrified to move, but sank down upon her knees in the roadway.

Leaving her thus, we will refer more particularly to Jack's proceedings.

As the reader may be tolerably certain, his business with the gentleman was something of more importance than merely ascertaining what o'clock it was.

He had merely devised that as a stratagem to get away from his companion, and a very clever one he thought it, for he had been puzzling his brains to invent some reason for turning back.

Chance, however, threw a good excuse in his way, and he availed himself of it instantly.

But he set off with all possible speed, so as not to allow Edgorth Bess any chance of opposing it.

When he turned round to run after the gentleman, he just caught a glimpse of him as he passed round a bend in the road.

Jack was fleet and light of foot, so he set on to run with full speed, taking care, however, to tread on the tips of his toes, so as to make as little noise as possible.

He soon came in sight of the gentleman again, and then he proceeded with greater circumspection.

He did not want them to be aware of his presence until he was, in a manner of speaking, actually upon them.

There seemed to be a strong probability of his being able to do this, for the servant was fully occupied with his master, and the master was fully occupied with himself.

At length Jack conceived he was near enough for his purpose.

He held a pistol in his hand, in readiness to do instant execution if necessary.

Giving one leap forward, he alighted close to the pair, and cried—

"Halt! or you are both dead men!"

These words were clearly and distinctly uttered, and it was evident that they carried their full meaning with them.

The servant and the gentleman stopped at once.

The light of the torch fell full upon Jack's figure.

"Murder!" cried the obsequious footman, as soon as he perceived him. "Murder! Thieves! Help!"

"Stop your row," said Jack. "Oh! you won't. Then take that!"

He seized the torch as he spoke, and, wresting it easily from the footman's feeble grasp, with one well-directed thrust sent the lighted end into his wide-open mouth.

The effect of this was, not only to extinguish the torch, but to extinguish the fellow's cries also.

He plumped down upon the ground at once, and rolled over and over in an extraordinary manner, while all the time he gave vent to some inarticulate and hideous groans.

Jack did not trouble himself any further with the footman, as he knew him to be completely discomfited, but, turning round, he clapped the muzzle of the pistol against the forehead of the astonished gentleman.

"Now, sir," he said, "be quick. Your life will be spared upon one condition."

"Murder!"

"Silence. If you utter such a cry again, that moment will be your last. Do you want me to spare your life?"

"Of course I do. Oh! dear! Could anything be more unfortunate?"

"Silence, I say! If you will hand over your purse, and whatever other articles of a valuable character which you carry about you, with the greatest dispatch, then your life will be spared; but if you refuse or linger, I shall blow your brains out, and rifle your pockets afterwards at my leisure."

The gentleman trembled visibly when he heard these words, pronounced, as they were, with all the firmness which Jack could throw into his voice.

"Spare my life!" he gasped, "spare my life!"

"On the conditions named, and no other," replied Jack; "fulfil them, and you are at liberty to depart instantly."

"Oh! dear! oh! dear!"

"No lamentations, but be quick, for I am in a hurry! Now then, I shall have to help you, I see."

With great dexterity, Jack proceeded to divest the gentleman of several of the valuable articles he wore.

He slipped out his massive scarf-pin, and possessed himself of his still more massive watch and chain; then he stripped his fingers of rings, and repeated his demands for his purse.

Awed by Jack's manner, Sir William no longer hesitated, but, plunging his hand into the inside pocket of his vest, drew forth a pocket-book.

Jack took it eagerly, but he said—

"Not so fast! not so fast! You carry a purse in addition to this pocket-book, I feel confident; so hand it to me at once, and then I will suffer you to depart."

With very bad grace, Sir William drew a purse from his breeches pocket.

Jack snatched it from his hand in a moment, and then he said—

"Now be off. I will count four, and if you are not a good way off by that time, I shall fire. Now, quick! Go!"

Considerably alarmed at this threat, Sir William set off to run; but he forgot all about the obsequious James, who lay prostrate in the roadway.

The consequence was, that he caught his foot against his extended body and fell over him, measuring his full length upon the ground.

He scrambled up again, however, almost before Jack was aware of what had taken place, and set off at full speed.

Obsequious James uttered a howl, and that reminded Jack of his existence.

"Get up," he said, dealing him a no very gentle kick in the ribs as he spoke. "Get up, you rascal, and run after your master there, or, if you don't, you are a dead footman."

James heard these words, and understood them too.

He sprang alacrily to his feet, and set off after his master at a speed that would have enabled him to win any race in Christendom.

Jack could not forbear laughing heartily at this adventure, which promised to be very profitable to him.

He jingled the purse, which he still held in his hand; and to judge by its weight, it must have contained a large sum of money.

He did not stop to examine it, however, but at once consigned it to his pocket, together with the pistol which had rendered him such good service.

With a heart much lighter than he had felt for some time back, Jack hastened along the road towards the spot where he had left Edgworth Bess.

He began to feel some apprehensions for her safety, and to wish he had not left her, now that the necessity for doing so no longer existed.

In a low tone of voice, he ventured to call upon her name.

"Bess! Bess!" he cried, "where are you? Speak! It is I—Jack. I am here. Speak!"

All was still.

His heart seemed for a moment to cease to beat.

But, recovering himself with an effort, he repeated his cry, and this time met with a response.

With his mind relieved from a terrible weight, he hurried along the road, and then found that he had not gone far enough.

He had said that, after his departure, Edgworth Bess had heard the sounds of conflict, and had sunk down upon her knees.

It was in this position that Jack Sheppard found her.

He hastened to raise her to her feet.

"Oh Jack! Jack!" she exclaimed, recoiling from him, "what has happened?"

"Nothing!" replied Sheppard, who was filled with apprehension by her manner.

"Oh, Jack! how can you make me such a reply as that? I heard the sounds of conflict."

"Of conflict?"

"Yes! do not attempt to deny it; I know too well what you have done, Jack. You have committed another robbery."

Jack was silent.

"How can you be so wicked and so foolish? I had no idea of your intentions until it was too late, or else I should have intercepted you. But now"—

"Bess!" said Jack earnestly, "hear me first, but do not judge me! Will you hear me?"

"What have you to say?"

"To justify my conduct."

"You cannot do that."

"Will you give me the opportunity?"

"To justify a robbery—impossible!"

"Bess, hear me; hear me, I beseech you! Can you not comprehend our position? Blueskin is a prisoner in Wild's house in London."

"How do you know that?"

"I have no proof, but that is my conviction. Without such aid as we could afford him he may perish. We are here alone, helpless, penniless; we must get to London. From that place we are distant very many miles."

"Enough, enough!"

"Nay, hear me out. You are weary—so weary that you feel you cannot walk another mile. We have no means of riding or of paying for a shelter; besides all which, there is the necessity for our reaching London with the least possible delay."

"I know all that, Jack; but still that all is far, very far from justifying your crime; no circumstances could justify it."

"Nay, nay! you saw that fog—he elicited your contempt. I have taken from him nothing more than he can well spare. He will never feel his loss, and we shall be able to reach London with speed and comfort."

"Not with comfort, Jack—not with comfort! Oh! Jack, I would rather have sacrificed my life than you should have committed this last crime."

"These scruples are unworthy of you."

"No, Jack, they are not! If you love me you will make all the speed you can after that gentleman and restore him the articles of which you have despoiled him!"

"Nay, Bess, listen to me; such a course would be perilous in the extreme; no one would believe in my intentions, and I should be assuredly taken prisoner."

"Alas! alas!"

"Come, Bess, cheer up; you make more of this than the event really deserves. Had it been my first offence the case would have been different, but now one more can't much matter."

"Oh! Jack. You will break my heart if you talk like that, you will indeed."

"No, no!"

"But you will. And do you for a moment think that you are likely to succeed in your designs if you resort to crime and violence as the means of accomplishing them? Oh! no, no. Until you change, until you cast aside this mistaken policy, we shall never prosper!"

The poor girl could go no further.

Sobs and tears choked her utterance.

"You are ungrateful," said Jack. "It has been for your sake that I have done what I have, not for my own."

"Then, if I am to be the means of causing you to commit crime, it is best that we should part, and that at once, before further mischief is done. Farewell!"

"Never! never! I cannot suffer you to part from me thus. I will not do so. What has been done cannot be recalled. What would you have me do?"

Bess made no reply, but endeavoured to release her hand from the strong grasp which Jack kept upon it.

This, however, she found to be impossible.

Jack continued—

"Would you have me cast this money in the road now that I have obtained it? Surely no. Your own good sense must shrink from such an act as that is, when we are so badly off for money as we are. The deed is done! Let us now turn it to the best advantage."

"Jack!"

"What, dearest?"

"I am convinced that until you change your tactics we shall never succeed. Look at your scheme for obtaining those ingots of silver. What trouble and danger they brought us into without doing us the least good, for we lost them after all. No, Jack; the curse of stolen property clung to them, and produced nothing but misfortune to their possessors."

"What shall I do?"

"Jack, we are struggling for justice; but how can we reasonably lay claim to it when we are ourselves violators of its precepts? It is monstrous and ridiculous."

"But you have not told me what I am to do."

"I adjure you to forsake such ways. No longer render yourself obnoxious to the laws of your country."

"Your will is my law."

"Fling away, then, all those things which you have taken. Rely upon it, if you do so, our position will be better."

"Hark!" cried Jack. "What is that?"

A rumbling sound came upon their ears, and the next moment the stage-coach going towards London came round the bend in the road.

Bess was silent, and looked at the vehicle.

She was not prepared, however, for what Jack was about to do.

He hailed the coach, and, before she had time to utter any remonstrances, it stopped, the door was opened, and Jack lifted her in, almost by main force.

Ere she could recover her composure, the vehicle was set in motion again, and then, leaning back in her seat, she clasped her hands over her face, and burst into a passionate flood of tears.

CHAPTER CCXCVI.

JONATHAN WILD AND HIS SON VISIT THE LAWYER'S CHAMBERS IN THE TEMPLE IN SEARCH OF THE MISSING PAPERS.

"Oh! you're taking it easy at last, I see."

Such was the remark made by Wild, junior, on the night of the projected expedition to the Temple, when, on descending the stairs, fully equipped, he found his respected parent sitting down in an attitude of deep thought.

Jonathan raised his head, and glared fiercely at him—fiercely enough, indeed, to have intimidated anyone.

But Wild, junior, was not very easily intimidated, so, taking no notice at all, he walked across the room and sat down in a chair opposite his father.

For a moment the precious pair looked at each other in silence.

George was the first to speak.

"Well, guv'nor," he said, "easy does it, you know; but, whenever you are ready, I am waiting."

"What hour is it?" growled the thief-taker.

"About half-past ten."

"Then it's about time we started."

"Just as you think proper, guv'nor."

"Are you armed?"

"Yes. Are you?"

"I am."

"But, guv'nor, you don't expect we shall have to make a fight of it, do you?"

"I don't anticipate such a thing, but we ought to be prepared."

"Of course. Always guard against accidents."

Jonathan smiled grimly.

"Are you sure," asked his son, after a moment's pause, "that you know just whereabouts this lawyer's chambers are in the Temple?"

"Oh! yes. No. 12, Pump-court. Third floor."

"Oh! that's the address?"

"Yes."

"How did you find it out?"

"I have once been there."

"Better and better. We shan't have to go beating about the bush so much."

"It is an advantage, certainly."

"A very great one. Why, you will be able to walk right up to the door of his chambers without the least delay or hesitation."

"Of course."

"And I daresay, now, on the occasion of your visit, you took notice of the fastenings on the door, thinking that, sometime or other, perhaps, a little knowledge on the point would be valuable."

Jonathan grinned in his usual disagreeable fashion when anything of a complimentary character was said to him.

"I have some recollection on the point, but that don't matter now. Time is going on. We must be starting."

"As I observed before, guv'nor, when you are ready I am waiting."

"Let us be off at once, then."

Jonathan rose to his feet as he spoke; his son immediately followed his example.

Without any farther delay, they went down stairs, and out at the front door into Newgate-street.

As they gained the pavement, they heard St. Sepulchre's church strike the hour of eleven.

This was a signal for them to quicken their steps.

Jonathan Wild led the way, in almost a direct line, to his destination.

The distance was not very great.

He entered the Temple by the gate near Temple Bar, because, as he well knew, the others were closed before this hour.

Upon arriving at this place, he found even this gate was closed; but the watchman was there, and he lost no time in summoning him.

"There's no admittance to the Temple at this hour," said the watchman, who saw at a glance that the applicants for admission were not ordinary inhabitants of the place.

He had the curiosity, however, to raise his lantern to look who it was that sought an entrance at such an unusual hour.

As he did this, Jonathan Wild took off his hat, and allowed the whole of his physiognomy to be exposed.

The light of the watchman's lantern fell in full force upon his countenance, which Jonathan screwed up into a hideous shape.

The watchman knew him.

That was evident by the kind of fright which he exhibited, and the rapid alteration which his manner underwent.

"Oh! dear," he gasped. "Is it really you, Mr. Wild? I didn't know you at first, sir; indeed I didn't. What did your honour's worship please to want?"

"Admittance," said Jonathan, sharply.

"Oh! dear, yes, sir; of course. You can have admittance to the Temple at any hour you think proper. Wait a moment, worshipful sir, and I will go and fetch the keys. I won't be a moment, Mr. Wild."

"Be off, then!"

The old watchman hobbled off under the gateway, and Wild, junior, touched his father on the arm, as he said—

"I say, guv'nor."

"What now?"

"Don't think you have gone the best way to work."

"How do you mean?"

"We are on secret service."

"Well?"

"Then, you should have kept your visit a secret. When the papers are missed, this will be recollected."

"Bah!"

"What do you mean by that?"

"Why, that it's more than the watchman's life is worth to say I have been here if I caution him to keep the matter a secret."

"Oh!"

"Didn't you see how eager he was to let me in?"

"Yes. I suppose, then, guv'nor, you happen to know one or two things that he would not like to be made public?"

"That's it."

"Well, guv'nor, I really will give you credit for being what I always said you were—a wonderful man."

"Hush! here he comes."

There was the sound of footsteps, and the faint flashing of a light.

Jonathan and his son both relapsed into silence.

"Here's the key, respected sir," said the watchman, thrusting it with nervous eagerness into the lock; "here's the key—that's it."

He opened the gate.

The two Wilds passed through in a moment.

"Fasten it after us," said the thief-taker.

"All right, sir."

The gate was relocked.

"Can I show you anywhere, sir?" asked the watchman.

"Yes, come here a moment; I want to speak to you."

The watchman drew close.

As soon as he was near enough, Jonathan clutched him with painful tightness by the arm and drew him towards him.

Then, putting his mouth close to the watchman's ear, whose face was now the very picture of alarm, he said—

"John Gordon."

"Ye—yes, Mr. Wild."

"Do you think you shall recollect this visit of mine?"

"Ye—yes, Mr. Wild."

"Very well, then. I want it kept a secret. Do you understand?"

"Ye—yes, Mr. Wild."

These few trembling words were all he seemed to have the power to utter.

"I say, I want my visit here to-night kept a secret," repeated Jonathan. "No one is aware of it but yourself. If, however, I find that it becomes known at any time, I shall lay the fault to you. Do you hear?"

"Ye—yes, Mr. Wild."

"Then I shall bring forward that little affair of the communion-service which was stolen from the sacristy. You know all about that, John Gordon?"

"Mercy, Mr. Wild, have mercy."

"Of course, I shall have mercy, but only just as long as you keep the secret of my presence here to-night."

With these words, Jonathan released his hold of the watchman's arm, and strode away into the recesses of the building.

John Gordon sank down in such a state of absolute fright that it was really pitiable to see him.

Jonathan was right in thinking he could trust him to keep his secret.

The thief-taker was well aware whereabouts Pump-court was situated, and he went towards it with a rapid and confident step.

Having settled the matter of the watchman in what he considered was a highly satisfactory manner, he gave way to a little elation.

He turned to the left, into the narrow place known by the name of Pump-court.

Proceeding to its extremity, he paused before a door which stood at one corner.

This door stood wide open, after the usual custom, and a flight of dark, steep stairs was disclosed beyond.

Jonathan beckoned to his son to follow him, and, as lightly as a foot could fall, made his way up the staircase.

But, in spite of all his caution, the woodwork would creak beneath his feet.

This, however, was nothing to be alarmed at, for if any one had been in any of the chambers and heard them ascending, they would have paid no attention to a circumstance which occurred so frequently.

The third floor was at length reached, and here Jonathan paused.

The place was in almost utter darkness, but his memory served him well; and, assisted by it and by his eyesight, he made out the position of the door.

Jonathan, however, before he advanced a step, pressed something into his son's hands.

"It's a mask," he said, in a faint whisper; "put it on, and then, if we should happen to be surprised, our features will not be recognised."

George Wild took the article in silence, and put it on; while, by the movements of his father, he could tell he was doing the same thing.

As soon as he had concluded this operation, Jonathan stole silently across the landing in the direction of the door, and placed his ear against the panel.

He listened attentively, but no sound from within reached his ears.

At length he was satisfied, by the dead silence that prevailed, that there was no one in the apartment beyond.

Having come to this conclusion, he felt for the fastenings.

There was a knob which he turned, but the door did not yield, thus showing that it was either locked or bolted.

Wild conjectured that the latter was more likely to prove the case.

The lock he knew, by a previous observation, to be nothing but a clumsy common one; so he did not even trouble to find a skeleton key, as he might have done, but inserted a picklock into the keyhole.

In the use of this, and, indeed, of all other burglarious instruments, Jonathan Wild was an adept.

He exhibited his skill on the present occasion, for having rattled the pick in the lock for a moment, there was a sharp snap, which showed that the bolt of the lock had been shot back.

After the performance of this feat, he remained silent and listening; but nothing of an alarming character reaching his ears, he once more ventured to turn the knob.

To his gratification, the door yielded.

He crossed the threshold in a moment, with his son close at his heels, and then he closed the door after him.

His first injunction was to his son, whom he bade light the lantern.

While he was thus occupied, the thief-taker himself passed his hand over the door, and quickly encountered a bolt, which he hastily shot into its socket.

They were then secure from intrusion in that quarter.

By the time he had done this, Wild, junior, had lighted the lantern, which soon gave forth a bright and steady light.

It was with the aid of this that the delightful pair took a look about them.

They found themselves in an apartment fitted up as an office.

It was quite vacant.

"This is the outer office, where the clerk sits," whispered Wild. "I don't suppose we shall find what we want here?"

"There is another room, then, guv'nor?"

"Yes, that is where Mr. Mudford himself sits and holds his consultations."

"That is the place for us, then. Where is it?"

"Yonder is the door."

"Good. I see it."

"Be cautious. There might, perchance, be some one in the inner room, though it is not very likely; still, we cannot be too careful."

"Right, guv'nor."

On tiptoe they now crossed the outer office, and approached the green-baize door leading into the inner one.

At this Wild again listened, but finding no sound came from within, he again came to the conclusion that the office was empty.

Acting upon this supposition, he opened the door, which he found yielded readily to his touch.

To his surprise and consternation, however, a flash of light came from within, and a voice cried out, in rather startled accents—

"Who is there?"

A curse came from Jonathan Wild's lips, and he dashed the door wide open.

As he did so, the interior of the inner office was disclosed.

On the table was a reading-lamp, and it was from this that the light Wild had seen had come.

Seated at this table, with a book before him, was a man of about fifty years of age, whom Jonathan immediately recognised as being the attorney belonging to the chambers, Mr. William Mudford.

He started to his feet in alarm when he saw by what kind of characters his sanctum was invaded, for the black masks which Wild and his son had put on gave them a very ferocious appearance.

CHAPTER CXXVII.

THE RESULT OF JONATHAN WILD'S SEARCH FOR THE MISSING PAPERS IN THE LAWYER'S CHAMBERS.

MR. WILLIAM MUDFORD never experienced such a shock of surprise in all his life before as he did when he saw the thief-taker and his son appear upon the threshold.

He was engaged upon a very important case, which was to come on for hearing the next day, and he had taken advantage of the silence of night to retire to his chambers.

Determined not to be disturbed, he had dismissed his clerk and locked the outer door.

Then he sat down to a quiet consideration of the important business before him.

The case was a very intricate one, and had cost him a great deal of trouble; besides, he had had only a short time to "get it up," as lawyers phrase it.

To do this he had been compelled to sacrifice several nights' sleep, and as he now sat poring over the pages he had fallen fast asleep.

It was during this slumber that Jonathan made his way in, and that without awaking him, though he disturbed him slightly.

His first knowledge of Jonathan's appearance dated from the time when the inner door opened.

Now, Mr. Mudford was rather a timid man. Indeed, in a contest he greatly preferred to rely upon intellectual rather than physical strength.

Therefore, when he saw the apparition of two well-armed men, both masked, he experienced extreme terror, and would gladly have sunk through the floor if he could.

As for making any resistance, the thought of doing such a thing as that never once entered into his head.

He stood glaring at the intruders in ludicrous fright.

Jonathan Wild saw at a glance that there was nothing to be apprehended from him.

Deliberately, then, he drew a pistol, and, cocking it, said—

“Mr. Mudford, if you utter one cry, or make the least attempt to escape, that moment will be your last. I will plaster the wall with your brains.”

At this awful threat, Mr. Mudford's terror visibly increased.

His teeth chattered, and his knees smote each other.

Jonathan made a sign to his son, who at once slipped round the table and grasped Mr. Mudford by the arm, who, apprehensive of the worst consequences, could not refrain from uttering an ejaculation of fright.

“Be quiet,” said Wild, junior. “Take it easy, and no harm will be done you.”

Somewhat comforted by this assurance, Mr. Mudford prepared to submit himself to his fate with the best grace he could.

Finding him thus tractable, he was quickly bound.

They tied him hand and foot, blindfolded him, and gagged him.

While in this very helpless state they lifted him up, and, carrying him to a remote corner of the apartment, they laid him down.

Being thus disposed of, they turned their attention to the original object of their visit.

The chamber was fitted up after the style of most lawyers' offices.

On a shelf placed at no great distance from the ceiling were several tin boxes, all of which were carefully secured with padlocks.

They were those sort of boxes in which title-deeds and other valuable papers are generally kept.

Every one had a name painted upon them.

Jonathan Wild took the lantern, and holding it up so that its beams fell upon these boxes, he, one after the other, perused the names which were painted upon them.

At length he found one upon which the two words, “Donnull” and “Private” appeared.

Wild, junior, saw this box the same moment as his father, and he said—

“That's the ticket, guv'nor! Wait a moment, and I'll soon have the gentleman down.”

He placed a chair in a convenient position as he spoke, and, mounting upon it, he lifted down the box, which was not so heavy as one would have thought from its appearance.

Jonathan watched all these proceedings with very great interest, and occupied himself, with holding the light to his son.

What Mr. Mudford thought of these extraordinary proceedings would be hard to say.

Wild, junior, descended from the chair with the box in his hands, and placed it down upon the table, though in so doing he overturned the reading-lamp, so that all the light they now had proceeded from the dark lantern.

This, however, was quite sufficient for their purpose.

When the box was fairly on the table, Jonathan resigned the lamp to his son, and set about making an examination of the lock.

It seemed to be of rather an intricate character, so he did not stop to try to unlock it, but took from his pocket a small steel crowbar.

This was in two pieces, which screwed together.

They then formed a very formidable instrument.

Jonathan Wild inserted the point of this weapon in between the lid and the box, and, after some little trouble, succeeded in forcing it open.

When the lid was raised, it disclosed a quantity of papers.

Subduing whatever eagerness he might have felt to have turned these over hastily, Jonathan took them up one by one, and put them down again after having carefully examined them.

This was a rather tedious operation, but Jonathan Wild did not mind his trouble in the present instance, when so much of importance was at issue.

As the quantity of papers in the box diminished, however, Jonathan's anxiety increased in a corresponding degree.

His son was scarcely less anxious than himself.

There were many papers of great interest connected with the Donnull family, and Jonathan would gladly enough have perused them, only his impatience would not permit him to do more than take a casual glance at their contents.

At length, having almost emptied the box, the thief-taker espied, lying in the bottom of it, a small packet, carefully tied up with red tape.

It was just such a parcel as he conceived the papers he was in quest of would make.

He pounced upon it like a vulture.

He turned it over before he attempted to open it, but there was no superscription of any kind to give him an idea of its contents.

The red tape with which it was secured was sealed in many places with a large red seal.

This Jonathan examined, and found the impression to be the crest of the Donnull family.

His heart beat high with hope.

At last he thought he had the important papers, for which he so ardently sought, securely within his grasp.

He could scarcely command his impatience to open the envelope, which, being made of parchment, would not tear or give way in the least.

He was forced to open it in the proper way.

When the outer envelope was removed, Jonathan found there was an inner one, upon which appeared some writing.

Eagerly he attempted to decipher it, and called out to his son, with an oath, to direct all the beams of the lantern upon it.

The writing was very distinct.

The words were as follow:—

“I have instructed my solicitor, Mr. William Mudford, to deliver this packet into the hands of a police-magistrate in the event of the occurrence of certain circumstances. The fact of this packet being received will be sufficient evidence to show that the circumstances alluded to have taken place. It is my desire that the papers enclosed be carefully perused, in order that tardy justice may be done to the persecuted suffering one.”

Jonathan Wild read these words half-aloud, and Wild, junior, who looked over his shoulder, was scarcely able to follow him as he read.

As soon as he had finished, the thief-taker looked up into the countenance of his son.

Wild, junior, looked at him again, and then said—

“That looks remarkably like what you want, eh, guv'nor?”

“I have them at last,” said the thief-taker, in whose mind there did not remain any doubt as to whether the packet really contained the papers of which he desired to get possession.

He took that for granted.

“I shouldn't wonder if you have not got the right pig by the ear,” said Wild, junior; “but I would not make cock sure.”

“There is no doubt about the matter,” said the thief-taker; “the superscription is quite sufficient to set all doubts at rest.”

“It seems so. But I need not remind you, guv'nor, there's many a slip between the cup and the lip, so that if I was in your place I should not indulge in any hopes that might turn out to be false ones, but open the packet at once.”

There was generally sound common-sense in what George Wild said.

In the present instance his father felt the full force and weight of his remarks.

There was no fear of an interruption, and why should he not seize upon the present opportunity to ascertain whether the packet really contained the papers he thought it did or not.

[JONATHAN WILD MAKES A PROPOSITION TO BLUESKIN.]

It would be better to feel quite confident upon the point, though. Until his son spoke, it had never occurred to Jonathan that there could be the slightest doubt.

Now, such could hardly be the case.

The inner envelope was merely a paper one, so the thief-taker had little or no difficulty in tearing it open.

It contained several papers, all neatly folded up to the same size, and tied round the middle with red tape.

Each paper appeared to have its contents labelled upon it outside.

The topmost one attracted Wild's instant attention.

The words written upon it were these—

"A confession of the means by which I removed the infant heiress to the Donnull estates, and took possession of them myself; together with other matters connected with Jonathan Wild, of whose villanies there is a full exposure."

"Well, I'm d—d, guv'nor," ejaculated George, "you have lighted on a sure thing at last, eh? Just what I told you. What's the next paper?"

Jonathan turned them over rapidly.

"We will not stop to read them now," he said. "They are certainly the papers I require."

"You are sure of that?"

"Oh! yes."

"That's all right. Didn't you say you wanted the will?"

"Yes."

"Is that among the papers in the packet?"

Jonathan once more turned them over, one by one.

"No," he said, at length. "The will does not appear to be there."

"I should think it's rather important you should have it, guv'nor."

"Highly important."

"So I think. Just look about you. We are more likely to find it here than anywhere else."

Jonathan consented to this, and consigned the packet of papers to his pocket.

One or two more documents remained in the bottom of the tin box, and these Jonathan took up carefully, in the hope each time of finding what he sought.

But each time, after a brief examination of the paper, he was forced to put it down disappointed.

The interest which Wild, junior, took in this affair was really most intense, but no doubt he had some peculiar object in view.

Time, however, will determine.

At last there remained but one paper in the box, and that Wild was certain, by the very appearance which it presented, was not the will.

Nevertheless, he took up the paper and read the inscription.

He was disappointed.

It was of not the slightest value to him; nor was it even remotely connected with the matter in hand.

"No go, guv'nor," said George.

"No, it is not there."

"And are you sure it is not among the papers you have taken out and put on the table?"

"Oh! yes. Besides, you looked at them as well as myself."

"I know I did."

"I don't think, then, that we are very likely to have overlooked it."

"No; and yet such a thing might have been. Look here, guv'nor. I'll tell you what we'll do."

"What?"

"Why, put the papers back into the box again, one by one, and then I should think we should be quite sure."

"It would be no harm to do so."

"None at all."

Jonathan Wild at once proceeded to act upon this hint.

He was not without a slight hope that the document had escaped his former search.

Each paper was now scrutinized with redoubled attention, but all in vain.

The last was put into the box, but no will could be found.

"That hope's gone, guv'nor. What shall we do now?"

"I know not. Give up the search."

"Not a bit of it. I have an idea."

"What is it?"

"If the will is in existence, I will wager my life the lawyer knows where it is to be found."

"Ah!"

"And, if so, we will threaten to blow his brains out if he does not discover it to us, and, rely upon it, we shall find the will."

"Of course," said Wild, and, as he spoke, he rushed across the office to the corner where Mr. Mudford had been deposited.

He uttered a cry of astonishment and rage, which was echoed by one from his son.

The lawyer had disappeared.

CHAPTER CCXCVIII.

JONATHAN WILD AND HIS SON FIND THEMSELVES SURROUNDED BY DANGER IN THE TEMPLE CHAMBERS.

FOR about the space of a moment, Jonathan Wild and his son gazed at each other with the most absolute amazement depicted on their countenances.

They could scarcely believe the evidence of their own senses.

By what magic could he have got away?

This question seemed a very difficult one, but, like a good many apparently difficult questions, the solution was easy enough.

The lawyer had been bound very hastily, but yet the thief-taker and his son thought securely.

Such, however, was not the case.

For one thing, they thought the lawyer's fright would be too great to permit him to make the least effort towards releasing himself.

Mr. Mudford, however, when he got a little calmer, resolved to try what could be done.

Now, Jonathan and his son were both too intently occupied in examining the contents of the two boxes to pay any attention to slight sounds, or even to hear them.

For the moment they forgot all about the lawyer.

He, however, quietly wriggled his arms about until he had freed them from the bonds by which they were confined.

When he once had his hands at liberty, the rest was perfectly easy.

The reader must not forget that Wild, junior, had overturned the lamp that was burning upon the table, and extinguished it.

This was a very favourable circumstance for the lawyer, since it was the means of preventing his movements being visible.

The light which came from the lamp was diffused all over the apartment, while that which came in through the lens of the dark lantern was concentrated into one beam of light.

This, while it allowed the two Wilds to see what they were about, plunged the remainder of the apartment into a profound darkness.

Such being the state of affairs, it is easy to conceive that the attorney, having got his hands at liberty, was not long in removing his other bonds.

He tore the handkerchief from his eyes, and removed the gag from his mouth.

He saw how intent the two masked intruders were upon the contents of the box, and he resolved upon the adoption of a particular line of conduct.

The door which led into the outer office was only a short distance from him.

It was ajar, too.

Towards this, then, he crawled inch by inch.

The floor of the office was covered with a thick matting, so that he made no noise whatever in his progress.

He reached the door, and quietly opened it wide enough to allow his body to pass through.

In fine, he managed to reach the outer door of the chambers unperceived.

To withdraw the bolt and then descend the stairs, with all the speed he was capable of making, were things that followed each other as a matter of course.

Rushing along the court, he reached the outer gates in the utmost disorder.

The porter who had admitted Wild had been in a state of the greatest perturbation ever since.

He did not refuse, however, to open the gates and allow Mr. Mudford to pass through.

That gentleman's idea was to run as fast as his legs would carry him in the direction of Bow-street, at which place he made sure of finding a constable.

Just as he was passing under Temple Bar he met three persons.

In the semi-darkness he recognised them.

They were Bow-street runners.

A few words served to make them acquainted with the aspect of affairs, and they requested Mr. Mudford to lead the way to his chambers with all speed, when, they assured him, they would soon capture the midnight intruders.

Comforted by this assurance—for there were papers of immense value and importance in the boxes, and he could not tell which particular box it was they had taken down—he hastened back, desirous of preventing them getting off with any documents in their possession.

The three constables and himself reached the outer door of the chambers just at the moment when Wild and his son discovered his absence.

Their position was more critical than they imagined.

The first impulse of both, as soon as they had recovered somewhat from their surprise, was to rush into the outer office, for they did not conceive it possible that the attorney had got any further than that.

As soon as they entered it, however, the door leading on to the landing at the top of the stairs was dashed open, and the officers entered the apartment.

They saw Jonathan and his son, and the precious pair saw them.

For a moment the great thief-taker was taken aback—so great did the suddenness of the attack surprise him.

But, recovering himself, he beat a precipitate retreat into the inner office, and, closing the door, bolted it after him.

He was only just in time, for the officers came with a tremendous rush against it, which threatened to burst it from its hinges.

By this time Jonathan as fully comprehended what had taken place as though he had been an eye-witness of the whole of it.

What was he to do?

Should he adopt the bold course of action of proclaiming at once who he was, and preferring a charge against the attorney of having treasonous papers in his possession?

That was his first idea, but he discarded it as soon as it was formed.

He wished to keep secret, if he possibly could, the fact of his having paid a visit to the Temple on that particular evening.

Accordingly having seen that all had been done towards securing the green-baize door that could be done, he looked all round him in search of some means of making his escape.

But none presented themselves.

He ran first to the window.

He saw that it commanded a view of the Temple-gardens, with the Thames beyond; but the distance to the ground was something alarming.

Nor could he see any means by which he could accomplish a descent.

In the meantime the police-officers hammered away at the door, and called upon them to surrender; but they made no attempt to break into the room.

They had two desperate men to deal with, they felt confident; and, having been assured that it was a matter of impossibility for them to leave the inner chamber, where they had sought refuge, they determined to imprison them, and despatched Mr. Mudford for reinforcements.

Had Jonathan Wild been aware of this, he would have set about making his escape with much greater coolness than he did.

A thorough examination of the room having failed to show him any means by which it could be left, he was, as a matter of course, driven back to the window.

As he looked down, he thought it impossible to reach the ground without running a much greater risk of breaking his neck than he felt inclined to do.

In this opinion he was well supported by his son.

Peering down, however, they perceived that the sill of the window below them, which was on the second floor, was rather a wide one.

Then, along the row of windows on the first floor, there was a balcony.

Now, Wild thought, if he could only gain the window-sill beneath him, he should be able to lower himself from that, and drop upon the balcony underneath.

Once there, to reach the ground would be an easy matter; and then, he thought, as soon as his feet touched the ground, he should be able to set pursuit at defiance.

He communicated this desperate scheme to his son, who, however much he may have disliked it, was compelled to accede to its adoption or remain where he was and be taken prisoner.

To this, it is almost needless to say, he had the strongest aversion.

With great speed and energy, Jonathan Wild tore down the two dingy red curtains which hung before the window, and tied them both together.

One end he fastened securely to the frame of the window, and the other end he lowered out, and was rejoiced to find it reach within a short distance only of the second-floor window-sill.

A struggle was near taking place as to who should descend first, but Wild, junior, had the good sense to give way, instead of prolonging their stay by a needless dispute, until the chance of making their escape was gone.

Jonathan Wild then got out of the window, and slowly lowered his body down the rope.

He felt giddy and sick when he thought how frail was the rope, which alone prevented him from being precipitated to the earth.

But Jonathan Wild was not destined to come to his death in that manner or on that occasion; and so, desperate and impossible as the achievement seemed, he reached the window-sill in safety.

The remainder of his task was, however, by no means easy.

He had to lower himself until his hands grasped the edge of the window-sill.

But he accomplished this; and then, hanging to the full length of his arms, he let go, and alighted on the balcony beneath.

By the time he had done that, his son had got down almost the whole length of the curtain.

The police-officers in the next room must have had some suspicion of what was taking place, for they flung open the window and looked out.

They caught sight of both in a moment; and, fearful they would escape them before assistance arrived, drew their pistols and fired.

The shots were not productive of any harm to Wild and his son in a personal sense, for they were not even scratched; but the report would have the effect of rousing all the inhabitants of that quiet spot.

Cursing their officiousness, Jonathan Wild clambered over the balcony, and dropped on to the ground.

He was joined in less than a moment by his son, who had been rendered extraordinarily expeditious by the shots.

He thought the next time a pistol was fired he might not escape so well.

He reached the ground unhurt, however.

But it was quite clear that the alarm was fast becoming general, for lights kept appearing with wondrous rapidity at the different casements.

Wild's troubles were not over yet.

They had escaped from the chambers, it is true, but they were still in the large mass of buildings known as the Temple.

The thief-taker did not require to be told that every avenue leading from the Temple would be guarded.

It was no good for him to think of making his exit by any of the ordinary gates.

But there was the river.

He thought he should be able to reach this some time before his pursuers.

Then there was a chance whether, at that hour of the night, he should be able to obtain a boat.

He did not, however, hesitate and consider long about this.

The river was his only resource, and he was driven to it.

He took his course in a direct line, heedless of the many obstacles that opposed themselves to such a mode of progress.

At length the terrace was reached.

The surface of the water looked dark and gloomy.

There were many boats upon it, just faintly distinguishable, but they were all on the opposite side, where they were moored.

Loud cries came from behind them, and, looking round, they saw a number of persons in full pursuit of them.

They seemed now to be in as great a difficulty as ever.

But Wild, recollecting that one end of the terrace must be very near the Temple-stairs, made his way towards it at full speed.

He had faint hopes of finding a boat there, and being able to hail it.

On reaching the east end of the terrace, he peered over, and fancied he could discern the outlines of a wherry, which was fastened by a chain to the stairs.

"There's no time to hail the boat, guv'nor," said Wild, junior. "They are too close behind us. How is the tide?"

"At the ebb."

"Very well, climb over the railing, and drop into the river. We must wade or swim to the boat, and cast off ourselves."

"Agreed. Come on."

Wild saw that this was about the best thing that could be done.

The rapidity with which both got over the spiked palings, and dropped into the muddy bed of the Thames, was really amazing.

The police-officers, seeing their prey after all about to slip through their fingers, made the utmost exertion to come up with them.

But, before they reached the end of the terrace, Wild and his son had both waded to the boat and got into it.

They were greeted with a loud shout from some one who already occupied the boat.

It was the boatman, who had gone to sleep in the bottom of it.

This cry had the effect of pointing out the whereabouts of the fugitives to the officers.

They fired a volley in the direction, but, unheeding it, Wild and his son cast off, and, by means of a dozen strokes, got so far out into the stream as to set pursuit at defiance.

CHAPTER CCXCIX.

SHOWS HOW JONATHAN WILD AND HIS SON REACHED HOME IN SAFETY, AND HOW THE LATTER OUTWITTED THE FORMER.

THE boatman was quite at a loss to understand what was the meaning of the events then in progress, but Jonathan adopted a ready means of reaching his understanding.

He took from his pocket a purse, which he put into the hands of the waterman, saying as he did so—

"That purse contains at least ten guineas. Take it—it is yours. All you have got to do in return is just to sit still in the boat, without making a noise!"

The boatman comprehended these words.

Indeed, they were spoken in too clear and emphatic a tone for there to be the least possibility of their being mistaken.

Moreover, there was the purse, which he clutched eagerly in his hand, for the man was poor, and ten pounds seemed to him like an inexhaustible fortune.

He remained quiet and still, then, as he was bid.

Both the thief-taker and his son knew how to handle an oar with dexterity, so they took one each.

They now felt quite safe, for the boat they had secured was the only one within sight.

Such being the case, Jonathan did not feel disposed to exert himself or to remain on the water.

He directed the course of the boat to the next landing-place down the stream.

This he reached in a few moments, and, leaping out of the boat, they left the waterman to make the best he could of his unexpected good fortune.

With all the speed they were capable of, they made their way towards Newgate-street, and reached the door of the thief-taker's house unmolested and in safety.

Jonathan Wild was highly delighted with the result of his evening's excursion, and his spirits underwent a corresponding elevation.

His good temper was increased when, on entering, he was assured by Quilt Arnold that all was well, and that no circumstance whatever of an alarming character had taken place.

Having assured himself of this, he went upstairs, accompanied by his son, and had a glass and a pipe together in the sanctum.

Here they talked over their night's achievements.

Jonathan was getting more pleased with his son every day, and he felt inclined to trust him more and more.

On the present occasion he gave him an insight into all his intended future proceedings, not a word of which was lost upon his hearer.

Just as day was beginning to break they separated, and both sought some repose, for it was impossible for them not to feel their fatigue.

Not a word had been said by either about the papers.

George took good care not to do so, and his father never mentioned them.

But upon entering his bed-chamber, Wild, junior, locked the door, and said—

"What a d—d fool the gov'nor must be to trust me like he does! However, I can't help it. It's no concern of mine. We shall see how things turn out. First, however, I will find a hiding-place for these."

As he uttered these words, he drew from his coat-pocket the packet of papers Jonathan had been at such trouble to obtain, and which he felt so much elation at being in possession of.

"He hasn't discovered his loss yet," said George, as he turned the package over and over in his hands. "That just proves the truth of what I have so often said. It shows what a d—d fool he is. Now, if I had been him, and had got these papers, I should have looked in my pockets every five minutes to be sure that they were safe."

He paused.

"However, here they are, and I mean to take good care of them, too. They are of vast importance, there can be no sort of mistake about that; and it is my duty, of course, to make the most of them that I possibly can."

With these words on his lips, Wild, junior, looked round the apartment in search of some place that would be suitable to hide the packet of papers.

How and when he had managed to obtain possession of them, heaven only knows.

He must have taken advantage of some moment when his father's pre-occupation was extreme to abstract them from the pocket into which they had been somewhat carelessly thrust.

At any rate, he held in his hands those papers which were so vital to the interest of Edgworth Bess.

He held in his hands a full confession of Lord Donnnull's guilt, from first to last, including all the dealings he had had with the thief-taker.

We have seen that Jonathan Wild and his son were both under the impression that the packet had been left with Mr. Mudford, with instructions that he should open it in case Lord Donnnull did not make his appearance within some specified time.

But such was scarcely the case.

Lord Donnnull's instructions when he left the packet with the attorney were these.

The packet was not to be opened until he (Mr. Mudford) had received proof of Lord Donnnull's death, and that, when that occurred, the packet was to be taken to one of the chief police-magistrates.

So that a great deal of the alarm which the thief-taker felt was groundless.

George Wild looked round and round the room several times before he could find a place suitable for his purpose.

He was thus engaged, and quite undecided, when his ears were saluted with a terrific yell, which a stranger would have declared came from the throat of some ferocious denizen of the forest.

But George knew better.

"The devil!" he ejaculated, "he's found out his loss now! What on earth shall I do with this packet?"

He looked round once more, but without being able to find an answer to his question.

He was convinced that there was no time to be lost, for he could hear a heavy footstep approaching.

"That's the gov'nor," he said. "I must put it somewhere, that's certain. Perhaps this will do."

He turned down the bed-clothes as he spoke, and thrust the package between the sheets.

He had scarcely done so, and returned the bed to its ordinary appearance, when his bed-room door was flung open, and his respected parent stalked in.

The countenance of the great thief-taker was something terrible to look upon.

Even his son was appalled.

It was distorted by the most fiendish rage.

He made one rush forward, and clutched his son tightly by the throat.

Then, while he held him in that position, he cried—

"Confess, villain! confess at once! What have you done with the packet of papers? Tell me, or I will twist your villainous head off!"

Wild, junior, glared at his father with well-affected amazement.

He made one effort to speak, but the pressure upon his throat was too great to allow him to do so.

Blinded with rage as he was, Jonathan saw this, and slightly relaxed his grip.

"Tell me!" he yelled, at the same moment. "What have you done with those papers?"

"Me?" said Wild, junior, with the utmost astonishment portrayed in his tone and manner.

"Yes, you."

"Why, gov'nor, you must be mad."

"Do not patter with me, villain. Your life hangs upon a thread."

"No, d—n it, gov'nor; easy does it!"

"Curses! Do not think of imposing upon me any longer. I know you—know you for a venomous reptile, which I have warmed in my bosom until it has turned round and stung me."

"Oh! d—n it, gov'nor, you're mad! Let go my throat, I say! Murder! Help!"

"Silence!" cried the thief-taker, fiercely.

"Silence be d—d! Do you think I am such a fool as to allow you to take my life without opening my mouth?"

He struggled violently as he spoke, and succeeded in getting free from the thief-taker's grasp.

But this result was not so much due to his superior strength or courage as it was to the fact that Jonathan's rage was beginning to cool a little.

Wild, junior, however, hastened to place the bed between him and his exasperated parent; and when he had entrenched himself in this tolerably secure position he said—

"Now, guv'nor, take it easy, and just tell us what is the matter. I don't understand your manner. Do you mean to say you have lost that packet of papers you found at the lawyer's?"

"Yes, and no one is better acquainted with the fact than yourself. You have taken them. You know it, so do not attempt to deny it."

"Don't be a d—d fool, guv'nor—don't be a d—d fool. Just as if it was likely that I should take the papers. What good would they be to me?"

"If you haven't taken them, who has?"

"How should I know, guv'nor? Come, now, don't be a fool. I can't believe what you say."

"What?"

"That you have lost the papers."

"I have."

"Are you sure?"

"Quite certain."

"Then it's a d—d unlucky circumstance, that's all I can say about it."

Jonathan Wild looked keenly at his son.

The words he had just uttered were spoken with such well-assumed surprise and regret that anyone would be deceived.

Wild was himself, and he was one not easily taken in.

It was the off-hand way in which Wild, junior, had uttered the last sentence that baffled him.

Finding him silent, George put on a look of still greater consternation as he said, in a serious tone—

"Is it really possible, guv'nor, that you have lost those papers?"

"Don't I tell you I have?"

"I could hardly believe it! Perhaps you are mistaken, guv'nor? Look in your pockets again."

"It's no good; the papers are gone."

Wild, junior, followed this announcement with a long, low whistle, and sat down on the edge of the bed.

He saw that his father's suspicions were fast disappearing.

"And when you discovered your loss, guv'nor, do you really mean to say that you thought I had taken them?"

"I did. I could have staked my life of it."

"Then, if you had laid the wager, you would be looking rather queer just now, eh? You should be more careful, guv'nor. Why, what good would the papers be to me?"

"Oh! I don't know."

"Then you prove how absurd your suspicions were. But, never mind, guv'nor, I feel that I can forgive you for it. When you made that discovery, I don't wonder at your becoming unconscious of what you were about."

Jonathan was silent, and sank down on the other side of the bed.

"To think," he ejaculated, half-aloud and half to himself—"to think that I had those important papers securely in my grasp, after having taken such a deal of trouble to obtain possession of them, and then to lose them!"

"Damnably vexatious, guv'nor! But stop, now!"

"What is it?"

"When did you discover your loss?"

"A minute ago. I threw myself down, but could not rest or close my eyes. I then bethought myself of the papers, and resolved to become acquainted with their contents. I put my hand into my pocket, where I had placed them, but they were gone."

"How vexing! When did you feel them last?"

"When did I feel them last?"

"Yes."

Jonathan passed his hand over his bald head in an absent fashion.

He was trying to remember.

But he could not.

"Curse it!" he said, at length. "I put them in my pocket securely, as I thought."

"And you have not felt them since?"

"I cannot recollect doing so."

"Nor do I. It's not to be wondered at, when you consider how we were surprised, and what trouble we had to get off."

"A thousand curses!"

"It's no good cursing, guv'nor. But I think it's rather too bad of you to be so ready to accuse me. It's very disheartening to be wrongfully suspected. Now, you see, you put the papers into your pocket, and never thought to look or feel whether they were safe until after you had laid down, and then, when you found they had gone, you jumped up in a moment, and accused me of stealing them. It's too bad, d—n me if it isn't!"

Jonathan listened to this outburst of indignation, and forgot his suspicions.

"What shall I do, George?" he cried. "My position is now ten thousand times worse than before. If I have lost the packet, as I fear I have, it will be found—its contents will be examined, and then, farewell to the best scheme that the brain of man ever conceived!"

"It's damnably aggravating!" said George, "for I quite intended to have a pick off that bone myself! It is to be hoped that you lost the infernal papers while you were on the Thames, and that they have sunk to the bottom!"

"I must think, I must think," said the thief-taker, as he rose from his seat and went towards the door of the apartment. "Good night, George. I must have some sleep; I shall be able to think better then."

As he spoke, Jonathan left the room, closing the door behind him.

As it closed, George Wild's face gradually expanded into a grin of satisfaction.

CHAPTER CCC.

REVERTS PARTICULARLY TO THE PROCEEDINGS OF BLUESKIN IN WILD'S HOUSE.

WE imagine the reader will be easily able to conceive how great was the thief-taker's dismay and consternation upon discovering the loss of the papers.

It was rather strange that his first suspicions should be so correct.

Now, however, he was completely thrown off the track; for, by his cunning behaviour, George had succeeded in clearing himself.

Jonathan felt the need of sleep.

But, with his brain in such a whirl as it was at that moment—with his thoughts so terribly distracted as they were—how was he to hope for repose?

Nevertheless, he flung himself upon his bed, and tossed and tumbled about, until, at length, his body becoming thoroughly weary, he dropped off into an uneasy slumber. There we will leave him.

It is, we think, high time that we turned our attention to Blueskin, of whom, lately, only casual mention has been made.

He had the prudence to obey all Mr. Snoxall's injunctions, and found himself rapidly getting better.

But he was careful to conceal this as much as possible.

He was quite certain that, so soon as Jonathan found he was getting up his strength, he would be removed from the chamber he now occupied to some place of much greater strength and security.

His intentions were, then, simple enough.

He would do all he could to recover from his hurts as quickly as possible, but yet conceal his progress towards convalescence.

Then, when he felt his strength was equal to the task, he would endeavour to make his escape.

It was, however, a matter of great difficulty to deceive Mr. Snoxall with regard to his recovery.

But he feigned sickness as well as he could.

After the interview, which we have already described as taking place between him and Jonathan Wild, he remained for some time in deep thought.

It was not, however, that he hesitated about rejecting the proposal.

He simply tried to fathom Jonathan's policy.

In this manner he passed away the time until night came.

That night which Jonathan spent in Lord Donnull's house in Piccadilly.

As the different objects in the room began to grow confused and indistinct with the approaching darkness, he resolved not to delay any longer making an effort to escape.

He felt stronger and much better than he had done.

He had the prudence to lie still until Mr. Snoxall paid his last visit, which was generally just about nightfall. But it so happened that he was later than usual.

As he waited for him to come, Blueskin tossed and tumbled upon the bed and worked himself up into a fever of impatience.

At last Mr. Snoxall came.

"You have been exciting yourself," he said, the moment he saw his patient. "That is wrong; you must keep yourself quiet, or you will have a dangerous relapse."

To this Blueskin made no reply.

As soon, however, as Mr. Snoxall withdrew, he sat upright in bed, and listened.

He heard him descend the stairs with his usual deliberate tread.

After that all was still.

He waited five minutes longer.

Then he sprang out of bed.

The moment his feet touched the floor, and his body assumed an upright position, such a sudden accession of faintness came over him that he was scarcely able to save himself from falling heavily to the floor.

Probably nothing but the consciousness that if he did so the whole house would be aroused, and his scheme of escape defeated, would have enabled him to rally from it.

But he did rally.

He felt giddy and sick, and sat down on the edge of the bed.

By degrees, however, he recovered himself, and slowly began to attire himself.

All this time he was in profound darkness.

When he had put on his last article of apparel he felt much better.

Having accomplished so much as he had acted as a kind of stimulus upon him.

With a better heart he turned to a consideration of how he was to leave the chamber.

The door, he knew, was not only of great strength, but hampered on the outside with almost every imaginable style of fastening.

He turned away from it without a hope of doing any good in that direction, for he was also aware that a man kept watch outside both by day and night.

The window presented him with scarcely any better hopes.

It was small in size, strongly barred on the outside, and at a considerable distance from the ground.

But that was the only other means by which egress could be had from the chamber.

To a sick man, whose body had been almost drained of blood, these looked like insurmountable obstacles.

But Blueskin did not think them such.

He opened the window easily enough, for it was not fastened except by a little button.

Indeed, every reliance seemed to be placed upon the iron bars without; for during his sickness the window had, by Mr. Snoxall's instructions, frequently been opened.

The gush of cool air that, on the present occasion, came through the iron bars, refreshed Blueskin exceedingly, and seemed to re-invigorate his whole frame.

He took hold of one of the horizontal iron bars and strove to shake it in its setting.

But the effort was altogether a vain one.

The bar did not move in the slightest perceptible degree.

Without any tools, how was a man in Blueskin's state to hope to remove them?

And when he had done so, how was he to escape?

There was but one means, and that was to stand upon the window-sill, take hold of the parapet, and draw himself up on to the roof.

But surely there must have been some traces of delirium about his brain, or he would surely never have contemplated the performance of so desperate a feat.

However, he felt in his pockets, for he was not without a hope that they had been left unsearched.

But they had been cleared of everything they contained, with the exception of one article, and that probably had been left because its size was so small, or because it was thought valueless.

It was nothing but a crooked piece of steel.

With this ineffective implement Blueskin hoped to effect a great deal.

He began, with great patience and perseverance, to pick out the mortice in which the end of one of the iron bars was imbedded.

It was a tedious operation.

Bit by bit, however, the hard mortar was dislodged, until at last he was able, by an exertion of the utmost strength he possessed, to get out one end.

A very great deal, he told himself, was now accomplished, and with renewed spirits he set himself to work.

Now that one end of the bar was cleared, he was able to work it slowly backwards and forwards, until at length he bent it back altogether.

It stood out at right angles to the wall.

It now occurred to him that, if he could pursue the same course with the other bars, they would very materially aid him in making his way on to the roof.

This thought was a fresh encouragement to him to proceed.

But from time to time a dizziness and faintness came over him, which but too truly told that he was overtaxing his strength.

Each time, however, that he experienced this sensation, he shook it off.

It returned, however, again and again, and with less interval on every occasion.

Still he continued at his labour.

At length the one end of the last bar was released, and bent back into the same position as its predecessors.

A series of rude steps were then presented, up which it was possible to climb.

But Blueskin was now terribly exhausted.

The perspiration poured off him in streams, and he drew his breath in short and fitful gasps.

Clouds of blood seemed floating before his eyes.

Still, rendered desperate by the prospect of liberty so temptingly laid out before him, he made one more effort to summon his fleeting breath and get upon the window-sill.

The first attempt he made was an utter failure.

The strength seemed to have wholly deserted his arms.

There was a terrible tightness about his heart when he made this discovery.

What should he do?

He tried to shake off the deadly lassitude which had seized upon him.

He made one more effort to mount the window-sill.

This time he succeeded.

Animated by this partial success, he tried to take the next step towards liberty.

But here our hero found his strength deserted him.

Again came over him that awful sensation of faintness and strengthlessness.

He swayed to and fro upon the window-sill like a drunken man.

He seemed in the most imminent danger of falling into the street.

He made feeble and ineffectual attempts to grasp at different objects.

Each time unsuccessfully.

His fingers were unable to make use of their prehensile qualities.

He uttered a gasping sob, and then, unconscious of everything, fell backwards on the floor of the room, his head coming into terrible contact with the boards.

Had that feeling seized him when he swayed in the other direction—that is, forwards instead of backwards—he must have fallen into the street.

No earthly power could have saved him.

The noise of his fall reached the ears of the man on guard outside.

He instantly raised an alarm, in accordance with the instructions he had received.

Quilt Arnold hurried upstairs; and, on the door being thrown open, Blueskin was found in the condition we have described.

At first they thought he was dead, for they were unable to discover any signs of vitality.

Mr. Snoxall was immediately sent for, and, when he arrived, he immediately set about recovering his patient, whom he found in a state of unconsciousness, not death.

But his condition was now rendered extremely critical by this relapse.

He was once more brought to the very brink of the grave.

The reader will, perhaps, remember that, on his return from Lord Donnull's mansion in Piccadilly, which was on the evening succeeding these events, Jonathan had gone upstairs to inquire after his prisoner's condition.

He was met on the threshold of the room by the apothecary, who held up his finger enjoining silence.

Jonathan was surprised to learn that Blueskin was so much worse.

He was in hopes to find he had recovered sufficiently to warrant his being taken to the cells.

But, when he saw Blueskin extended on the bed, and looking for all the world like a corpse, he abandoned the idea.

Quilt Arnold had repaired to some extent the damage Blueskin had done, and Mr. Snoxall did not think of it to acquaint him with all the particulars of the affair just at present.

Then, as for Wild himself, he was fully occupied with his new project, so he did not pay so much attention as probably at another time he would have done.

On the day following the loss of the papers, however, Jonathan was made acquainted with the full particulars of Blueskin's attempt to escape.

This made him terribly uneasy.

If the papers had slipped through his fingers, he was determined that Blueskin should not do so.

Let the risk be what it might, he resolved to place him in some place of greater security; and, in spite of all Mr. Snoxall's remonstrances, Blueskin was forthwith carried to the cells.

The reader may be sure that Jonathan Wild took care that it should be the strongest of the lot.

He allowed him a plentiful supply of straw for a bed, but took good care to have his limbs so chained that he could only move very slightly.

It was in vain Mr. Snoxall exclaimed against this, and declared how injurious it was to the health of prisoner.

Jonathan turned a deaf ear to all.

He was intent only upon keeping him safe.

This there seemed every likelihood of his being able to do.

Even Blueskin, stronghearted and resolute as he was, lost all hope.

He was in the clutches of the thief-taker, and held so fast that it was impossible to get out.

But his chief anxiety was not so much for himself nor for the peril of his situation.

It was for Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess, who, ignorant of his fate, must be suffering a thousand terrible apprehensions.

Mr. Snoxall still continued his attendance, and, though his case had seemed so desperate, Blueskin showed unequivocal signs of rapid recovery.

This intelligence was, of course, duly conveyed to the thief-taker by the apothecary.

CHAPTER CCCI.

JONATHAN WILD PAYS BLUESKIN A VISIT IN HIS CELL, AND MAKES A STARTLING PROPOSITION TO HIM.

HAD he not been so unlucky as to lose the packet of papers, Jonathan would have considered that at last he had succeeded in his nefarious schemes.

Blueskin was his prisoner, and, ere long, he was confident of capturing Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess.

The papers, however, had disappeared.

During the day which succeeded the night upon which he had lost them, Jonathan suffered an agony of apprehension.

He dreaded every moment to hear the intelligence that they had been found, and their contents made public.

Was such to be the case, there would, of course, be an end to his daring attempt to obtain possession of the Donnull estates and title, for Jonathan had dared to covet that too, small as was his chance of success.

The day passed away, however, and the next night came, without any such unwelcome intelligence reaching his ears.

But even this, though it may sound strange to say so, was productive of discomfort and uneasiness of mind.

It was clear the papers had not been lost either in the lawyer's chambers, in the Temple-gardens, or on his way home after leaving the boat.

Had they been dropped in either of these places, he was quite confident they must have been found by some one.

And, when found, the character of the papers was of such a startling character as to insure their being made public.

But this was not so, or he would have heard something long ere this.

In this manner he was driven back to the suggestion of his son, who had hinted they might have been lost in the Thames.

But, somehow, Jonathan could not bring himself to think this.

Of all the places he had been in, this was the least likely for them to be lost.

To be sure, they might have fallen into the boat; but if so, they would have been found by the waterman.

As he pursued these reflections, Jonathan felt the suspicions he had at first entertained of his son having purloined them rapidly return, and with a stronger sense of conviction than before.

He was no stranger to the advantages which would accrue to his son, should he really have them in his possession.

He did not so much dread that he would use them against him, as he did that he would obtain a kind of mastery over him.

The more Jonathan pondered over it, the more likely it seemed.

"I will notice whether there is any alteration in his behaviour," he muttered; "whether he will treat me as though he thought I was in his power. If he does, then I shall know that he has the papers, and it will be no hard task to obtain possession of them again, and then I should be able to make him smoke for it!"

Having come to this resolution, Jonathan wisely made up his mind to abide the issue of events.

"I will see Blueskin," he exclaimed, after a few minutes' thought; "he must surely be by this time reduced to the greatest abjection! If so, it will be all the easier for me to succeed with him. But matters are now, I feel convinced, coming to a crisis, and I am determined to bring the matter to an end somehow or other!"

He rose from the chair upon which he had been sitting as he spoke, and, going to the cupboard by the side of the fireplace, produced a torch, of which he had a large bundle.

At one time, when he paid a visit to the prisoners in the cells, he had always taken a dark lantern with him.

But latterly he had found this did not give light sufficient to satisfy him.

This was owing to the impureness of the air in the cells, which did not permit the wick of the lamp to combust properly.

With the torch, however, he got on much better.

In a pure atmosphere they gave out a great glare of light, and though in the dungeons their lustre was much diminished, still they diffused sufficient light to enable him to see with distinctness about him.

Being thus provided, the thief-taker lighted the torch and proceeded to the dungeons.

His heavy tread awakened many dismal echoes in that subterraneous region.

They aroused Blueskin from a kind of half-dozed into which he had fallen.

He slowly and painfully raised himself up on one arm.

The heavy footstep paused outside the door of his dungeon.

He recognised the heavy step.

He knew it was the thief-taker, who was about to pay him a visit.

He nerved himself for the worst.

One by one the numerous heavy fastenings were undone.

The door was flung open.

Then there was a glare of light which, after the darkness of his dungeon, was so brilliant that Blueskin had to close his eyes.

He was unable to look upon it.

But anxiety to know what was going to take place would not allow him to keep them shut, and when he opened them, he blinked like some nocturnal animal disturbed by alight.

Dimly and imperfectly he saw the form of his persecutor.

Jonathan Wild, on this occasion, thought fit to assume what he considered a highly facetious manner.

He entered the cell with a jaunty step, and, going close up to Blueskin, held the torch within about a couple of inches of his face.

Blueskin shrunk back as far as he could, but that was only a short distance, for the chains effectually prevented him from moving far.

"You don't look well, my friend," said Wild, with mock joviality in his tones, and which grated terribly upon the ears of the prisoner, who made no reply.

"But you will soon be better, I know," continued Wild. "Just wait a moment, I have got something I want to say to you."

"If it is to repeat the proposal you made to me the other day, you may as well save yourself the trouble. You can take my answer now."

Jonathan Wild affected not to hear this speech, but busied himself in sticking the torch in an iron ring that was fastened in the wall.

In this position it diffused a light over the limited area of the cell.

Going to one corner of it, Jonathan produced what Blueskin did not know was there.

It was a small, three-legged stool.

But he might well be in ignorance of its presence, for the darkness of the cell was profound.

Jonathan brought this to about the centre of the dungeon.

Then, placing it there, he sat himself down upon it.

For a moment or two he looked at his prisoner in silence.

Blueskin presented but a sorry spectacle.

It grieves us to have to describe our old friend in such a plight.

His head was bandaged up, and a great deal of his hair cut away.

This gave him an unnatural and terrible appearance.

His face was white and bloodless.

His eyes dull and sunken.

His cheeks forming two great hollows, leaving the jaws distinctly visible.

His whole form was wasted and emaciated.

To use a common expression, he was but the shadow of his former self.

Then his clothes were torn, and ragged, and soaked with blood from top to bottom.

Indeed, it would not be possible for the imagination to picture a more wretched-looking object than Blueskin now was.

Jack Sheppard would scarcely have known him.

He was very weak, and the fetters he had on weighed him down, but still he managed to find strength enough to raise himself up on one arm and look into the countenance of thief-taker, where, however, there was neither pity nor compassion visible.

On the contrary, he seemed to rejoice at the terrible appearance which Blueskin now presented, for his face was distorted into a grin of hideous derision.

He repeated his former speech in the same disagreeable tones.

"You don't look well, my friend, and I am sadly afraid that the atmosphere of this cell will not agree with you; but I suppose you don't mind that, as you are here of your own free will.

To this taunting speech Blueskin returned no reply, but still fixed his eyes upon the countenance of his tormentor.

"Oh! you won't speak. Well, never mind, I suppose you mean that I am to take your silence for consent. Well, it seems strange that anyone should lie here in a place of this sort from choice. But strange things happen every day."

"Why do you mock me, Jonathan Wild?"

"Oh! you have found your tongue at last, have you? I am glad to hear it. Let's hear you talk a bit."

"Jonathan Wild!"

"What?"

"I am at a loss to think what can have brought you to this cell. Surely you have some better occupation than to come here and jeer and taunt me while I am powerless to resent your insults!"

"Ha! ha!"

"That laugh is unmeaning. Jonathan Wild, you have got to deal with one who knows you as well as yourself; and therefore all these little artifices, in which you so delight, although they might have an effect upon some, are quite powerless upon me."

"I see, my friend, you are a great deal better than I thought you were, and I rejoice in such a circumstance. I am prepared for you this time, however. It's no good your trying to get out of this place."

And Jonathan glanced round at the stone walls of the cell triumphantly, as though he would defy anyone to break through them.

Blueskin did not think proper to reply in any way to this speech or this look.

Wild continued.

But he spoke in a different tone, and with a different manner.

"Look here, Blueskin," he said; "you told me just now that you knew me. Well, I daresay you do. You have had, in past time, plenty of opportunities of studying my character. So much the better if you do know me, Blueskin. So much the better. We shall come to an understanding with each other all the sooner."

"We shall come to no understanding whatever."

"You think so."

"I do."

"Then I differ from you. Listen."

"I am compelled to do so, willingly or unwillingly."

"As you remark, you are compelled to listen to me. Now, you boast that you know me. I do not deny it; but, if so, you must also possess this one piece of knowledge—when I say a thing I always keep my word!"

But Blueskin still remained silent.

"Why don't you speak?" at length roared the thief-taker.

"What must I say?"

"Answer me."

"What?"

"Do I or do I not keep my word?"

"You make a boast that you do."

"And do I not?"

"When you are able, no doubt."

"But I am able."

Blueskin was again silent.

"You think to provoke me by maintaining this silence."

"I have nothing to talk about."

"Why do you not answer me?"

"I do."

"Come, come, Blueskin, we shall never get on like this. I want to have a few minutes' chat with you. Why should we be foes, like we lately have been? You see it has resulted in no good to yourself."

"If you are going to repeat your former proposal, you may as well spare your trouble. My mind remains unaltered. My resolve is the same."

"Fair and softly—fair and softly. I only submitted one side of the question. You must look at it in two lights."

"There is no necessity."

"But I say there is."

"How so?"

"My proposal to you was this. You are my prisoner—helplessly my prisoner. Now, upon certain conditions, I am willing, not only to set you at liberty, but also to restore you to that position which you but recently occupied in my household. There you were in comfort and in safety."

Blueskin turned over on his straw impatiently.

Jonathan continued.

"The simple conditions which I mentioned were, that you should discover to me the whereabouts of Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Besz, and aid me in the designs which I have formed against them."

"And do you think, Jonathan Wild," exclaimed Blueskin, in furious tones, "do you think that I am such a monstrous villain as to doom my comrade to an ignominious death, and be instrumental in depriving a poor persecuted girl of her just inheritance? No, Jonathan Wild. Ten thousand times no!"

[JONATHAN WILD'S SON SECRETING THE LORD DONMULL'S PAPERS.]

CHAPTER CCCII.

JONATHAN WILD THREATENS BLUESKIN WITH THE CONSEQUENCES OF HIS REFUSAL.

BLUESKIN pronounced these words with such tremendous energy that he made the vaulted dungeon ring again, and Jonathan Wild shrank back with something like surprise visible upon his countenance.

But, as soon as he had spoken, the factitious vigour with which he had been inspired suddenly left him, and Blueskin fell back upon the straw as though dead.

Jonathan did not move hand or foot; and, his first surprise over, he sat calmly upon his stool looking at him.

Blueskin's swoon was only a partial one, and he soon recovered himself from the effects of it.

As soon as he felt himself able, he raised himself again, and, looking his tormenter in the face, said, with as much calmness as he could assume—

"Jonathan Wild, cease to torment me upon this theme. You know my determination, and I shall not depart from it. My mind is firmly made up."

"Oh! it is, is it?" said Wild, mocking the tone of voice in which he spoke.

"It is."

"Very well, then; that will do."

"I rejoice to hear you say so, and I hope you will be good enough to leave me."

"Oh! dear no; we can't part yet, my friend. I have not said all I intended to say to you, and I can't go away till I have. Just listen."

"I am compelled to do so."

"So you said before, and uncommonly true the remark is. Now pay attention, as you must be aware there are two sides to every question."

"If there were a thousand sides to your proposal, my determination would still remain unaltered."

"Oh! indeed. Well, now, I differ from you there entirely. When I made you the proposition, I told you what advantages would accrue to you if you accepted it."

"Advantages?"

"Yes; but I did not tell you what would be the consequences of your refusal."

"Nor need you."

"So you think, perhaps; but I will tell you just the same."

And, as he spoke, Jonathan Wild assumed what he considered to be a very striking and highly effective attitude.

Leaning forward, he placed one elbow on his knee, and supported his head with one hand.

The other hand he allowed to rest in a negligent sort of manner upon his other knee.

In this position he leered into Blueskin's countenance, as he said—

"Blueskin, my friend—for such, when I think about the past, I cannot help calling you—Blueskin, my friend, you made a very egregious mistake when you thought proper to leave me and link yourself with my enemies. You have done no good since; whereas, if you had been content to remain with me, all would have gone on as well as before."

"Until I ceased to be of service to you."

"Now, Blueskin, my dear friend, don't talk like that. But I daresay the pain of your wound has an irritating effect upon your temper. I am afraid, too, that it confuses your mind, and disables you from seeing things as clearly as you ought to do."

"I understand sufficient."

"A delusion—a delusion. Now, I will tell you what I will do; for, really, if you will believe me, I should like to put an end to the dissensions between us."

"You can easily do so."

"How?"

"Cease to pursue Jack Sheppard and myself like you do, and no longer persecute the poor heiress."

"Ha! ha! An easy way, truly. No—no, my friend; the thing must be done in a different way to that—in an entirely different way. But this is what I shall have to do: I shall have to show you your exact position, which I am sure, by your behaviour, you cannot comprehend."

"There you are in error, Jonathan Wild."

"No, it is you who are in error, as I will quickly prove, if you will allow me the opportunity."

"I am not in a position to interfere with or prevent what you may intend to do."

"Oh! you acknowledge that, do you? Then, let me tell you that is an important admission—such a one as, candidly speaking, I did not think you would make. However, it is highly satisfactory for me to find that your intellects are not quite in such a state of confusion as I thought they were."

Blueskin moved uneasily.

Jonathan's manner galled him, as well as the fact that he was powerless to escape from being thus tormented.

Wild continued.

"Just have a look at the past. You know my way of carrying on business. In fact, you are acquainted with a great many of my secrets—I may say all, so far as trade is concerned. We got on well together. I found I could trust you and depend upon you, just as well as I could depend upon myself. I was liberal to you, and you were content. Thus, all went well, and to the mutual advantage of all persons. Now, Blueskin, answer me this, and answer me truly: have you ever been so comfortable since you quitted my employ, as you were before you did so?"

"Not bodily; for, in consequence of your inveterate hostility, I have had much to suffer; but then, I have had the consolation of an approving conscience."

"Bah! bah! bah!"

"You do not know what that is, Jonathan Wild, and, in all probability, you never will. But I do, and it has encouraged me to endure all the misery you have inflicted upon me."

"Now, Blueskin," said Wild, in an affected deprecatory manner, "do, for goodness' sake, talk sense. If you will only do so, I can get along; but when you talk about such d—d nonsense as approving conscience, you turn me sick. Listen."

"To what?"

"To what I was saying when you flew off at a tangent. You admitted, however, that you had never been comfortable since you set yourself up in opposition to me."

"The opposition came from you, not from us. We would willingly have let you alone, but you would not allow us to do so."

"But you forget, Blueskin, that you interfered with my plans—that, in fact, you interrupted my choicest scheme."

"That of robbing an unprotected girl of the wealth and title which should belong to her. A feat well worthy of you, truly!"

"No matter; you interfered, and you perceive the consequences. You have gained nothing by your opposition; on the contrary, you have lost everything. There was the matter of Jack Sheppard. Curse the fellow! It is he who has caused all this trouble, and I hate him for it! You brought him to me, as I believe, thinking that he would serve me; but, instead of that, how has he behaved? and then, when he rebelled, you sided with him."

"And should do so again under the same circumstances."

"Then I lament your want of sense."

"You may do so."

"I do. But enough of that. I say you joined him, and set yourself up against me. How foolish must such a proceeding be upon your part! As though you two could contend with any amount of success against anyone so powerful as I am!"

"You overrate yourself."

"Not so; events will prove that I do not. As yet, who has been best off in the contest?"

"You have not succeeded."

"But I can easily do so. At any rate, I have you in my power, so wholly that it is impossible for you to be extricated from it. I can do with you just as I please. I could slay you at this moment, if it answered my purpose to do so, and you would not be able to so much as raise your arm to ward off the fatal blow!"

"And why do you not strike it?"

"For reasons of my own, which, if you thought proper, you could easily become acquainted with."

"What are they?"

"All in good time. You are not prepared to hear them yet. Do you admit that you are wholly and utterly in my power?"

"I cannot deny it."

"Well, then, if such is the case, it appears I am in a position to dictate terms to you."

"Jonathan Wild," said Blueskin, "you are only beating about the bush. Whether it is with the intention of stultifying my intellects or not I know not, but your conversation comes to just the same point as before. You would offer me my freedom upon conditions, that I re-enter your service, and deliver Edgworth Bess and Jack Sheppard into your hands, for you to do with them as you may think fit."

Jonathan clapped his hands.

"Bravo, Blueskin!" he said. "Your brain is not half so muddled as I thought it was. You comprehend your position very well indeed."

"And am I right with regard to the proposal you would make me?"

"Perfectly right."

"Then, Jonathan Wild, I repeat what I said a short time ago. My answer is no; if necessary, a thousand times no!"

"Oh! indeed. You refuse?"

"Most certainly."

"Stop a moment. You have not taken all things into consideration. Believe me, the proposal is made out of the good feeling I have for you."

"Ha! ha!"

"You laugh."

"Yes, and so would anyone else who heard Jonathan Wild talk about having good feeling for anyone."

The thief-taker scowled.

"Blueskin," he said, "I am willing to spare your life if you are willing to have your life spared. Do you think that, if you refuse to assist me in capturing Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess, I should fail to do so? No! I merely mention that as a condition of your freedom, in order that I may be assured of your good faith. After that I should have no doubts, and once more take you into my confidence, as I did of old. I feel the want of you, or, at any rate, of some person upon whom I could rely."

"There is your son."

"I like him not! I like him not!"

Jonathan frowned darkly as he spoke.

Any allusion to his son always disturbed him, and on the present occasion his mind was tortured with the suspicious, which he could not dissipate, respecting the loss of the important packet of papers.

Blueskin noted the effect his words had upon him.

"Join me!" said Wild, chasing away all thoughts of his son; "join me! I promise you shall have no occasion to repent of having done so. Join me, I say! It will be the best for both of us."

"That I dispute."

"When you were at my right hand, I always succeeded in what I undertook, and never met with the vexatious disappointments which lately I have so frequently experienced; and now I cannot help thinking that you were in some mysterious way connected with my successes."

"Jonathan Wild!" said Blueskin; "hear me, once for all. It is impossible for me to join you again, or for us ever to assume our former position with respect to each other. Circumstances have made us foes, and such we must continue."

"Indeed!" said Wild; "then do you know what I shall do? You have confessed yourself in my power; and well you know that you are. You cannot save these two persons, and you cannot save yourself, unless you choose to subscribe to my conditions. Let me see; what is to-day? Oh! Saturday. Very good; that will do capitally. The sessions come on on Wednesday; you will be brought up; case against you; tried; found guilty, of course; sentence of death in due form; and you will be hanged on Monday morning!"

"Jonathan Wild!"

"What?"

"You have been talking a great deal about my being in your power; do you forget that you are in mine?"

Jonathan started.

But he quickly recovered his self-possession.

"In what way am I in your power?"

"Do you forget with what secrets of yours I am acquainted? When I am brought up for trial I will make a full confession of all your villainies!"

"Bah! bah! bah!"

"You may affect to despise me, but you will find I shall be as good as my word."

"So you may be! so you may be, and welcome! Tell all you like—it will make no difference to me. I am in remarkably good odour with the authorities just at present, and it does not matter what you say—all will be put down to the ravings of malice. If you think that gives you any power over me, you are deceived."

"Well, we shall see."

"So we shall, if we live long enough; but the term of your existence is rapidly drawing to a close, unless you choose to reverse your late determination; and I hardly think you will be fool enough to adhere to it."

"I shall adhere to it. Jonathan Wild, I defy you! Do your worst!"

"I shall keep my word. However, I am willing to give you one more chance for escape. I will come and see you again on Monday. Until then, you can occupy yourself in reflecting over your position; you will have nothing else to do."

"You may as well take your answer now."

"I do; but still, for all that, I shall allow you an opportunity of altering your mind."

"You need not."

"Oh! you don't know."

"I do."

"So you may think. You can either tell me where I can find Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess or not, just as you please. But, if you do not tell me, I cannot long remain ignorant of their whereabouts; and then, when I have them in my hands, you will no longer have an opportunity of proving your good faith."

"Nor do I require one."

"But I do."

"Jonathan Wild, I wish you would believe me when I say that all this talk is idle. You see, after our long interview, things remain just as they were upon the former occasion, and it will be the same always."

"Then you shall swing!" said Jonathan, his anger at length getting the better of him; and, starting up from the stool upon which he sat, as he spoke—"you shall swing! I would fain have spared you that ignominious fate, if I could; but, since you are resolved upon it, why, you shall swing. It will be the easiest matter in the world for me to get up a case against you and have you convicted—then all will be over."

"So you fondly imagine, no doubt."

"I don't imagine; I am certain. Farewell! I leave you yet a chance to change your determination. There is time. I repeat, you can have from now until Monday morning to reflect."

As he spoke these words, the thief-taker stalked angrily from the cell, taking the torch, and carefully locking the door after him.

He was much annoyed at the want of success which had attended all the efforts he had made.

He had spared no trouble—he had used every argument his imagination could suggest—but all to no purpose; the resolution of the prisoner remained unshaken. Still he scarcely despaired.

He knew well how powerful an instinct was the desire of life, and he fancied that, even in the eleventh hour, Blueskin would give way.

How far he was sincere in his proposals, and what would have been the result if Blueskin had consented to them, we leave the reader to judge.

He must have obtained a tolerable insight into his character by this time, if possessed of any penetration at all; and he need only ask himself the question whether, if he was in Blueskin's place, he would feel inclined to put any faith in his promises.

Whether he succeeded or not on the Monday morning, time alone can determine.

We can only patiently await the progress of events.

For the present, however, we must leave Jonathan Wild to mature his schemes and meditate fresh villainies, while we devote our attention to the proceedings of Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess, of whom we have for so long lost sight.

CHAPTER CCCIII.

RELATES THE FORTUNES AND ADVENTURES OF JACK SHEPPARD AND EDGWORTH BESS UPON THEIR ARRIVAL IN LONDON.

WHEN Jack Sheppard, after committing the robbery in the lane, stopped the stage-coach, he almost lifted Edgworth Bess into it.

The events took place with so much rapidity that the poor girl had no time to make even an attempt at resistance, and her senses, too, were so distracted that she scarcely knew what she was about.

She was, indeed, quite passive in Jack's hands.

Upon finding herself in the inside of the coach, she mechanically sat down upon the vacant seat that was nearest to her; and she had scarcely done so before the vehicle was set in motion again.

Then she began to collect herself somewhat.

She leant back in her seat, and clasped her hands over her eyes—then burst into a passionate flood of tears.

Those tears almost broke Jack Sheppard's heart; he could endure, he thought, any other sight than that of seeing her weeping, and that unmanned him completely.

There were two other persons inside the coach, and, as they had nothing else better to do, they looked at the two new comers with great curiosity, though the dim light which hung from the roof of the coach did not permit them to see very distinctly.

But, beyond this regard of inquisitive curiosity, they did not go.

They did not ask what was the cause of her grief, or inquire whether it was in their power to do anything to assuage it.

For this, however, Jack was thankful.

He felt that any interference would exasperate him to such a degree that he should cease to be master of his actions.

So it was, perhaps, fortunate for all parties that no more notice was taken.

Jack did not attempt to soothe Edgworth Bess in any way.

It was not that he felt unwilling to do so, but because he was at a loss to think what he could say or do that would tend towards it.

So he was silent.

The coach rolled on, at what was then considered the wonderful rate of ten or twelve miles an hour.

It was rather an imprudent thing for Jack to make this journey in so public a manner, but he almost felt careless of all consequences.

For one thing, he calculated upon arriving in London at an hour when very few persons would be abroad.

That was the hour just before daybreak.

And so he was forced to remain silent, and occupy himself with his own thoughts.

This was an occupation which did not promise to be a very pleasing one.

He looked at his fellow-travellers, but, their curiosity being now exhausted, they had ceased to trouble any further about them.

They were both hard-featured looking men, and, if their countenances were any index to their dispositions, it was certain they possessed little sympathy, and still less commiseration, for the sufferings of others who might not be so well off as themselves.

It was in this way, then, that the journey was performed.

It was not a long one, for Jack had not succeeded in getting very far from London.

As he expected, the coach pulled up in the Borough, just a little before dawn.

Some faint signs of the approaching day might have been distinguished by a close observer, but that was all.

Jack alighted, and paid the fare for himself and his companion.

This done, he took hold of her arm and led her unresistingly away.

But only for a few paces.

As soon as the inn before which the coach had stopped was fairly out of sight, Edgworth Bess stopped, and released herself from the slight hold which Jack held upon her arm.

Then she recoiled a few paces.

Jack observed this with the greatest surprise.

But, before he could utter a word, she spoke.

He made no attempt to interrupt her.

He felt constrained to listen.

"Jack," she said, in a voice choked with sobs, "Jack, what booty did you take from that man in the lane?"

Jack stammered and hesitated.

"Let it be what it will, you must restore it to its owner. Money, got in the way you obtained that, will be a curse to us instead of a blessing. I say again, you must restore it; and in that way make the only reparation you can for the crime you have committed.

"Impossible."

"No—no. It is not impossible."

"It is—believe me, it is. The mischief is done, and cannot be repaired. What, think you, would be the result of returning these things? I should be laughed at and captured."

"No, not captured."

"Yes, I should. They would certainly give me into custody."

"Then, Jack, there is one other thing you must do."

"What is it?"

"Nay, do not come any closer. Since, by your own showing it is impossible for you to restore these things, you must fling them away."

"Fling them away?"

"Yes; and if you really have that regard for me which you profess to have, you will not hesitate a single moment to do as I desire. Fling those things away."

"And starve?"

"Yes, and starve. It will be better that we should do that than procure food by such means. It will be the means of getting us into still further trouble. Take my advice, and fling them all away."

"The money, too?" asked Jack.

"Yes, every farthing of it, for it will never do us any good, but bring us into fresh difficulties and dangers. Oh! Jack, how could you have committed such an act?"

Tears checked further utterance.

Jack endeavoured to draw closer to her, but she shrunk from him and avoided him.

He was as much pained as surprised at this behaviour. He could not understand it.

"I acted for the best," he said, apologetically; "or as I thought for the best. But, now that the mischief is done, do not ask me to fling the money away. That would be madness, situated as we now are."

"You refuse, then?"

"I do not exactly refuse," said Jack, hesitatingly, "but—"

"Oh! Jack, do not cause me to alter my good opinion of you. Be guided by me, and, take my word for it, it will be best. Fling all that money away which you have obtained by such dishonest means, and try to obtain some more in a better manner."

"You know not what you ask," said Jack. "If I throw this money away what is to become of us?"

"We must trust in Providence."

"If we do, we shall indeed have a frail dependence."

"Jack!"

"I repeat again, we shall have a frail dependence. I have no faith in this same Providence which people prate so much about. If it had any regard for innocence and suffering it would not have permitted you to remain so long in the condition you are."

"Oh! Jack—Jack! Do not speak like that—pray do not. If you do, you will break my heart—indeed you will."

"You will break mine if you continue to sob and weep like you do now. Cheer up! Believe me, all will yet be well."

"It will be well if you will fling away that money. Oh! do not hesitate any longer. In London money can be procured by honest and honourable means. If you cannot obtain it, I will try to do so."

"You speak in ignorance of the world."

"I may do. But I speak that which is right, and you cannot deny it. Fling that money away, I pray you."

"But Blueskin," urged Jack. "Think of him. He is, doubtless, a prisoner in the power of the villain Wild. The gold you ask me to cast away would, perhaps, procure his freedom. Do you not wish that object to be attained?"

"I do. Heaven knows I do. But you must accomplish it by some other means than those."

Jack was silent.

He was unwilling to refuse anything which his companion asked, but this last request seemed to him to be quite out of the bounds of reason.

He hesitated.

"Oh! Jack," continued Edgworth Bess, "if you only knew the anguish I suffered while we were in that coach. But, while I suffered, I reflected, and came to a resolution."

"What was it?"

"I resolved to urge this upon you, even as I have done, and try whether I could not persuade you to act in accordance with my wishes, and then, in the event of your refusing—"

"What?—oh! what?"

"I thought you might refuse, though I hoped and trusted that you would not. Still, if you did—"

A fresh gush of tears prevented her from announcing her resolution.

Jack's anxiety was extreme.

"If you did refuse, Jack," she said at length, recovering from her emotion with a great effort—"if you did refuse, I should part from you."

"Part from me?"

"Yes. You have the choice of two alternatives. You must either cast away that ill-gotten money or cast away me. Now, which will you do?"

"Oh! Bess; you torture me to madness. Do, I pray you, listen."

"Forbear to use any arguments. No matter how good you might consider them—they would be powerless with me; they would not induce me to alter my determination."

"But one word!"

"Not even one! No, Jack; you must tell me at once which you will do. Can it be possible that you hesitate?"

"I cannot believe that you are in earnest; or, if you are at the present moment, I think, ere long, you will repent, and wish that—"

"Never, never! Do not think such a thing as that for a single moment."

"I wish, dearest, that you would come nearer to me, that you would allow me to persuade—"

"You cannot persuade me! No, Jack; let us cease this dispute at once. Either you cast away that money, or we part, and henceforth our paths will lie in opposite directions."

Jack was torn with conflicting emotions.

He was willing to do as his companion asked him, but he was unable to see the policy of it. He asked himself the pertinent question of what were they to do in the event of consenting to part with the money?

Bess observed the conflict that was going on in his mind, and was silent.

At length she spoke.

"Have you decided?" she asked.

"I cannot decide without you listen to what I have to urge upon you."

"Farewell, then. Farewell. We must part."

She sobbed bitterly.

"No—no! we must not part!" said Jack, springing forward, and endeavouring to catch hold of her apparel.

But she eluded him, and increased the distance that already existed between them, and continued to retreat as Jack advanced.

He paused, for he felt that no good could be accomplished in that way.

"Oh! Bess," he cried, "do not present me to such a terrible alternative. Without this money we shall perish."

"And, if you retain it, we shall part."

"No—no."

"But I say yes. My determination, so far from being altered, is strengthened. You cannot shake it. Jack, must we part?"

"No—no; ten thousand times no."

"Then cast away the money."

"Oh! do not press this point; pray do not. Make some kind of compromise."

"No—no; none. I can, however, see that you, like me, have come to a determination. Well, I am sorry. I trust you will not abide by it."

"What do you mean?"

"I see that you are resolved to keep the money."

"No—no."

"Cast it away, then."

"No—no."

"I feared this would be the result. Farewell! Jack; farewell! We must part. One word before I go. Will you cast away that money?"

"Nay, I"—

"Enough—enough; say no more. I shall urge this matter no further. You have decided. Farewell!"

No words could possibly express the anguished tone with which these words were uttered.

No sooner had she spoken them, than she turned round and glided away into the semi-darkness like a shadow.

She vanished immediately.

For a moment, at least, Jack Sheppard was so petrified with astonishment that he was unable to move hand or foot.

But, when the power of volition was restored to him, he uttered a loud cry, and darted off in the direction which Edgworth Bess had taken.

But the turnings about that spot were perplexingly numerous, and no trace of her could be seen.

Scarcely daring to believe in the reality of what had just taken place, Jack Sheppard cried aloud—

"Bess, darling—Bess, darling! come back to me. Oh! pray come back to me. Come back, and I will no longer hesitate to consent to your wishes; but come back, I pray you! Answer me! Speak one little word to let me know where you have concealed yourself! We cannot part thus; it is impossible! Bess—Bess! Answer me! Come back!"

Jack ceased.

The violence or his emotion overcame him.

He could no longer give utterance to his supplicatory words.

He had raised his voice until it became a loud shout.

It rang with a startling effect through the silent and deserted streets.

But no reply came, save the wailing echo of his own words.

Distracted and maddened, Jack rushed frantically down the turning opposite to where he stood, and which he fancied his companion must have taken.

He continued his cries as he sped along it, to the surprise of those persons who happened, at that early hour, to be abroad.

At length the end of the street was gained, and numerous others spread out before him, leading in every conceivable direction.

He paused, and, with the hopelessness of despair, renewed his cries.

But all in vain.

They met with no response.

His decision came too late.

Had she melted in the misty morning air, Edgworth Bess could not have disappeared more suddenly and completely than she had done.

Stupefied and bewildered with grief and astonishment, Jack Sheppard once more looked around him.

He found himself surrounded by a throng of curious, eager persons, each of whom stretched their heads forward to see and hear what was taking place.

When he perceived this, Jack shrank back from the public observation he had drawn upon himself, and, with his heart almost bursting with grief, and his eyes blinded by tears which he could not repress, he rushed along the empty thoroughfares.

But he no longer called upon Edgworth Bess, and implored her to return.

His voice refused him.

His throat was swollen, and, had his life depended upon it, he could not have articulated a single word.

At length, breathless and exhausted, he sank down upon some stone steps that led up to some edifice.

What he did not look to see.

His strength was quite spent.

He could go no further.

He buried his face in his hands, and groaned.

Tears, too, the first he had shed for many a long day, forced their way through his fingers, and trickled down on to the steps.

He groaned heavily.

All other evils and calamities were now forgotten.

He could remember nothing, and think of nothing, but the terrible loss he had sustained.

By degrees, however, his grief abated in its violence, and then, becoming conscious of some slight sound near him, he looked up, and again found himself surrounded by a curious crowd of people, who all wondered what was the cause of his grief.

No sooner did Jack make this discovery than he started to his feet.

The people involuntarily made way for him.

Jack darted through their ranks in a moment, and fled. Such despair and grief as he now felt, he had never before experienced.

He had lost Edgworth Bess, and entirely through his own fault.

This knowledge inflicted fresh poignancy.

Where to look for her now he knew not.

He had not yet sufficiently recovered the use of his faculties to be able to think with any degree of calmness upon the subject.

He only exhausted himself by rushing in all directions, without pursuing any method.

In this way it happened that he frequently went over the same ground twice.

At length, upon looking around him, he saw he had again reached the spot where their brief conversation had taken place.

He knew it again in a moment.

Then he grew calmer.

The tumult of his mind gradually subsided.

He looked around him.

It was now broad daylight, and that spot which, a few hours before, had been completely deserted, was now filled with people.

CHAPTER CCCIV.

JACK SHEPPARD RESOLVES UPON ONCE MORE MAKING HIS WAY INTO WILD'S HOUSE, AND ATTEMPTING THE RESCUE OF BLUESKIN.

BUT, although Jack continued thus to look around him, he was unable to see anything that would serve as a clue to the whereabouts of the poor heiress.

He was filled with dread on her account, not so much in consequence of the danger a friendless, penniless, and unprotected girl must necessarily run in London, but because he had little doubt that, ere long, she must fall an easy prey into the clutches of her implacable enemies.

This almost drove him to madness, because he had no one he could accuse of driving her into this great danger but himself.

She was gone—utterly and completely gone.

It seemed at first like a dream, but its reality soon pressed itself upon him.

In a more systematic and logical manner than he had adopted hitherto, he recommenced his search.

In spite of the danger he brought upon himself by so doing, he inquired after his missing companion of every person he met.

But no one could give him any intelligence.

He inquired at every house in every street contiguous to the one in which she had disappeared, and still with the same disappointing result.

No one had seen her.

No one knew anything about her.

At length, after many hours of unsuccessful search, he crawled into a public-house, and, thoroughly wearied, he sunk down upon a seat, and called for refreshment.

His position now, terrible as it was before, seemed ten times worse.

Indeed, in comparison, it sunk into insignificance.

Where Blueskin was, or what was his fate, he was equally ignorant as he was of the situation of Edgworth Bess.

His grief now had almost passed away, and was succeeded by a deep and hopeless despair.

He felt almost as though he could give himself up to his foes, and no longer continue his desperate fight against the force of fate.

In this frame of mind he remained for a long time, but at length hope slowly returned to his heart.

He resolved, if possible, to find Blueskin.

With this intent he rose and left the public-house.

Upon going out into the streets again he found it was quite dark, and that night had fairly come.

A cool wind swept past, and he felt grateful for it.

It cooled the fever of his brain, for his head and face were hot and flushed.

Jack, almost without considering upon the subject, directed his steps towards Newgate-street.

The impression that Blueskin had fallen into the hands of Jonathan Wild had taken hold of his mind with the full force of conviction.

He knew the character of the thief-taker too well to think that Blueskin's life was in any immediate danger.

In pursuing his refined system of revenge, he would consign him to the gallows, and that was a work of time.

The distance to Newgate-street was not great, and Jack soon arrived there.

The bustle of the day had subsided, and the streets were beginning to wear an empty look.

A slight rain that was falling tended, too, to clear the streets somewhat earlier than usual.

Jack passed the huge, gloomy prison of Newgate, and looked up at its black and dismal walls with a shudder.

He did not linger near it, however, but turned the corner into Newgate-street, where the residence of the thief-taker was situated.

It was here that he imagined Blueskin was most likely to be found.

Upon arriving opposite the ruinous structure, he crossed over on to the other side of the street, and looked up at it.

From none of the windows came the feeblest gleam of light.

Whether Blueskin was there or not, Jack had no means of telling.

What would he not have given for the possession of some full and definite information?

It was on this night that Jonathan and his son conducted their search in Lord Donnull's mansion in Piccadilly.

Both were from home, and remained so for many hours.

It was on that night, and about the same hour that Jack stood looking up at the thief-taker's dismal edifice, that Blueskin made his abortive attempt to escape.

Oh! if Jack had only known that!

How easily would he have made his way to that window, and assisted his comrade out on to the roof and into some place of safety.

He saw, indeed, the window open, and he saw the dark form appear at it, but the obscurity and distance were both too great for him to distinguish what it was.

Indeed, he dreaded that it was one of his foes; and, fearful of being seen, he drew back still further into the shadow of the houses close to which he stood.

It was in vain that Jack perplexed his brain and taxed his inventive powers to discover some means by which he could ascertain whether Blueskin was really a prisoner or not.

The only course he could think of, was by making his way, by some means or other, into the house, and ascertaining whether he was really there or not.

But the risk of such a course of action as this was so great that Jack shrunk from encountering it.

Should he unfortunately be taken prisoner at that juncture, their position would be terrible indeed.

That move, then, must be abandoned.

And so Jack stood irresolute, when, if he could only have known what was taking place within, he could have rendered important service.

In the contemplation of the probable situation of Blueskin and Edgworth Bess, he totally forgot his own danger.

He did not remember that an accurate description of himself had been extensively circulated, and that a large reward would be paid for his apprehension and lodgment in any of the city prisons.

And yet there he stood, calmly enough, within twenty paces of the outer wall of Newgate.

A thousand half-formed schemes by which he could accomplish his designs flitted through his brain, but none of them was clever enough for elaboration.

Something occurred to make them all impracticable.

And so, in this state of irresolution, he remained idle when he ought to have been actively at work.

It is more than probable that the sudden disappearance of Edgworth Bess was a great obstruction to his inventive powers, which, in ordinary circumstances, were by no means to be despised.

Now, however, his mind was divided between two objects, instead of being concentrated upon one.

It is not surprising, therefore, that in so difficult a matter he should be at fault.

It was in vain he tried to banish all recollection of the poor heiress; but he could not—the recollection of her loss, and his terrible uncertainty as to where she now was, perpetually intruded themselves.

In this fruitless manner the whole night was spent.

To be sure, he did not stand all the while upon the spot, but he hovered round about the thief-taker's residence, keeping careful guard.

But he was not rewarded for his trouble in any way.

Dawn at last approached, and then, fearful that if he remained there any longer he should be discovered and captured, he slunk away.

Besides which, he was weary in body and sick at heart.

He felt as though it would be a comfort to lie down and die.

Hungry, cold, and wretched, then, he crept away from Wild's house, with the intention of finding some place where he could shelter himself and recuperate his exhausted energies.

Had he but stayed a few minutes longer than he did, he would have seen Quilt Arnold emerge and return with Mr. Snuxall, the apothecary, whom he called in to attend to Blueskin on a discovery of him in his helpless condition.

Jack did not see this, but, going down a few narrow thoroughfares, found himself in the street called Little Britain.

Here there was a coffee-house, which he entered.

He called first for some refreshment, which the sinking of his system required him to take, and then asked for a bed.

Entering a wretched room at the top of the house, he threw himself, dressed just as he was, upon a still more wretched bed.

He closed his eyes, and endeavoured to woo sleep, but sleep came not.

He tossed over and over, tormented and distracted with his thoughts.

At length he fell off into an uneasy slumber, which was disturbed by dreams of the most terrific description.

They were a distorted image of the events which had recently taken place, and in them Blueskin, Jonathan Wild, and Edgworth Bess figured in strange confusion.

By degrees, however, as exhausted Nature asserted her claims, his sleep deepened, until at length he slumbered profoundly and dreamlessly.

It was evening when he awoke, and the room was already full of shadow.

But though he awoke he did not offer to move, but lay quite still upon the bed.

In the silence and semi-darkness of that room he thought he should be better able to collect his thoughts than elsewhere.

He tried to keep himself calm, but this was a most difficult task.

At one moment he thought he would hunt the kingdom over until he found Edgworth Bess.

At the next he would determine to discover whether Blueskin really was an inmate of Wild's house, and if so to procure his freedom, and then, with his assistance, endeavour to discover Edgworth Bess.

But both of these enterprises seemed to be beset with insuperable obstacles, and when he reflected upon them, his spirit, dauntless as it was, seemed to shrink back, crushed and appalled.

At length he resolved to return once more to Jonathan Wild's house.

The only hope he had was that he would be more successful than on the preceding night in discovering something that would serve him as a clue.

This determination being the only rational one he could come to, he at once put it in practice.

He took up his position much in the same place.

But on this occasion his patience was not destined to be put to so severe a trial as on the preceding one.

Soon after his arrival he saw the door of the thief-taker's house opened.

There was very little light, but still Jack was able to distinguish the forms of Jonathan Wild and someone else, whom he did not recognize.

That was Jonathan Wild's son.

As the reader, doubtless, surmises, they were about setting out upon their little expedition to the lawyer's chambers in the Temple, in search of the important packet of papers.

Jack saw them sally forth, and go arm-in-arm down the street.

What could be their destination?

This, he thought, would in all probability be well worth ascertaining; so, with a silent and stealthy tread, he followed them at a distance, taking care to keep himself concealed beneath the shadows of the houses.

Not for a moment did he lose sight of their dusky forms, which were just visible in the darkness.

He kept upon their track, and dogged them to the gate in Fleet-street leading into the Temple.

He was much surprised to find them halt here, and could not conjecture what business they could have there at such an unwonted hour of the night.

From the opposite side of the road, Jack observed all that took place.

He stood just beneath the archway leading into Bell-yard.

From this advantageous position he saw Wild, and the person by whom he was accompanied, pass through the gate.

He saw, too, that the gate was closed and locked after them.

Little did the thief-taker and his son imagine at that moment that Jack Sheppard was so close to them.

But so he was.

He watched them until they quite disappeared in the deep gloom of the Temple, and then he pressed his hands over his brow, and strove to think what would be the best thing he could do.

"He is out now," he muttered. "I am quite certain of that, and the probability is that he will remain out for some time. The coast is as clear now as I can ever hope to find it. I will return to his house at once, and try whether I cannot set the question at rest of ascertaining whether Blueskin really is a prisoner in his hands or not."

As he uttered these words, he turned round, and made his way back to Newgate-street with all possible speed.

On his way thither, however, he occupied himself by revolving in his mind which were the best means of entering the thief-taker's house; for, as the reader may have guessed, this was what Jack had determined upon doing.

A more desperate undertaking could scarcely have been conceived, and the probability is that no one would have dreamt of attempting it but Jack Sheppard.

For some time he was unable to come to a conclusion upon this point, until, at length, he recollected the means by which he had once before entered.

"Blueskin would be in the cells, if anywhere," he muttered; "I am quite sure of that. It is to the cells, then, that I must make my way. That will do it. At least, I hope it will, but I fear Jonathan has taken means to prevent me from ever playing him such a trick again. And yet, who knows? he may have omitted to do so."

This was but a frail hope, but still Jack clung to it, for the simple reason that no better one presented itself.

It will not be necessary to tell the reader Jack's precise intentions. They will be well enough seen by following his actions.

He changed his course, then, in the first place, and did not make his way into Newgate-street; but, plunging through a wilderness of narrow streets, at length emerged into Warwick-lane.

Turning to the left, he passed on rapidly until he came to the well-remembered archway leading into Newgate-market.

The iron gates were closed and locked.

But these were no obstacles to Jack.

Looking up, he saw there was room to squeeze himself between the top of the ironwork and the masonry; and he at once set about climbing up the gates.

This was by no means a difficult feat, and Jack easily accomplished it.

He let himself down in safety on the other side.

The market was plunged in utter darkness, but, heedless of that, Jack pursued his course unhesitatingly in a certain direction.

Down the long, dark avenues he sped, until, at length, he paused before a small door set in the wall.

He ran his hand hastily over it, in the hope of finding a fastening of some kind, but in this hope he was defeated.

Then he tried whether it would yield, but it resisted all the pressure he could apply to it.

Finding this to be the case, he made no further attempt to open it, but, retracing his steps along the passage, emerged into one of the open places in the market.

Here he looked about him for a moment, and then made his way towards a shed, the roof of which he endeavoured to gain.

There were several projections of various kinds, and of these he availed himself.

By their aid he succeeded in getting upon the roof of the shed.

This was slanting, but he made his way up it at good speed, for he never stumbled once.

Upon reaching the top of the shed, he found himself upon a wall of great thickness.

He looked down, and endeavoured to ascertain the depth to the ground.

He failed to do this, but he fancied the depth was considerable.

Still he did not hesitate.

Carefully lowering himself over the brink, until he hung down the full length of his arm, he prepared to drop the distance.

He let go as soon as he had steadied himself, and reached the ground with rather a severe shock.

But he did not lose his feet.

He could not avoid making some slight noise in his fall, and now he stopped and listened whether any alarm had been given before he ventured to move.

But all was still.

Finding this to be the case, he turned round.

"At last," he muttered. "At last."

From what has been previously related, we doubt not that the reader will be already aware of what place it was into which Jack had thus made his way.

It was the yard at the back of the thief-taker's house.

It will be recollected that, on a former occasion, he had been so fortunate as to discover in the yard a secret mode of entrance to the cells.

For what reason this secret and apparently disused entrance had been constructed, Jack knew not, though the mystery will be cleared up.

Without much trouble Jack found the iron ring in the flagstone.

He turned it round as before, and was rejoiced to find the slab come up when he pulled.

In precisely the same manner, then, as was related at full-length in the eighty-fourth chapter of this history, he made his way into the corridor from which the cells opened.

Scarcely, however, had he passed though the secret door and closed it after him, than he heard a faint sound, as though someone was descending the steps at the further end of the passage, and about to pay a visit to the cells.

This suspicion was very quickly converted into a certainty.

He distinctly heard the tread of a heavy foot upon the stone steps.

Then he saw the faint glimmering of a light upon the moist and humid walls.

Someone was coming.

For a moment Jack forgot that Wild was from home, and the dread came over his heart that it was no other than the thief-taker who was approaching.

But, whether it was or not, his discovery seemed certain.

What should he do?

Hastily he glanced round him in search of a hiding-place, but none appeared.

Cell-doors were on each side of him.

He knew that, when unoccupied, the cells were merely fastened by an iron bar, which was placed across them, and sometimes not even by this.

This suggested a chance—a desperate chance, but the only one.

He might make his way into one of the empty cells, and secrete himself there until the visit was over.

Acting upon this, he lifted down, with the utmost rapidity, the bar which was placed across the door nearest to him.

He pushed the door.

It yielded.

The cell, then, was an empty one.

He glided in with the swiftness of an apparition.

CHAPTER CCCV.

WILD, JUNIOR, HAS SOME TROUBLE IN FINDING A SECURE HIDING-PLACE FOR THE PACKET OF PAPERS.

The tide of events now carries us away from Jack Sheppard, but only for a moment.

We shall return to a relation of what happened to him after entering the empty cell almost immediately.

We wish now, for a short time, to direct the attention of the reader to the proceedings of Wild, junior.

After so successfully removing the suspicions which his father had entertained, namely, that he (George) had stolen the packet of papers, his features expanded into a grin, as the thief-taker left his bedchamber and closed the door after him.

He remained without moving for some moments, and with precisely the same expression of satisfaction upon his countenance.

This was while he listened to the sound of his father's retreating footsteps, in order to make sure that he really had gone away and not made a pretence of doing so while he lurked just outside the door in readiness to pop in at an unexpected moment.

He knew his worthy parent was quite capable of such a trick.

Indeed, he was not satisfied with hearing him retire, but he crossed the floor of the room stealthily, and then opened the door with great suddenness.

But all this cleverness was expended in vain.

Jonathan Wild was not there.

He had really retired.

What suspicions he had had, his son had succeeded, by his consummate cunning and address, in removing.

All without was dark and silent, and it was with a feeling of the utmost satisfaction that Wild, junior, closed the door again and turned the key in the lock, so as to be secure from any very sudden intrusion.

"There really is no sort of doubt," he muttered, in a low tone of voice; "there is really no sort of doubt that the gov'nor's a d-d fool, or else he would not have suffered himself to be taken in in this manner. It's either that, or else I'm a d-d clever fellow. I think it must be the last, for the gov'nor would not take me in very easily."

He sat himself down on the edge of the bed.

"I have got those papers all safe," he continued; "there's no sort of doubt about that. And very important they are, too. But, most of all, the gov'nor has no suspicion. He had at first, though. How strange he should hit upon the guilty party so soon! However, he will be rather confused now, I think. But, stop! I must not congratulate myself so fast. I have got the papers, but where shall I hide them?—that's the question."

Wild, junior, looked all round his bedchamber as he spoke.

"I must find a good hiding-place, a poor one won't do at all. I shall never be able to tell when the gov'nor may feel his suspicions return, nor how soon he may take it into his head to make a thorough search of this room. Where on earth can I hide them?"

This was a very, very important question, and Wild, junior, felt all its momentousness.

He rose from his seat on the bedside, and went all over the room, peering into odd nooks and corners, and shaking his head every time he asked himself the question whether the place would suit.

He knew his father was not an ordinary man, more especially when looking for hidden things was concerned; and, therefore, it behoved him to be very careful where he deposited the precious packet.

An hour passed by without his having come to any definite decision.

At one time he thought of leaving his room, and secreting the packet in some other part of the house, but he considered the risk of it being found was almost, if not quite, as great; and besides which, there was the chance of exciting his father's suspicions afresh if he heard him leave his chamber.

He had thought of every hiding-place the room afforded, but without being over well pleased with either; but at length he decided upon one which he considered, upon reflection, was the most eligible.

This was beneath the flooring of the room, or, rather, between it and the ceiling of the room below.

He imagined that if he carefully raised one of the planks and placed the packet under it, and then fastened the plank down in such a manner that its ordinary appearance was preserved, that it would be likely to escape his father's observation, should any search be made.

At any rate, as he could find out no better hiding-place, he was, in a manner of speaking, compelled to adopt it.

Before he commenced operations he went to the door, and, opening it, looked out and listened.

All was silent.

Believing, then, that he had the place entirely to himself, he closed the door again, and, having locked it, set about his task of concealing the papers without further loss of time.

He took his candle, and, by the aid which its dim light afforded, made as good an examination of the floor as he was able.

The thief-taker's house was an old one, and in this chamber, as in most of the others, the flooring was worn and uneven, so that the removal and replacement of a board would not be so likely to be noticed as it would in a room where the floor was even and level.

Moreover, his task would be much easier.

Wild, junior, deposited the candle on the floor, and produced from his pocket a crowbar.

It was in two pieces; each about twelve inches in length.

They screwed together in the middle, and then formed a very effective weapon for burglarious and other purposes.

[ABEL DONMULL RECEIVES HIS DEATH AT THE HANDS OF JONATHAN WILD.]

One end was quite sharp, being formed into a kind of spike.

With this Wild, junior, would have little trouble in raising a board.

He knelt down, and inserted it between one of the crevices.

A crackling, splitting noise followed which rather alarmed him, and he stopped suddenly and listened.

He was afraid the sounds would reach his father's ears, and be the means of betraying him.

But no one seemed disturbed, and, reassured by the silence, he recommenced his task with greater caution.

Still he could not be quite silent; a slight splitting noise as the nails were wrenched from their hold was unavoidable.

At every few minutes would he pause to listen, and his excited fancy made him think he heard slight sounds which, in reality, existed only in his imagination.

At length he raised the board sufficiently to answer his purpose, and, by using the crow-bar as a prop, kept it in the required position.

He looked down into the space below.

It was half-filled with dust and cobwebs.

The place seemed admirably adapted for the concealment of any small object, such as the packet of papers.

George took hold of it, and, not without some misgiving, consigned it to the dark recess.

He was full of dread lest it should be discovered.

In order to preserve the papers as much as possible from receiving any external injury, he wrapped them up carefully in his handkerchief.

He then pushed them under the flooring, until a joint prevented him from pushing them any further.

The most difficult part of his task, however, had yet to come.

That was to replace the board in such a manner that no suspicion should be aroused by its presenting an altered appearance.

It was necessary, too, that this should be done silently.

He removed the iron bar, and gently pressed the piece of wood back into its place.

In raising it, however, the rusty nails by which it was secured had been bent to such a degree that he could not press it down close.

He had no resource but to draw them out and straighten them, and this was a task which quite exhausted his patience.

But at last it was accomplished.

Then, one by one, he placed them in the holes provided for their reception, and by the aid of the blunt end of the crow-bar hammered them down.

"Thank the fates!" he said, as he raised himself and straightened his back, "that job is over. I believe I have done it all right. I don't believe the gov'nor or anyone else heard me, I made such a little noise. I must alter the look of that, though."

Looking down at his work, he perceived a small heap of black dust, which, in some way or other, he must have removed from the recess beneath.

It lay upon the floor, and would, perhaps, be the means of exciting suspicion.

He stooped down with the intention of removing it, but it then occurred to him that he might make it useful.

Taking it up between his finger and thumb, he patiently filled with it the interstice between the edges of the board he had removed, and those next to it.

When this was accomplished, he thought his hiding-place would defy detection.

"The gov'nor's a d—d sight cleverer than I take him to be if he finds that out. I know he won't do it, for there is nothing suspicious about that plank, any more than there is about the rest. Now I have him in my power. But let me see. How shall I act now? I must be careful, or he will get the best of me. Now, I wonder whether it would answer my purpose best to turn round against him altogether? If I thought so, I would do it in a moment. I must not be too precipitate, however, or else I may spoil myself altogether. I had better get into bed, and think the matter quietly over. I may as well take time to consider. There is no need to precipitate matters; not a bit."

And so George Wild, very well pleased with himself and his prospects, prepared to retire to rest.

As he had said, he tried to think the matter over, and decide what he should do.

While thus engaged, he fell off to sleep.

When this event took place, however, he could not say, nor how long his slumber continued, but he was aroused by hearing a slight sound.

He did not thoroughly awake, but lay in a state of semi-consciousness.

But, the noise being repeated, he opened his eyes, but he had the prudence not to make the slightest movement.

He found, upon opening his eyes, that the room was not perfectly dark, but that a faint gray light pervaded the whole of it.

It was so faint, though, that the familiar objects by which he was surrounded appeared confused and indistinct.

The light came from the window, and was the first gleam of the coming dawn.

Suddenly the noise, whatever it was, ceased.

From the position he occupied, Wild, junior, commanded a view of the door of the apartment.

It was from this direction that the disturbing sounds had come.

As he gazed with straining eyes, he saw the door gently and slowly open.

"That's the gov'nor," he thought, but remained as motionless as before.

At another moment his surmise was verified.

A head was thrust into the room.

The dim, gray light fell upon it.

It was the head of Jonathan Wild, the thief-taker.

The object of his visit may easily be conjectured.

After continuous reflection, his old suspicions returned to his mind, and the more he pondered over them the stronger they became.

He resolved, at any rate, to pay a stealthy visit to his son's chamber.

So far as the thief-taker and his interests are concerned, it is rather a pity he did not come to this determination sooner than he did.

As he had, he would have found how George was engaged.

At that time, day was just breaking when, with the stealthy tread of an assassin, he left his own chamber, and made his way towards that occupied by his hopeful son.

The door was locked.

But, as we know, such a trifle as that was nothing to Jonathan Wild.

He produced a picklock, and it was the noise he made with this instrument which reached the ears of George and awoke him.

After the bolt of the lock was shot back, he waited a moment and listened; but, as all appeared to be still, he opened the door, and thrust his head into the room, as we have already described.

As soon as Wild, junior, saw who it was, he, of course, guessed what had taken place in his mind, and guessed his errand too.

He resolved to have something like a revenge for this visit, and, if possible, frighten his father out of paying him another.

It was George Wild's custom always to sleep with a brace of pistols, ready for instant service, under the bolster.

Gently and noiselessly, then, he glided his hand towards them, and got hold of one.

It was on full cock, so he would have nothing to do but pull the trigger.

He was not ready to do this yet, so he put his hand under the clothes, though, when he did so, he grasped the pistol by the stock, and had his finger on the trigger.

Then he feigned to be asleep.

By the time he had done this, Jonathan Wild had satisfied himself that his son was asleep, and he accordingly made his way in.

The first thing he did, was to crawl on his hands and knees towards the bedside.

Then he slowly raised himself, in order to have a look at his son's face.

This was the moment for which Wild, junior, had waited.

Suddenly, pretending to awake, he started upright in bed, and, at the same moment, he drew the pistol and fired it.

He took care not to wound the thief-taker, because he knew, if he had done such a thing, the consequences would have been most serious to himself.

Still, the bullet whistled past Jonathan's head in any event but pleasant proximity.

He uttered a tremendous shout, which mingled strangely with the report of the pistol.

Then, for the first time, Wild, junior, pretended to recognise who his visitor was.

He flung down the pistol, and cried, in tones of well-affected surprise—

"Well, I'll be d—d, gov'nor, is that you? Why, who would have thought it! I haven't hurt you, have I?"

"No, curse it!" exclaimed the enraged thief-taker; "but you might have done! What the devil did you want to fire your pistol at me in that way for?"

"Why, gov'nor, I didn't know it was you. In fact, I woke up suddenly; seeing someone close to my bedside, I fired off the pistol under the impulse of the moment."

"Oh! d—n your impulses!" yelled the thief-taker, who was not only annoyed beyond measure at his son's easy manner, but also at the failure of his scheme. "It was a wonder you didn't kill me."

"It was, indeed. But I did not stay to take aim. Be stop a minute, gov'nor."

"What now?"

"How did you get in?"

"How did I get in?"

"Yes."

"Through the door, of course."

"I don't know how you did it, then, for it's d—d odd to me if I didn't lock the door before I got into bed, and that's why I thought it so strange that anyone should be close to the bed."

"You must be mistaken," said the thief-taker, with a grim smile. "The door opened to my hand."

It was on the tip of George's tongue to say—

"Yes, but not until you had picked the lock;" but he wisely refrained from uttering the words.

"It's a good job," he continued, "that matters have turned out to be no worse. I thought someone was going to rob me, or something, but the fact is, the thing was done so suddenly that I scarcely thought at all."

"Then you had better, another time."

"But what did you want, guv'nor? I forgot to ask you that before."

Jonathan had anticipated this question, and had resolved how to reply to it.

It would be no good, he thought, to let his son know just what brought him there on the present occasion.

He did not say one word about his suspicions.

He merely replied—

"I want you to get up."

"But I have only just come to bed."

"Pho—pho! Look up; it is morning."

"What do you want me to get up for?"

"Why, I feel very uneasy about those papers, and I want you to go down to the river at once and try and find the waterman in whose boat we sat, and ask him whether he has found them. If so, they are probably still in his possession, and for a small sum he might easily be induced to give them up."

George Wild had all his thoughts about him while the thief-taker thus spoke.

His reflections ran somewhat in this fashion.

"Artful devil, the guv'nor, d—d if he isn't. I see his game. He wants me out of the way. He suspects I have got the papers. If I hesitate about going he will be convinced of it. If I do go, why, he will take advantage of my absence to make a thorough search of the chamber. He has me, any way. What the devil shall I do?"

Truly was he between the horns of a dilemma.

However, he knew it would not do to hesitate, so he scrambled out of bed with affected alacrity, and hastily attired himself.

Then he announced his readiness to start.

The thief-taker accompanied him as far as the front door, and here they parted.

Jonathan watched his son round the corner of the Old Bailey, and, as soon as he had disappeared, he turned in and went straight upstairs to his son's chamber.

He had got rid of him for some time, at any rate, he thought.

But he reckoned without his host.

Wild, junior, knew that his father was watching him, but, the moment he turned the corner of the Old Bailey and he knew he was out of his sight, he paused.

"I know what the guv'nor's up to," he said, "just as well as if I could see him at this moment. Ha! stop! I have a thought! I will go back and pretend I want something I left behind me. Then I shall just catch him."

No sooner had he come to this decision, than he proceeded to act upon it.

Back again he went like a shot.

He knocked softly at the front door, and it was immediately opened by Tonks.

George said not a word, but, as light as foot could fall, sped upstairs to his own room.

The door was open.

He approached with the utmost stealthiness.

He reached the door unperceived, and peeped into the room.

There, as he fully expected, with his hands behind him and his eyes roaming inquisitively about the room, stood the thief-taker.

George watched a moment, and then saw him go to the bed, and, one by one, pull the things off it and shake them.

While he was thus engaged, Wild, junior, pounced into the room.

"Hullo! guv'nor!" he yelled, in tones that fairly made the thief-taker start again, "what the devil are you about? Are you going to make my bed for me?"

Jonathan turned round.

An angry look was on his face.

"What have you come back for?"

"What have I come back for? Why, for something, I rather think. Who would have thought of seeing you here?"

"What have you come back for?" repeated the thief-taker, impatiently.

"Why, the fact is, guv'nor, as soon as I got outside I found I had got no arms about me; and, as I did not fancy going out totally unprovided with weapons, I thought I would just pop in again and fetch the pistol I fired off a little while ago."

"D—n you pistol," exclaimed the thief-taker, enraged to think his pretext for getting his son out of the house was detected by him. "D—n your pistol."

"Just as you like, guv'nor," rejoined Wild, junior, with his customary coolness. "But what on earth are you about? Curse me if I can make you out."

"Can't you indeed, George?" said the thief-taker, looking at his son with a leer. "Such a clever youth as you ought to be able to do that. Come, now, what's the good of disguise? You know what I came here for just as well as myself, and that is the reason you came back and popped into the room so suddenly."

"Then you would make me believe that you can make me out?"

"Just as you like. I leave you to draw your own conclusions. I have missed the papers, and I can't help thinking you have taken them."

"Then, if that is the case, guv'nor, we had better dissolve partnership. I can never get on when I know I am mistrusted and suspected. What a d—d fool you must be! Just as if the papers would be any good to me."

"Come, George, there's no harm done. I suspected you. You are such a clever fellow, you know; and I thought it just possible you had taken the papers. I resolved to satisfy myself, and sent you out. You penetrated my design, and returned unexpectedly, and caught me in the act of searching. Where's the harm?"

"Why it just amounts to this. If you can't trust me, we had better part."

"Stuff, we are useful to each other. Now, George, just listen to me."

"I am listening."

"If you really did take those papers, confess it, and I will forgive the offence. Restore them to me, and I will think no more of the matter. To you those papers cannot be half so valuable as they are to me. You have no idea how much depends upon my having them in my possession."

George Wild listened to this proposal in silence.

But, when his father had done speaking, his resolve remained unaltered.

The very anxiety which his father manifested to regain possession of the papers convinced him still more of their importance.

"Now, guv'nor," he said, with well-assumed frankness, "do let this bit of foolery drop. I tell you I have not got the papers. What good are they to me? The idea is so ridiculous, that it is a mystery to me how you entertain it. Let us hear no more of it, and I will promise you to do my best to assist you to recover the papers. Is it a bargain?"

"It is," said the thief-taker.

"Very good, then," rejoined his son; "see that you keep to it. Don't mention it again. Now, do you want me to go down to the boat, or was it all fudge?"

"If you will go," said the thief-taker, "I should be glad. It is just possible I dropped them in the boat."

"It's a d—d sight more possible than that I took them, I can tell you that. And now, guv'nor, while I am gone, do just leave my room alone. If you turn it inside out, you will meet with no reward for your trouble."

"I will take you at your word," said the thief-taker, with a grin.

"All right," said George. "I am really off this time."

He left the room as he spoke, and made his way to the front door.

In another moment he was on his way to the water-side.

He knew his journey would be a bootless one, but he did not care for that.

He knew his father would most likely set some one on his track; and, if he did not go to the appointed spot, his suspicions would return with full force.

It was a strange partnership which existed between these two villains.

Mutually distrustful of each other, they knew just what reliance to place upon each other's words; and Wild, junior, did not doubt, although he had been assured to the contrary, that his father was at that moment engaged in making a thorough search of the room.

But Wild, junior, had faith in the security of his hiding-place, and suffered very little, if any, apprehension as to the result of the search.

CHAPTER CCCVI.

RELATES THE EXTRAORDINARY MANNER IN WHICH JACK SHEPPARD WAS MADE A PRISONER IN THE CELLS BENEATH WILD'S HOUSE.

THE hiding-place which Jack Sheppard sought when he heard someone descending the stone steps that led to the corridor from which the dungeons beneath the thief-taker's house opened, was about as strange a one as could well be imagined.

With that boldness of invention which was the characteristic of Jack Sheppard throughout the whole of his life, he hit upon the daring idea of concealing himself in one of the cells, until the danger of discovery with which he was menaced should be past.

Surely anyone would think that one of the last places in the world in which Jack would be likely to take refuge, would be one of Wild's cells.

But so it was.

Strange things happen; and, as we have seen, he voluntarily assumed a prisoner's position.

With the swiftness and silence of a spectre, he glided through the door, which, fortunately for him, gave way to the pressure he applied to it.

His first impulse upon entering the dungeon was to close the door after him.

To secure it in any way was impossible.

He pushed it to.

Then, fearful of running the risk of remaining too near the door, he resolved to make his way to one of the distant corners.

The cell was profoundly dark.

Still he hastened forward, for he was familiar with the plan upon which they had been constructed.

He relied too much upon his knowledge.

Suddenly his foot came in contact with some obstacle that lay upon the floor.

So unexpected was this, that he was unable to recover himself, and fell heavily upon the ground.

In falling, he struck his forehead against one of the stone walls which formed the boundary of the cell.

The violence of the blow was so great as to at once deprive him of his senses.

There was a convulsive movement of his limbs, and he lay, utterly bereft of sense or motion, upon the damp flooring.

What happened after this he knew not.

The person he had heard descending the steps, which led from the hall in Wild's house to the cells beneath, was no other than that confidential janizary, Quilt Arnold.

In the absence of the thief-taker, it was part of his duty to see that the prisoners were all safe and their necessities attended to, and this it was that caused his visit on the present occasion.

When about halfway down the steps, he fancied some strange sound reached his ears, and he paused to listen.

But all was still.

He imagined, therefore, his hearing had deceived him, or else that he had mistaken some slight sound from above.

Quilt carried a torch, for of late the air in the corridor had been so impure as to render a lantern almost useless.

As its red glare fell upon his countenance it revealed a puzzled look upon it.

He was muttering as he came along.

Something had occurred to dissatisfy him.

He paused before the door of the cell which was nearest to the foot of the flight of steps.

In his hand he held a rather large-sized key, which was made so as to open all the locks upon the cell-doors.

Thrusting it into the keyhole, he turned it round, and removed the iron bar.

He opened the door a few inches only.

Thrusting his head, and the hand which held the torch, into the cell, he gazed upon its miserable occupant.

Satisfied that all was right, he closed the door again.

This he repeated all along the corridor, doing no more than ascertaining by this means that the prisoners were all secure.

At length he came to the cell in which Jack lay in so helpless a condition.

The door was ajar, and the iron bar lying upon the ground.

"Hullo!" he ejaculated, as he made this discovery. "There's one of these bars down again. Curse me if you can depend upon anybody. Well, it's a good job I took it into my head to make my rounds before old Johnny came home. A fine row there would have been if he had happened to see this, after giving such strict orders that the bars were to be put up whether the cells were occupied or not. I'll see if I can't kick up a row about it when I go upstairs. Curse their laziness! But they knew very well I should be the sufferer, not them."

Having thus given vent to his indignation at the discovery he had made, Quilt Arnold came a little closer.

"I can't understand it," he continued. "This here's one of the empty cells, to my knowledge, and has never been occupied since—but no matter. I wonder what on earth they wanted to take that bar down for. However, before I put it up again, I think my best plan will be to take a look inside."

It was almost fortunate for Jack that he was insensible when this took place.

He would have considered discovery inevitable, and, under that idea, might, perhaps, have got himself into fresh difficulty.

As it was, he lay like a log on the floor, in one of the furthest corners, quite unconscious of this fresh danger.

The torch which Quilt carried had burned away a good deal, and now gave forth but a dim light; so he knocked it up against the wall to improve its lustre.

This done, he pushed the door open a little further, and looked in, much in the same manner as he had looked into the others.

He waved the torch about in the endeavour to dissipate the darkness, which here appeared to be profound.

Then, satisfied by this casual glance that all presented its usual appearance, he withdrew again.

The torch had failed to show him the dark form of Jack lying, a huddled-up mass, in one of the remote corners.

He closed the door with a loud clank, which roused a thousand echoes in that dismal, subterranean place.

But it failed to awaken Jack.

His swoon was too deep to be removed by any such means.

Quilt Arnold next raised the iron bar, and thrust it through the staples provided for its reception.

Jack was a prisoner.

As he put up the bar, Quilt muttered—

"I'll kick up a row about this, curse me if I don't! But I'll guard against this cell being left open another time; and I don't suppose it will ever want to be used, because"—

Quilt broke off abruptly, and did not finish what he was about to say.

Plunging his hand into his pocket he drew forth the key which he had used to lock the other doors.

He thrust it into the keyhole.

He turned it round.

A sharp click followed, as the bolt shot into the matrix provided for it.

"That will do it, I rather think," said Quilt Arnold, with a chuckle, as he drew out the key, and restored it to his pocket. "I shan't be bothered with that door being left open another time, I know."

Thus satisfied, both with himself and what he had done, Quilt stalked away, and continued his examination of the prisoners until his task was finished, and then he returned to the upper air.

In the meantime, Jack still lay in the same insensible and lifeless state in the corner of the cell.

Little did Quilt think of the service he had unconsciously done for the thief-taker, in making prisoner he who had been a source of so much trouble to him.

Had he known that he had made Jack Sheppard a prisoner, how elated he would have been.

But he was denied that piece of knowledge, though, if he had performed his duty in a proper manner, and taken the trouble to enter the cell, instead of just putting his head into it in the manner he had done, he would have been in possession of it.

Fate, however, had decreed differently.

Quilt Arnold remained ignorant.

As for Jack, how long he remained in that state of insensibility he never knew, but he fancied it must have been a long time, for when he at length did recover, he felt cold, hungry, and wretched.

Consciousness was restored to him by very slow degrees.

His first sensation was a most intolerable headache, which proceeded from the terrible blow he had received by coming into contact with the wall.

This at first so distracted him that he was unable to think of anything.

Presently, however, the violence of the pain abated, and he opened his eyes.

Recollection had not yet returned to him, and he was astonished to find himself surrounded by total darkness.

For a moment an awful idea took possession of his mind, and that was that he was blind!

But he endeavoured to banish this thought, and to recollect what were the events which had last happened to him.

For a long while he was unable to do this.

His intellects were in a sad state of confusion, and anything like clear thought, while his head ached in the frightful manner it now did, seemed quite out of the question.

By slow degrees, however, as he lay perfectly still upon the ground, all his late proceedings dawned upon his mind.

But he was compelled to begin at a distant point, and trace all his actions forward from it.

He recollected at last how he had made his way to the cells beneath Wild's house; how he had heard someone approaching, and how he had hit upon the desperate expedient of concealing himself in one of the empty cells.

He remembered lifting down the bar, and gliding through the door.

He remembered closing it after him, and hastening across the dungeon; but at this point recollection ceased.

After that circumstance, all was a blank.

In vain he tortured his mind to recollect something further.

He was compelled, in the end, to give it up in despair.

He passed his hand over his forehead, as though he would clear his brain of the mists which hung before it.

In doing so, his hands came in contact with the lump which the fall against the stone wall had raised.

It was painful to a degree.

But this furnished the missing link which connected the chain of thought.

He recollected when he hastened across the cell that he had stumbled over some object which lay upon the floor.

In falling he must have struck his head against some hard substance, and that had caused the lump upon his forehead, and a fit of insensibility.

Having recovered his recollection so far, he now tried to ascertain how long he had been unconscious.

In this, however, he was completely baffled.

It might have been hours—it might have been days.

He had no means of telling, and probably never would have.

He was hungry, cold, and thirsty.

From these symptoms, he fancied his swoon must have lasted for a long time.

As yet, the reader will perceive, the suspicion that he had been made a prisoner never crossed his mind—nor, indeed, was it likely to do so.

He sat still for some time, endeavouring to recover his usual energy and spirit.

Fortunately, he had in his pockets a supply both of food and drink, for he knew not what emergency might arise.

He now had good reason to congratulate himself upon his forethought.

After his meal he felt much better.

The pain in his head subsided, and he was about to rise to his feet, with the intention of leaving the cell, when he fancied he should be easily enough able to do, when his whole attention was suddenly attracted by the sounds of many footsteps in the corridor without.

CHAPTER CCOVII.

JACK SHEPPARD HEARS SOME STRANGE SOUNDS WHILE AN INMATE OF WILD'S CELL, AND HAS HIS ESCAPE INTERRUPTED.

FULL of the most breathless eagerness and impatience to know what these sounds signified, Jack Sheppard paused in his intention of seeking the cell-door.

Crouching down upon the floor, he concentrated all his faculties into the one of listening.

He was anxious that no sound—no matter how unimportant it might seem—should escape him.

The footsteps came nearer.

Jack could tell not only that several persons were approaching, but also that they were coming from the direction of the staircase.

Nearer they came, until he fancied they must be almost opposite his cell-door.

Could it be possible that that was their destination?

As he asked himself this question, the idea first occurred to him that he might have been discovered while in his unconscious state and made a prisoner, and that those who were now approaching intended to make him more secure than he then was.

As this awful supposition crossed his mind, the blood in his veins seemed to turn to ice, and his heart to cease to beat.

As we know, Jack was both wrong and right.

He was wrong in thinking he had been discovered, but right in fancying himself a prisoner.

In spite of his terrible thoughts, he had the presence of mind to remain perfectly still, and not to make any movement to betray himself.

It was fortunate for him that he did so.

The trampling footsteps paused.

They were either just opposite the door of his cell, or else a yard or two past it.

Which of the two it was he could not tell.

Suddenly he heard a voice.

He recognised it.

Its tones thrilled through him.

It was the voice of Jonathan Wild, the thief-taker.

Jack could not distinguish the words he uttered, though he strove his utmost to do so.

A growling sound alone reached his ears.

Then he heard the rattle of a key, thrust hastily and impatiently into a lock.

Then, for the first time, Jack became aware that they had paused, not before the door of the cell in which he then was, but before the door of the one adjoining it.

He was surprised to hear the rattling of the key and the click of the bolt of the lock with so much distinctness as he had, when he could not distinguish the words uttered by the thief-taker, but he learned the reason almost immediately.

He heard the door of the adjoining cell grate open upon its hinges.

Then, to his surprise, all the sounds which he had before heard now reached his ears with much greater plainness.

If he had been in doubt about this, and thought his fancy was playing him a trick, he would have been convinced that he was not mistaken, for he could now hear what was said.

heard Wild speak.

The tones of his voice grated upon his ear.

"Now, then!" he said, "bring him in, can't you? Are you going to be all day?"

"Coming, Mr. Wild!" replied a chorus of respectful voices.

The trampling of feet followed, and it seemed to Jack that the prisoner to whom the thief-taker evidently alluded was bodily carried into the cell by the janizaries.

He had no time, however, for reflection, for he heard Wild say, in an impatient manner—

"Where's Godfrey?"

"Here I am," said a voice, in reply.

"Have you got the irons ready?"

"All ready, Mr. Wild."

The clanking of fetters followed these words, as though Godfrey wished to prove the truth of his assertion.

"Come on, then," said Jonathan. "Put them on, and be quick about it; but be sure you put them on securely."

"Depend upon me, Mr. Wild."

Jack was at no loss to comprehend what was taking place—indeed, he understood it almost as well as if he had been able to see as well as hear.

Some poor, helpless, wounded wretch had been brought into the cell, a prisoner, and Jonathan was about to be barbarous enough to place the fetters upon him.

Godfrey was the name of the man who, when required, performed the functions of smith.

No more was said for the space of some moments.

The silence was only broken by the clink of the smith's hammer upon the little portable anvil, as he riveted the fetters.

He ceased, and then Wild spoke again.

"Have you done?" he said.

"Yes, Mr. Wild; and I'll warrant them secure."

"That will do, then. Be off!"

The trampling of feet, as the janizaries left the cell, immediately followed this command.

The heavy tread of the thief-taker followed them. Jack could distinguish it from all the rest.

He heard the door closed with a violence that raised a thousand reverberating echoes.

The key was turned in the lock.

The iron bar was placed in the staples.

Then the whole of the party retired, and silence once more prevailed in that subterranean region.

For some time after their departure, Jack remained perfectly still.

But, though his body was still, his thoughts were active.

He listened for a long time, in order to make sure that Wild and his janizaries had really left the cells.

All remained silent.

He listened for some sound from the tenant of the next dungeon, but none came.

At length, rising to his feet, Jack went towards the door.

He was ill prepared for what awaited him there.

His thoughts were wholly occupied with elaborating the details of his daring plan.

Convinced that Blueskin was in one of the cells, he determined to spare no trouble in releasing him from his perilous position.

His retreat, he believed, he had already secured; and his enterprise assumed, at least, the appearance of success.

But that appearance was deceptive.

With his thoughts occupied in this manner, Jack groped his way towards the door.

He passed his hands over the stonework until he perceived it, by the difference in the feel of iron and stone—for, as we have elsewhere stated, the doors of Wild's cells were all lined with sheet-iron.

Hastily Jack ran his fingers over the crevice of the door, and tried to find a place where he could insert his fingers and pull it open.

The door was close shut, and he made the attempt in vain.

Still, he could not realize what had befallen him.

He tried the other side of the door, but with the same result.

He felt over the whole of its surface, up to as high as he could reach.

Then the horrible conviction was forced upon him that the door had been secured from without, and that he was a prisoner.

His brain whirled when he made this discovery.

What had happened during his long swoon?

A thousand terrible questions suggested themselves to his mind, and, entirely overcome, he sank down upon the ground.

He extended himself at full length upon the earthen flooring, and clasped his aching head with his hands.

Could it be possible that he, who had made his way to that dismal place with the intention of setting his friend at liberty, should himself become a prisoner?

More tightly still, he pressed his hands upon his brow, and tried to think more calmly, to bring back more correctly to his mind the occurrences of the past, and to reason more logically upon his present position.

He found this task a difficult one indeed.

He rose again to his feet, and made another examination of the door, the result of which was a conviction that he was indeed a prisoner.

The door was as firm and immovable as a rock, and resisted all the frantic attempts he made to shake it.

Again he tried to think.

The door had been fastened during his swoon.

Of that he could, at any rate, feel certain.

The question which now presented itself to his mind—and a terrible and important one it was—was whether he had been discovered by the person who had closed the door.

It appeared most likely.

If so, how was it he had not been re-visited by his old foe, the thief-taker?

How was it that he had passed the door of his cell without looking in, as he felt certain that he must have done?

Vainly did Jack strive to find plausible replies to these questions.

They perplexed and troubled him, and that was all.

He started.

A slight sound had struck upon his ear and disturbed his meditations, which, deep as they were, did not make him insensible of external impressions.

The sound came again.

This time he recognised its character.

It was a hollow groan.

His first sensations were those of alarm at hearing such a sound in such a place.

But this feeling soon subsided.

He recollected the inmate of the adjoining dungeon, whom he pictured grievously hurt and loaded with heavy fetters.

It was from him, doubtless, that the groan proceeded.

He listened for a repetition of it, in order to be sure that he was not mistaken.

He had not long to wait.

Another groan, such as could alone be wrung from man's lips by the most awful suffering, struck upon his ear.

All doubts were now over.

Jack was certain that it came from the prisoner he had heard carried into the next cell.

In a contemplation of this man's probable sufferings, he lost sight, for a few moments, of his own.

He wondered who he was, and whether he could administer any help or consolation to him.

He resolved to make an attempt as soon as ever he was in a position to do so.

At present, however, his own situation demanded the whole of his attention.

How was he to escape from the cell?

This was an accident which he had not foreseen.

Indeed, he could hardly be expected to take so strange an occurrence into his calculations.

But the prospect of working his way out of that place was not so difficult a one to Jack as it would be to most persons.

As the reader is well aware, he was not without experience in matters of this sort.

He had succeeded in making his way out of a stronger cell than the one in which he now was, and at a time, too, when he was not in half so good a position to achieve his escape.

It cannot, therefore, be said that he looked upon the task before him with any great amount of diffidence.

He relied upon his own powers.

Resolved to set to work without further delay, he commenced searching in his pockets for anything that promised to be of service to him.

He found himself but ill-provided, and yet he had several useful articles secreted about him.

Among these was a large-bladed clasp-knife, and a small, but exquisitely-made file.

In the hands of such a person as Jack Sheppard, wonders could be done with such tools even as these.

He determined to begin with the clasp-knife.

Opening it, he made his way towards the door.

His intention was to pick away the mortar around the lock, and so open the door by that means.

Whether he would have succeeded or not is hard to say.

Scarcely had he taken the knife, and commenced operations by chipping out a small piece of mortar, than he heard a sound which warned him to desist without he wished to run the risk of immediate discovery.

He ceased, of course.

The sound was one familiar enough to Jack's ears.

It was a footstep.

This time, however, it was that of one person only.

Jack could tell that in a moment.

Someone was about to pay another visit to the cells.

CHAPTER CCXVIII.

JACK SHEPPARD MAKES AN UNEXPECTED DISCOVERY, AND IS THE UNSUSPECTED AUDITOR OF AN IMPORTANT CONFERENCE.

JACK could not refrain from uttering a curse at this unlooked-for interruption to his proceedings.

It was useless, though, and he knew it.

There was nothing left for him to do but to wait with patience and bide his time.

On came the footstep, and, as it came nearer, causing him in consequence to hear it with greater plainness, Jack recognised it.

Too often had he heard that heavy and peculiar tread to be mistaken upon the point.

It was Jonathan Wild who was approaching.

Jack was as sure of it as if he could see him at that moment.

Breathlessly, then, he listened, for he could not divest himself of the idea that this second visit of Jonathan Wild's was in some way connected with him.

Was he about to visit him?

Jack thought so, and prepared himself for the meeting, for he could scarcely bring himself to believe that he had been made prisoner in the manner he had been without the person who secured the door knowing who he was.

But, as we happen to know, such was the case; and, after nerving himself for the encounter, which he made sure must take place, he discovered that his cell was not Jonathan's destination.

Still, the thief-taker's lumbering step stopped somewhere close at hand.

It was at the door of the adjoining cell.

Jack heard the fastenings undone, and could tell that Jonathan had entered the cell.

What was his errand there?

This it was important he should find out, for Jack could not help thinking that all Wild's proceedings were in some way or other connected with himself.

He had no fear of not being able to hear what passed, because on the previous occasion every word had reached his ears with almost as much distinctness as they would if they were spoken in his own cell.

He listened eagerly.

He heard Wild address the prisoner in tones of mocking hilarity, which grated terribly upon his nerves.

Why should he speak to his prisoner thus?

Jack listened for some reply to Wild's speech.

None came.

Jonathan continued in the same sneering tone.

Then the prisoner spoke.

But the first word he uttered in reply caused Jack to start violently.

It was only with the greatest difficulty that he controlled himself from giving vent to a loud shout, so intense was his surprise.

Fortunately he was sufficiently master of his emotions to be able to repress his surprise, or, at all events, to keep it from reaching the ears of his enemy.

To this surprise disbelief succeeded.

He fancied he must surely be mistaken.

If so, he should quickly know.

The prisoner, in all probability, would speak again.

He would be prepared to pay the utmost attention.

His patience was put to a short test.

After some more taunting remarks, the prisoner spoke.

Prepared as he was, he still started.

He knew that voice.

Knew it as well as he did his own—perhaps even better.

It was Blueskin he heard speak.

He was quite sure of it.

He was the unfortunate being whose sufferings he had commiserated without knowing who he was.

It was Blueskin who had been carried into the next cell.

It was Blueskin who had been ironed so heavily.

It was Blueskin who had given utterance to those dreadful groans.

Oh! it was terrible.

This discovery was almost more than he could bear.

He sprang to his feet.

He found himself almost unable to credit the evidence of his senses.

Could it be possible that Blueskin, whose release he was so anxious to accomplish, should have been brought to the very next cell to the one of which he was the inmate under such peculiar circumstances?

His brain spun round.

He feared he was going mad.

He clasped his hands over his head.

But the conversation between the thief-taker and his prisoner in the next cell continued, and swept away all doubts.

He was not mad.

He did not dream.

What he heard going on was real.

He once more listened.

He heard his own name, coupled with that of Edgworth Bess, pronounced by the thief-taker.

He listened with, if possible, redoubled interest and eagerness.

He heard the thief-taker make the tempting offer which we have in a preceding chapter recorded; he heard, too, how Blueskin indignantly and positively refused it.

Oh! that refusal, how it went to his heart!

Never had he felt the least doubt about Blueskin's fidelity, but now he had the most convincing proof of it.

That proof was unnecessary, but still he could not help feeling pleased.

He rejoiced in the spirited manner in which he breathed his scorn and defiance at the infamous offer made to him, and his heart glowed to think that the poor, persecuted heiress had so true and tried a friend.

No words could possibly express the anxiety with which he waited for the remainder of this conversation.

Instinctively he turned his face in the direction from which the sound appeared to come.

A faint glow of light met his vision.

Looking closer, he saw from whence it proceeded, and then the mystery of his hearing so plainly all that was said in the contiguous dungeon was revealed.

He wondered he had not thought of it before, for now he recollected that the cells communicated with each other near the top.

There was a small aperture in the wall near the juncture with the roof.

This had been contrived for the purposes of ventilation, but had been found to be horribly insufficient.

There came back to Jack's mind an adventure which he once before had in one of the cells.

It was through this aperture that the faint glow of light came.

This proceeded from the torch which we have related Jonathan took with him when he paid his visit to Blueskin, and which he had stuck in a staple in the wall.

As Wild proceeded in his conversation with Blueskin, Jack gathered the gratifying intelligence that he must be ignorant of the fact of his being a prisoner in the adjoining cell.

His incarceration was, then, the effect of an accident.

He breathed more freely.

Hope regained its ascendancy in his breast.

He began to see a way out of all his difficulties and dangers.

With varying emotions, he listened to the remaining portion of the conversation which took place between Blueskin and the thief-taker.

He had no fear that Jonathan would be able to cajole his friend by any of his specious arguments.

He trusted not only to his fidelity, but to his being too well acquainted with the villain's character to suffer himself to be taken in by anything he said, or to believe that he was sincere.

Impatiently, then, we say, he waited for the conference to terminate, in order that he might have the pleasure of infusing fresh hope and joy into Blueskin's heart by communicating to him the fact that he was close at hand and ready to strain every nerve to effect his release.

But Jonathan seemed in no hurry.

As the reader is aware, the interview between them was of considerable length.

In it Jonathan exhausted every argument, and displayed every inducement which his fertile invention could suggest.

But in vain.

Blueskin's fidelity was not to be shaken.

All his trouble brought him no nearer to the point he wished to gain than he was on the preceding occasion when he made his offers.

Blueskin remained firm.

From promises Wild proceeded to threats, but these he found equally unavailing with the former.

Our old friend preserved his firmness, and suffered nothing to have the least effect upon him.

Euraged at the want of success which had attended his strenuous efforts, Jonathan Wild rose to his feet, and, to the infinite satisfaction of Jack, quitted his comrade's cell.

In his own mind, however, the thief-taker had only abandoned the siege for the present.

He resolved to renew the attack when his victim was weakened and paralyzed with hunger.

He doubted not that he should then succeed better.

It was this which caused him to break off the interview so abruptly.

He slammed the door violently behind him, and secured it with a vengeance.

As he stood in the long, vaulted passage, a thousand angry feelings warred around the heart of the thief-taker.

His brow contracted.

His eyes gleamed with a baleful lustre.

The whole expression of his countenance was terrible to behold.

Unlucky would be the individual who came before him in his present state of mind.

He had set his mind upon winning Blueskin over to his interests, and made sure of doing so upon the present occasion.

But he failed—and failed signally.

He was exasperated at his defeat, and malignant threats and horrible imprecations fell mutteringly from his lips.

Jack, who listened to his every movement with an attention which could not be realized by anyone who did not happen to be in his position, heard him close and fasten the door, and go a few steps along the passage in the direction of the flight of stairs leading into the hall.

Then he heard him pause.

Wondering what this portended, Jack, with a beating heart, remained quite still, with his sense of hearing stretched to the utmost.

The thief-taker remained for a moment quite still.

Jack pictured him in an attitude of deep thought, and his imagination did not deceive him.

Then he heard him return, and cross to the opposite side of the corridor.

"He has some other visit to pay," thought Jack. "I wonder who it is to? I am afraid there is no hope of my hearing what takes place, as I did a little while ago."

A clanging sound now made itself heard.

It was produced by the iron bar with which the cell-door was secured being cast upon the ground.

Then he heard a door unlocked, and there could no longer be a doubt about the thief-taker's intentions.

He had another visit to pay.

Jack could scarcely restrain an exclamation of impatience.

He longed to communicate with Blueskin, to make him aware of his proximity, and to infuse hope into his breast.

But the manifest impolicy of attempting to do this, while Jonathan Wild was so close at hand, sufficed to keep him silent.

The murmur of voices came upon his ear, but it was an undistinguishable hum.

For a long time it continued.

By degrees, however, he heard the voice of the thief-taker increase in loudness.

Something was exciting him.

Jack put his ear close against the door of his cell, and listened.

A succession of horrible shrieks saluted his ear.

They seemed like the death-screams of some person who suffered more than mortal agony.

They froze the blood in Jack's veins, and he made a frantic effort to burst open the door.

CHAPTER CCCIX.

JONATHAN WILD HAS HIS LAST INTERVIEW WITH LORD DONMULL.

It took but a moment, however, to convince him, not only of the futility, but the danger, of the attempt he was making.

He became suddenly silent.

As yet, he believed his presence in that cell was unsuspected, and it was important in the extreme that it should remain so.

If he could have burst open the cell-door, he would have done himself more injury than he could have done anyone else good.

His thoughts, too, reverted to Blueskin, who languished in the next cell, and who, without his timely assistance, would surely perish.

He was now seized with the dread that he might have been heard.

Once more he pressed his ear against the iron-lined door, and listened.

The horrible shrieks had ceased.

From what cause he knew not.

At any rate, all now was still.

And yet he listened in the hope of hearing more.

He had begun to despair of doing so, and was about to turn away, when a slight sound reached his ears.

He renewed his listening instantly.

Jonathan Wild had not yet, as he believed, left the cells, and it was important that he should be assured upon this point before he ventured to communicate in any way with Blueskin.

Should he, by any unlucky chance, be overheard, he would be ruined.

The reader may then imagine the intentness with which he listened.

The next sound that reached his ears was that of a door closing violently.

Immediately afterwards he heard a key turned in a lock and the bar put up.

Then followed the heavy tread of the thief-taker along the passage.

Jack fancied by the sound that he came nearer.

He paused.

Surely it was before his own door!

Was he about to enter?

Could it be possible that he had heard the hammering against the door, and was about to ascertain the cause of it?

It seemed probable.

Oh! the agony of that moment!

Jack felt as though he had been suddenly changed to stone.

To his infinite relief, however, the thief-taker continued on his way along the passage, in the direction of the flight of steps.

Jack listened to his retreating footsteps with the utmost satisfaction.

Before, however, we proceed to relate what took place between him and Blueskin, we will revert to the late proceedings of Jonathan Wild.

Jack Sheppard was ignorant of the cause of those terrible cries which he had heard, but there is no reason why the reader should be.

We will, therefore, follow the thief-taker after he left Blueskin's cell.

We have already described at full length the interview which took place between them, and its results.

We have stated in what an angry mood it was that Jonathan left the cell and closed the door behind him.

As he stood in the dark and dismal passage, a thousand angry passions were warring at his heart.

Woe to those who should cross him while in his present mood!

Wild did not seem inclined immediately to seek the surface.

For a moment he paused, with his brows knit in silent thought.

Then, making up his mind, as it would seem, upon a point about which he had some hesitation, he crossed the corridor in a diagonal direction, and paused before another of the numerous cell-doors.

He deliberately undid the ponderous fastenings.

Then, flinging open the door, he strode in.

[JACK SHEPPARD DISCOVERS BLUESKIN'S CELL.]

A quantity of impure air gushed forth, and for a moment threatened to choke him.

The torch, too, suddenly diminished in lustre.

He shook it, however, and held it up above his head.

A dim radiance only proceeded from it.

The rustling of straw followed his entrance.

At first, however, the darkness was too intense for the keen eyes of the thief-taker to pierce it.

He strode still further into the cell, in spite of the noxious odour which assailed his senses.

Then was revealed a most miserable spectacle.

Crouching down upon a small quantity of damp and discoloured straw, was something in the form of a human being, but which looked far more like a wild beast.

It was a human being, however, as its presence in that place alone would testify.

And then, if any further proof was wanting, the miserable wretch, upon seeing who was his visitor, shrank back, in horror and detestation, as far as he was able.

Then, with wildly-gleaming eyes, which glittered ominously in the darkness of the dungeon, he glared upon the thief-taker.

Jonathan cast a satisfied glance upon the abject form at his feet.

He could see it more plainly every moment.

Not only was his vision becoming accustomed to the obscurity, but the foul air, rushing out and mingling with the comparatively pure air in the passage, allowed the torch to burn with greater brilliancy.

For some few moments Wild remained in a fixed attitude, gazing upon his prisoner.

He seemed to gloat over the havoc that had taken place in that once manly and robust frame.

Now, nothing but a poor miserable being, so horribly emaciated that his bones were literally sticking through the loosely-hanging skin, met his view.

Strengthless now was that once powerful arm; attenuated that once bold intellect.

Oh! it was a spectacle most heart-rending to look upon; and yet Jonathan contemplated it unmoved—or, at all events, with a species of satisfaction.

The reader may, perhaps, recognise this miserable being; and, great as may be the abhorrence which his former actions may have excited, still, we think, when viewing him in this plight, they will not refuse some small amount of sympathy.

It was the so-called Lord Doumull; but now so strangely altered, that not even his most intimate associate would recognise him.

The envious younger brother—the treacherous friend—the abductor of his infant niece, whom he doomed to a frightful death, in order that he might step into her place—the usurper of the poor child's inheritance—the accomplished villain—the victim of his associates—such was the being who now crouched down in abject fear before the thief-taker.

Such actions as his assuredly deserved punishment, but scarcely such as he received at the hands of the villain he had taken into his confidence, to free him from the complications of his situation.

Jonathan had betrayed him.

As long as he answered his purpose, and as long as he thought it safe, he had allowed him his liberty.

But, when remorse had seized upon him, when he talked of endeavouring to repair and atone for the misery he had caused, and the wrong he had done, then Wild judged it to be imprudent to let him remain at liberty any longer.

Treacherously he decoyed him into the cell, and here he had ever since remained.

At length Wild spoke.

From his manner, it would seem as though he had waited for the prisoner to speak.

Finding, however, that he exhibited no symptoms of doing so, the thief-taker addressed him.

He employed the same sneering, mocking tones as he had used to Blueskin, only, in consequence of the angry state of his mind, they were now so much bitterer.

"Well, my lord," he said, "you don't look quite so well to-day. I am sadly afraid the atmosphere of this place does not very well agree with you. However, it can't be altered. You must make the best of it you can. Why don't you speak, eh?"

The miserable prisoner seemed to struggle with his emotion for a moment, and then he said, in a voice so hollow that it seemed as though he had issued from a tomb—

"What have I to say to you, Jonathan Wild? You pay no attention to my supplications. Release me, and I will agree to do all that you demand of me."

"You should have reasoned yourself into this state of mind a little earlier."

"What mean you?"

"It is now too late."

"Too late?"

"Yes."

"How too late?"

"Be content to know that it is."

"You forget the papers."

"No, I don't."

The prisoner glared at the mocking countenance of his captor with dismay.

He had reckoned upon those papers as a kind of security for his life.

Now Wild did not seem to care about them.

His heart sickened.

With a voice so agitated that he could scarcely utter his words with sufficient distinctness to be understood, he said—

"You misunderstand me, Jonathan Wild."

The thief-taker shook his head.

"Indeed you must do. Those papers are essentially requisite to the consummation of that scheme which you have had the audacity to contemplate."

"You admit that?"

"I do," said the prisoner, eagerly. "I assure you of it."

"Indeed?"

"Yes; they are of the utmost importance. You cannot succeed in your designs without them."

"Are you sure of that?"

"Quite sure," said the poor prisoner, with increasing eagerness.

"That's a pity."

"Why?"

"You should have told me this before."

"What do you mean?"

"Just what I say."

"I cannot understand you."

"Did I not tell you it was too late?"

"Ye—es; but I cannot conceive how it could be too late."

Abel Doumull passed his hand over his forehead confusedly.

"You may take my word for it," said the thief-taker; "it is too late."

"But, I tell you again, that it is impossible for you to succeed in your plans without you have those documents in your possession."

"I admit that."

The prisoner looked puzzled and bewildered.

To Jonathan the contemplation of his eagerness and anxiety afforded the utmost delight.

He was now having his revenge upon him.

"You admit the importance of the papers," said the prisoner, after a momentary pause.

"I do. I have never attempted to deny it."

"Oh! Jonathan Wild," screamed Abel, full of the most horrible forebodings of what this scene preluded, "speak out more plainly—tell me all!"

"What more do you want to know?"

"The papers!"

"Well, what of them?"

"Release me, Jonathan Wild; fulfil your promise; let me reverse my former determination; release me, and I will place those papers in your hands."

A mocking smile came to Jonathan's lips.

"Too late," he said; "too late."

"Again those awful words," said the prisoner, wrought up to a pitch of madness.

"Yes, if they are awful words."

"To me they are, because I cannot understand them."

"They are easily enough understood, I should think."

"Jonathan Wild, listen to me."

"I am paying every attention."

"I am now a miserable object—the most wretched being on the face of the earth. So, perhaps, I ought to be. I am receiving the well-merited punishment for my villainy. Your turn will come some day."

Jonathan Wild shook visibly when these words fell with the force of a prophecy upon his ears.

The prisoner continued—

"Still, I desire my freedom; give it to me, and you shall receive those papers from me—they are now in a place where you will never find them."

CHAPTER CCCX.

LORD DONMULL AT LENGTH REAPS THE REWARD DUE TO HIS CRIMES.

"Are you sure of that?" said Jonathan, in a tone of voice that fairly made the flesh on the prisoner's bones creep again. "Are you sure that you have deposited those papers in a place where it is impossible for me, if I chose to take the trouble, to find them?"

The prisoner was silent.

For the first time he felt doubtful about the safety of the papers, and about the excellence of the hiding-place he had contrived for them.

His heart beat with redoubled violence, and he looked up to the thief-taker's countenance in a vain attempt to read his thoughts.

But he failed in this.

Making a great effort, he resolved to know the worst at once.

"Jonathan Wild," he said; "tell me—answer me—have you found those papers?"

The thief-taker did not immediately reply, but gazed mockingly upon his victim.

"If I have found them," he said, at length, in a tone of the deepest significance—"if I have found them, how much would you give for your life?"

"My life!" screamed the prisoner, the excitement of the moment lending him strength sufficient to start to his feet, and stand upright before his enemy.

"Yes," said Jonathan, unmoved, "your life!"

"But have you found the papers?"

"Did I not tell you you were too late, when you promised to place them in my hands?"

"You did, you did."

"What conclusion, then, can you draw from that?"

"The worst."

"The worst?"

"Yes, but that is not enough for me. Tell me at once, clearly and distinctly, whether you have found the papers."

"I have."

The prisoner staggered back and almost fell.

But a momentary hope, which gleamed across his brain, enabled him to recover himself.

That hope was that the thief-taker was deceiving him, and that, in reality, he had not found the papers.

He would question him, and then all doubts would be resolved.

Jonathan noticed this, and knew the hope by which he was inspired as well as if he had expressed it.

It rejoiced him to think how completely he should be able to demolish that hope, and how bitterly his victim would be disappointed.

His countenance remained unchanged.

The prisoner could gather nothing from that.

Feverishly, he proposed his first question—

"Where did you find the papers?"

"You thought you had hidden them where I should never find them!"

"I did."

"Then you were deceived."

"I have only your word for that."

"True; but what more evidence do you require?"

"Something that I can rely upon better."

"Ha! ha!"

Abel Donnnull could not control a shudder when he heard this laugh, which sounded so fiendish and triumphant.

His heart sank again.

Still he resolved to know the worst.

"Tell me," he said again, "where did you find those papers?"

"I confess I had some trouble in the matter," said Wild, without replying to the question asked him, "but, then, such a simple matter as that was not likely to baffle me. I sought till I found."

"Till you found?"

"Yes."

"But where did you find?"

"Don't be impatient."

"Jonathan Wild, I do not believe you; if you really had found the papers you would answer me."

"Oh! should I?" said Jonathan, mockingly.

"Oh! this suspenseful torture is horrible," groaned the prisoner. "Oh! that I knew the truth, and then I should know what to expect. Tell me, tell me."

"Do not excite yourself."

"Excite myself! Jonathan Wild, you must be a demon, though the shape you wear is human."

"Ha! ha!"

"I say you are a demon; if you were not, you could not contemplate, unmoved, such sufferings as mine are."

"You repent now, do you not, that you refused the offer I made you on the occasion of my last visit? If you had taken it you would have been at liberty by this time. Fool that you were, that when you saw a chance of achieving your freedom you did not embrace it. Now, that chance is gone."

"No, no; I will not believe it—at least, not without some further proof than your bare allegation."

"You might as well do so. I speak the truth."

"I should believe you if you would tell me where the papers were found."

"Your belief is immaterial; you can do just as you like. I say I have the papers, and you have no longer anything to offer that will induce me to set you at liberty."

"I cannot believe it. I took such pains, and gave such strict injunctions."

"I know you did."

"How? You know?"

"Yes. You little thought I should peruse the pretty little superscription you had written upon them."

The prisoner stared aghast.

Up to this moment he had cheated himself into the belief that Wild was trying to impose upon him.

His last speech, however, he well knew, indicated a knowledge of them, if nothing more.

"You have found them, then?" he gasped.

"Of course I have. I went first to your town mansion in Piccadilly, and searched it in vain—at least, not altogether in vain, for I found there a letter from a certain lawyer in the Temple. It was a letter about a mortgage, but it served to put me on the right scent. Do you believe me now, Abel, eh?"

A cold sweat had burst forth upon the brow of the unfortunate Lord Donnnull, and hung there in clustering beads.

His whole frame trembled, and he seemed in imminent danger of falling.

No longer could he delude himself with the idea that the papers were undiscovered; and yet, with the pertinacity of despair, he clung to the idea that Jonathan was deceiving him.

The thief-taker, however, went on.

"When I had once got that address the rest was simple. It is scarcely necessary to mention the name of the lawyer, but, as you seem so very hard of belief, I will do so. It is William Mudford, and his offices are in Pump-court, Temple. I went there, and found the packet of papers in a tin box containing other documents relating to the Donnnull family. You may be sure I lost no time in taking possession of such important papers. I was rather amused with that superscription of yours—it was so like you. Not content with confessing your own crimes, you must needs implicate me, and try to get my neck into the halter. However, that danger is past, so it does not matter. You don't look so well as you did a little while ago, my friend."

Every word of this last speech fell like repeated blows upon the heart of Abel Donnnull.

Jonathan had found the papers.

His words proved it.

All was now lost, and a deep groan came from his overcharged breast.

He had relied upon those papers as being the means of preserving his life; but now all was over: they were in the possession of Jonathan Wild, and he was wholly in his power.

These were terrible thoughts to have, and he glanced apprehensively at the darkening countenance of his foe.

What hope had he of mercy from such a man?

He shuddered, and resigned himself to the worst.

He leaned heavily against the wall.

Without its support he would have fallen.

He glanced, once more, furtively into the countenance of the thief-taker.

It wore a still more ominous expression.

The truth was, Jonathan Wild was tired of playing with his victim, and was contemplating the delivery of the last stroke.

Abel Donnnull knew his danger, and a scream came from his lips.

It was the first which struck upon the ears of Jack Sheppard.

He knew the danger of his position.

Now he would be nothing but an incumbrance to Wild, and the hated possessor of many dangerous secrets.

His death, then, would be most desirable.

Now that Wild had got the papers, what was to hinder him from taking it?

Nothing; but, at the same time that he came to this conclusion, he resolved not to suffer his life to be taken from him without making at least an effort to protect it.

He would sell it dearly.

As these thoughts swept through his brain with the velocity of the whirlwind, they suggested others.

A hope of escape presented itself to his view.

Jonathan Wild was there—within his reach—and off his guard.

Would it not be possible for him to spring forward with great suddenness, and cause the thief-taker such surprise as to render him incapable of resistance until he had got the mastery of him.

He thought so; and, as soon as the thought occurred to him, he proceeded to put it into execution, for he well knew that his position was most desperate, and that prompt measures could alone avail him.

All would depend upon his being able to take his adversary by surprise.

Of a truth, the thought of his prisoner making an attack upon him never once entered Wild's mind.

Excitement, and the hope of making his escape, not only from horrible captivity, but perhaps speedy death, endowed Abel Donnull with factitious strength sufficient for his purpose.

Turning swiftly round, he bounded forwards.

He had calculated his distance correctly before he took his spring, and his fingers grasped Wild tightly by the throat.

He felt them there, and, with the frenzy of a maniac, buried his vulture-like claws in his flesh.

Jonathan was taken by surprise.

So astonished was he that he dropped the torch, which, however, was not extinguished.

It smouldered on the ground, and diffused a faint light over the cell.

But Wild quickly recovered from his astonishment—long before his prisoner had time to obtain any decided advantage over him.

A horrible imprecation came from his lips.

Then he commenced a struggle.

But he was astonished at the strength of his adversary.

It was the strength of a maniac.

By an exertion of the tremendous muscular power which he possessed, Jonathan freed himself from his grasp, and forced Abel down on to the ground.

Then, releasing him with the quickness of thought, he sought in his pockets for the short, thick bludgeon, which he invariably carried with him.

To grasp it was the work of a moment.

Just then Abel Donnull struggled to his knees.

Uttering a fiendish yell, Jonathan raised the bludgeon in the air, and brought it down with terrific force.

Abel saw it coming.

He cried for mercy, and put up his hands to ward off the blow.

In vain.

The heavy bludgeon descended upon his head with a sickening crash! Another and another blow followed, and then Abel Donnull lay upon the floor of the cell with his skull completely beaten in.

CHAPTER CCCXI.

JACK SHEPPARD ASSURES HIMSELF OF THE DEPARTURE OF THE THIEF-TAKER, AND THEN MAKES HIS WAY INTO BLUESKIN'S CELL.

SUCH was the explanation of the awful shrieks which Jack had heard, and which he rightly enough imagined came from some one in his death agony.

Occupied as Jonathan was, it is not at all surprising that the slight noise Jack made in his excitement should have failed to reach his ears.

Little did Jack think from whom those shrieks proceeded, and that Edgworth Bess had one enemy less in the world.

At least, towards the last, Abel Donnull could scarcely be called her enemy.

He had repented of what he had done, and was desirous of making reparation.

It was this which sealed his death-warrant.

Had he continued to be the same as he was, Jonathan would have permitted him to live much longer yet, for he would have been of great service to him in the execution of his plans.

Now he was better dead.

Jack heard Wild close the door of the cell and lock it.

He heard him go a few paces and then pause.

For what purpose he knew not, without it was that he was pondering as to the cause of the noise which Jack had so incautiously made.

Whether this was so or not, Jonathan eventually continued on his way to the staircase leading up to the house.

For many minutes after all sounds had died away Jack continued to listen.

He knew the cunning and craft of his old enemy, and if he suspected anything he would be sure to go away in such a manner that his departure could not fail to be noticed, and then return with the utmost stealthiness.

It was prudent, then, for Jack to act as he did, and not risk all by any precipitate movement.

It was a hard trial upon his patience, for he was anxious, in the extreme, to let Blueskin know that he was so close at hand.

It was important, too, that as little time should be lost as possible.

Jack was full of anxiety as to the fate of Edgworth Bess, and he longed that himself and his friend were at liberty and searching for her.

Indeed, this was a point upon which he could not reflect, and he was compelled to banish the idea as much as possible from his mind.

To do this, he turned his thoughts upon his present situation.

All was still.

Jonathan Wild had, as he firmly believed, left the precincts of the cell.

Having come to this conclusion, he removed his ear from the door—against which it had been tightly pressed while he was listening.

As he did so, a faint groan came from the adjoining cell.

It went to his heart, for he was well enough aware that it was no ordinary suffering that would have the effect of wringing such a sound from Blueskin's lips.

He started to his feet—for he had been kneeling down—and made his way towards that wall which divided him from his companion.

In a low voice, he uttered the one word—

"Blueskin!"

It must have been heard, for a sudden clanking of chains and rustling of straw took place.

Again Jack pronounced the name.

"Who spoke?" asked a hollow voice. "Who spoke? Surely I am mad, or dreaming."

"Hush! do not speak so loud."

"Again that familiar voice. Oh! heaven, can it be possible?"

"Hush—hush! Be silent, or we shall be overheard. It is I—Jack Sheppard."

"Impossible!"

"No—no. I am here; here to effect your release."

"Where are you? Is it some cheat? I hear your voice plainly enough; where are you?"

"It is no cheat," replied Jack. "I am here in the next cell."

"In the next cell?"

"Yes."

"You, then, are a prisoner like myself. By what means has Jonathan got you into his power, and where is Edgworth Bess?"

"Not so fast with your questions, my friend," said Jack. "Wait a few moments; I will tell you all, presently."

"Why not now?"

"Because I want to make my way into your cell first."

"But how can you do that? It will take you a long time. You will find these walls formidable obstacles, even if you have proper tools to pierce them."

"Wait a bit," said Jack, "and you will see how I am going to manage it. It is not such a difficult matter as you seem to think."

"What are you about to do?"

"Are you not aware that just where the wall of the cell joins the ceiling there is a small square aperture, designed for the purpose of ventilation, and that it is in consequence of this that you can hear me speak so plainly?"

"Yes, I am well aware of all that."

"Very well, then, it is through that aperture I intend to make my way into your cell."

"Impossible!"

"Nonsense!"

"I tell you it is impossible."

"We will see about that."

"When Wild had those holes made," continued Blueskin, "he took care to have them so made as to prevent all possibility of a prisoner getting through them."

"Well, you will see. Here I come!"

As he spoke, Jack Sheppard gave a spring upwards, and caught hold of the edge of the square opening with his fingers.

This is what he had done on the former occasion; and, having obtained a hold with the ends of his fingers, he had, by the muscular power in his arms, drawn himself up until he could get a firmer grasp.

This he attempted to do in the present instance.

But he failed.

His fingers gave way, and refused to support the weight of his body.

He was compelled to drop to the ground.

He forgot that on the former occasion he was possessed of his full strength, and could perform such a feat easily.

Now, however, the case was entirely different.

He was worn out and exhausted by the want of sufficient food and rest, and by almost superhuman exertions.

His heart fluttered painfully when he saw how his strength failed him.

He did not hurt himself when he dropped to the ground, for the distance was but short.

His failure, however, did not dishearten him.

Indeed, it seemed to have an altogether contrary effect. Convinced that he had not enough strength to pull himself up by the assistance of his arms alone, he endeavoured to find something that would aid him in his ascent.

A rapid search round the cell showed him that there was nothing there of a portable character that was likely to answer his purpose.

Then a fresh idea struck him.

With the aid of the strong blade of his clasp-knife, he should easily be able to pick out sufficient mortar between two of the stones to enable him to thrust his toe into the crevice, and so mount by this means.

No sooner did this thought strike him, than he set about trying to carry it into effect.

Blueskin inquired anxiously what he was about, and Jack at once explained his difficulty.

He attacked the mortar with his clasp-knife vigorously, and soon had the satisfaction of perceiving that he made rapid progress, and that he should soon have a crevice large enough for his toes to be inserted in it.

He worked away with right good will.

The mortar was soft, owing to the continual damp, and a tolerable space was left between each of the stones. At length he ceased his labour.

He restored his clasp-knife to his pocket, and, summoning all his strength, gave a spring upwards once more.

Again he succeeded in obtaining a hold, and this time he was able to retain it, because his feet had something to rest upon.

By another effort he succeeded in thrusting his head and shoulders through the small square aperture.

He was now all right, and, stimulated by his success, forced himself still further through.

A dim kind of twilight pervaded Blueskin's cell, which would have been utter darkness for anyone who had not been immured in it for some time.

By the aid of this, however, Jack was just able to distinguish the figure of Blueskin lying on the ground.

The weight of his fetters, and the weakness produced by his wound, prevented him from rising.

"Do you not find the hole too small for you to force yourself through it?"

"Not a bit of it," replied Jack, in as cheerful a voice as he could assume; "when Jonathan contrived this, he did not reckon upon having a prisoner as slender as I am."

"Come to me, Jack, if you can. I am unable to come to you or assist you in any way."

"Cheer up," said Jack. "I shall be able to manage without your help, I have no doubt."

As he spoke these words, Jack strove to force himself through.

But this he found a by no means easy task.

Had there been some one on the other side who could have caught hold of his arms and pulled him down he could have managed well enough, but as it was his position was a very awkward one.

By slow degrees he wriggled himself through, however; but in the end he was compelled to drop rather awkwardly to the ground.

But he did not mind that in the least.

He was on his feet again, and by the side of Blueskin, in a moment.

The greeting between the two friends was a warm one, and each was impatient to hear from the other an account of what had happened since the separation.

They talked rapidly for some time, but, as all the events about which they spoke have already been set down in their proper place, it is needless for us to place the particulars of their conversation before the reader.

They did not cease until Blueskin had told Jack all that had befallen him since the moment of their parting in the ruined farmhouse, and until Jack had told Blueskin all that had happened to himself since the same period.

As the reader may suppose, from the immense number of incidents, this mutual relation consumed a great deal of time.

Blueskin was especially concerned when he was told of the mysterious disappearance of Edgworth Bess.

It seemed to have the effect of inspiring him with fresh strength, for he felt all the importance of at once effecting his release.

On the other hand, Jack could not help feeling alarmed at finding Blueskin in so grievous and dangerous a state.

At length a perfect and thorough understanding was arrived at, and they proceeded to talk over their future actions.

Jack Sheppard was in a sinking state for want of food, and inquired of Blueskin whether he was supplied with any.

He was replied to in the affirmative, but at the same time informed that the supplies came very irregularly.

At the present moment there was no food, of any description, in the cell, for the rats had devoured the remains.

Jack then bethought himself of the provisions he had had the forethought to place in his pockets.

The quantity was but small, and half was already eaten.

Still he took out what was left, and, dividing it into two equal portions, gave one to Blueskin and took one himself.

He also produced a flask which contained a small quantity of spirit, and of this he partook equally with his companion.

After their meal Jack felt much better, and he at once proclaimed his readiness to set about attempting to effect his release.

CHAPTER CCCXII.

JACK SHEPPARD RELIEVES BLUESKIN FROM HIS FETTERS, AND IMMEDIATELY SETS ABOUT ATTEMPTING TO ESCAPE.

"BUT, Jack," said Blueskin, "have you any idea whether it is day or night? If it is the former, it will be very injudicious to take any steps."

Jack passed his hand over his forehead, and strove to recollect whether it was day or night.

But he was unable to speak with precision.

The swoon into which he had fallen upon first making his way into the cell, and of the duration of which he could form no idea, baffled him entirely.

He racked his brain for some time to no purpose, and was at length compelled to give up the attempt in despair.

"We must run our risk, Blueskin," he said, "whether it is day or night; for if my life depended upon it I cannot tell you, and it is just as likely to be one as the other."

"True; and yet I wish we could ascertain. The point is such an important one."

"I admit that; but can you see any means of doing so?"

"Alas! no. I can think of none."

"Cheer up! my friend," said Jack. "You must not speak so despondingly as that, or we shall never do anything, you may depend."

"It is my weakness and my wounds."

"I know your sufferings must be great."

"These fetters!" said Blueskin, "they weigh me down!"

"Pardon me, my friend," said Jack. "I had forgotten them. Our first step towards escape must be the removal of them. Fortunately, I have the means of freeing you from such an encumbrance."

As he spoke, Jack drew forth his file.

A gleam of hope and joy irradiated Blueskin's heart. Jack commenced filing vigorously at the fetters.

The iron of which they were composed, though heavy, was soft, and the file sank into it as it would into wood, for its teeth were sharp, and the steel of which it was made well tempered.

"Have you another file, Jack?" asked Blueskin, who had viewed his companion's proceedings with the utmost satisfaction. "If you have, fear not that I shall be able to make use of it; and that will reduce the length of your task somewhat."

"I have only this one file," said Jack, pausing for a moment in his work, "and if I had another, I don't think I should let you make use of it."

"Why not?"

"You will have need of all the strength you can muster when the eventful moment comes."

"I know it."

"It won't be the easiest matter in the world to walk out of here, I can tell you."

"I know that, too."

"Very well, then; while I am at work at these fetters, do you listen with all the ears you have got, and warn me in time should anyone be approaching."

"Right; I will do so. But, Jack!"

"What?"

"Suppose someone was to enter this cell while you were here; what would you do?"

"Well, I hardly know."

"The point deserves attention, for someone is almost sure to come."

"We must wait till then," said Jack, carelessly, "and rely upon our good luck. You can think it over if you like, but mind you don't forget to listen."

And, speaking these words, Jack resumed his task of filing the fetters.

It was astonishing to see what progress he made.

He did not, however, file through one thoroughly, but left it secured by a thin piece, which he could sever in a moment.

In this manner he did them all.

The motive was an obvious one.

Should anyone enter the cell before he had completed his task, their suspicions would not be so likely to be aroused.

They were, however, left completely undisturbed.

Although Jack worked with such speed and energy, the fetters were so complicated a description that a very long time elapsed before he completed his task.

He was filing away at the last link, when Blueskin's quick ear detected a slight sound in the corridor without.

He informed Jack of it, who ceased instantly and listened too.

The slight sound was developed into a footstep.

Jack's position was now critical.

To return to the cell he had, with so much trouble, left, he looked upon as an impossibility.

Should a visit to Blueskin's cell be intended, he was certain he could never squeeze himself through the small aperture in time to avoid detection.

What, then, was to be done? for, if he remained, and anyone entered, his discovery appeared to be inevitable.

The prisoners were able to hear with great distinctness all that took place in the corridor without, in consequence of the opening above the door, which we have frequently had occasion to describe.

It was through this that a faint, dim light found its way into Blueskin's cell.

As both listened they could distinguish the footsteps of two persons.

They heard them pause, and the door opened.

"They are going their rounds to supply the prisoners with food. Conceal yourself, or we are lost, for my cell is sure to be visited."

"We shall be found, not lost, I think," muttered Jack.

"How am I to conceal myself in this cell?" he added, in a louder voice.

"I know not, I know not," replied Blueskin. "I fear all is over with us."

"Do not despair, my friend. Even if they entered, the chances are a thousand to one the cell will not be examined, and, as a natural consequence, my presence will pass unnoticed."

"Betake yourself to the most obscure corner," said Blueskin.

"I shall do that, you may depend," replied Jack.

"Hark! they come!"

The footsteps sounded nearer.

Various other cell-doors were undone and quickly fastened again, which confirmed Blueskin's statement about the prisoners being supplied with food.

Few words passed between the two persons, whoever they were.

At length they paused before Blueskin's cell.

Now was the anxious moment.

Jack Sheppard glided towards that corner of the cell which would be concealed by the door when opened, and screwed himself as close as he possibly could against the wall.

Blueskin lay down upon the straw as though insensible or sleeping.

A key rattled in the lock of the door, and then a voice said—

"This is Blueskin's cell, Mr. Wild. Shall I leave anything here?"

A pause ensued, which was presently broken by the voice of the thief-taker.

"No, curse you!" he said. "Who told you to put your key in that lock?"

"I thought, Mr. Wild!"

"What business have you to think, villain?"

The man submissively removed the key.

"No," continued Wild, speaking in a very loud voice, "you will leave no provisions in that cell until you have further orders from me."

"Very good, Mr. Wild."

"You are not even to open the door of this cell without I am with you and give you instructions to do so. Do you understand me?"

"Perfectly well," replied the janizary, whose voice was a strange one both to Jack and Blueskin. "I understand you perfectly well, and you can rely upon my faithfully carrying out all your instructions."

"Above all, see that you obey me in this," said the thief-taker; "and now follow me."

As he spoke these words, Jonathan strode away from the spot.

Jack drew a long breath of relief when he thought of the danger he had been fortunate enough to escape.

He did not venture to utter a word, however, while Wild was anywhere within the precincts of the cells, for he did not know how far his voice would be carried.

Blueskin, too, remained perfectly silent, doubtless for the very same reason, though, perhaps, he was better aware of the danger of carrying on a conversation in one of the cells while Jonathan Wild was at hand than even Jack was.

It seemed a weary time to them while Jonathan and the janizary went the round of the cells, but at length they heard the welcome sound of their returning footsteps.

They passed the door, and at length silence once more reigned in that gloomy region.

In a faint voice, Jack spoke.

"Well, Blueskin," he said, affecting to make light of their dangerous position, "what do you think of that?"

"Of what?"

"Of Jonathan's kind intentions towards you."

"Oh I understand all that. I am rather surprised he should have tried such a thing upon me."

"What do you mean?"

"Why, that conversation that took place outside the door was a planned affair, and intended as a means of intimidation."

"Oh I indeed."

"Jonathan spoke like that on purpose. He wanted me to overhear his instructions, and understand that it was his design to accomplish my death by starvation. I should, doubtless, be kept without food for a considerable length of time in order to give colour to it, and then he would pay me a visit, and renew his infamous proposals to me."

"You seem to understand him pretty well."

"And so I ought to, after knowing him for the length of time I have, and after having had so many opportunities of studying his character."

"True! true!" said Jack; "I see it now plain enough. He would calculate upon that little bit of conversation making a deep impression on your mind."

"And it would be admirably calculated to do so, were I less well acquainted with the motives that actuated him."

"Just so. But, Blueskin, I tell you what it is—the sooner we get out of this place, the better. It is evident you will have nothing given you to eat at present; and therefore, the longer we stay, the less able we shall be to achieve our escape.

"Exactly," replied Blueskin. "I should not recommend you to delay another moment. But how are you to get that door open? it is very strongly secured."

"Leave the door to me," said Jack, "I'll manage it; but I think the best thing I can do, is to free you altogether from your fetters."

"I shall be very glad to be released from them, for in my present state their weight is more than I can sustain without enduring great fatigue."

"Well, I don't think we need fear another visit just at present."

"Certainly not."

"All right, then. For before the time comes round for them to pay another, I trust we shall be far away."

"So do I, with all my heart."

Without any further delay Jack now proceeded to file through Blueskin's fetters; and this task, owing to the effective manner in which the former part of his labour was accomplished, occupied but an incredibly short space of time.

One by one the ponderous links were removed, and then Blueskin once more, thanks to the exertions of his friend, was unshackled.

Feeling his body relieved of the intolerable weight which pressed him down, he felt that already no inconsiderable step had been taken in the direction of freedom.

Much, however, yet remained to be done; but Jack had confidence in his own powers, and he at once made his way to the door, which was the chief obstacle he would have to overcome—for, after passing through it, the remainder would be comparatively easy.

CHAPTER CCCXIII.

JACK SHEPPARD MAKES HIS WAY INTO THE PASSAGE, AND ENCOUNTERS WILD AND HIS MYRMIDONS.

THERE are, however, few, we venture to affirm, who would have looked upon that door with the same amount of easy indifference that Jack did.

Its massive strength seemed to set at defiance all efforts which might be made to force it.

Indeed, it had been specially constructed to render such a thing impossible; and the reader may be sure that Jonathan took the utmost care that Blueskin should be perfectly secure.

Oh! how astonished and incredulous the great thief-taker would have been if, when he stood at the door of the cell, someone had whispered in his ear that Jack Sheppard was within it, as well as Blueskin!

But Jonathan was not destined to receive any such intimation; and, as we have seen, he took his departure in ignorance.

A little more light would have been of infinite service to Jack in the task he was about to commence; but, as that was out of the question, he forbore to think about it.

Carefully Jack felt the door with his hands, before he attempted to make any attack upon it.

He found the bolt of the lock shot into a small place in the stonework, provided specially for its reception.

Now, could this stone be removed, he thought that would be at once the quickest and easiest way of getting the door open.

He resolved to make the attempt.

The success he had already met with in using the clasp-knife, encouraged him to persevere in the use of it.

Again taking it from his pocket, he opened the blade, and with it begun, in just the same manner as before, to pick away the mortar.

Here, however, he found his task much more difficult, for the wall was tolerably dry, and the mortar consequently firm.

Still, the keen edge of the clasp-knife soon made an impression upon it.

Little by little did the crumbled mortar fall down upon the floor of the dungeon.

Jack worked with a speed and industry remarkable to a degree.

In less time than even his companion Blueskin considered possible, he had loosened the stone so much that he could move it backwards and forwards, and almost draw it out.

Success inspired him with fresh vigour, and more mortar came away before the sharp point of the knife.

At length the stone came away in his hands, when he drew it towards him.

So far, then, all was well.

But though the door was no longer secured by the lock, it still remained firm and immovable.

There were the massive bolts, and there was the heavy bar of iron.

Both these formidable securements had to be removed. Unweariedly Jack continued with his task.

The heavy drops of perspiration fell from his brow like tears, but he heeded not this proof of the exertions he was making.

He continued his efforts.

He first set to work upon the iron bar.

It was lucky he knew the exact manner in which these were put up, because it rendered his task all the easier in devising a means whereby he could take it down.

He still made use of his clasp-knife.

Inserting the blade between the door and the stone wall, which served for a door-post, he moved it up and down until he encountered the bar.

Then, putting forth his utmost strength, he raised the handle of the knife, and strove to lift the bar from its setting.

For a long time he was unsuccessful, for it fitted into the staples provided for its reception tightly.

At length, however, he felt it yield to the upward pressure which he applied to it.

He put forth his utmost strength.

It went still higher.

Again he tried, and this time the blade of the knife slipped in some inexplicable manner, and the iron bar descended to its former position.

Jack gave utterance to an impotent curse.

Rendered passionate by the defeat, he put forth redoubled strength.

Up went the bar, and the next moment it fell with a clang upon the stone flooring of the corridor.

This was something they had not foreseen, and Jack and Blueskin felt their blood suddenly congeal to ice upon hearing the frightful sound, which, they doubted not, would reach the ears of some of thief-taker's myrmidons.

However, it would never do to hesitate, and Jack commenced an attack upon the bolts with the frenzy of desperation.

But they were firm, and of themselves sufficient security for any door—no matter how strong.

But they could not stand against Jack's file.

This was thin and sharp.

He was now easily able to introduce it between the door and the wall; and he worked it backwards and forwards with great rapidity.

At each stroke he could feel the file sink deeper and deeper into the soft iron.

At length it was severed.

Exultant, Jack turned towards the one remaining bolt.

When he had filed through that, the door would swing open upon its hinges.

Under such circumstances, who would not apply himself to work with redoubled ardour?

What Jack performed was really incredible.

In less than half the time the first had taken the second bolt was sawn through.

With a beating heart, he pushed against the door.

It swung open.

In the twinkling of an eye, he was in the corridor.

Turning round instantly, he assisted Blueskin up the somewhat steep steps leading from the cells.

But now a fresh and quite unexpected danger awaited them.

The bar, the fall of which, Jack fondly hoped, had been productive of no alarm, had, on the contrary, aroused the attention of the man whose duty it was to keep guard at the grating.

It was night; and, as usual, he was in a half-slumbering state.

The falling bar awoke him, but he did not know exactly what it was.

He paused and listened.

But all was still; for the noise Jack made with the file was too slight to reach so great a distance.

Unsatisfied, and confident that something unusual had taken place—and dreading, too, the punishment he would surely meet with for any neglect of duty—he rose to his feet, unfastened the grating, and crept down the steps.

Upon reaching the foot of them, the grinding of the file struck upon his ears.

He jumped to a conclusion respecting what was taking place.

Some prisoners were endeavouring to escape.

Back to the hall he went with the rapidity of thought.

He whispered a few words to the man on the lock, and then darted up the stairs to Wild's room.

Jonathan and his son—outwardly better friends than ever—were sitting one on each side of the fireplace, smoking, and indulging in occasional conversation.

Two words sufficed to acquaint Wild with the state of affairs.

He started to his feet with an oath, and seized a huge, heavy sword, which he had unbuckled from his waist before he set down, and placed in a little nook by the side of the fireplace.

Wild, junior, also snatched up a brace of pistols, and the three made their way with full speed down the stairs.

Upon reaching the bottom, Jonathan called to the man on the lock to follow them, as he was the only janizary on duty and ready for immediate service.

Through the iron grating they passed in a dense throng, so dense as somewhat as impede each other's progress.

When about half-way down the steps, they were able to see the full length of the passage, and, to the unutterable consternation of Jonathan Wild, who should he see emerge from a cell, but Jack Sheppard.

At first he stood aghast, unable to credit the avouch of his own eyes.

He glared at him.

He saw him raise Blueskin from the cell.

Jonathan Wild now uttered a shout.

He could not have stifled it had his life depended upon his doing so.

It reached the ears of our two friends, and let them know the danger with which they were menaced.

They were on their guard instantly.

The thief-taker dashed down the few remaining steps with the disregard for personal safety which characterizes the conduct of a maniac.

His son and the two janizaries, who were all greatly excited, followed him closely.

Jonathan made sure he had his prey in his grasp, and he felt exultant accordingly.

He felt sure it was impossible for them to escape, and that, though they might resist, he should be sure of them in the end.

He forgot the very important circumstance that the secret of the outlet into the yard was known to Jack Sheppard.

Indeed, it was so long since he had had any occasion to make use of it, that he had almost forgotten its existence.

It was not, therefore, to be surprised at, that, though they were free from their cells, he considered them quite as much his prisoners.

"Yield—yield!" he shouted, "or I will fire and be the death of you!"

To this speech Jack and Blueskin paid not the least attention, but made their way along the passage to the first secret door leading to the second series of cells.

Jack Sheppard knew not the means by which this was opened, but, fortunately for their safety, Blueskin did.

He pressed upon the spring, and the door flew open instantly.

They were through it with a speed and celerity really marvellous.

Upon seeing this, a yell of furious rage came from Jonathan's lips.

Our friends did not hear the whole of it.

It was abruptly cut short by Jack, who, as soon as they had gained the inner passage, swung the door shut after him.

It closed with a sharp snap.

They did not pause, however, for they were well aware this would be only a momentary check, for Jonathan would, of course, know how to press upon the spring.

Nevertheless, it was a slight advantage.

Without slackening his speed, Jack ran to the end of this second passage, to where the stone was which would enable them to reach the yard above.

Of this Blueskin was in ignorance until Jack had informed him of it in the course of the conversation they had had with each other in the dungeon.

Just as they gained this stone, the other secret door was dashed open with terrific violence, and the gigantic form of the thief-taker and his adherents appeared at it.

Upon seeing what Jack was about, his rage knew no bounds, and the absolute frenzy of a madman took possession of him.

CHAPTER CCCXIV.

JACK SHEPPARD AND BLUESKIN SUCCEED IN REACHING NEWGATE-MARKET, BUT JONATHAN WILD FOLLOWS HARD UPON THEIR TRACK.

THE situation of Blueskin and Jack Sheppard was now desperate in the extreme, and nothing would save them from death or capture but the adoption of some mode of action, the daring and boldness of which would be commensurate with the occasion.

The first secret door through which Wild was making his way was narrow, and it was impossible for more than one to pass through it at a time.

Jonathan's bulky form now occupied the opening.

Close behind him, standing in a dense throng, were the two janizaries, and Wild, junior.

This gave Jack an idea.

It flashed across his mind the moment he turned round, which Jonathan's frightful yell had involuntarily compelled him to do.

He saw the position of his enemies, crowded together as though in a tube.

Quick as thought, he drew a brace of loaded pistols from his pocket, cocked them, and fired both at once.

The scene of confusion which followed can be imagined.

In that confined space, it was impossible for the bullets to be harmless.

On the contrary, they must, of necessity, be terribly destructive.

Another yell came from the lips of the thief-taker, but its character was altogether different to those which he had previously uttered.

It was one of pain.

It was echoed by other cries from his rear, for the two pistol shots had done frightful execution.

Jack Sheppard did not, however, wait to see this.

As soon as the pistols were fired, he turned towards the stone that opened upon the steps.

He pressed upon the spring.

The stone revolved.

The steps were disclosed.

Jack stood aside.

"Mount, Blueskin!" he said, urgently. "Mount, and be quick for your life."

Our old friend did not want to be told twice, but dashed through the small opening.

Jack followed as closely as was practicable, and pulled the stone sharply after him.

He had the satisfaction of hearing the spring go snap, which assured him it was fastened.

This staircase was profoundly dark, and Blueskin had to grope up it in the best manner he could.

He struck himself several times against projecting portions of the masonry, but such trifling accidents as these he took no notice of.

The reader will recollect that, when Jack Sheppard passed through the square opening in the yard, he had restored the movable stone to its ordinary position, being confident of his power to raise it when the proper moment came.

It would have been running a risk to have left it open, for he could not have told who might come into the yard, though, at the same time, he was aware that the thief-taker made but little use of his back premises.

Ascending the steps, then, which were spiral, Blueskin, not knowing how high he had to go, struck his head a rather sharp blow against this stone, and then came to a sudden halt.

[EDGORTH BESS SUCCUMBS TO EXHAUSTION AND DESPAIR.]

Jack, who guessed what had happened, told him to remain still while he passed him.

Owing to the narrowness of the staircase, this was a difficult matter.

Jack's body was small, however, and he managed it.

He found that it required all his strength to lift the stone.

He succeeded in raising it, however, and slipped through.

He held the stone up while Blueskin followed him.

Having reached so far in safety, they paused to listen.

A confused noise came from below.

Jack was about to place the stone slab in its proper place when a fresh thought struck him.

He communicated it to Blueskin, whose approval was immediate.

By their joint strength they raised the stone completely from its setting.

They then turned it until they held it cornerwise over the staircase.

Then they let go.

It dropped with a tremendous crash upon the steps, and effectually blocked up the passage.

Jack and Blueskin were now quite confident that Wild and his followers could not make their way by that means into the yard.

They would have to return along the passage, ascend the steps leading up into the hall, and reach the yard by means of the back-door.

This gave our friends time.

It was very necessary.

There was the door to open, which led out into Newgate-market, and he could not tell until he tried what trouble he should have in doing so.

He now at once made his way towards it.

For a moment, however, we will return to the proceedings of Jonathan Wild, who was quite impressed with the notion that he had his prisoners in a kind of trap, from which they could not escape.

Their passing so readily through the first secret door was the first thing that staggered him in his belief.

He increased his speed, and shouted to those who followed to keep close behind him.

The secret spring was, of course, well known to Wild.

He pressed upon it, and the door swung open.

Then, to his unutterable horror, he saw Jack in the act of removing the stone which led to the staircase, the existence of which he fondly hoped was known only to himself.

At the moment he did not recollect that Jack Sheppard had once before made his way into the cells by that means.

It was this discovery which caused him to utter the dreadful yell.

Then, before he could fairly gain the inner passage, Jack Sheppard fired the brace of pistols.

Wild uttered a howl.

He felt himself hit.

He staggered a pace or two, and then, throwing his arms about him in a strange manner, fell gasping to the ground.

His cry of pain was echoed by Wild, junior; for he, too, was hit, but not severely.

The bullet which had struck his father, wounded him also on the cheek, along which it made a deep furrow and took off a piece of the lower part of his ear in its progress.

The other bullet struck the man who had charge of the grating, full in the chest, and he fell back dead without uttering a groan, carrying in his fall his companion with him.

Wild, junior, was the only one out of the four who kept his feet, and he gave vent to a volley of curses that would have done credit to his parent.

The unhurt janizary was the first to struggle to his feet.

Jonathan followed.

He was by far more frightened than hurt.

The bullet had struck him slightly on the head, and produced a momentary insensibility.

At first he thought he was killed, but he quickly recovered from his panic.

He had dropped his sword when he fell, and now, taking it up once more, he rushed up the steps.

A faint gleam of light came down from the night-sky, and to this circumstance was Jonathan indebted for escaping a sudden and violent contact with the stone Jack and Blueskin dropped down.

As it so happened, he saw it in time to save himself from any injury.

He comprehended in an instant what had been done.

He made no attempt to remove the stone, for he well knew that all his efforts would be futile.

He turned round swiftly, determined to reach the yard as quickly as possible by the other route.

As he hastened along, he called out to his son and made him aware of what had happened, and ordered him to follow.

George—whose blood was up, and who, on such occasions, resembled his rascally parent more than he did at any other time—did not need twice bidding.

The janizary brought up the rear.

Wild shouted out his instructions to him.

"Run to the stables," he said, "and get ready horses and men. Take them round into Warwick-lane at once."

Upon reaching the hall, Jonathan was pleased to find that several of his men, aroused by the tremendous tumult, had assembled there.

He waved his sword, and, in a shrieking tone of voice, called to them to follow him.

They obeyed.

He led the way to the back of the house, and dashed open the door that led into the yard.

So expeditious had he been in his movements that Jack and Blueskin had only just left the yard.

We now revert to them.

Upon reaching the door, the first thing that attracted Jack's notice was, that there were a couple of bolts at the top and bottom of the door.

He had some difficulty in withdrawing them, for they had got completely rusted into their sockets.

At length, however, he succeeded.

But the door did not then yield.

It was still further secured by means of a ponderous lock.

How this was to be undone in the time seemed a mystery.

But Jack set to work with a good heart.

Taking the file out of his pocket, he endeavoured to force back the bolt of the lock with the point of it.

But, so far from succeeding, he only deprived himself of a useful tool, for, in bending it, he broke it in the middle.

With the largest fragment he renewed his attempt.

This time he succeeded.

The bolt flew back with a snap.

The door now gave way before the pressure which they applied to it.

They passed through, and found themselves in the long dark passage leading into Newgate-market.

It was just at this moment that Jonathan Wild reached the yard.

He was, indeed, fearfully close upon their track, and the perils of the escaping prisoners were by no means over.

Jonathan was rendered furious by the pain of the wound he had received, and there is little doubt that, could he have overtaken Jack and Blueskin at this moment, his anger would have been so great as to render him oblivious of the refined system of revenge he had resolved to pursue in connexion with them, and would have immediately sacrificed them.

Such, however, was not to be.

Jonathan saw the open door before him, and knew in a moment that his prey had fled.

Without hesitation he entered the dark passage, and, traversing it with full speed, emerged directly afterwards into Newgate-market.

Here no trace of them could be seen.

Calculating, however, that they would make their way towards the entrance gates in Warwick-lane, he hastened in that direction.

It was here where the horses were to be.

Upon arriving at the gates, which had not yet been closed for the night—for, though it was dark, the evening was by no means far advanced—Jonathan looked eagerly up and down the street in search, not only of the fugitives, but also of the janizaries and their horses.

Of neither, however, could anything be seen.

The horses would come from the direction of Newgate-street.

This was a route he could hardly conceive the fugitives would take, and, if they did, they would be almost sure to be intercepted.

Bidding his son remain at the gateway, and leaving instructions that as soon as the horses arrived they were to mount and follow him, Wild ran with full speed down Warwick-lane in the direction of Paternoster-row.

CHAPTER CCCXV.

THE PURSUIT OF JACK SHEPPARD AND BLUESKIN BY JONATHAN WILD.

WEARY, faint, and almost overcome—the one by the weakness proceeding from his wounds, and the other from the immense amount of exertion he had undergone—Blueskin and Jack Sheppard ran, with all the speed they could possibly make, through the dark and narrow alleys of Newgate-market.

They could hear how close behind them their inveterate foe was, and the knowledge endowed them with greater fleetness than they believed possible.

They did not speak, however, because that would have involved a greater expenditure of breath than they could afford to lose.

Jack led the way towards Warwick-lane, as Wild had correctly anticipated he would.

He expected he should have to climb the gates again, and he trembled when he thought of the length of time it would necessarily take.

It was quite an agreeable surprise when he found them standing wide open.

They darted through like shadows.

The danger of going in the direction of Newgate was obvious, and so Jack turned the other way.

With much ado, Blueskin kept up with him.

Every few moments he would feel his brain swim and his legs threaten to give way beneath him.

Each time, however, that he experienced this sensation of weakness, he rallied himself by a violent effort.

But this was a state of things which could not last.

He would have to succumb ere long.

In his weak state the exercise of running was quite beyond his powers.

He lost his breath, and his heart beat with so much rapidity that he dreaded every moment it would burst.

Still he kept on.

On his part, Jack Sheppard suffered scarcely less severely.

When Wild and his men were mounted, what chance would they then have for escape?

Indeed, their position now looked worse than ever, and both were almost ready to give up in despair.

On came the thief-taker, as remorseless and un pitying as fate.

They could hear his shouts on the still night air, as he induced others to join in the chase.

Then the trampling of horses' hoofs came upon their ears.

The cattle had arrived; and Wild, junior, agreeably to his father's instructions, had mounted and followed after him.

He overtook the thief-taker in a few moments, and Jonathan mounted the spare horse that was provided for his use.

The chase was then resumed.

Jack Sheppard had been aware from the first that it would be of no use for him to try to outrun his enemy, and had made up his mind to seek shelter at the first opportunity.

But, hitherto, no chance had presented itself, nor did any now.

Jonathan was gaining on them fearfully.

Suddenly, in his headlong course, Jack observed a narrow turning, and, quick as thought, he turned down it.

His principal reason for so doing was, that the passage was impassable to horses, and his enemies would have to dismount to follow them.

This would result in the gaining of a little time.

They turned down, however, only just in time.

So close was Jonathan behind them, and so much greater was his speed than theirs, that, before they could have gone twenty yards further, they would have been overtaken.

As it was, Wild saw them turn down the narrow alley, and stopped his own horse so suddenly and unexpectedly, that he ran a narrow escape of being ridden over by those behind.

There was a slight collision.

He dismounted recklessly, and cried—

"Follow me! follow me, quickly! They are trapped at last. This place has no outlet. Follow me! We are sure to have them now!"

A triumphant sort of shout came from the desultory throng, and then they all poured down the alley.

These were dreadful words for our friends, if true; and Wild would scarcely make such a statement without having some foundation for it.

If it so happened that that particular alley, like many others in London, was so constructed as to have but one outlet, how were Blueskin and Jack Sheppard to escape?

As Jonathan had triumphantly enough said, he was sure to have them.

The statement was true.

Jack discovered it before the thief-taker spoke, and he uttered an impotent curse at his own folly for getting into such a dilemma.

The narrow turning was only a few yards in length, and there was no other outlet to it than that commanded by Wild and his gang.

With eyes almost starting from their sockets, Jack and Blueskin glared about them.

Both were utterly exhausted, and the breath came from their lungs only in short and fitful gasps.

The perspiration rolled off them in streams, and its copiousness was increased by the discovery that they had run into such a trap.

Discovery seemed inevitable.

It was just at this moment that they heard Wild shout to his men in the manner we have related.

Few men possessed a more intimate knowledge of the streets and alleys of London, in all their ramifications, than did Jonathan Wild.

The moment he saw them go down the turning we have mentioned, he knew there was no outlet.

By the time he had finished speaking, nearly all his troop had dismounted, and followed by these, as well as by a whole troop of ragamuffins who had followed in the rear, attracted by their cries, he dashed down the alley.

The place was profoundly dark, and it was with difficulty that Wild saw about him.

The inhabitants of the locality, however, gave indications of having been aroused by the tumult.

Lights appeared at the various casements, where all had been darkness a moment before, and heads were projected, all eager to learn the cause of the disturbance.

In fact, the alarm was fast becoming general.

Paying no heed to all this, however, Jonathan Wild centred the whole of his attention upon searching the alley for our two friends.

Sword in hand, he rushed into the dark corners, of which there were many, and made furious thrusts in the darkness.

All this was in vain.

No trace could be discovered of those he sought.

Perplexed and alarmed by this mysterious disappearance, he recommenced his search, and concluded it without coming to any other result.

Upon this, a storm of the most horrible imprecations came from his lips, and in this pleasant, edifying little amusement he was ably seconded by his son.

Cursing, however, did nothing for them.

Feeling himself impeded in his movements by those around him, Jonathan looked up and saw the alley was now densely packed with people; so from this it became quite clear that our friends were not in it, or they must have been seen by some one.

Jonathan was now forced to come to a very unwilling conclusion, and that was that his prey had sought refuge in one of the many houses which had doors opening into the court.

If this was so, and he could account in no other way for their disappearance, then his chances of capturing them were much diminished.

It would be impossible for him to say which of the houses they had entered, and, while he was searching one, they would have ample opportunities to get off if they happened to be in another.

He was thus in a state of great uncertainty, and not able to decide upon the best course of action that should be adopted.

While his indecision lasted, the fugitives were, doubtless, actively engaged in getting away.

Suddenly he thought of an expedient.

He forced his way into the middle of the crowd.

He got a couple of his janizaries to raise him above their shoulders.

Thus elevated, he was, of course, a conspicuous object.

He was seen by the whole of the dense throng, and curiosity made them for a moment silent.

Every window that looked down upon the alley was crowded with anxious faces.

They saw the thief-taker, and looked to him probably for an explanation of the hubbub—for they, too, ceased the cries which they had hitherto uttered with great volubility and power.

In a screaming voice, which seemed to pierce the ears of the whole of that vast assemblage, the thief-taker spoke.

"Friends all," he cried, "be silent for a moment, and listen to what I have to say. It is of the utmost importance that you should all hear it."

These words were well calculated to arrest the attention, and claim the silence of all present.

In a moment all was hushed.

Jonathan, perceiving the advantage he had gained, hastened to improve upon it.

"A hundred pounds!" he yelled, in even louder tones than before.

"A hundred pounds reward!—there is a hundred pounds to be earned by some of you. Listen, all, and pay attention. Two escaped prisoners ran down the court a few minutes since; I pursued them closely, but, in some way or other, they have disappeared. They must have get into one of the houses here, and I call upon each of you, in the king's name, to search the houses in which you live. Whoever delivers the two prisoners into my hands shall receive a hundred pounds the next moment. Look about, all of you. A hundred pounds! a hundred pounds, I say!"

A scene of terrible confusion now ensued.

Wild was placed upon his feet.

The people at the windows hastily withdrew, and those in the alley swayed and surged about like the turbulent ocean.

Wild now thought he had gained his point.

It was scarcely possible, he thought, that, supposing our friends to have sought shelter in one of the houses, that they could escape being seen by some one when attention was so generally directed towards them.

Every person, in each of the houses, would become aware of what had happened, and the moment Jack and Blueskin were perceived, which, if they were in one of the houses they could scarcely fail to be, the largeness of the reward which he had offered would, he doubted not, overcome all entreaties, on the part of the fugitives, for protection.

The inhabitants of this neighbourhood were the poorest of the poor, and a hundred pounds would be, to them, almost like a colossal fortune.

All these thoughts had flashed, with the rapidity of lightning, through the brain of the thief-taker when the idea first occurred to him.

An anxious moment elapsed, during which his evil eyes roamed over the mass of ruinous buildings which surrounded the alley. Suddenly a tremendous tumult ensued, which seemed to indicate the discovery of the fugitives.

Jonathan made sure of it, and, with a loud yell of satisfaction on his lips, he forced his way through the crowd in the direction of the house from which the disturbance appeared to come.

CHAPTER CCCXVI.

ELUCIDATES THE MYSTERY OF THE SUDDEN DISAPPEARANCE OF EDGORTH BESS.

WE doubt not the reader feels a more than common anxiety to hear what befel Edgworth Bess after disappearing so abruptly from Jack Sheppard's gaze, as we have related in a precedent chapter.

For a brief space, then, we will part company with the thief-taker, and his gang, and the two fugitives, while we devote ourselves to the fortunes of the unfortunate heiress.

It would seem as though fate had singled her out for the object at which its most malignant shafts could be levelled; for, from the first, the poor girl had known nothing but poverty, persecution, and peril.

But, what was worst of all, the termination of all these sufferings seemed as far off as ever, and no sooner was she released from one danger than she was assailed by another.

It was not possible for her to remain unconscious of this.

The fact obtruded itself before her, and would not be repulsed.

Naturally enough, then, she strove to find some reason which would account for her being thus marked out as a victim to relentless persecution.

How was it that all the efforts which had been made to place her in her proper position should have terminated so disastrously?

For a long time she was unable to frame any reply whatever.

At length she came to the conclusion that the reason why they were so perpetually thwarted was because Blueskin and Jack had sought to obtain their ends by dishonest means.

There were various excuses which she knew would be urged, but she determined to pay no attention to any of them.

The past it was impossible for them to recall, but it lay in their power to amend the future.

This she determined should be done.

More than once she had been about to inform Jack of her reflections and resolutions, but from some cause or other, when the moment arrived, she shrunk from doing

So.

She was ashamed of herself for this exhibition of weakness, and she resolved not to hesitate the next time.

And so things went on.

Whether, in her conjectures and conclusions, Edgworth Bess was right or wrong, we leave our readers to judge.

It was while she was in this frame of mind that the robbery in the lane occurred.

When, after Sir William, as he was called by the obsequious servant, had passed them, Jack had said he wished he had thought to ask the gentleman what time it was, and said he would run after him down the lane for that purpose, no suspicion as to his real object had entered her mind.

But the moment he had gone the thought struck her, and she was so overcome with the recollection of her own weakness in not being able to summon sufficient resolution to speak out upon the subject, that she sank down on her knees by the side of the lane where Jack had left her.

Looking in the direction he had taken, she found a turn in the road hid him from her sight.

She was, therefore, spared the additional pang of being a witness to the robbery.

Sounds of a struggle, however, reached her ears, and confirmed her utmost dread.

She did not swoon, but it was only by the greatest efforts she could make that she retained her senses.

At length she heard Jack returning.

She heard him call upon her by name, but she was unable to reply.

At last he found her, and raised her to her feet.

Then ensued that conversation which we have already placed before the reader.

She told him her convictions, and implored him to make a change in his tactics; but, ere she could wring a consent from him, a lumbering stage-coach reached her ears.

It was the London stage-coach approaching.

To her unbounded astonishment, Jack hailed the vehicle, and, before she could recover from her surprise sufficiently to expostulate or resist, he had opened the door of the coach and lifted her in.

Then she had sunk upon a seat and burst into tears.

The reader will remember that upon the arrival in London, Edgworth Bess, convinced that the possession of the stolen money could do them no good, implored Jack, with the greatest earnestness, to fling it away.

But her companion, who had had a larger experience of the world, and who knew that, if he parted with this money, their position would be truly desperate, for the first time in his life hesitated about acting implicitly in the manner which she directed.

He endeavoured, as well as he could, to urge upon her another view of the case.

This, however, he found was quite useless, though he persevered in the use of such arguments as at the moment he was able to command.

But his companion, so far from replying to or noticing his objections in any way, did nothing but repeat her request that, since it was impossible for him to return the articles to their proper owner, he should throw them away.

With the result of this interview the reader is acquainted.

Jack, though he did not flatly refuse to do as she required, hesitated, and showed no appearance of being willing to do so.

On the contrary, he exhibited the utmost reluctance.

Not only was she vexed to think he did not take the same view of the case as she did, but secretly mortified that he, to whom all her former wishes had been law, and productive of immediate obedience, should now refuse this request, which she was assured in her own mind was of such vital importance to their mutual interests.

A feeling nearly akin to anger found a place in her breast, when she discovered her wishes to be so little regarded; and, at length, to such a pitch did this feeling reach, that she, as she had threatened, uttered the word farewell, and left him.

Without noticing which way she took, and, without taking into consideration the consequences that would be almost certain to follow this hasty action, she turned round and ran rapidly away.

The thick haze which filled the streets hid her in a moment from Jack's anguished gaze, and, as we know, all his subsequent efforts to obtain a glimpse of her were fruitless.

That this should be so will not appear at all astonishing to anyone acquainted with the intricacies of the streets of London. They will know that in two moments it is possible to lose sight of a person, even in broad daylight, and that all attempts to find him would prove abortive.

Jack, however, had the fog to contend with, and, moreover, his mind was in such a state of perturbation at her sudden disappearance, that he was incapable of looking about him with proper coolness.

Thus was it that he failed to find her.

As for Edgworth Bess, her eyes filled with tears, and her heart swelled with grief; she, without considering what she was about, ran rapidly and deviously along.

She was oblivious of the fact that Jack might have the greatest possible difficulty in finding her.

She was only conscious that he had hesitated and refused at a moment when she thought he would be least likely to do either the one or the other.

So she ran on.

She fancied that while she continued this rapid motion her feelings would not be so acute, and probably in this she was correct.

More than one person turned round, with surprise, as the flying form of the young girl flitted by them, but each had his own business to attend to, and no time to look after other people's, and so she was suffered to pursue her path unmolestedly.

But at length, startled by the sudden clearing up of the fog, and the bursting forth of the sun, she paused and looked about her.

She found she was in London, but in a portion of it with which she was totally unacquainted.

In vain she looked all around her for some familiar building.

Not one was to be seen.

She now began to repent that she had acted in so rash a manner, and left Jack so suddenly as she had.

Now she would have given worlds to have seen him, to have once more rejoined him.

But, as with tearful eyes she looked in every direction, she was unable to see anything of him.

She felt now as though her heart would surely break.

What to do, or where to turn, she knew not.

She was even ignorant of the way she had just come, and could not have retraced her steps had her life depended upon her doing so.

The streets, too, began to fill with people, and these, being for the most part the dregs of the population, insulted and jeered her for the forlorn appearance which she presented.

She shrank back from them with a feeling of loathing. But in vain.

They pressed still more closely around her, until, at length, she was compelled to fly, once more, at the top of her speed, to escape their persecutions.

A hooting mob, composed principally of evil-disposed children, followed her in a yelling throng, and pelted her with such missiles as came conveniently to their hands.

At length, however, without having received any injury, she was fortunate enough to distance them.

As soon as she was able, she reduced her pace, and once more looked about her, and endeavoured to ascertain her whereabouts.

But again she found herself at fault.

She had never possessed an intimate or extensive knowledge of London; for, from a tender age, she had been employed working early and late for the means of supporting a wretched and miserable existence.

Thus she had never had many opportunities afforded her of going abroad.

The character of the locality in which she now was differed essentially from that which she had just left.

The houses were old-fashioned, and many of them showing the effects of time rather conspicuously; but, from the general appearance of the exteriors, the inhabitants of them appeared to be respectable people.

The streets were quiet, and almost free from vehicles and passengers.

The houses were almost all private ones.

It was only at irregular intervals that she encountered a shop, and these were invariably small, and but scantily furnished with vendibles.

Almost heartbroken, the poor girl looked around her.

No familiar object met her eye, and though she had not expected such a thing, yet she could not help feeling disappointed when she found that no trace of Jack Sheppard was visible.

His refusal filled her breast with the greatest torture, and she thought that perhaps now, while she was looking so eagerly for him, he was altogether heedless of her whereabouts.

This was a thought so poignant that she burst into a flood of tears, of so violent a character as to be actually terrible to witness, while convulsive sobs came from her distracted bosom.

CHAPTER CCCXVII.

THE POSITION OF THE POOR HEIRESS CHANGES FROM BAD TO WORSE.

But it was only for a few moments that this thought held possession of the poor girl's mind; and, when she had banished it, she wondered how she had first entertained it.

She looked back upon the past, and recollected the thousand proofs which Jack had given her of his affection, and she had perceived no abatement of it, except such as his refusal to throw away the money indicated.

Could she, then, believe that he was heedless of her whereabouts?

Ah! no; doubtless at that very moment he was eagerly searching for her in every direction.

She now deeply blamed herself for having acted so hastily as she had.

Jack would search for her now unremittingly, she felt certain, and she would search for him.

If they both did this, they must eventually meet each other, and she hoped this would happen soon.

Encouraged by this hope, she looked around with a more hopeful gaze; but her eyes encountered not the wished-for form.

Still she hastened onward, expecting every moment to arrive in some locality with which she was familiar.

But all was strange to her.

What pained her most was that she was now beginning to feel the effects of such long-continued exertion.

She was, in fact, terribly fatigued; and her limbs threatened every moment to give way beneath her.

The miles she had by this time walked and run was incredible.

She was, too, almost famished.

Many hours had elapsed since food last passed her lips, and hunger was gnawing at her breast.

These two circumstances could not fail to have an effect upon her mind, and she again suffered the utmost depression of spirits.

This increased as her hunger and fatigue became greater.

At length, thoroughly wearied out, she found she could go no further.

She paused, and looked around her.

But she was so giddy and sick that she was only able to see, confusedly, that she was in a long, dark street, containing many ancient-looking houses.

A sigh of disappointment and despair came from her lips, and then, unable any longer to support herself, she sank down upon a step which led up to a ruinous-looking edifice.

Burying her face in her hands, she burst into another flood of tears; and again sobs of the most heartrending description came from her breast.

Her grief was now ten times greater than before.

Oh! how bitterly she reproached herself for having acted so rashly as she had! for, not only had it been productive of so much suffering to herself, but to Jack also, who could not but feel deeply the separation.

Regrets, however, were useless; and this conviction only added to her grief.

And now a dreadful lassitude began, by slow degrees, to creep over her.

At first she was insensible of it, until too late to check its progress.

It proceeded from the combined effects of fatigue and hunger.

It seemed to hold her will powerless.

She found herself, not only unable to move, but unable to make the mental effort to do so.

By degrees all feeling left her.

She became unconscious of her situation—of her hunger and of her fatigue—though there still lingered about her brain a dim remembrance of where she was.

But at last even this sensation passed away, and she lapsed into a state of utter insensibility.

How long she remained thus she knew not.

For a time, she had not the least idea of what happened.

It was not for long, however, that she was permitted to remain unmolested on this doorstep.

That adverse fate which had so long been her lot still pursued her unrelentingly.

And yet, as she sat there, she looked an object which few would trouble themselves about.

Her dress was torn, faded, and travel-stained.

Her hair was in disorder, and but few traces of her beauty remained visible.

A close observer would, however, have noticed the grace of her whole figure, marred as it was by the rough clothing with which it was covered; and would have perceived the delicacy of her hands and feet, which so well corresponded with it.

Edgworth Bess knew it not, but she was in Westminster—a place which, a century and a quarter ago, was very much worse than it is at present.

It was, in fact, the resort of all those persons who procured a living in defiance of the laws by which the country is governed, and vice and crime of every description prevailed in it.

Into such a neighbourhood as this had the poor heiress been unfortunate enough to stray, and sink down without the power to protect herself.

Heaven help her! for she had, indeed, need of its protection.

The street in which she was happened to be one of a more respectable character than those which surrounded it.

It was quiet and retired, and Edgworth Bess remained insensible for nearly half-an-hour, before a single person came by.

At the expiration of that time, however, a female emerged from a side street, and passed the doorstep.

As soon as she saw Edgworth Bess, the woman paused.

She was very stout and masculine in appearance, being apparently about fifty years of age.

Her person was decked off with garments of the most gorgeous description, and, doubtless, when by themselves would have looked well, but, combined as they were, they had far from a pleasing effect.

The reader will understand us when we say that her dress was in colour crimson, of so brilliant a hue as to be almost painful for the eye to look upon it.

Over her shoulders she wore a shawl of huge dimensions.

Its colour was a bright yellow, and ornamented with huge figures of birds and flowers, which appeared to be embroidered upon it with silk of a vivid green.

On her head she wore one of those small, coquetish-looking hats, which, upon a young and handsome girl, looked so bewitching, if we may trust to the fidelity of the portraits which have come down to us.

But upon the head of this extraordinary-looking female quite a different effect was produced; moreover, it was ornamented with a feather of the deepest scarlet.

Add to this that her face vied in redness with any of the garments she wore—that her eyes were small, ferrety, and moist, from the effects of strong liquors—that her nose was of an unnatural size, and embellished with caruncles of purplish hue, doubtless attributable to the cause above named—that, in fact, her whole figure was gigantic, and calculated to remind one more of an overgrown porpoise than aught else.

Such was the strange-looking and conspicuous female who, upon seeing Edgworth Bess sitting dejectedly upon the doorstep, paused before her.

At first she did no more than gaze at her with her humid eyes, but presently, appearing satisfied with what she saw, she drew closer to her, and then, for the first time, discovered that she was in a swoon.

In rather a rough manner the conspicuous female raised the poor girl's head, and then, removing her hands, looked earnestly into her countenance.

A guttural sound, very much like a grunt of approbation, came from the woman's lips, and she looked anxiously around her to discover whether she had been observed.

But the street was quite deserted, and not a single human being was in sight.

Upon this she uttered another grunt, but whether this was of satisfaction at finding the street empty, or whether it was in consequence of the exertion she was compelled to make in order to once more bring herself to an erect posture, we know not.

At any rate, she left Edgworth Bess just as she had found her; and, with more speed than anyone would have deemed her capable of making, she waddled to the corner of the next street, and then beckoned violently with her hand to the driver of a hackney coach.

In obedience to the summons of the conspicuous female, the crazy vehicle was set in motion.

In the meantime the woman made her way back to where she had left Edgworth Bess.

When she arrived she was rather distressed with the exertion she had made, and puffed and blowed immensely.

However, opening a little fancy bag which she carried on her arm, she took out a small bottle containing some pungent volatile essence.

Removing the stopper, she held it close to the face of Edgworth Bess.

The effect was immediate.

The poor girl revived, and looked about her.

But her mind wandered, and she was not aware of where she was or what was happening around her.

By this time the hackney coach had arrived.

It was stopped just opposite to the doorstep.

The jarvey descended from his box, and opened the door.

At the request of the conspicuous female, he assisted her to place the almost lifeless girl in the coach.

Edgworth Bess sank back upon the seat as motionless and as ghastly as a corpse.

When this was done, the conspicuous female wiped her face with a blue silk pocket-handkerchief, and then regaled her nose with a pinch of snuff.

"Where to, mum?" asked the driver, who fancied he had got a good fare.

The conspicuous female settled herself in the coach before she deigned to reply.

Then, in a pompous, palsy sort of voice, she said—

"No. 74, Spring Gardens."

The driver mounted his seat with a disappointed air.

Spring Gardens was close at hand—so close, that it was hardly worth while to make a journey there; and the probability is that had Edgworth Bess been at all able to walk the coach would never have been called.

The driver would have all his trouble for nothing, though, from the peculiar character of the whole transaction, he fancied he should be able to extort a tolerable amount.

The pace of the clumsy vehicle was not very rapid, but still it took but a few minutes for him to reach his destination.

He pulled up before the door of a rather handsome-looking house.

It had a noble front, with a magnificent door, wide enough to have driven a carriage through.

The appearance of No. 74 revived the driver's hopes, and he jumped down with more than usual alacrity and opened the door.

The conspicuous female alighted, and he officiously assisted to lift out Edgworth Bess, and to knock at the front door, which was opened by a domestic, into whose charge the unfortunate girl was immediately given.

She then placed in the hands of the driver a five-shilling piece.

As this was only about six times the amount of his proper fare, he flung the coin on the ground, executed a contemptuous dance upon it, and poured forth a volley of abuse, of which the conspicuous female took not the slightest notice.

CHAPTER CCCXVIII.

IN WHICH EDGORTH BESS DISCOVERS THAT A GREAT CHANGE HAS TAKEN PLACE IN HER FORTUNES AND PROSPECTS.

INTO what kind of hands had the poor helpless girl now fallen?

Were they good or bad?

Alas! when we reflect how rare a thing disinterested kindness is, and how seldom it is met with in London, we dread almost to ask the question, and shudder to reply.

We must leave time to answer the question.

At present we can do no more than describe all that took place.

The conspicuous female, having settled with the cabman, entered the house—or rather mansion, for its appearance was such as to deserve that appellation—with the air and manner of one who was mistress of it.

Edgorth Bess, still looking more like a dead body than a human being, had been deposited in the huge porter's chair.

At a word from her she was lifted from her seat, and carried up the broad flight of stairs which ascended from the hall, and placed in a luxuriously-furnished bedroom on the second floor.

The conspicuous female then summoned several female attendants, to whom she issued her instructions.

They appeared to obey her with reluctance, and yet it was as evident that they did not dare to refuse or even hesitate.

The manners of the extraordinary-looking female were very masculine and authoritative.

She uttered her commands in a loud voice, which sounded almost like the blast of a trumpet.

She exhibited not the least kindness towards these attendants.

On the contrary, she treated them just as an American overseer would a drove of slaves.

By her directions, which she stood by and saw executed, Edgorth Bess was undressed and placed in bed, when means were adopted to restore her to her senses.

Whether she had had experience in matters of this sort we will not say, but the conspicuous female was not long in doing this.

Edgorth Bess looked about her with a vacant stare.

Although she had been recovered from her swoon, her brain was in the utmost disorder.

This mental aberration was, doubtless, produced by want of food.

Perceiving the delirium with which she was seized, the conspicuous female was not long in coming to a correct conclusion as to the cause of it.

Some light food in a liquid form was prepared, and this the poor girl mechanically swallowed when it was held to her lips.

She was too much exhausted to make the least resistance, or even to sleep.

At length, when everything had been done calculated to procure her restoration to health and strength, she fell off into a deep sleep.

Upon this, the conspicuous female and her attendants withdrew, in order to allow her to remain undisturbed.

What was the motive which prompted her to take such extraordinary pains with a young girl found in the street, as Edgorth Bess had been, will soon become apparent.

This sleep continued for very many hours.

The food which had been given her, though small in quantity and easy of digestion, possessed a remarkable amount of nourishment, and when, at length, Edgorth Bess awoke, she felt well and comparatively strong.

The fever of her mind had abated, and when she opened her eyes she was in possession of her usual faculties.

What she saw, however, was quite sufficient to bewilder her.

As she gazed, one after another, upon the various articles of luxury the room contained, her astonishment knew no bounds, and she closed her eyes, fancying she was dreaming.

She then found herself endeavouring to recollect what had last happened to her.

For a long time her memory baffled her, but at length she remembered, with a sob of anguish, her hasty parting with Jack Sheppard.

From that point recollection rushed rapidly upon her, until she had sunk exhausted on the doorstep.

From that moment to the present was a blank, and she opened her eyes again, half expecting to still find herself seated there.

But she was deceived.

The self-same objects met her view.

She was puzzled and confused, and unable to think how she had reached her present situation.

All was vague conjecture.

At length she was driven to the conclusion that someone had found her while in her exhausted and senseless state, and actuated by motives of compassion for her sufferings had caused her to be brought thither.

When once this idea was started, she discovered numerous circumstances, all tending to confirm it.

She was undressed, and she no longer felt the cravings of hunger—therefore her wants had been attended to.

Involuntarily she poured out her thanks to her unknown benefactor, though there was no one by to listen to her words.

Then she strove to rise, but found herself reduced to such a state of weakness as made it absolutely impossible.

Then she once more occupied herself with her thoughts.

They were pleasant ones.

She believed she had found friends, who would assist her in her multitudinous difficulties.

In her innocence and simplicity of heart, she judged of the actions of others by herself.

Had she been in the position in which the owner of the room in which she lay evidently was, and she had seen a poor girl upon a doorstep dying with hunger and fatigue, she would not have hesitated a moment to do as she believed she had been done by.

It seemed to her perfectly natural and right, but those who knew the world would feel sure that all this had not been done without some ulterior object.

But such a thought as this never for one moment entered the pure mind of Edgorth Bess.

For a long time, then, she lay thus, indulging in her pleasant felicitations without anyone appearing to disturb her.

She tried to sleep again, but the novelty of her position would not permit her to do so.

She would not have felt quite so secure as she did, perhaps, if she had known that the door of the room in which she lay was locked.

In her present state, perhaps, it was well that she did not make the discovery.

Some time elapsed, and then, weary with thought, she must have dropped off into a kind of half-dozzle, from which she was aroused by hearing a slight sound, though what it was she could not exactly say.

It was, however, the click of the lock as the door was unfastened.

The conspicuous female entered, and carefully closed it after her.

She had removed her hat and shawl, but in lieu of the former she wore upon her head a turban, which gave her a very fierce and Mahomedan-like appearance.

It was composed of some bright scarlet material, and was adorned with some very remarkable-looking feathers.

Her face had not abated in redness, but its tint was rather subdued by the semi-darkness which prevailed in the chamber; for the thick blinds and curtains before the windows had been closely drawn.

A kind of twilight softened all things, and gave them a richness of appearance which in the bright glare of day they would not have possessed in so great a degree.

The fiery rubicundity of the conspicuous female's countenance, and the gorgeousness of her apparel, did not therefore strike the beholder so much as when she was abroad.

The room shook beneath her ponderous tread as she made her way to the bedside of the poor girl.

Edgorth Bess looked up as she heard the approaching step, wondering and curious whether it was that of her benefactor.

By making a great effort, she raised her head a few inches from her pillow.

It was at this moment that the conspicuous female reached the bedside.

Bess looked at her eagerly, and then suffered her head to fall back upon the pillow with an air of disappointment.

The countenance she now saw so close to her own by no means corresponded with the one which she had imagined.

Moreover, a sickening and disgusting odour of spirits assailed her nostrils as soon as the female approached her.

Edgworth Bess, however, rallied herself, and called in her good sense to her aid, and overcame as well as she could the repugnance which at first she could not help feeling.

She had been treated with kindness, and if the person who had befriended her was not favoured with a handsome and prepossessing countenance, it was no fault of her own.

Besides, the person who now stood beside her might not be the individual who had succoured her; but, perhaps, a nurse who had been appointed to attend upon her.

Revived by this conjecture, Edgworth Bess looked with a more satisfied expression into the woman's fiery countenance.

Just as she did so the woman spoke.

Her wheezy, thick accents made a disagreeable impression upon the poor girl's hearing.

In a tone which the conspicuous female intended should be eminently soothing and affectionate, she said—

"Well, my dear, and how do you find yourself by now?"

If Edgworth Bess had disliked the tones of her voice, she liked the manner in which she was addressed still less; but, as she considered she was not in a position to be so fastidious, she replied—though her voice was only a little louder than a whisper—

"I am better, much better, thanks to your kindness and attention."

"That's a good job," said the conspicuous female, with one of those grunts of satisfaction to which we have already reverted.

Edgworth Bess felt her antipathy rapidly increase—indeed, abhorrence is a word which would better express the nature of her feelings.

"Surely," she thought, "it is impossible that this can be the person to whom I am so indebted!"

She resolved to no longer have any doubts about the matter.

"Tell me," she said, "to whom I am indebted for this kindness. Let me know who it is, in order that I can pour forth my best thanks. I recollect all. Weary with fatigue, and famishing for want of food, I sank senseless upon a doorstep. There I must have been found by someone, but by whom I know not, and brought to this place, where I have had all my wants attended to. Believe me, I am deeply grateful—my heart overflows with gratitude; tell me, then, I implore you, who is my benefactor? Let whoever it may be, be brought to my bedside, and I will thank them with all the eloquence and fervency I possess."

"Very purty," said the conspicuous female, with another grunt, and with particular emphasis, "very purty, indeed!"

CHAPTER CCCXIX.

THE PRESENT GOOD FORTUNE OF THE PERSECUTED HEIRESS THREATENS TO BE OF SHORT DURATION.

THERE was something so extraordinary in this reply, that Edgworth Bess could not help her countenance expressing all the surprise which she felt.

There was something in this woman's appearance, manner, and speech, so utterly incongruous with the luxuriously and tastefully furnished bedchamber in which she stood, that had the same effect upon our heroine as a sudden discord in beautiful harmony would have upon a lover of music.

More than ever was she convinced that the being before her could not have been the one who had so generously snatched her from a dreadful death.

"It must be the nurse," she murmured, in so low a tone as to be inaudible to anyone but herself. "It must be the nurse who has been appointed to attend to me in my sickness."

As the poor deluded girl came to this erroneous conclusion her heart once more overflowed with gratitude at the kindness of her unknown benefactor.

Much did she wonder who she could be.

The owner of the house in which this beautiful bedchamber was situated, beyond all doubt.

That the being who stood at her bedside could be the owner seemed improbable in the extreme.

And yet what could be the meaning of her strange behaviour?

What could be the meaning of her strangely-uttered and viciously pronounced words when Edgworth Bess, in the sweet accents of her touching voice, implored her to say to whom she was indebted for her present good fortune?

This question was the most puzzling of all, and Edgworth Bess found herself quite unable to reply to it.

She could not reconcile her idea of this person being the nurse, when she thought of the words she had spoken.

So far from being any reply to her anxious queries, or indicative of a knowledge of who her benefactor was, they seemed merely expressive of approbation.

But of what?

Edgworth Bess could not tell.

The words she spoke seemed to have no sort of connexion with what she had just said.

Then there was the expression which appeared upon the conspicuous female's countenance.

She looked as though she was highly pleased or satisfied with something.

She nodded her head, too, in an approving manner.

Edgworth Bess placed her hands upon her temples, and strove to think clearly.

This, however, the more she strove, seemed to become more and more impossible.

Her body was weak, and her brain was suffering too much from previous agitation for her to be capable of much reflection.

Suddenly she felt all her ideas run into the utmost disorder.

Strange visions flitted before her, and then, uttering a long-drawn sigh, she fainted.

How long she remained in this state of unconsciousness she never knew.

When she recovered herself, however, she found the conspicuous female—for so, until we have some better appellation, we must continue to designate her—still bending over her bed.

From this she conjectured her swoon must have been of brief duration; and this was really the case, for, no sooner did the conspicuous female perceive what had happened, than she thrust her hand into her pocket, and, after some rummaging in that capacious receptacle, produced a small vial of pungent essence.

This she held to the poor girl's nostrils.

The effect was almost instantaneous.

Edgworth Bess opened her eyes.

Perceiving she had recovered, the conspicuous female waddled across the room to an elegant side-table, upon which several bottles and glasses were placed.

Selecting a small vial, she poured a portion of its contents into a goblet, which she then filled with water from an exquisitely-cut carafe.

This draught she held to the lips of Edgworth Bess, who swallowed it mechanically, without knowing what it was or being aware of the purpose for which it was administered.

It was a soothing draught, and a few minutes after having drunk it the poor girl unconsciously fell into a deep and calm sleep.

No doubt this would be the means of doing her a very great deal of good.

It would allay the fever which held possession, not only of her body, but her mind.

As she lay thus asleep, the eyes of the conspicuous female seemed to gloat over her features and such portions of her person as the bedclothes left visible.

The satisfactory expression her countenance had worn deepened, and she chuckled in her throat.

Who could this mysterious female be?

What could be her motive for taking all this trouble?

No one, to look in her countenance, would imagine for a moment that it had been taken purely and disinterestedly.

And yet persons must not always be judged by appearances.

Time, however, will explain all.

At present we cannot help feeling apprehensive to a degree, and we are almost inclined to say that it would have been better for her if she had been left alone upon the door-step upon which she had sunk.

THE STRUGGLE ON THE STAIRS.

When the conspicuous female had assured herself that the sleeping-draught had exercised its proper effect, she crept away from the bedside as quickly as she was able.

The slumber she knew, from the quantity administered, would last some hours.

For the present, then, all would be well.

Opening the door, she passed through it, taking care, however, to close it after her carefully, and to lock it securely.

Edgworth Bess was a prisoner, although the chamber little resembled a prison.

Unconscious, however, of this disagreeable fact, the young girl slept on quietly and dreamlessly.

When she awoke it was night.

But the apartment was not in darkness.

At the foot of the bed was a magnificent dressing-table, studded with a looking-glass of such dimensions as would exhibit the whole figure of a person reflected in it.

On either side of this glass was an ornamental bracket, composed of Parian marble, and fixed against the wall.

Upon these were placed two elegantly sculptured figures, representing vestal virgins.

Each held in her hand a lamp, from which proceeded the soft, mellow lustre that filled the chamber.

The glass globes protecting the lights were tinted a bright crimson colour, and this had the effect of imparting to the lustre a rosy hue.

By the aid of these two lamps, the various luxurious articles the room contained were rendered visible.

It imparted to them an appearance of exceeding richness.

Never in the whole course of her existence had the poor heiress beheld anything so beautiful; and, as she lay there, with her intellects still in some confusion, she wondered to herself whether all which she then saw, or fancied she saw, was not the creation of a distempered brain.

As her mind grew calmer, however, she became convinced of the reality of what she saw before her, and with great pain and difficulty recalled to her recollection all the occurrences of the past.

There were blanks here and there which she found herself incompetent to fill up, but eventually she came to a tolerably clear notion of her position.

She still clung to her original idea.

She recollected sinking down upon the door-step, and then, on returning to her senses, finding herself where she now was.

Some kind lady had, she felt sure, taken compassion upon her; and once more she felt her heart overflowing with gratitude.

She found, however, that thinking made her head ache terribly, and she determined for the present to postpone her reflections.

She next attempted to rise, but found herself in such a state of weakness that she could not so much as lift her head from the pillows.

After this, unconsciousness again came over her.

Upon awakening, she found it was daylight.

During her slumber the chamber had been entered, for the lamps, which she recollected seeing alight, were now extinguished.

The full glare of day was not allowed to enter through the casements.

They were darkened with thick curtains, so that in the room only a kind of misty twilight prevailed.

Looking round, Edgworth Bess was startled to perceive standing by the bedside the same strange-looking female she had before seen, and who, she had made up her mind, had been appointed to attend to her wants.

As her eye rested upon this woman's countenance, however, she felt an invincible feeling of repugnance spring up in her breast, and with a faint shudder of loathing she strove to shrink as far away from her as possible.

Her supposition that this woman was a nurse was destined to have some doubts cast upon it.

Finding Edgworth Bess to be awake, the conspicuous female, in a shrill tone of voice, cried:

"Jane, Jane, where are you? Come here this minute! Confound you all, is it any good for me to speak, I wonder?"

Edgworth Bess looked round in astonishment; she could not, for the life of her, think what was meant.

The mystery was soon cleared up.

A pretty-looking girl, about eighteen years of age, entered the room in obedience to this call.

She carried in her hands a tray, upon which was spread a light repast.

This she placed upon the bed, and Edgworth Bess immediately comprehended that it was for her the meal was intended.

She felt low and faint for want of sustenance.

Still, she was unable to raise herself to partake of the tempting but light viands spread before her.

The young girl Jane, however, raised her carefully, and propped her up with pillows.

With difficulty, then, Edgworth Bess took that refreshment so necessary to her vitality.

She addressed several questions to Jane and to the conspicuous female, but she received only evasive and ambiguous replies.

Upon the countenance of the former she could not help noticing that a sad and pained expression appeared whenever their eyes met.

What could be the reason of this, Edgworth Bess could not imagine, and the rebuffs she had previously received discouraged her from making an inquiry respecting it.

When the meal was ended, the poor heiress felt much stronger and better; indeed, there was nothing ailed her but the weakness occasioned by want of food.

Turning now to the conspicuous female, she entreated her to give her some information; but she was refused in a peremptory manner, and she was somewhat harshly bidden to lie down and compose herself to sleep, as she was not yet well enough to enter into an excited conversation.

With a sigh, Edgworth Bess obeyed, and the conspicuous female and her attendant departed from the chamber.

It was only natural that Edgworth Bess should almost immediately sink into a profound slumber.

That was the course which Nature took to recuperate her strength.

Once more it is night in the mysterious house in Spring Gardens.

Once more the elegant lamps on each side of the dressing-glass in that luxurious chamber diffuse their rosy, mellow light around.

But this time Edgworth Bess is not awake.

Her deep slumber has continued for many hours, and still shows no signs of ceasing.

Her light and regular breathing is the only sound which has broken the deep silence of the room for a long time.

But, hark!

Another sound now strikes upon the universal stillness.

It is a sharp sound, which ceases almost in a moment.

It is the snap of a lock, as the bolt flies back into the matrix.

The door opens.

The conspicuous female enters.

Her step is heavy, but upon the thick, soft carpet of that bedchamber is inaudible.

Stealthily she approaches the bedside, and an expression of satisfaction steals over her fiery countenance when she finds that Edgworth Bess is still sleeping.

Stepping back a pace from the bedside, she placed one finger on her lip, as though to enjoin silence, and with the other hand she beckoned someone who appeared to be standing on the threshold.

In obedience to this summons, a young man entered on tiptoe.

His dress was rich, and such as at that period was worn by the highest nobles in the land.

The rosy lamplight fell with rich effect upon it, and imparted great magnificence to the jewels which sparkled on the hilt of his dress-sword and upon various parts of his person.

"Hush!" whispered the conspicuous female, in a faint whisper, as he approached. "Hush!"

CHAPTER CCCXX.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD MAKE A DESPERATE ATTEMPT TO ESCAPE FROM JONATHAN WILD.

TRULY did despair take possession of the heart both of Jack Sheppard and Blueskin, when, almost exhausted by the exertions they had made, they turned down the alley, in the hope that it would enable them to escape, and then found that it had no outlet.

Jack made this discovery before the yelling tones of Jonathan's hideous voice reached his ears and informed him of it.

What to do now he knew not, for he could see no chance of ultimate escape.

The only course open to them for adoption was to enter one of the houses, and Jack comprehended in an instant all the peril which would accrue to them if they did this.

But there was no choice left to them, and let what would be done, their position could not be worse than it would be if they remained in the alley.

Nor was there any time for deliberation.

Another second, and the thief-taker and his janizaries would fill the place.

With the instinct of despair, then, Jack Sheppard turned round, and grasping the hand of Blueskin, led his exhausted friend across the alley in the direction of the nearest doorway.

It was situated in a corner, and plunged in profound darkness.

This was all the better for them, since it decreased the probability of their being seen.

Two ruinous and broken steps led up to this door.

Hastily Jack ascended them.

His companion followed him with difficulty.

Jack pressed against the door.

To his surprise, no less than his gratification, it yielded. It had been left ajar by someone.

Ominously it creaked as it swung back on its hinges.

Jack darted into the house, dragging Blueskin after him.

To close the door, turn the key in the lock, and shoot two bolts into their sockets, took little more than a moment.

They now ventured to give a sigh of relief, though their danger was only slightly diminished.

They endeavoured to look around them, but could not.

The whole place was buried in the most profound darkness, and from nowhere came the faintest scintillation of a light.

They groped onward for a few paces, until they came in contact with some obstacle which prevented their further progress.

A rapid examination of it by means of his hand convinced Jack that it was the balustrade of a staircase.

He communicated this discovery to Blueskin in a whisper, and they agreed to ascend these stairs, wherever they might lead, and trust to good luck and the chapter of accidents to befriend them.

The stairs were steep, and creaked at every step they took.

They made but slow progress.

Not only was the intense darkness confusing, but Blueskin could only ascend with great difficulty.

At length they reached the landing upon the first floor. Here there was a very faint-light visible, which came from a window opposite to the head of the staircase.

Through this the faint night light came, causing the different objects around to be dimly visible.

With two bounds Jack reached this window.

As he expected, from its position, it commanded a view of the alley.

Looking down, he saw that it was crowded with people.

He was able to see their upturned countenances plainly enough, for at almost all the other windows people with lights were looking out to ascertain the cause of the disturbance.

It was the reflection of these lights which enabled Jack to see what was going forward.

That which met his gaze so much surprised him, that he stood as if spell-bound, and unable to stir hand or foot.

Blueskin, too, who had reached his side, experienced the same sensations in an almost equal degree.

They saw Jonathan Wild force his way through the dense throng.

They saw him raised in the air above those surrounding him by two of his janizaries.

Then they heard his voice, which was so loud that no one in the neighbourhood could avoid hearing it.

His words struck terror to their hearts, and what little hope they had of making their escape was now destroyed.

The offer of one hundred pounds for each person to search the house in which they lived would, Jack felt certain, set the whole of the inhabitants on the alert.

Discovery seemed inevitable; and doubtless the number of people in each house would be so great that they would not be able to get clear of them before Jonathan arrived.

To meet danger half-way, however, was never a failing of Jack's.

There was now the most pressing necessity for immediate action.

"Come!" he said to Blueskin, speaking in a low voice, and yet as cheerfully as he could. "Come, friend, we must make one bold effort for freedom, or we are lost indeed!"

"I am afraid we are lost already!"

"Nay, do not despair! We are not captured yet!"

"But what hope have we of escape?"

"Not much, I confess, though I don't think we ought to give up on that account, but try what can best be done! Follow me! Perhaps even now all may be well!"

"I am very weak, Jack," rejoined Blueskin. "My head swims round and round! The exertion I have already been compelled to make is too much for me, and I feel completely overpowered!"

"Nay, nay! Do not speak in so desponding a tone of voice! Summon to your aid all the energy and strength you possibly can! We must make one last effort!"

While this little conversation had taken place, the two friends had not remained standing idly by the window, but had recrossed the landing in the direction of the stairs which led to the upper portion of the house.

These they ascended, Jack lending Blueskin all the assistance he possibly could.

As they went higher the staircase became lighter, and this enabled them to make better speed.

Within the house all was still for a moment or so after Wild had concluded his extraordinary speech, and then our friends heard people moving about in all directions.

Doors were opened and closed, and lights gleamed upon the walls.

But Jack and Blueskin continued their upward course, hope reviving in their hearts at every step they took.

The top of the second flight was almost reached, when a man sprang with great suddenness across the landing and rushed down upon them.

This man was of fierce and ruffianly aspect, and appeared to be the possessor of enormous strength.

Instinctively the man seemed to know that Blueskin was the weaker of the two, and that if he detained him the other would not leave.

Accordingly he grasped Blueskin tightly, and then set up such a succession of shouts as must have reached over the whole neighbourhood.

Blueskin felt himself utterly incapable of coping with this man.

With a sigh he gave himself up for lost.

He did not even attempt to grapple with his foe, but merely clutched the balustrades, with all his remaining strength, to save himself from being thrown down.

In vain the man strove to force him from his hold.

Blueskin clung to the woodwork with the energy of despair.

In the meantime, Jack was not slow in coming to the assistance of his comrade.

The first shock of surprise over, he seized the man, and, urged on by the desperate nature of their position, struggled with him.

He was by far Jack's superior in strength, and, doubtless under ordinary circumstances, Jack would not have stood the faintest chance of obtaining the victory.

But now the case was different.

Almost maddened by this interruption, which threatened to be fatal, Jack felt himself endowed with thrice his ordinary strength.

The man found him a formidable assailant, but, nevertheless, he did not loose his hold upon Blueskin, whom he determined to grasp until assistance arrived, which he was convinced would be but a moment or two at most.

Jack was desperate.

He struggled with the utmost fury.

Blueskin, with much trouble, retained his hold upon the balustrades.

These were old and frail, and swung backwards and forwards, threatening every moment to give way and precipitate all three to the floor beneath.

And now footsteps could be heard ascending.

They were many in number, and a confused murmur of voices mingled with the sound.

Above them all, rose one whose tones were most distasteful to Jack's ears.

This was the voice of Jonathan Wild.

Inspired by the hope not only of recapturing his escaped prisoner, but Jack Sheppard as well, the thief-taker sprang up the stairs two at a time; and such was the extraordinary speed he made, that he quickly left the rest far behind, although they mounted with great rapidity.

But none of them possessed such a powerful stimulant for action as Wild did.

Up he came, uttering fierce cries of mingled rage and triumph, each one of which increased the desperation of Jack's former conduct to frenzy.

The form of the dreaded thief-taker came in sight.

Jack saw him.

A horrible expression was upon his countenance.

In three seconds more, the men by whom he was followed would be in sight.

Loudly he called out to the man to retain his hold a moment longer.

The hope of receiving the hundred pounds he thought would enable him to do so.

But he did not calculate the effect which this immediate prospect of capture would have upon Jack Sheppard.

In a moment he seemed to receive the strength of a dozen men.

With one terrific wrench he caused the man to release his hold upon Blueskin, who nevertheless was so exhausted that he continued to cling to the balustrades.

With the same preternatural degree of strength Jack continued the struggle.

The man found himself being forced gradually backwards.

Suddenly Jack released his hold.

His adversary was surprised at this action.

Before he could recover himself, however, Jack struck him two violent blows, which succeeded each other so quickly that there was no perceptible interval between them.

The man staggered from their effects, so violently and forcibly were they delivered.

But by this time the thief-taker had only about half a dozen steps to ascend before he should be upon them.

Now was the critical moment.

How he did it Jack could never afterwards exactly tell; but, as the man staggered from the two blows and slightly relaxed his grasp, Jack again seized him, and with one tremendous effort hurled him down the staircase.

He would have inevitably followed his foe—for he felt himself lose his balance—had not Blueskin, who saw the danger, suddenly stretched forth his hand and caught him by his coat.

That enabled him to recover himself.

The man, however, who rolled headlong backwards down the staircase with terrific velocity, as a matter of course, came in contact with the thief-taker as he was ascending.

So rapidly had all this taken place that Wild did not perceive his danger until it was too late for him to step aside and avoid it.

Crash came the body of the falling man against him.

Instantly he lost his footing, and felt himself impelled with fearful force down the staircase.

Not far below him was his son, and just behind his son a crowd of people.

Like a cannon-ball he dashed upon them, and a scene of the most indescribable confusion ensued.

This was the moment for Jack and Blueskin to achieve their escape.

If they failed to do this before the thief-taker and his crew recovered, it would be all over with them.

Blueskin saw this at a glance.

Jack spoke to him encouragingly, and then, animated by the hope of yet effecting their escape, they bounded up the next flight of stairs, which communicated with the attics.

Here they doubted not they should readily enough gain access to the roofs.

The only question was, would Blueskin be able to support so much exertion?

This must be tried.

Without waiting to see the results of the fall of the thief-taker among his men, both darted up the stairs.

It was probable that above they would meet with fresh enemies, but this apprehension was groundless.

A moment's reflection told Jack that had anyone been above they would long ere this have made themselves visible and come to the aid of the man who had been so signally defeated.

At length the attics were reached.

The two fugitives saw a partially-open door before them, and, perfectly indifferent as to where it led, they darted through and rapidly closed it after them.

CHAPTER CCCXXI.

JACK SHEPPARD TAKES A LEAP OVER THE HOUSETOPS, TO THE IMMINENT PERIL OF HIS LIFE.

JACK SHEPPARD'S first impulse upon entering this room was to run his hand rapidly over the door to find what fastenings were upon it.

He did this before he even glanced around him to ascertain what kind of place he was in.

His hand first encountered one of those rude drop latches which are even now to be found in old houses, but which at the period of which we are writing were almost the only kind in use.

There was no means of fastening this, so Jack raised his hand to the upper portion of the door, and was well pleased to encounter a bolt.

This he immediately shot into its socket.

Steeping down, he found another bolt a foot or so from the floor, which he treated in the same manner.

All this occupied such a short time as to be almost imperceptible.

The closing of the door and the shooting of the bolts seemed to occur simultaneously.

As he turned round after doing this, the faint notes of a child's voice struck upon Jack's ear.

The interior of this room or attic, for such it really was, was plunged in darkness; but to Jack's eyes, accustomed as they were to the gloom, it quickly resolved itself into a kind of twilight.

He saw his companion Blueskin leaning, faint and exhausted, against the wall.

He had not recovered from the attack which had been made upon him while on the stairs.

The crying of a child again attracted Jack's notice, and he found the sound proceeded from one corner of the chamber, where he could just distinguish the faint outlines of a bed.

Before them was a small window, and through this the night sky was visible.

Jack caught his companion by the arm.

"Come, Blueskin!" he said. "So far all is well. Cheer up, my friend! One more effort, and we shall doubtless escape them! Come, collect your energies for this one effort! Yet stay! I ought to have thought of this before. Here is something which will doubtless serve you."

As he spoke these last words, in a hurried and disjointed fashion, Jack Sheppard plunged his hand into the pocket of his coat, and drew forth a pocket-flask.

The quantity of spirit it contained was very small indeed, but still he hoped there was sufficient to reanimate the shattered energies of his comrade.

He held it to his lips.

"Drink this," he said, "drink this. It is all I have left."

Blueskin needed no second asking.

Never did anyone require such a stimulant so much as he did at that moment.

But he did not drain the flask.

He drank only a small portion, and then, removing his lips, said:

"I am better now, Jack. I have not drunk it all; you finish up the remainder."

Jack would have been heartily glad of a draught of spirit just then, but he thought how much more his wounded and exhausted companion wanted it than he did, and he conquered the impulse he had at first felt to lift the flask to his mouth.

"No, no, Blueskin," he said; "I can do very well without. Do you drink it, and get all the strength you can, for we have yet much to do."

Blueskin already felt the beneficial effects of the small quantity of brandy he had drunk, and he did not any longer hesitate to finish the remainder.

He drained the flask in a moment, and then, returning it to Jack, he said, in a surprisingly altered tone of voice:

"Quick! If we are to escape we must lose no more time, or Jonathan will quite recover from the panic into which we have thrown him."

"True; but if that fall down the staircase don't confuse his faculties for some time to come, it's very odd to me. He won't get over it very easily or very quickly, I am sure."

"Recollect what a wonderful man he is. Hark! Can you hear them? They have begun to ascend the stairs again!"

Jack listened.

"It is so," he said; "they come! This door will be a barrier to them, but only a slight one; they will quickly enough demolish it. Still, it will hinder them a little."

"I am much stronger, and all the better, for the short rest I have had."

"That is good news! You speak better."

"I feel better, Jack."

"Follow me to the window, then. I doubt not we shall easily be able to reach the roofs, and then our chances of escape will be much increased."

As he spoke, Jack hastened across the room towards the window, beneath which was a small, rickety dressing-table.

He mounted upon this, and unfastened the window.

It was a small, diamond-paned casement, and one half of it opened outwards, like a door.

Jack looked out, and saw that, from the window-sill, there was a sloping piece of roof, which terminated, a few feet lower down, in a gutter, which was defended by a stout parapet.

This was enough.

Jack slipped through the window with the agility of a harlequin.

Holding himself as well as he could upon the slippery tiles, he assisted Blueskin to follow him.

They were only just in time.

Jonathan, with the fury of ten thousand fiends about his heart, was blundering up the stairs, maddened with pain, and followed by his men.

In another moment he would reach the door, to which his attention would doubtless be attracted by the crying of the child, which had continued without intermission, and was now louder than ever.

The moment Blueskin scrambled through the window, Jack closed it.

To fasten it was an impossibility, and this was a great pity. Could he have fastened the window, Jonathan would be in doubt as to which way they had gone.

As it was, he was compelled to leave the route taken apparent.

Dismissing this from his mind, however, he cautiously slid down the tiles into the gutter, where Blueskin was already standing.

He could not resist the impulse of looking over the parapet.

Nothing, however, met his view but a wilderness of roof-tops and chimney-pots.

Fortunately, for some distance right and left of them the houses appeared of a uniform height, which would make their progress all the easier.

They ran a great risk of interception, because the whole neighbourhood had been thoroughly aroused, and they could not tell how soon an enemy might appear from one of the numerous attic windows.

They kept on steadily, however, making as much speed as was consonant with their safety while in so dangerous a situation.

They had crept along the gutter over the roofs of several houses, when they were forced to come to a dead stop.

At this moment they were perhaps somewhere about a quarter of a mile from the window through which they had emerged.

A sudden uproar caused them to look back, and on doing so they perceived one of the circumstances which had occasioned Wild's delay, and prevented his getting upon their track sooner.

He had halted while links had been obtained.

One of these he now held in his left hand, while in his right he grasped his ponderous hanger.

His men crowded after him, and nearly all were furnished with lighted links.

A ruddy glare was consequently cast upon the roof-tops for a considerable distance round.

The scene was picturesque in the extreme.

Furious shouts came from the party.

They had made their way into the gutter, where they found ample proof of the presence of the fugitives, as well as a sure indication as to the route they had taken.

The gutter was filled with a soft, black, oozy mud, the accumulation of many years.

In this the feet of the fugitives had deeply sunk at every step they took. Consequently Wild and his men were able to follow in their track with all imaginable ease.

The howl of satisfaction which the thief-taker gave upon making this discovery was something awful.

Now he thought he should be able to follow them unerringly, and capture would be certain.

No matter where they went, he should be able to track them to their destination.

With the utmost eagerness, then, he pressed forward.

Too late, Jack Sheppard saw the imprudence of which he had been guilty.

Such a thing ought to have come earlier to his mind, and he should have taken measures to prevent such a palpable means of tracking him.

It was no use to trouble about that now, however.

The mischief was done, and could not be repaired.

Besides, his whole attention was required to devise some scheme by which the obstacle which opposed his further progress could be removed.

We have said that after going a long distance they were compelled to come to a halt.

That was because they had reached the brink of a gulf which yawned at their feet.

The block of houses along which they had made their way was divided by a court from a similar block of houses which was built upon the opposite side of it.

This court completely isolated the houses upon which these adventures were taking place from all others.

This was a terrible, unexpected, and apparently insurmountable obstacle, and it would seem that all the efforts they had made to achieve their escape would prove abortive.

All their exertions seemed in vain.

They had the choice of two alternatives.

One was to remain where they stood and be captured by the fast-approaching thief-taker and his gang, or else to leap into the gulf beneath.

Jack shuddered as he thought of this latter alternative, and turned round to face his foes.

Onwards over the roof-tops they came, in prodigious numbers, and raising a terrible clamour.

Foremost in the throng, however, Jack Sheppard could distinguish the bulky form of Jonathan Wild, making almost superhuman efforts to overtake them.

What was to be done?

Despairingly they glanced around them.

The opposite houses, from which they were separated by the court, seemed like a haven of safety.

They were mocked by them.

To leap the intervening space with the chance of a fall to such a depth beneath was a feat of so desperate a character that even Jack and Blueskin, perilous as their position was, shrank back from it appalled.

Had they been nearer to the ground, and the chance of injuring themselves less, they would not have hesitated to essay the leap, especially when spurred on by such inducements as they were.

But the thought of falling down such a dreadful abyss made them hold back.

Every instant, however, increased the emergency of their situation.

Ere their hearts had pulsated many more times, the thief-taker would be upon them.

With a speed that showed an utter recklessness as to personal consequences, he made his way along the gutter, and it was through this very recklessness that he succeeded in getting so far ahead of his men as he did.

"What is to be done, Blueskin?" asked Jack.

"I fear all is over with us!"

"We will not yield without a struggle!"

"What will it avail us?"

"Probably nothing, but I could not think of allowing them to capture me unresistingly. Do you think you could leap on to the opposite houses?"

"I fear not. Could you?"

"I don't know. I should not mind having a try. I would sooner run the risk of falling down into the street below and breaking my neck, than I would remain here with the certainty of being taken!"

"It is an awful risk!"

"It is indeed, and we must make up our minds quickly whether we are to do it or not, or it will be too late!"

"Look here, Jack. You are young and active. I have no doubt you could jump it easily enough. Do so, and secure your own safety!"

"And leave you here to be captured?"

"Yes; better one fall into the villain's hands than both!"

"No, no, Blueskin, my friend, I shall not desert you in the hour of your greatest danger!"

"Pho, pho! Escape while you have the chance!"

"Never! Either I leap with you or remain here!"

Blueskin could see by the resolute manner in which Jack spoke that he would be as good as his word, and he once more looked at the awful abyss, and calculated the chance of his being able to take such a leap with safety.

Jonathan's approach and his comrade's determination seemed to decide him.

"Try it, Jack!" he cried.

"Will you follow?"

"Yes!"

"You give me your word for it?"

"Here is my hand! Let me see you leap. If you succeed, I shall have a better heart to make the attempt!"

"Agreed!" said Jack, and as he pronounced the word

he grasped his comrade's hand warmly, for the thought came over him that perhaps that would be the last time he should be able to do so in life.

It might be that fate had decreed that one or both of them should pay the penalty of their lives for what they were about to attempt.

CHAPTER CCCXXII.

JONATHAN WILD CONTINUES TO PURSUE HIS VICTIMS WITH UNABATED VIGOUR.

ALTHOUGH it has taken so long to describe what took place from the moment when Jack and Blueskin sought safety and shelter by entering the house in the court, yet in reality a very short space of time sufficed for all that we have described to be done.

For instance, all the time that elapsed from the moment the two fugitives paused on the brink of the abyss up to the last event detailed in the preceding chapter was only so long as it took Jonathan Wild in his blind speed to get about three parts of the distance which intervened between them and the attic window through which they had passed on to the roofs.

But under such exciting circumstances it is wonderful how much can be done in a short space of time.

Having pressed Blueskin's hand, Jack Sheppard summoned all his energies, and prepared to take the fearful leap which would either place him in comparative safety or else destroy his life.

Shutting his eyes, however, as much as he could to the inevitable consequences of failure, he measured the distance and took a terrific spring.

Breathlessly his comrade watched him.

But his suspense was of short duration.

Jack cleared the space with comparative safety, and alighted on his hands and knees upon the slanting roof of the opposite house.

His faculties were too much confused by the force with which he had fallen for him to retain his position, and he rolled down the tiles.

Fortunately there was a parapet, and against this he rolled, which alone prevented him from falling into the street below.

Quickly recovering himself, however, he arose, being full of anxiety to know whether the same good fortune would attend upon his friend.

Stimulated by Jack's success and the ease with which he accomplished the leap, as well as by the increased rapidity of Jonathan Wild's approach, who perceived what had taken place, and hastened his steps accordingly, Blueskin, without waiting to see anything further than that Jack had alighted safely on the opposite houses, sprang forward with all the impetuosity he could command.

But either he did not measure his distance correctly, or else his bodily powers failed him.

He fell short of his mark.

Yet he reached the edge of the parapet.

He felt himself alight upon it, but he could not retain his footing.

Had he waited until Jack was in readiness to receive him, doubtless all would have been well.

As it happened, Jack, who saw what had taken place, was too late to save him.

For a space of time during which, perhaps, a watch could have ticked thrice, Blueskin's body balanced itself upon the parapet.

The least thing would have pulled him over.

But before Jack could seize him, the inclination of his body towards the street fearfully increased, until he hung quite down the abyss.

A shout came from Blueskin's lips.

It was echoed by one from Jack's, and re-echoed by a roar from Jonathan Wild, who was quite near enough both to see and hear what was taking place.

Blueskin gave himself up for lost.

The violence with which he fell upon the parapet partially deprived him of consciousness, but the hideous sensation of falling down the chasm restored him to himself.

He struck out with his arms and clutched the edge of the coping-stone with a grasp strengthened by the peril of his situation.

But he could not retain his hold.

He felt the stone slipping from his fingers.

He made another convulsive effort.

This time, Jack, heedless of his own danger in doing so, caught him by the arm with one hand.

Almost at the same moment he clutched him with the other hand by the collar of his coat.

But Jack could do no more.

His comrade's body was bulky and of great weight, and it was only by throwing himself as far back as possible and exerting his utmost strength that Jack preserved his own balance.

But Blueskin, feeling he was saved, struggled for himself, and endeavoured with all his might to climb over the parapet.

It was while things presented this aspect that Jonathan Wild arrived at the opposite brink of the abyss.

He waved his torch once round his head, to make it give forth a better light, and threw down his hanger.

It fell with a clattering sound upon the slanting roof and slid down the tiles.

His reason for doing this soon became evident.

It was the quickest and easiest means for him to disencumber himself of a weapon of which he did not just then want to make use.

With incredible rapidity he drew a pistol from his belt, cocked it, took aim, and fired.

A deafening report and a blinding sheet of flame followed.

Jack felt something whistle past his face when he heard the explosion, and then he knew he was saved.

It was the bullet.

He redoubled his efforts, and so did his comrade, until he at length got on to the parapet, and then Jack with a sudden exercise of strength pulled him over.

Jonathan saw he had missed his aim, and with a malignant curse he threw the discharged weapon at the two figures on the opposite house.

It struck Blueskin with such force on the shoulder that it wrung a cry of agony from his lips.

But for the moment they were safe.

Pained, bruised, terrified, and scarcely conscious that he had escaped a frightful fate, he struggled to his feet, and blundered in the direction in which Jack led him.

Speed now would be everything.

A hasty glance which Jack flung behind him showed him Jonathan standing with another pistol in his hand, which he was in the act of levelling at them.

Jack had just time to sink down, and drag his companion down with him, when the sound of the explosion struck upon his ears.

Springing up immediately, for he knew that that danger at least was over, Jack Sheppard drew his companion after him.

By this time Jonathan found himself surrounded by a crowd of people, who had with much difficulty followed him to the spot upon which he now stood.

They waved their torches in the air, but none of them made the least attempt to hazard the fearful leap from one housetop to the other.

Jonathan Wild measured the distance with his eye, and shook his head.

It would have been madness for him to make the attempt.

He was too thick-set and his body was too bulky for him to stand the least chance of effecting his purpose.

While he was thus compelled to inactivity, he had the mortification to perceive the prey which he had once or twice fancied he had actually in his grasp rapidly getting out of his reach.

He drew another pistol, and in tones which were shrill and shrieking through passion, he called to those around him to fire at the retreating figures, which in another moment would be lost to sight among the confusing shadows that fell everywhere.

As he spoke, he discharged his third pistol.

An irregular volley followed from the motley crew around him, but the fugitives were already too far off and their forms too indistinct to view for any of the shots to be effective.

What to do now Wild knew not.

To cross that chasm in time to overtake his prisoners seemed impossible.

He ground his teeth and stamped with rage.

At this moment a faint cry reached him from the rear.

The tone of the shout, for such it was, startled him, and in common with all the rest, he turned round to ascertain the cause of it.

In the distance a man appeared, carrying a plank.

He had brought it from the roof of a house where some repairs were going on, and where it had been left by the labourers.

With a yell of satisfaction, Wild darted towards this man.

He comprehended in a moment the purpose which the plank was to serve.

Seizing it with his own hands, he ran back with it to the abyss.

He carried it as though it had been a willow wand.

Indeed, he was never conscious of its weight.

This will show the extent of the passion which held possession of him.

With frantic speed he placed this plank, which was only of the ordinary width, across the intervening space, in such a manner that it would imperfectly serve the purpose of a bridge.

Surely it was about as frail and perilous a one as could be well imagined.

But the thief-taker, wrought up to the extreme point of desperation, darted across it like a flash of light.

A cry of astonishment came from those who beheld him.

There was not one who cared about running such a risk of his neck.

The plank was only just long enough to serve its intended purpose, and in his haste Jonathan had placed it in such a position that it was frightfully insecure.

It bent down in the middle by its overweight, and for the want of some intermediate support.

Probably the weight of more than one person would cause it to break asunder.

Wild, upon reaching the other side, looked back a moment, and finding that none moved, he called out to them, in a furious tone of voice, to follow him at once.

But none stirred until they heard the remainder of his speech.

"I double the reward!" he cried. "Two hundred pounds! Two hundred pounds reward! Those who wish to earn two hundred pounds, follow me!"

These words produced an immediate effect.

It is really wonderful what efforts people will make upon the bare prospect of receiving a large sum of money.

The plank was quickly placed in a more secure position, and as quickly crossed by several persons, all eager in the extreme to earn the promised reward.

Finding that these passed over in safety, the others followed.

Wild, junior, was not among the number of those who thronged the roof-tops.

He had been wounded almost at the commencement of the affair by the shot which Jack aimed at his father, the thief-taker.

Against this hurt, however, he struggled manfully, and apparently took no notice of it.

With eager impatience he ascended the stairs while the man held Blueskin, and endeavoured to keep up to the thief-taker.

This, however, he failed to do, though he was in advance of all the rest.

This was the state of affairs when Jack hurled the man down the staircase.

Placed, then, as he was, he received the full weight and accelerated force of the falling man, and the thief-taker as well.

He was swept off his feet in a moment, and when he fell he was undermost of all.

Indeed, the rest, every one, seemed to fall on to him.

He at once became insensible.

Who was there that could retain his senses under such circumstances?

In this condition he was left along with the man, while all the others rushed upstairs in pursuit.

But an inevitable delay took place.

Jonathan Wild himself was partly stunned, and it is questionable whether he would have recovered himself had not one of his janizaries poured an immense quantity of brandy down his throat.

This was, as we know, the thief-taker's usual restorative, and it succeeded in the present instance

It was, perhaps, owing to this that his passion gained such an ascendancy over him as it did, and most likely to the same cause may be attributed the utter recklessness as to the amount of danger to which he exposed himself.

He went on, indeed, like a maniac; and that providence which it is said watches over drunken men and madmen seemed to preserve him from injury.

CHAPTER CCCXXXIII.

JACK SHEPPARD AND BLUESKIN, AFTER MANY PERILS, FIND A HIDING-PLACE, AND THE THIEF-TAKER CAUSES A CONSTERNATION IN THE WORK-ROOM.

THUS was it, then, that Wild, junior, was not at hand to second his father in what he did.

As for those men who accompanied Wild, several of them were his own janizaries, and the remainder persons who, having nothing better to do, joined in the chase, to which the prospect of obtaining at a stroke more money than they could earn with two years' hard industry gave an additional zest.

That they were quite willing to risk their lives for such a sum was evidenced by the manner in which they one after another crossed the narrow plank.

Had they been funambulists they could scarcely have performed their task better.

No sooner did they reach the houses opposite than they hurried on after the thief-taker, whose torch they could see at some distance.

Things now assumed somewhat of their former aspect, though, owing to the delay that had taken place in procuring the ladder and making use of it, Jack and Blueskin have got a capital start, which they strive to make the most of.

To their proceedings we now revert.

Every moment that elapsed brought Blueskin more and more to his senses, and he followed Jack with increased speed and ease.

That their ultimate escape now depended upon the exertions of the next few seconds Jack Sheppard felt quite convinced, and he rushed on accordingly.

At any other time the obstacles they overcame would have appeared insurmountable.

By the time Wild had got the plank, and placed it across the chasm in the manner we have described, the fugitives had got a considerable distance, and were, indeed, actually out of sight of their foe.

Owing to the rapidity with which Jack had sunk down, and dragged his companion with him, the second bullet from Wild's pistol was rendered harmless.

Then, as for the volley which was shortly afterwards fired, they were by that time too far off to be injured, and nothing more than a complete waste of powder and shot was the result.

The torches which Wild and his men carried enabled the fugitives to perceive them long after they themselves were hidden from the view of their pursuers by the increasing gloom.

Now or never was the time for them to seek some place of refuge and ultimate safety.

They were by this time a long way from the attic window from which they had emerged.

They stood a chance, then, of escape, if they could enter one of the numerous garret-windows before them, and work their way down into the street.

This they resolved should be attempted.

Pushing on, then, as fast as possible, Jack kept on the look-out for a window which seemed as though it would answer their purpose.

It was necessary to find one where they could enter with the certainty of being unperceived.

They were still unable to fix upon a suitable place of shelter, when Jonathan crossed over from the other block of houses.

This hurried them onward.

Just before them was an immense skylight in the roof of a house, through which came a feeble but continuous ray of light.

It was necessary for them to be cautious, but, in the haste he made, Blueskin trod upon a loose tile, which slipped from beneath his feet.

So suddenly was this done, that he could not preserve his balance, and fell heavily.

His left arm fell upon the skylight, and at once shivered one of its panes to atoms.

A shriek, which seemed to come from half a hundred throats at least, was the result.

Blueskin, cursing his ill-fortune, rose to his feet.

His fall had not injured him bodily, but he feared now that such an alarm would be raised as would bring Jonathan upon them almost immediately.

From the tone of the shriek Jack felt certain it was produced by females.

With an impulse of curiosity which he could not resist, he dropped down upon his hands and knees, and looked through the broken panes of the skylight.

Another shriek greeted him.

A somewhat singular scene was presented to Jack's view, but he took it all in at a glance, and instantly determined upon the course of action he was to pursue.

The room which the skylight was placed to illuminate was a large one, though irregular in shape, and with a low ceiling.

In it were seated a great number of young women; indeed, the first thought that struck Jack as being wonderful was how the room could be made to contain so many human beings.

All were engaged in the same employment.

It was sewing with the needle.

The utmost consternation was depicted upon their faces.

But such faces!

It almost broke Jack's heart to look upon them.

Every one was hollow, pallid, and emaciated to a degree.

Their eyes were all large, but lustreless.

Upon the cheeks of several the hectic spot of consumption was painfully apparent.

The dreadful trade at which they worked sapped the spring of life.

Jack noticed that there was not one really old face among them, though a large proportion exhibited all the tokens of premature age, brought on by long hours of work in an ill-ventilated apartment, insufficient sleep, and insufficient nutriment.

All seemed strengthless; and though, when they heard the crash of glass, they had all given utterance to a scream, yet there did not seem to be one who had physical power enough to move from her seat.

When they caught sight of Jack's countenance they set up another scream, but all still sat as motionless as statues.

From the ceiling of this room hung a rude and roughly constructed chandelier, upon which several tallow candles were stuck; and it was from these the light which had at first attracted Jack's notice proceeded.

Here, he thought, would be a place where they could safely ask for shelter, with the certainty of its being afforded them.

Jack's resolution was no sooner taken than he set about acting upon it.

Seizing the frame of the skylight as high as he could, he bade Blueskin enter.

He was immediately obeyed, and directly his comrade's head had passed through he followed him closer.

The trap-door fell down into its proper place at once.

The terror of the unfortunate sempstresses was now so great, that they were unable even to scream, but sat looking with glaring eyes upon the two fugitives.

Certainly the appearance of our friends was anything but prepossessing.

What the poor needlewomen thought of them would be hard, indeed, to say; very likely they expected nothing but immediate death, for their notions of what was likely to take place were rather confused.

The whole of their experience was confined to the work-room.

Jack saw all this, and hastened to reassure them.

He spoke in as calm and soothing a voice as he could command.

"Ladies!" he said, making a circular kind of bow to all who were in the room as he spoke, "I am exceedingly sorry that we should have alarmed you, and been compelled to intrude upon you as we have. But we are two poor fugitives from a relentless foe, who has pursued us until our strength is quite spent, and we can go no further. We, therefore, entreat you to afford us shelter.

You need be under no alarm; we would not injure any of you for the world! If you knew our story you would do your best to save us! Our death is sought by a ferocious villain because we are the only protectors of a poor girl, like one of yourselves, but who is heiress to some immense estates, of which this foe of ours unjustly holds possession. He wishes to slay us! The poor girl, of whom I have spoken, would then have no one to defend her.

"His next step would be to put her out of the way, and then he would have no difficulty in keeping possession of her wealth.

"He has pursued us over the house-tops, and in another moment he will be here; and, unless you can find us a place of concealment, he will certainly slay us before your very eyes!"

The trampling of feet on the roof above added confirmatory proof to what Jack had said.

The foregoing speech he had uttered with the greatest volubility.

But the poor white slaves understood it.

It was, above all, an address calculated to appeal at once to all their sympathies.

They could comprehend the fate of the poor heiress if deprived of her protectors, and, at all hazards, they resolved to hide them.

Jack saw in a moment that all would be well.

"Leave us to conceal ourselves," he said; "all you have got to do is to deny knowing anything about us, or having seen us."

While he spoke, Jack had been busily occupied in looking for a hiding-place.

By the time he had done, he had decided upon one.

In one corner of the room was a quantity of white garments.

They had just been made, and had been thrown where he now saw them for the purpose of allowing the forewoman to inspect the workmanship.

There was quite enough for Jack and Blueskin, by lying down, to be covered with them and hidden from sight.

Jack proposed this, and the needlewomen made no demur.

There was, indeed, no time to lose, for though the scene had taken place with great rapidity, another moment would suffice to bring Jonathan upon them.

With that quickness of apprehension which is so distinctive a characteristic of the feminine disposition, these poor creatures showed, by the ready way in which they set about concealing the fugitives, that they fully understood their situation.

Jack and Blueskin screwed themselves up in the corner of the room, contracting their bodies into the smallest possible space.

The clothes were then carelessly heaped upon them, but with true womanly art, and in an instant the heap assumed its former appearance, and there certainly was nothing whatever in the chamber to generate suspicion.

Scarcely, however, had they time to resume their seats and bend their fingers to their accustomed task, than the sudden glare of ruddy light came through the skylight, accompanied by the tramping of many feet.

Of course, placed as they were, Jack and Blueskin could hear every word.

The hiding-place which Jack had chosen may seem to be an inadequate one for concealment. But it was all the better on that account.

Jack knew from Wild's disposition that the more artifice they used in hiding themselves the more likely he would be to discover them.

Both held pistols in their hands, and the attitudes they had assumed were such that they could spring instantly and easily to their feet, should discovery be inevitable.

They had strong hopes, however, that if these poor needlewomen acted their part well, they should escape by Jonathan going off on a false scent.

Whether these anticipations were doomed to realization or disappointment time alone can determine.

With beating hearts they listened to what was about to happen.

The conviction that the next few moments would decide whether they would escape or whether they should be deprived of life and liberty whetted their sense of hearing.

The footsteps on the roof which they could hear so plainly passed close to the skylight, through which an increased red glare came into the room below.

ELGWORTH BESS AND THE YOUNG NOBLEMAN IN THE MOUSE IN SPRING GARDENS.

Voices could be heard, and above all the rest the fugitives could distinguish that of their implacable enemy, the thief-taker.

Then there came a crash.

The skylight had been seized and thrown violently back upon the tiles.

A tremendous clattering of glass ensued, and the needlewomen gave a shriek of genuine fright.

Their terror was increased when, on the skylight being removed, the form of Jonathan Wild and those of his myrmidons, revealed by the torchlight, appeared before them.

The countenance of the thief-taker was indeed an awful sight to look upon, and well might those poor trembling creatures feel appalled.

His expression convulsed with rage, as it was fiendish in the extreme.

The ruddy glare of the torches added to his demonlike appearance, and the men crowded behind him like a throng of evil spirits.

For a moment Jonathan neither moved nor spoke.

He was engaged in looking down upon the scene thus unexpectedly presented to him, and endeavouring to find some trace of the presence of those two persons whose capture he was determined to effect.

CHAPTER CCCXXIV.

JONATHAN WILD IS BAFFLED BUT NOT CONVINCED, AND BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD OWE THEIR LIVES TO WOMAN'S SENSE OF HONOUR.

WHETHER anything indicative of the presence of Blueskin and Jack Sheppard met the hateful-looking gaze of Jonathan or not would be hard to say.

The idea that they would seek shelter at the very first opportunity they had was prominently before his mind, and the cause of his being so long reaching the skylight was that he stopped occasionally in his progress to ascertain whether they entered any of the houses.

Many little things convinced him that, up to the present, they had not done so, and he reached the skylight only a little too late.

Here, however, he came to a dead stop.

After pausing a moment, as we have stated, he jumped down with great suddenness into the room.

At that moment the two fugitives fairly gave themselves up for lost.

They had the presence of mind, however, not to move a muscle.

They contented themselves with holding their pistols a little more firmly in their grasp.

A shock of genuine alarm followed Wild's sudden intrusion into the room.

His looks and manner were well calculated to produce such a feeling; and then the bang with which he reached the floor—for, of course, the distance from the floor to the roof was several feet—was positively tremendous.

It shook the whole house, and both Jack and Blueskin mentally remarked that if that did not cause the arrival of some more persons on the scene nothing would.

"Where are they?" yelled Wild, in his usual screaming accents, addressing the terrified girls, who had one and all rose from their seats. "Where are they, I say? Where have you hidden them?"

This pointed question, which seemed to indicate some knowledge on the part of the dreaded thief-taker of what they had done, so increased the alarm under which they were labouring, that there was not one of them who had the power to utter a word even if her life had depended upon it.

Jonathan was about to proceed to some additional enormity, when the door of the attic in which this singular scene was taking place was flung violently open, and a little thin, shrivelled-up woman, about thirty-five years of age, rushed into the room.

In a faint whisper, when they saw her appear, the needlewomen cried:

"Miss Blogg!"

This was the name of the new comer, whose appearance we have briefly described.

She was the forewoman of the establishment, and it was her duty to look after the needlewomen.

It was evident that, from some cause or other, she was boiling over with rage.

So great was it, and so much did it blind her, that she did not at first perceive that Jonathan Wild was in the room.

"Hoity-toity! Dear me! Indeed!" she exclaimed in the shrillest of all possible tones, and the most shrewish aspect imaginable. "So this is the way! Dear m— Oh!"

This last ejaculation, which she broke off in the middle of what she was saying to give utterance, was produced by her mingled astonishment and alarm at perceiving Jonathan Wild standing like a demon in the centre of the workroom, for it was by this appellation the miserable garret was designated.

Jonathan Wild, upon seeing her enter, turned round and made a mock bow, as he said:

"Really, madam, I am sorry if I have created a slight disturbance in your amiable family——"

Thus far did Jonathan proceed, but no further.

By the time he had uttered these words, Miss Blogg, the forewoman, had recovered herself.

If her form was small, and her body weak, she was, nevertheless, endowed with the spirit and courage of a lion.

The first shock of her surprise at finding so extraordinary a figure as the thief-taker in the workroom being over, she strutted forward, and placing her arms akimbo, looked up with a virago-like aspect into Wild's face.

She was in the habit of exercising command over the poor needlewomen, and so used to the obedience which she always received from them, that she, from force of habit, expected it from everyone else.

The most amusing thing was, she thought this universal deference was exacted by her own majestic air and deportment.

In what she conceived to be a very striking and effective manner, she stalked up to Jonathan Wild.

"Oh, dear me!" she said, for her style of conversation was rather fragmental and disjointed, "oh, dear me! Yes, to be sure! Very fine, indeed! I shouldn't wonder! Of course—of course! What else can be expected? It's very good! I wonder you don't all laugh outright! I would!"

How long she would have continued this peculiar and unmeaning discourse no one knows, but Jonathan Wild interrupted her roughly:

"Hold your row, woman!" he said. "What do you mean by talking that nonsense? Mind what you are about, or you shall hang at Tyburn on Monday morning! I am Jonathan Wild, the thief-taker!"

At this dreaded announcement Miss Blogg uttered a scream of dismay, and seemed as though she was going to faint; but finding there was no one behind to catch her, and nothing convenient to fall upon, she altered her mind.

She also altered her manner.

In the most fawning and cringing tones imaginable, she said:

"I am sure, Mr. Wild, I didn't know it was you; but really these gals is such varmint and scum of the earth, that——"

"The charge against you," continued Wild, not heeding this speech, "will be that of having concealed in your house two desperate robbers and murderers!"

"Oh goodness!" exclaimed Miss Blogg, "There's nothing of the sort!"

"Don't deny it, woman. Tell me where they are, and you shall have a couple of hundred pounds for your trouble. Here they are."

By way of adding effect to his words, Wild produced a thick black pocket-book.

Avariciousness was the particular vice of Miss Blogg.

To have obtained money she would have sold her soul over and over again, if she had only had the chance.

The bare mention of two hundred pounds was overwhelming.

"Oh, Mr. Wild!" exclaimed Miss Blogg, in the most impressive accents, "I can really assure you that no such persons as you mention have taken shelter here. I only wish they had, and you should have had them exchanged for two hundred pounds pretty quick."

"I can hear you are a sensible woman," said the thief-taker. "Now just listen to me."

"Yes, Mr. Wild."

"I have pursued two desperate characters over the roofs of some houses for a considerable distance, but I lost sight of them, and I feel sure they have got into one of the houses. Now this is the one, I am almost certain; because, I say, a pane in your skylight is broken."

"A pane broken!" ejaculated Miss Blogg. "Oh, heavens! how has that happened? It's some of you wretches," she said, turning to the needlewomen, who were all standing huddled together in attitudes expressive of the utmost fright.

"It's some of you wretches, I'll be bound! Now, then, who broke it? Tell me at once, or I'll fine you a shilling apiece all round."

The girls all declared they had not broken the skylight, at the risk of being fined a shilling each, which was somewhere about half their week's wages.

"Now just listen to me a moment," said Wild. "I make sure the two persons I am after have entered this room, because I find the skylight broken. Just tell me, if you please, when you were in the room last."

"About an hour ago, I should think!"

"Very well, that will do. Was the skylight broken then?"

"No, it wasn't!"

Wild's face assumed a triumphant expression.

"You are sure of that?" he said.

"Quite sure!" said Miss Blogg, emphatically, "because when I came in the skylight was open; the varmint said they wanted air. Air be blowed! What did they want with air? Was the wind to blow in and flare the candles away because they didn't burn fast enough?"

"But how are you sure there was not a pane broken?"

"Because I got up and closed the skylight myself," replied Miss Blogg, triumphantly.

"That will do!" replied Wild.

As he spoke, to the infinite terror of the poor girls, he turned towards them.

"Now look here," he said, in a voice that made what little blood they had congeal in their veins, "if you don't tell me the truth about this matter you shall every-one hang at Tyburn before you are another week older."

"And serve them right, too, the wretches!" said Miss Blogg.

"Who broke the skylight?" repeated Wild. "Tell me at once, how was it done?"

"We don't know!" said some of the girls, with trembling voices.

"Don't know! What do you mean by that?"

"We don't know how it was done."

"Oh, but you own it was done?"

"Yes, sir; as we were sitting at work, all at once we heard something like footsteps on the tiles, and then there was a sound like a fall, and then there was a crash!"

"Oh, indeed!" said Wild. "And, now, what caused the crash? Tell me, or ——" and Jonathan assumed his most menacing aspect.

"We don't know!" cried all the girls in chorus.

"You don't know?"

"No sir, we don't; we heard the crash, and it very near frightened us to death, and then we heard nothing else!"

"And no one entered?" asked Wild, misgivingly, for the thought occurred to him, that after having broken the skylight, the fugitives had continued on their way.

"No, sir; we heard nothing else!" said the girls.

Wild then uttered some very diabolical curses.

By this time, if they had not entered the workroom, as he made sure they had, both Blueskin and Jack Sheppard would be far enough away.

But he was not inclined to give up his point quite so easily.

He glared all round him.

Nothing but the bare walls met his gaze.

There was no place where they could be concealed, at all events, in that room.

As for the heap of sewing beneath which our friends were hidden, he never so much as caught a glimpse of it, for when they had started from their seats, several of them, with admirable presence of mind, stood before and completely concealed it from view.

Jonathan Wild was baffled; but, in spite of the evidence before him, he could not get rid of the impression that his prey had really sought refuge here.

He resolved to make one more attempt.

"Hark ye, my venches!" he said; "I have threatened you, and that will do no good, so now I shall make you a promise. If you tell me whether the two persons I want entered this room, the one that tells me shall receive two hundred pounds?"

The girls looked blankly at each other.

Can the reader conceive how anxious a moment this was for our two friends?

Reduced almost to the brink of the grave through starvation and hard work, as these girls were, and probably with someone dear to them whose life depended upon their efforts, could it be expected that they could withstand the temptation of giving Wild the information he wanted, and receiving for it the sum of two hundred pounds?

All remained profoundly silent, looking at each other with eager, inquiring eyes.

They were wondering whether one of their companions would speak.

Jonathan thought they were silent because they had not understood him.

He therefore repeated his offer, and as he did so he held out the bulky-looking pocket-book.

"Here is the money!" he cried—"two hundred pounds. I will give it to whoever gives me the information I require."

There was a momentary struggle with the spirit of right in their breasts.

But it quickly ended.

Right triumphed, and those poor girls achieved a victory of which only themselves were fully conscious.

"We know nothing of them, sir!" they said.

"We heard the window break, and we heard the tramping of feet upon the tiles above, but that was all!"

This seemed decisive, and Jonathan was unwillingly forced to come to the conclusion that for once in his life he was mistaken.

He thought those girls would never have proved proof against such an offer as he had made them.

He gave one last glance round the attic, but he saw nothing.

Slowly and unwillingly he turned round, and placing a chair beneath the skylight, mounted upon it, and in another moment stood among his men upon the roof.

Some kind of fascination seemed to compel him to linger about that spot.

He could not make up his mind to turn away.

He could not account for this feeling of conviction, for the only circumstance at all tending towards it was the broken skylight, and the fugitives might easily enough have broken it in the progress over the roofs.

CHAPTER CCCXXV.

MISS BLOGG DISCOVERS JACK SHEPPARD AND BLUESKIN IN THEIR HIDING-PLACE, AND RECALLS WILD TO THE SCENE OF ACTION.

Miss Blogg had for the last few moments been completely overcome by the offer which had been made to her.

To think that she should really have had the enormous sum of two hundred pounds offered to her for doing something which she was very willing but not able to accomplish, was maddening in the extreme.

She did nothing but glare at Wild, with open mouth, and continued to do so when he mounted the chair and from thence sprang on to the roof.

At length the thief-taker, convinced that he should do no good by remaining, and fearful that he should fail in his attempt to capture the fugitives, after all the trouble he had taken, stalked away, followed by his men.

The roof-tops were dark and silent, and as he gazed around he could nowhere see the faintest trace of those he sought.

But he pushed onwards.

Even after his departure Miss Blogg continued to stare vacantly at the spot upon which the thief-taker had so recently stood.

The skylight still lay back upon the tiles, with its glass in a terribly shattered condition.

Of this, however, she was oblivious; and so, too, was she of the cold night wind which poured in at the large aperture, and caused the candles in the huge chandelier to gutter away at a great rate.

Presently, however, she recovered herself.

Turning round, she bent the most withering looks upon the unfortunate girls, who stood still huddled together in attitudes of terror.

As she looked upon them, Miss Blogg became herself again.

"Well—well, to be sure!" she exclaimed, breaking out into her usual incoherent style of conversation. "Very well, indeed! I wonder what, in a manner of speaking, will happen. Yes! Oh, it doesn't matter a straw. Of course, we are all independent of our labour, thank heaven! and it don't matter a cuss whether we work or whether we doesn't! We can stand up, and there is no occasion for us to work whatsomever! Oh, dear no! I should not! Not at all, of course!"

Now what was meant by this speech, uttered as it was with a rapidity that did credit to her vocal powers, a stranger would most likely have been puzzled to know.

His bewilderment would have been increased if he found, as was actually the case, that she appeared to address her random remarks to no one in particular, and made scarcely any pause between her unconnected sentences.

Her hearers, however, were accustomed to her peculiar style of delivery.

They understood only too well what she meant.

Miss Blogg uttered these words in a tone which she intended should be highly ironical.

She alluded to the poor slaves, who, while the preceding scene had taken place, had suspended work, and had not resumed their tasks when she turned round.

The reason was, they everyone shook with fear, for they dreaded that the two fugitives would yet be discovered.

This seemed extremely likely.

The heap of calico garments, beneath which Jack and Blueskin were so inartificially hidden, was the joint labour of all the girls in the room.

It was a portion of Miss Blogg's duty to inspect this work—which the reader may depend she took particular pains to do.

It was scarcely likely that she would go down again out of the room without examining the work, and taking it down with her.

If she did this, and they had scarcely any doubts upon the point, the discovery of the fugitives would be certain. Then what was to become of them?

The threats which the thief-taker had with so much malevolence pronounced were far from being despised by them.

They had a very exaggerated idea of Wild's power

His words still rung in their ears, and their whole bodies trembled and shook so that it was entirely impossible to hold anything with the least degree of steadiness.

The piercing gaze which Miss Blogg bent upon them only increased these symptoms.

The forewoman having, as she considered, allowed sufficient time for her last discourse to produce its full effects, spoke again:

"Very nice goings on they are to be sure! Taking, in a manner of speaking, all things together! Well, we shall see what will become of it. How pleasant! Two hundred pounds! I wish I could see the rascals—I would call Mr. Wild back pretty quick. Two hundred pounds! Dear me! I can't help thinking what a nice man he is; and that quaint of his makes him really delightful! We shall see what's to be done. Where's the work? Oh! in the corner, there. Of course there's not so much done as there ought to be! Oh, you wretches, if I only had you to deal with instead of your dear, delightful, amiable, angelic mistress, I'd pretty soon let you know what was what—that I would! And that is all the work done? Of course, we are all above our employment! I know that perfectly well! But still I know my duty; and I'll do it!"

With these triumphant and high-minded words upon her lips, Miss Blogg crossed the work-room and made her way towards the corner in which the work was piled up.

As a matter of course, our two friends had not missed hearing a single word of all that had been said during the whole of the time they had been in their strange place of concealment.

As for the danger with which they were now threatened, they only partially comprehended it.

But they heard the sharp, quick tread of the forewoman as she came towards the corner.

They prepared themselves for the discovery which they made up their minds must now take place.

The poor needlewomen sat looking on in dumb suspense. Had their lives depended upon it they could neither have spoken nor stirred.

They were just as though some sudden stroke of enchantment had turned them into stone.

Stooping down, Miss Blogg spread out her arms and prepared to lift the heap of clothes up at once.

She started and paused, however, for at the moment she was about to touch them a faint cry struck upon her ears, which was immediately followed by the heavy fall of something.

Looking up to ascertain the cause, she saw that one of the "hands," as she called them, lay prostrate on the floor.

The poor creature, completely overcome by what had occurred and the discovery which was threatened to be made that instant, had fainted.

That was so common an occurrence in the work-room, that it extorted nothing more than a passing glance from Miss Blogg.

Once again she set about the execution of her interrupted purpose.

With a grand sweep she caught hold of the clothes.

What was her horror upon discovering that the clothes, instead of being soft and yielding, as she expected to find them, contained some hard substance.

The truth flashed upon her mind with the suddenness of lightning.

A shrill and ear-piercing shriek came from her lips.

Dropping the clothes of which she had taken hold, she rushed towards the skylight and sprang upon the chair.

By this time Blueskin and Jack Sheppard, finding all further hope of concealment entirely at an end, rose rapidly to their feet.

Both were much invigorated and refreshed by the rest they had had, and they felt themselves equal to another struggle for freedom, should it be requisite.

Jack saw in a moment the danger which would result from the extraordinary proceedings of Miss Blogg if she were allowed to go on unchecked.

The forewoman, having sprang upon the chair, caught hold of the lowest edge of the skylight, and began to make numerous violent efforts to draw herself up on to the roof, quite heedless of everything but the notion that she was about to earn two hundred pounds.

Before Jack could reach the chair, so great was her speed that she had almost succeeded in scrambling out on to the tiles.

Only two thin legs remained visible.

But these were enough for Jack.

Jumping upon the chair, he caught hold of both a little way above the ankle, and then, exerting all the downward pressure he could, he pulled her back into the room.

At finding her legs seized in this dreadful manner, Miss Blogg uttered a scream, and when she thought of the appearance she must present to those below, all her strength deserted her.

Discovering this, Jack nimbly stepped aside, and the forewoman reached the floor with a bang sufficient to shake the house to its foundation.

At the same moment there came the loud report of a pistol, and Blueskin narrowly escaped the bullet which had been aimed at him.

The shot had been fired by Jonathan Wild.

He had not been able to altogether get rid of his previously formed conviction; and though he applied himself vigorously to the search, he could not help keeping round the skylight, just as a moth will flutter round a flame.

At the time when Miss Blogg made her desperate attempt to rush after him he was several yards off.

The scream, however, to which she gave utterance reached his ears with great plainness.

Turning round, he found the cry had proceeded from the direction of the work-room, and he considered it to be amply sufficient to warrant his turning back.

He made all speed.

He arrived just when Jack dragged Miss Blogg so violently back into the room.

Then the first object which met his view was Blueskin standing in the middle of the room.

With the speed of thought he levelled the pistol he held in his hand, and pulled the trigger.

But Blueskin happening to move just as he fired, his aim was balked, and our old friend escaped without sustaining the least injury.

Things had now come to a crisis.

Speechless with surprise and terror at the extraordinary scene which was taking place before them, the poor needlewomen neither moved hand nor foot.

As for our two friends, they knew full well the time had arrived for rapid action, and they were thankful to think they had rested sufficiently to recover in some degree their late fatigue.

Blueskin held a pistol in his hand, and as soon as the thief-taker fired, and before that worthy could execute his purpose of once more jumping down into the work-room, he returned the shot he had received.

Whether it was effectual or not he could not tell, for the attic was completely filled with the blue smoke produced by the discharge.

Ere the echoes of Blueskin's shot had died away, there was a third report.

It was Jack who had fired.

Immediately after he had dragged Miss Blogg down he produced from his pocket the pistol he had the moment before consigned to it, and though he could not take anything like an accurate aim, he fired as well as he could in the direction of the skylight.

The repeated concussion of the air had, one after the other, extinguished the candles in the chandelier, and now total darkness prevailed.

Without further loss of time, or attempting to strike another blow, Blueskin and Jack Sheppard made their way in the direction of the door which afforded egress from the attic.

They had carefully noted its position, and reached it without difficulty.

The sound of men jumping down through the skylight, and a chorus of piercing shrieks, caused them to make fresh exertions.

Favoured by the darkness, they were yet in hopes of being able to make their escape.

The door opened to their touch.

Passing through it like shadows, they closed it after them.

Unfortunately, however, there were no means by which it could be even temporarily secured.

It was necessary that they should feel about them carefully for the stairs; but when once they commenced the descent, they would be able to make good speed.

It so happened that the head of the stairs was very close indeed to the attic door.

Down they went, then, holding the balustrades for assistance.

The floor beneath was quickly reached, and the descent of the next flight of stairs commenced.

Just then they heard the attic door flung open.

A glare of light from the torches carried, and the trampling of many feet, immediately followed, showing the energy of their pursuers to be undiminished.

The two fugitives increased their speed, and, with feet scarcely touching the stairs, reached the second landing.

More stairs were below them, and down these they sped until the landing on the first floor was reached.

No sooner had they reached here, however, than a door was flung open with great violence.

A stream of bright light poured through this door on to the landing.

A man appeared, and endeavoured to intercept the progress of the fugitives.

"Help, help!" he cried. "Thieves! Murder! Fire! Thieves! Help, help!"

"Take that," said Jack, "and don't in future mix yourself up in other people's affairs."

As he spoke he struck this man a violent blow on the head with the butt-end of the pistol he had so recently discharged.

CHAPTER CCCXXVI.

JACK SHEPPARD HITS UPON A CAPITAL SCHEME, AND SUCCEEDS IN THOROUGHLY BAFFLING HIS FOES.

A VERY ominous crack was the result of this blow; and the man, with a wild sort of shriek which was checked before it was half uttered, fell headlong down the stairs, his body striking with a sickening crash against the wall.

This interruption, although it had taken so little time, was yet sufficient to let their pursuers gain rapidly upon them; and Jack could not help admitting that their chances were less than they were a little while before.

The fall of the man down the stairs could not fail to attract the notice of those who happened to be on the ground floor.

Whether they would encounter any enemies at the foot of the stairs another moment would decide.

The man lay there as still as though in death.

Leaping down two or three steps at a time went the fugitives.

The bottom of the stairs was reached.

No one appeared.

They cleared the prostrate body with a leap.

Before them was a half glass door.

They peeped through it.

It looked into a shop where linen garments of every description appeared to be sold.

A woman was standing behind the counter.

Her face was turned towards the glass door as though she had been alarmed by hearing something.

More than this the two fugitives did not and dared not wait to see.

If they had lingered they would eventually have been overtaken.

Suddenly they dashed open the door of the shop and rushed in.

The female behind the counter uttered a shriek, and disappeared from view.

Altogether heedless of her, Jack and Blueskin rushed across the shop, and in a second were in the street.

The hour was a late one.

At the time of which we write the early closing movement had not been thought of, and certain classes of shops remained open at a much later hour than they do at present.

This shop was one of the late ones.

There was not another open in the street except the public-house at the corner.

It was verging upon midnight.

With a rush, then, our two friends gained the street just as those who had followed them down the stairs burst into the shop.

But the fugitives were menaced with a fresh danger, the probability of encountering which Jack had overlooked.

Scarcely had they gained the middle of the street, and before they set off in any direction, than they heard someone cry:

"There they are—there they are! After them!—we shall have them yet! Hurrah!"

A rush of many feet followed these words, and a number of men who had stationed themselves in the street, in the hope of seeing them emerge from one of the houses, took up the chase.

Again, then, did it seem as though our friends were to be subjected to the terrible ordeal of being hunted like wild beasts through the streets of London.

They had no resource but to fly with all the speed they could command.

As a matter of course, they chose a direction opposite to that taken by their foes.

With unabated speed they swept onwards.

The streets were quite deserted.

This was to them both an advantage and a disadvantage.

It was an advantage so far as not meeting with any impediments to their progress was concerned; but then it made them all the more conspicuous—and here was the disadvantage, for they would be all the more easily followed.

By this time those who had rushed into the shop had emerged into the street and joined in the ranks of those who were in full pursuit.

The cries they raised were sufficient to rouse all London, but nearly the whole of the population was in bed, and so they did not obtain such reinforcements to their ranks as they would have done at an earlier hour.

"Round the next corner, Blueskin!" said Jack in a low tone to his companion as they hurried onward almost deprived of breath. "Round the next corner, my friend, and then round the next! We must try to baffle them in that way, for I am convinced we shall never outrun them."

Blueskin's breath was too far spent to allow him to reply to his conductor's speech, but he nevertheless fully understood what he said.

The next corner was only a few yards distant.

They dashed round it, and were out of sight of their pursuers.

Fortunately for them, another corner was close at hand.

Round this they swept, still keeping by that means out of sight.

Jack directed Blueskin's attention to another corner which it would be desirable to turn, because then they would be more likely to baffle their foes, who, however, they could hear, were much closer to them than was at all pleasant.

"Now for a place of shelter!" said Jack, as they turned this last corner. "Moderate your pace so as not to excite suspicion. Ah, look! On the opposite side of the road there is the very thing we require."

He ran across the street as he spoke.

Blueskin was rather bewildered, for he could not make out what fresh scheme had entered his companion's brain.

He was not long kept in suspense, however.

On reaching the other side, Jack reduced his pace to a walk.

Blueskin did the same.

About a couple of yards before them was a tailor's shop. The interior and the windows were brightly lighted up.

A boy was, however, actively engaged in closing the premises for the night.

"In here, Blueskin!" said Jack, as they reached the door. "We are saved at last!"

These words were comforting ones to hear, but Blueskin hardly dared trust himself to believe them.

He did not hesitate, however, to follow Jack Sheppard into the shop.

He had great faith in his young companion's abilities to do all that he said he could.

They then entered the shop as ordinary customers might.

As soon as they were fairly inside, Jack felt he was safe.

He uttered in a whisper a brief and energetic command to his companion :

"Feign to be just a little drunk," he said, "and leave the rest to me ! Act your part well, and I will guarantee not only to baffle those who are after us, but to procure a first-rate disguise as well !"

Jack ceased.

A glimmering of his plan now dawned upon Blueskin's mind.

At this moment a man entered the shop from an inner room.

He came up to the counter at which our friends stood, and desired to learn their pleasure.

Jack put on the air of one who has drank rather too freely, but who is still sober.

"Sorry to trouble you so late at night," he said, with a hiccup, and reeling slightly ; "but, curse it all, I have slipped down in the mud, and so has my friend ! Just look at our clothes !"

And he laughed unmeaningly, and as intoxicated men do laugh, as he finished speaking.

In this laugh Blueskin joined, as though it was the best joke in the world to fall down and soil their clothes.

"What's the odds ?" he said, addressing the shopkeeper. "If these things are spoiled—(hiccup)—I say, where's the odds ? There's more clothes in London that are not spoiled, and we have got the money to pay for them, haven't we, my boy ?"

He, too, concluded his speech with a drunken laugh.

The shopkeeper was quite deceived.

He had not a very good principle, that tailor.

Had they been ordinary customers on such an errand, he would have told them they were too late to attend to that night.

But as they were drunk he thought he should have a good chance of fleecing them by passing off an indifferent article, and charging an exorbitant price for it.

They would know no better, he told himself, and on the morrow they would probably be puzzled to recollect anything of the affair.

Now, this was what Jack had counted upon, and he was right in his calculation.

Perhaps he had had some experience of the honesty of London tradesmen under such circumstances.

Whether that was so or not, he was certainly quite correct.

To conciliate his customers, the tailor joined in Blueskin's laugh, whereat the latter swore, with an oath, he was a downright good fellow.

"Will you please to walk this way, into the inner room, gentlemen, where we can take your measure ? The boy is closing the shop, but that don't matter. When you are suited, we can let you out at the side door."

"Of course you can !" replied Jack, with tipsy jollity. "What a crib you have got ! When you have suited us with a suit you will let us out at the side door ! Ha, ha !"

This was esteemed so good a joke that the two indulged in a boisterous fit of laughter, to the infinite astonishment of the boy who was putting up the shutters.

No one, to have seen Jack and Blueskin acting their parts, and taking things so easily as they did, would for one moment have imagined how close their pursuers were behind them.

When Jack perpetrated the sorry joke of being suited with a suit, his quick ear detected the sounds which indicated the rapid approach of his pursuers.

Most anxious was he to reach the inner room, where they would certainly be safe.

But he did not show the least trace of that anxiety.

Nearer came the shouts and cries, and trampling of feet. The tailor led the way into the inner room, and was closely followed by the two fugitives.

Blueskin came last, and, as if by accident, he gave the door through which they had just passed a push.

It closed with a bang.

At that very moment, an excited, furious crowd, shouting and yelling, tore by, and the boy dropped a shutter in his alarm.

They were Jack's pursuers.

There was nothing in the tailor's shop to arrest their attention, and they swept onwards like a mighty sea.

"There seems to be a bit of a row in the street, eh ?"

said Jack, with a laugh, which he checked suddenly with a hiccup. "I wonder what it's all about ! Let's go and see, eh, old boy ?"

"Ha, ha !" responded Blueskin, who understood his companion perfectly. "More fun ! Let's go and see the lark !"

"Nay, nay !" said the tailor, who felt at first an unaccountable suspicion that his late customers were in some way connected with the hubbub outside, but who now banished the idea completely in consequence of Jack's admirable presence of mind in acting as he did. "Nay, nay ! It is impossible for any gentleman to go out while in such a condition as you now are ! If you will step this way I will show you some garments."

"Ha, ha ! Of course !" said Jack. "Why, old boy, you forget we were not suited with a suit yet ! Ha, ha !"

And again they laughed tremendously. This time they could do it with better spirit and effect, for they considered that at last the termination of the night's troubles had been reached.

Whether they were right we shall presently see.

With a staggering gait they made their way towards the counter, upon which were several articles of ready-made clothing.

It was too soon to put off the mask yet ; and Jack, who thoroughly understood the motive by which the tailor was actuated, determined, ere he departed, to punish him for his rapacity and meanness.

The clothes which the tailor placed for their inspection were of the cheapest and commonest description ; but our friends said nothing about that, because it afforded them all the better chance of disguising themselves.

They allowed, in fact, the tailor to select a suit for them ; and so accustomed was he to his trade, that after taking the measure of them with his eyes, he could tell what garments would fit them.

Taking the bundle up, he carried it into an inner room, where they could change them for those they had on.

Our friends entered this room, and quickly re-apparelled themselves.

They did not address each other or throw off their half-tipsy manner, for fear the tailor should be either peeping or listening.

It was well they took this precaution, for the unprincipled shopkeeper was listening and peeping too.

As soon as they had finished, and transferred the contents of their pockets, which they were careful to do as secretly as they could—for they by no means wished it to be known that they were so well armed as they were—they emerged into the room, where they found the tailor waiting for them.

A glance showed the two comrades that the shop was closed, and most of the lights in it were extinguished.

The street, too, was quite quiet.

Their hopes increased, and had the tailor exhibited a proper spirit they would have been inclined to deal with him liberally, as the means by which they had escaped their foes.

But his rapacity they determined should be punished.

"How much for the clothes ?" asked Jack.

"Ten guineas each suit !" said the tailor, with a bow.

Jack did not show the least surprise or dissatisfaction at this exorbitant price, but continued in his rollicking tipsy character.

His pockets were well lined with money, thanks to his adventure with Sir William, so he drew out a purse and counted twenty guineas, one after another, into the tailor's hands, whose eyes sparkled with avaricious pleasure as coin after coin descended into his palm.

With a sigh of satisfaction he consigned the money to his pocket.

He had, he considered, done a good night's work.

The clothes he had just sold for twenty guineas cost him about two ; but then what were drunken men to know about the matter ?

Anxiously he led them to the side door, whither our friends followed him with great alacrity.

As soon as the door was opened, Jack cast an anxious gaze up and down the street.

Not a soul was in sight.

The tailor stood upon the door-step, and wished them good night.

Now was the moment.

Jack threw off his assumed manner in a second.

He grasped a pistol in his coat-pocket, and he now drew it forth with great suddenness and clapped it to the tailor's temples before that individual knew what it was.

Jack pressed the muzzle of the barrel with painful tightness into his flesh.

"Do you know what that is?" said Jack.

Then, without giving the tailor time to open his mouth or to move, he added:

"It's a pistol! Now utter a word, or move, and I will blow the roof of your head off! The pistol is loaded to the muzzle!"

Then turning to Blueskin, he said, rapidly:

"Empty his pockets, and lose no time about it!"

CHAPTER CCCXXVII.

EDGORTH BESS AT LENGTH FINDS HERSELF FACE TO FACE WITH HER PRESERVER.

As lightly as foot could fall the richly dressed young man approached the conspicuous female.

The reader will recollect that when we saw her last she was standing at the bedside of the poor persecuted heiress, Edgorth Bess, who was sleeping peacefully.

She had beckoned to this young nobleman, as his dress indicated him to be, and in accordance with her invitation he had stepped into the room.

She whispered to him to be silent, but her caution was not needed.

With the noiselessness of a shadow he glided over the soft, yielding carpet, and in another moment he stood by the side of the bed.

The conspicuous female grasped his arm with one hand, and with the other held back the curtains in such a manner that the rosy lamplight showed with full effect upon the sleeper.

Very beautiful she looked while slumbering deeply.

Her face, in the artificial light which flooded the chamber, no longer wore its natural deathly white appearance.

It was now faintly overspread with a slight carnation tinge, which enhanced her beauty in a wonderful degree.

Her neck and one fair arm were visible.

The proportion and shape of both were perfect.

An expression of rapture came over the countenance of the young man, and as he gazed he clasped his hands together.

Up to that moment he had never seen anything so truly beautiful.

It was like gazing on some lovely vision.

He did not speak.

All his faculties were absorbed by the spectacle before him.

With an eager eye the conspicuous female noted the effect which this exerted upon him; and, if her countenance could be trusted, she appeared well satisfied with the result.

As though she thought he had gazed enough, she endeavoured to draw him away.

But he resisted, nor could the strength which she put forth move him in the least.

He seemed spell-bound.

"Enough, enough!" she said, in a faint but energetic whisper. "You have lingered long enough! She may wake, and then——"

"Peace, peace!" said the young man, speaking in the same tone.

At this moment Edgorth Bess, roused probably by the whispering, started violently, and awoke.

As her eyes unclosed they rested for a second upon the form of the young man.

It was, however, but a momentary glimpse which she obtained, for the conspicuous female instantly released her hold on the curtains, and the descending drapery hid him from her sight.

The conspicuous female drew the young man backwards, and made him an imperative sign to retire.

Reluctantly he obeyed.

But she persisted, and he was compelled to withdraw.

"What is that?" exclaimed Edgorth Bess, faintly. "Who is there?"

She partially raised herself upon one arm as she spoke.

The conspicuous female appeared.

"Don't be alarmed," she said. "It's all right. It's only me."

"I saw someone else besides yourself," replied Edgorth Bess.

"Hush, hush!"

"But I did!"

"Hush, hush! Don't excite yourself."

"I am not exciting myself; but tell me who it was that I saw. It was a young man!"

The conspicuous female nodded.

"Who is he?" asked Edgorth Bess, whose mind was filled with vague and undefined alarm.

"Your preserver!" was the reply, uttered in a low voice.

"My preserver!" ejaculated Edgorth Bess; and then, thoroughly surprised, she found herself unable to proceed further.

The conspicuous female repeated her statement.

Edgorth Bess was surprised.

Somehow or other, she knew not how, the idea had taken possession of her mind that her unknown benefactor was of the female and not of the male sex.

The idea that it could be to a young man that she was indebted never once occurred to her; and now that the notion was so suddenly presented to her she could not help being overwhelmed with surprise.

"That young gentleman!" she exclaimed, in tones which expressed the astonishment she felt. "Can it be possible that it is to him I owe so heavy a debt of gratitude?"

"Why not?" asked the conspicuous female.

This was rather an unanswerable question, and Edgorth Bess was unable to reply to it.

She could not think why not.

"Where is he? Call him back!" said Edgorth Bess, a moment afterwards. "Yet stay!" she added; "why should he come here while I was sleeping?"

"He was anxious to know how far you had progressed towards recovery. When he entered he did not know you were sleeping. You awoke the moment he reached the bedside."

"Then, why did he retire?"

"He knew your weak state, and was afraid to excite you."

"Oh, call him back—call him back, I entreat you, that I may thank him!"

"Nay, nay! There is time enough for that. Be patient. When you are stronger and better able to thank him will be a more fitting time."

"No, no!" exclaimed the deluded girl. "Now—let me see him now, while a sense of his benefits is fully present to me."

"It is too late; he has gone! Besides, he would be better pleased to hear your thanks when you are well; you must preserve them until then."

With a sigh of disappointment, Edgorth Bess sank back upon her pillow.

"Rest—rest!" said the conspicuous female; "in a few days you will be well. You can return then, and thank him."

"I feel much better."

"Rest—rest!" was the monotonous reply. "It is rest that you require."

As she spoke, the conspicuous female, who showed palpable signs of being tired of the conversation, withdrew, taking care, as before, to close the door after her.

Again Edgorth Bess strove to think.

The reader, being already in possession of the true facts of the case, will probably feel suspicions of the conspicuous female rapidly increase.

It is quite certain that what she told the poor girl about the richly dressed young man being her deliverer was quite untrue, since she herself conveyed her to her present place of abode.

What could be her motives for such conduct time will unfold.

She was joined on the outside by the nobleman—for such he was in title and by the accident of birth—and the pair descended the staircase in earnest conversation.

In vain Edgorth Bess strove to think clearly, and assure herself that all was well.

Her mind was agitated with vague alarm, to which with all her efforts she could give no sort of consistency or form.

From the first she had been mistrustful of the conspicuous female.

There seemed something very suspicious about her.

Then the young man?
Could it be possible, she asked herself, that he had rescued her?

He looked far more like the owner of the room than the woman did.

And yet, somehow, she could not bring herself to believe it.

In this manner time passed away.

Days elapsed.

During this time she grew rapidly better.

Nothing ailed her but want of food and rest, and as these wants were supplied, she quickly became herself.

She inquired repeatedly after the young man she had seen, for the poor girl was anxious to pour out her thanks for what he had done.

Evasive answers were, however, given her, and she was put off from time to time.

At length, about a week after she had first seen the young man, she felt so far better, and was considered to be so much better by the conspicuous female, as to be allowed to get up.

Upon leaving her bed she was unable to find the ragged and dirt-bedraggled garments which she had last worn.

In their place were some garments fitted, from their style and make, to be worn by a lady.

These, however, she for a long time refused to put on.

The conspicuous female with much difficulty overcame her scruples, and in the end induced her to put them on.

"It was by the wish of her preserver," she said, "that the apparel had been brought in place of her own, and he would be much pained if she refused to put it on."

An artful appeal to her gratitude settled the matter, and the poor girl reluctantly yielded.

She placed the garments on, one after the other, with a feeling of great distrust.

But she did not know how to refuse, and then all her inquiries for her own clothing were not attended to.

She was, then, in a manner of speaking, compelled to act thus, having no other choice left her than to remain in bed.

To this she had the greatest objection.

She was impatient in the extreme, and longed to renew her search for Jack Sheppard, who all this time must, she felt confident, have been suffering the utmost uneasiness and suspense on her account.

She therefore arrayed herself in the rich apparel, and which should have been her daily dress.

She could not help being struck herself by the great and extraordinary change in her appearance.

Her charms, instead of being hidden as they had been, were now displayed to the utmost advantage.

How she wished, as she stood before the tall dressing-glass we have described and surveyed her full figure, that Jack could see her now.

The feeling was a natural one—for where is the girl who is not desirous of appearing to the greatest advantage in her lover's eyes?

The subject of her thoughts called up a brilliant flush to her cheeks.

It was at this moment that the conspicuous female entered the bedchamber.

A grunt of approval at the appearance of Edgworth Bess announced her arrival.

With a feeling of dislike which she could not repress, the young girl turned round.

The conspicuous female was profuse in her admiration and loud in her expression of it.

Edgworth Bess found it impossible to check the torrent of her eloquence upon this subject.

We spare the reader the infliction.

At length she exhausted herself, and then she inquired whether Edgworth Bess was willing and prepared to see her preserver.

This was what the deceived girl had been anxiously looking for, and she immediately signified her assent.

"Follow me, then!" said the conspicuous female, "and I will take you to him!"

"Take me to him!"

"Yes!"

"Will he not come here?"

"What, here in the bedchamber?"

"Pardon me!" exclaimed Bess, in confusion. "I forgot."

"Oh, never mind, there's no harm done! Follow me! He is not far off!"

As she spoke she took hold of Edgworth Bess by the hand, though this was a mode of conducting her which the young girl would gladly enough have dispensed with.

She did not like to resist.

She was thus led out of the bedchamber into a spacious landing from which many other doors opened.

Edgworth Bess looked with curiosity and delight upon all she saw, for of course when she was conveyed from the hackney coach to the bed-room she had no consciousness of the scenes through which she passed.

Everything she saw was magnificent in the extreme.

High above her head she could see the summit of the staircase, which was arched over into a handsome dome.

The balustrades were most elegantly carved and gilt, and the stairs were beautifully carpeted.

Down these they passed until the first floor was reached.

A door was then opened, and the heiress was ushered by her companion into a sumptuously furnished apartment, which was in perfect harmony with all she had previously seen.

The apartment was vacant, and upon making this unexpected discovery she bent an inquiring look upon her companion's countenance.

"It's all right, my dear," was the reply, given in her usual thick, unctuous accents. "Go in and wait a few moments, and he you so much wish to see will soon make his appearance."

Uttering these words the conspicuous female retreated, leaving Edgworth Bess standing alone in that magnificent apartment, and with rather a bewildered feeling about her heart and brain.

According to what seemed to be her unvarying custom, the conspicuous female locked the door after her.

Edgworth Bess noticed this, and her uneasiness increased.

Fancying she had not heard aright, she went to the door of the room and tried to open it.

But it was fast.

Her heart fluttered painfully.

What could be the meaning of all this?

She gazed around her, but nothing reassuring met her view.

Everywhere articles of the utmost value and elegance could be seen, and the whole aspect of the place was that of a palace.

To Edgworth Bess, however, it was that of a prison.

She could not trust herself to sit down, and scarcely to move.

She stood close to the locked door, in an attitude of eager listening.

But no approaching footsteps reached her ear.

When the young man appeared, however, she resolved to ask him the meaning of this extraordinary conduct.

While her thoughts were thus engaged she was suddenly startled by hearing a slight sound in a distant portion of the apartment.

She looked in that direction instantly.

To her astonishment she saw the same richly dressed young man at the extremity of the spacious chamber.

His sudden appearance gave her a slight shock of surprise, for how he had contrived to enter she could not conceive.

CHAPTER CCCXXVIII.

EDGWORTH BESS AT LAST BEGINS TO REALISE HER DANGER.

THE explanation of his seemingly mysterious appearance was, however, ample enough.

At the end of the apartment, opposite to that in which the door was situated by which Edgworth Bess had entered, was another door, and this the young girl had not had time to observe.

With a smile on his lip, and a confident, smiling expression upon his whole countenance, which she was pained and alarmed to see, this young man, with extended hands, advanced towards her.

By his attitude it seemed as though he was about to clasp her in his arms.

At any rate, the manner in which he came forward to greet her was peculiar, and certainly not such as Edgworth Bess had anticipated.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD OBTAIN A CLUE TO THE WHEREABOUTS OF EDGWORTH BESS.

She felt terrified, and those vague feelings of alarm which had so long oppressed her sprang up with redoubled force in her mind.

She shrank back.

Heedless of this manifestation, however, the young man hastened on.

Edgworth Bess could not avoid taking a good look at him.

He was a young man upon whom few, if any, of the softer sex could have looked without experiencing a more or less intense degree of emotion.

He was eminently handsome.

His countenance was glowing with health, and his bright eyes sparkled with excitement.

Their lustre was scarcely inferior to that of the many ornaments which adorned his person.

His dress was very rich and magnificent, and exhibited a thoroughly good taste.

No. 66.

The times, we suppose, have for ever gone by when the titled and the wealthy will exhibit the rich appearance which they did a century and a quarter ago.

Their different ranks in life were distinguished by the dress, but now no perceptible distinction is made.

Rings of great brightness glittered on this young man's fingers; but they were only occasionally seen, for the lace ruffles round his wrists almost hid his hands from view.

By his side he wore a light dress sword, such as in those days no gentleman was ever seen without.

The scabbard and the belt, which were real objects of beauty, glittered and blazed with diamonds and various other precious stones, with which they were encrusted.

His attire almost wholly consisted of dark crimson velvet, and on his head he wore a flowing white peruke, in accordance with the unvarying fashion.

This imparted to his frank, open countenance a particularly pleasing expression.

With animation beaming from every feature and visible in every gesture, he hurried forward.

Edgworth Bess, however, was not prepared to be greeted so warmly.

She retreated rapidly.

The young man, apparently undaunted, came on with the same easy, confident smile upon his lips.

"Was this the being to whom she had to express her gratitude?" Edgworth Bess asked herself. "Was this the demeanour of a preserver—of one who, from pure and disinterested motives, had rescued her from destitution?"

She shuddered at this question mentally presented itself to her.

With an effort she summoned courage to speak.

"Hold, sir!" she said.

There was something so decisive in the tones of her voice that the young man came to a halt at once, and the expression of his face somewhat changed.

"What is the matter, my charmer?" he said. "Is it possible that the harsh words I have just heard proceeded from that rosy mouth, which should only be the means of expressing the most ardent love?"

The alarm of Edgworth Bess increased.

"Sir," she said, with native dignity, "I do not understand you!"

"Come, come! this is nothing but an artificial coyness, and doubtless the part which you are now playing has been well studied. But with me it will have no effect! I am too old a hand to be ensnared by such a device! Come, my little charmer, if you wish to please me you will throw off all those little airs and graces—they don't become you, I assure you they do not. Come, now, I can tell you that we shall be the best of friends!"

As he concluded this speech, to which Edgworth Bess listened with mingled incredulity and horror, he called up the same smile to his lips, and renewed his advance to her.

In another moment he would have caught her in his arms—for at first Edgworth Bess was so far overcome as to be unable to stir—but his proximity restored her powers of volition, and she darted away from him with the agility and speed of a fawn.

There was an elegant chair near her, and behind this she sprang, holding it before her in such a manner as to keep off her admirer.

"Hold, sir!" she cried again, in the same startling and decisive tones as had before made such an impression upon him. "Hold, sir! I have heard you without interruption, and I must beg of you to listen to what I have got to say, without you interrupting me."

At this address, so entirely different to what he had expected, the young man's countenance became the picture of amazement.

"What is the meaning of all this?" he asked. "I'll be hanged if I can understand it!"

"I will tell you, sir, if you will listen, and if you will remain where you now are," replied Edgworth Bess. "There is no need for you to come any closer to me than you are at present."

"Come, my charmer," exclaimed the young man, "let us have an end of this sort of thing—it always tires me."

"Nay, nay, sir; I am convinced that you, like myself, are labouring under some mistake."

"Mistake?"

"Yes; and you would quickly understand it, if you would only attend for a few moments to what I wish to say; I crave your attention for no longer period."

"Go on, my charmer, I will listen to you; but not at this distance."

"Yes—yes!"

"But I say, no—no! The thing is absolutely preposterous!" and as he spoke the young nobleman continued to advance.

Edgworth Bess retreated, dragging the chair after her, and still keeping her face turned towards him.

"Stand, sir, I say!" she exclaimed, and exhibiting such manifest signs of terror and distress as should have made her would-be admirer desist. "I pray you listen to me, and let this misunderstanding no longer continue."

"Ah, my dear girl, believe me, I understand everything! Come, cease this nonsense! I know what it means quite as well as you do; and if you wish to please me, you will throw off all such disguise at once, and appear before me in your true character. As I said, so lovely a mouth as yours was never formed to utter aught but love; and, need I add, that such lovely arms as you display are fitted only to embrace a lover? Come—come; we have had enough of this! Throw off this disguise at once."

Thus far did the young nobleman proceed in his speech uninterrupted.

The reason was that Edgworth Bess was too overwhelmed with bewilderment to be able to make any reply.

She thought that one of them must be mad.

The closer approach, however, of the young man aroused her, and with eyes sparkling with indignation, she exclaimed:

"Hold, sir! Once more—hold! Once more I implore—I entreat you to listen to me! You wear the costume of a gentleman—prove to me that you are one by listening to my request."

At this address the young man looked at Edgworth Bess with great surprise, but his assurance coming to his aid, he concluded that this was only a pretty little piece of acting, made use of for the purpose of enhancing the charms of the lovely being before him.

Accordingly, he greeted with a loud laugh that which at first attracted his attention by its seriousness.

Unabashed, then—and, on the contrary, with more assurance than before—the young man sprang forward suddenly, hoping by this means to take Edgworth Bess by surprise.

He nearly succeeded in his object.

Rapidly the young girl retreated, and this time she did not drag the chair along with her; for she felt that it would have impeded her movements to such a degree that he would have caught her instantly.

She abandoned, then, this means of defence.

With one bound she seemed to reach the other side of the apartment.

Breathless and alarmed, she leaned against the door through which the young man had gained admittance.

Her hands hung listlessly by her side.

Her lips parted with terror, and she gazed upon her persecutor—for such he was—with the utmost alarm.

Suddenly she felt her hand touch something, and her heart swelled with joy.

It was a slight, gold-headed cane, such as the young bloods of the period always carried with them.

The handle of this she grasped, and intended to hold it before her as a defence.

As she swung it rapidly through the air she felt one part of it shake, as though loose.

It is probable she would have paid no attention to this circumstance but for the fact that a portion of the elegant cane slipped off, and exposed a glittering blade.

In an instant, then, she comprehended the nature of the weapon she held in her hand, and she could not forbear uttering an exclamation of thankfulness.

The stick was one of that kind which carry, as in a sheath, a rapier blade.

Such things then were very common.

Indeed, it was scarcely safe for any person to walk the street at night without being provided with some such means of defence.

With more rapidity than one would have deemed possible, Edgworth Bess seized the lower part of the cane, which served as a scabbard for the blade, and drew it off.

The bright rapier then glittered through the air like a flash of light.

The next instant she held it up before her in an attitude admirably adapted for defence.

The young man halted.

Surprise, anger, and admiration, all strangely mingled, were visible in his looks and attitude.

Edgworth Bess spoke not, but, with her back against the door, and her eyes riveted upon his countenance, she watched his every movement, and held herself prepared to defend herself, should it be necessary.

Her resolute bearing somewhat dismayed the young man, and he hesitated about approaching nearer.

There was a gleam in the young girl's eye, which seemed to say, as plainly as words could speak, that it would be dangerous.

So he paused.

For a moment or so he was silent, and then contracting his brows into a frown, and biting his under lip, he said:

"Come, I am tired of these heroics; I have had enough of them. Would you have me believe you are in earnest? I will give you credit for the excellence of your acting; but believe me, it is by no means to my taste, and I would fain see you in another character. Come now, throw down that foolish weapon, about the use of which you can, I am sure, know nothing, and which, I am convinced, must of necessity be highly dangerous in your hands. Let me disarm you of it, and for the remainder of the evening."

"Once more, sir," said Edgworth Bess, with dignity and energy—"once more, sir, I command you to come no nearer, or, as you say, this weapon may prove dangerous. Of its use I may not be so ignorant as you imagine; and, therefore, I bid you beware! You seem to be under the delusive impression that I am playing a part, and that all this is feigned. Let me, however, assure you, sir, that such is not the case—I am most terribly in earnest!"

The young man halted before the sharp point of the rapier, and stood looking at her in speechless surprise, while his eyes glowed with admiration at the young girl's appearance.

Her whole soul seemed to be beaming from her face; and, with her countenance flushed, and her eyes sparkling with excitement, Edgworth Bess never looked more beautiful than she did at that moment.

As for the young man, he thought he had never beheld anything so charmingly lovely in his life.

"In earnest!" he repeated, mechanically, and scarcely knowing what he uttered.

"Yes, in earnest!" repeated Edgworth Bess. "Over and over again, I have implored you to listen to me. I am certain you are labouring under some mistake; but if you would only listen to what I have to say, you would understand everything. Once more, then, on your honour as a gentleman, I implore you to hear me!"

CHAPTER CCCXXIX.

EDGWORTH BESS RESOLVES TO PUT TRUST IN THE YOUNG NOBLEMAN.

"You are so beautiful," said the young man, clasping his hands, and fixing his glowing eyes upon our heroine, "you are so beautiful, that it lies not in my power to refuse you anything! Speak, then! Tell me that which you are so desirous to communicate. But, while you do so, let me entreat that you will no longer preserve the cruel attitude which is so unbecoming of you. Here, try my side, upon this couch, I will listen to all you have to say, even though you ended not at doomsday!"

"Sir," replied Edgworth Bess, while you hear what I have to say, our present positions must be retained. You need not fear that I shall be tedious. I shall be only too glad when this scene comes to an end."

The young man's astonishment increased, and he began, for the first time, to realise that this interview would have a widely different termination to that which he had wished for and expected.

"The other night, on waking from my sleep, I saw you standing at my bedside, and gazing upon me as you do now. You disappeared almost instantly, but not before I had seen you, and noted your countenance so well that I felt certain I should be able to recognise you in a moment. I inquired who you were, and I was informed that you were my preserver and benefactor."

"Your preserver and benefactor!" ejaculated the young man, staggering back in the intensity of his astonishment.

"Your tones express surprise," said Edgworth Bess, "and I cannot help thinking that I have been deceived. I confess I could not reconcile your behaviour towards me this evening with the impulse which prompted you to snatch a starving girl from death by destitution."

"Destitution! Good heavens! My dear girl, compose yourself! You must be mad!"

"No, I am not mad, and yet—"

Edgworth Bess interrupted herself, and passed one hand confusedly over her brow.

The events which had latterly occurred were certainly sufficient to induce the belief that her intellects were wandering.

But the present scene seemed real.

"No, I am not mad," she said, with additional calmness. "I begin to see now that I have been most cruelly deceived."

"Deceived? What—how? Explain yourself!"

"I will, sir. Some days ago—I cannot say how many—I sank down, overcome with fatigue and exhaustion from want of food, upon a door-step. I felt that I could go no further, and I soon became unconscious of all that was happening around me. What happened from that moment until I awoke and found myself in the bed by the side of which you have stood, I have not the least idea. All is blank. When I awoke, I was weak; but all my wants were attended to. I soon grew stronger. The first thing I desired to know was the name of my preserver, for I had come to the conclusion, after much anxious thought upon the subject, that I must have been found upon the door-step by some kind, rich, and benevolent person, and placed where I found myself."

At these words the young man smiled faintly.

But a remarkable change had come over him.

He listened to every word which fell from the lips of Edgworth Bess with the utmost attention and interest.

"Proceed," he said, gently—"proceed! Let me hear all."

The tones of his voice and his manner were so entirely different from what they had been a short time before that Edgworth Bess looked at him with surprise.

"Having come to this conclusion, I became anxious in the extreme to see the person to whom I was so much indebted. A woman, to whom I took the deepest dislike the moment I saw her, seemed my principal attendant. To her, therefore, I addressed myself. I requested her to lose no more time in bringing me face to face with my benefactor, in order that I might pour out my gratitude and thanks, for I felt my heart full to overflowing. This she would not do. When I awoke and found you bending over me, I eagerly demanded who you were. This woman then told me that you were my preserver—that it was to you I was indebted for my preservation from death—from starvation in the streets."

"I?" ejaculated the young man, with increased surprise.

"Yes, you. But hear me out, and then you will be able to judge better, and so shall I. No sooner did I become aware of this than I was impatient in the extreme to again find myself face to face with you. But my repeated request was not attended to. At length I became strong and well enough to leave my bed. The garments which I had last worn were nowhere to be seen, and those which I now wear were in their place. At first I refused to put these on, but I was told that you—my benefactor—would be displeased if I refused, and I yielded. I was then told you were waiting for me, and I was led to this apartment. But your behaviour during our interview has been so utterly at variance with what I had expected, that I cannot come to any other conclusion than that I have been deceived. Hold off, sir!" she cried, with sudden energy, as she perceived the young man about to advance.

He halted at once, and then spoke.

"Fear nothing," he said; "I can assure you, you have no longer any occasion to fear me. Like yourself, I have been grossly deceived by Mother Robotham in this affair."

"Mother who?" inquired Edgworth Bess.

"Mother Robotham."

"Who is she?"

"The woman who keeps this house."

"The woman who keeps this house?"

"Yes."

"Can it be possible that this elegant mansion belongs to—"

"Say no more! Spare me, I pray you, the disagreeable task of stating who Mother Robotham really is, and the nature of the proceedings which are carried on in this house."

Edgworth Bess stared at him aghast.

The young man continued:

"As I said just this moment, you have not been more grossly deceived in this matter than I have. Need I tell you that I knew nothing of your history until the present moment, and that I have no claims whatever to the titles of either your preserver or benefactor?"

"Oh, heavens!"

"Nay, hear me out. It may be that in me you will find a friend, who will see you clear of a terrible danger. I will, however, be frank with you, and I trust you will pardon, for that reason, any liberty of speech of which I may make use."

With parted lips, Edgworth Bess listened eagerly to what was about to happen next.

"You will doubtless understand me when I say that this house, kept by a woman who is known as Mother Robotham, is a place to which young men in the City of London occasionally repair in search of pleasure. I can tell by the expression of your face that you understand me. I need say no more, except that I was told of your presence here by the woman you have mentioned, and admitted to an interview with you, under the belief that you were by no means unwilling that the meeting should take place. You will now, I hope, understand my behaviour. No doubt mine has surprised you as much as yours has me."

Edgworth Bess burst into a bitter flood of tears.

"Alas—alas!" she exclaimed, in a voice broken by sobs, "By what a malignant fate am I pursued! I escape one danger only to fall into another worse. Merciful heavens! what will become of me?"

For a moment or two the young man remained silent, and allowed her grief to remain unchecked and uninterrupted with.

Then he spoke.

"If you will allow me," he said, "I will make the only reparation in my power for the injury I have done and the unhappiness I have caused you."

She fixed her tearful eyes upon him, in the endeavour to ascertain how far he was to be trusted.

But no other expression appeared upon the young man's countenance than that of candour and sincerity.

"Will you," he added, perceiving how her attention was riveted upon him, "will you allow me to repair, as well as I am able, the injury I have done you?"

"I do not understand you, sir."

"Then I will speak more plainly. It is quite evident that you are no willing inmate of this house."

"Oh, no—no!" exclaimed Edgworth Bess, with a shudder of horror.

"I knew it—but then, if I am content to take my departure, leaving you unmolested, that will not secure you from the advances of others, who perhaps might not feel disposed to listen to your words as I have done. Besides, I shudder when I think upon the fate which is almost certain to be your lot!"

"Oh, sir!" exclaimed the poor girl, "you fill me with even greater horror and apprehension than I have yet experienced!"

"If you remain in this house——"

"Fear not, sir, that I shall lose any time in leaving it! Do not think that I should remain in it a moment after I have parted with you!"

The young man shook his head.

"You speak in total ignorance of where you are, and the characters by whom you are surrounded. Do you think you would be allowed to quit this house? No!—they would slay you first!"

"Alas! alas!" moaned the unhappy girl. "What will become of me?"

"If you will allow me to obtain in reality the title which has already been falsely bestowed upon me—that of your deliverer—I am willing to attempt it."

"What is your meaning, sir?"

"Simple enough. Under my protection you will be able to leave this house, but by no other means. As I have told you, they would slay you rather than suffer you to depart. Under my escort, however, you will, doubtless, be able to leave this ill-omened roof. Will you place so much trust in me as to allow me the opportunity of rescuing you from this danger? Believe me, it is a more fearful one than that with which you were menaced when you sank down upon the door-step in the manner you have described!"

Edgworth Bess looked closely into the young man's countenance as he gave utterance to the preceding speech. But she could detect upon it nothing but candour and integrity of purpose.

An anxious question now presented itself to her.

Should she trust this young man?

There was unquestionably great risk in doing so; and yet, she asked herself, after what she had heard, was it possible that she could make her position worse than it then was?

That did not seem to be possible.

Again she looked into the young man's countenance; and this time she felt even better satisfied with the result of her examination.

He spoke again.

"I shall not press you to act in the manner I have advised," he said, "lest you should place a wrong construction on my motives. If, however, you are willing to trust me, I will pledge you my honour as a gentleman—and, bad as I may have been, I have never broken my word—I say again, that if you will trust me, I will pledge you my honour to strive my utmost to free you from this horrible den."

Edgworth Bess hesitated.

She fully realised the importance of the step she was thus desired to take.

She felt fearful to decide.

And yet, the prospect of remaining where she was, with the probability of being again subjected to such an ordeal as that which she had just passed through, was so full of horror, that she felt almost decided.

Once more she looked at the young man's expressive countenance.

It remained unchanged.

She lowered the point of the weapon with which she had hitherto kept him at a distance, but very slowly. Still it was lowered.

The young man advanced.

She held out her hand towards him.

Then, in an earnest, solemn voice, she spoke.

CHAPTER CCCXXX.

EDGWORTH BESS SUCCEEDS IN LEAVING THE HOUSE IN SPRING GARDENS.

WITH his countenance beaming with undissembled pleasure, the young nobleman stepped forward a few paces, and took eagerly the hand which was extended towards him.

"I will trust you, sir!" said Edgworth Bess. "I will place reliance upon your word of honour, so solemnly given me! I hope I shall do so, and have no cause to repent it! If you are deceiving me in any way—if any treachery lurks beneath your words—then may you be deceived at the moment when you place the utmost reliance upon another!"

He shook a little at this adjuration, Edgworth Bess thought; but, if so, it was so slightly as to be scarcely perceptible.

The tones of his voice, when he replied to her, were constrained, however, and he seemed to be suffering deeply from some emotion.

"You can trust me," he said, "as you would trust yourself, or anyone who is dear to you! I shall not be false to my pledge! I cannot say that I have spent my life as I should have spent it, but I can lay my hand upon my heart and say that I never yet was guilty of a base or dishonourable action!"

The accents of truth are unmistakeable and irresistible.

Edgworth Bess, as she listened to these words, felt her confidence increase.

"Once more," she said, "I will say, I trust you, and place full reliance upon your power and good faith to save me!"

"I say it not from any desire of overrating my services," replied the young nobleman, "but you have acted very wisely. You do not—and heaven forbid you ever should—realise the full horrors of the place, or the scenes to which you would have been exposed. Aided only by yourself, you would never have been able to escape, and you would have met with a doom I shudder to contemplate! Happily, however, that is over now, and you have no longer anything to fear upon that head. Enough has been said; and it is time now for action. Arm yourself with what fortitude you are able, for we have a violent scene to go through!"

"You terrify me!"

"Nay, nay—do not be alarmed! I will take care that no harm happens to yourself!"

"But you?"

"Can it be possible that you feel an interest in my welfare?"

"Can I do otherwise? Are you not about to render me an inestimable service?"

"True—true! The speech was a foolish one; but you will quickly see that I am well able to take my own part."

"But what are you about to do?"

"That will depend greatly upon circumstances."

"What circumstances?"

"Those which may arise. In the first place, I shall require you to place your hand upon my left arm, thus. I will carry the rapier in my right. I shall then proceed to leave the house. If I am allowed to do so unquestioned, why, well and good; if not, let those who seek to interrupt me look to the consequences!"

"You alarm me!" said Edgworth Bess, "and I question whether I am right in thus bringing down danger upon you!"

"Pho, pho! I feel that I owe you some reparation, and I am only too anxious to discharge the obligation. Come, lend me your hand! We will tarry here no longer. The sooner you cease to breathe the atmosphere of pollution which fills this place, the better it will be for your own purity. Come, give me your hand!"

Edgworth Bess hesitated.

Even at the last moment the dreadful question occurred to her—was she acting rightly?

She could not tell.

She felt, however, that she had no resource, and resolved to leave the result in the hands of providence, and consoled herself with the reflection that she had acted, so far as she could tell, for the best.

After this momentary struggle, she tremblingly placed her hand upon the young nobleman's arm, as he had requested.

The die was now cast, and she felt like some desperate gamster who had staked his all upon one throw.

A furtive glance at her companion's countenance somewhat reassured her.

He no longer showed the least wish of remaining in that apartment.

He strode towards the door.

It was but a few paces from them, and was not the one through which Edgworth Bess had been ushered by the conspicuous female—who, it appeared, was known by the peculiar title of Mother Robotham—but the one through which the young nobleman had passed when he entered the room unperceived by Edgworth Bess.

The other door was locked, she already knew, and she wondered whether this one was.

Her doubts were soon set at rest.

Her companion turned the handle, and the door opened to a touch.

A spacious and well-lighted corridor appeared beyond.

It seemed to be the entrance-hall of a mansion, but Edgworth Bess could tell at a glance it was not the one she had crossed when she entered the apartment where her singular interview had taken place.

With a bold and confident step, which had the effect of banishing a great deal of the timidity she felt, the young nobleman passed into this corridor, and made his way along it in a certain direction until a spacious staircase was reached, and then Edgworth Bess recollected that she was not upon the ground floor, but the first floor of the house.

Labouring under so much excitement as she had been, it is not wonderful that she should have forgotten this.

The staircase was brilliantly lighted.

Edgworth Bess glanced all round anxiously; but, to her relief, she saw nobody.

The descent of the stairs was then commenced.

She still allowed her hand to remain upon his arm, and he still held the rapier in his hand in such a position as to make immediate use of it.

In spite of herself, Edgworth Bess trembled.

Her companion perceived the tremor, and strove to reassure her.

"It is quite possible," he said, "that we shall be able to take our departure without being seen by any person."

"No, no!" said Edgworth Bess. "Look, look!"

She pointed down the staircase as she spoke.

Standing in the centre of the hall below, and only a few feet distant from the foot of the stairs, her face distorted and empurpled with mingled astonishment and anger, was the conspicuous female—or Mother Robotham, as the young nobleman had called her.

When she saw the pair descending, she did not speak, but her whole attention seemed to be absorbed in gazing upon them.

Without wavering in the least, the young nobleman commenced the descent.

It was quite clear that he did not care much for Mother Robotham.

He held his head erect, and looked down haughtily and threateningly upon her.

She did not seem to like the look of his face, but still she did not speak, nor did she move an inch from the position she occupied.

The hall in which she stood was tolerably spacious as regarded width, but as her dimensions might truly be termed herculean, and as her dress was disproportionately distended with the stiffest of hoops, and as she had planted herself directly in the centre of the passage, it was quite clear that they could not pass without brushing her apparel.

A contact was therefore inevitable.

In a moment or so the bottom of the staircase was reached.

Still she never moved nor spoke, but her looks denoted an accession of wrath.

The young nobleman did not seem disposed to be hindered by her, or to allow her to obstruct his progress.

He raised his glittering rapier in a more threatening manner than he had done hitherto, and, in a voice so stern that Edgworth Bess scarcely recognised it, he said:

"Stand aside, woman!"

Trembling, and with difficulty preventing herself from sinking to the ground, Edgworth Bess clung to his arm, and no longer just rested upon it as she had done.

Mother Robotham took not the least notice of the words which had been addressed to her.

"Stand aside, woman!" cried the young nobleman, in even sterner and more angry tones than before. "Stand aside, I say, or you will have occasion to bitterly rue the consequences!"

"Stand aside yourself!" at length replied Mother Robotham, fiercely, and exhibiting an amazonian disposition, which her appearance fully warranted. "This is my house, not yours!"

"I grant that; but you must allow me to pass."

"There is plenty of room for you!" retorted the woman, significantly, and placing particular stress upon the last word.

The young nobleman pretended not to notice it, and walked on again.

Edgworth Bess trembled so excessively that she could scarcely support her legs under her.

Two steps took them to where the woman was standing.

Another second and they would have passed her, but ere they could do so she suddenly stretched out her hand and grasped Edgworth Bess by her apparel.

A faint shriek came from her lips upon finding this dreadful woman had placed her hand upon her.

With his eyes gleaming with rage, the young nobleman turned upon her.

"Release your hold!" he said.

"I shall not!"

"You will not?"

"I will not!" was the decided answer.

"It is well you are a female, or you would not have dared deny my demands a second time. The respect I have for you, however, is small. Beware, lest you tempt me too far—lest I should forget your sex, and bestow upon you the punishment you deserve!"

During this speech, Mother Robotham remained impassable.

"I shall not release my hold!" she said, with greater firmness even than before. "That which I grasp is my own property, and I will not allow any of it to be taken out of my house!"

"Give me back my own ragged apparel!" said Edgworth Bess, "and you shall have yours, and welcome!"

"Indeed!" said the woman, with a sneer.

"No, no!" exclaimed the young nobleman, "I will not suffer this—it is monstrous! Mother Robotham, we have had dealings before to-day—beware how you provoke me!"

"My lord," said Mother Robotham—for the first time making known the young nobleman's title—"I am in possession of secrets of yours which you would not like to be made public! Beware how you provoke me! I should be sorry to do so; but if you thwart me, I will disclose all!"

"You presume to threaten, then?"

"I do, and I shall carry my threats into execution. That young girl and the clothes she wears belong to me."

"Well, then," said the young nobleman, who was evidently deeply in the power of this infamous woman, or he would not have made the degrading concession he did—"well, then, if such is the case, the matter can be easily arranged between us. I have no desire to quarrel with you."

"Nor I with you, so long as you don't interfere with me."

"Come, then, Mother Robotham, let us consider this matter as settled. You understand? We are friends. This young lady leaves here under my protection. The other particulars we can arrange at some more fitting opportunity."

"As you like, my lord. If such is your determination, I am agreeable; only, I warn you beforehand that the price—"

The young nobleman checked her in what she was about to say by an exclamation of anger and impatience.

"Enough of this!" he cried. "The matter is arranged. Stand aside and let me pass!"

Suddenly and unwillingly, the woman obeyed, but it seemed as though she had complied because she did not know how to refuse.

Edgeworth Bess gave a sigh of relief when she found herself free from the hateful woman's touch.

What had just passed she only partially understood, so greatly was she terrified, and, moreover, much that was hinted at was past her comprehension.

Without further hindrance, they now made their way to the hall door.

A sleepy-looking porter rose from the depths of his easy-chair, and, opening the door, allowed them to pass out.

Oh, how grateful did poor Edgeworth Bess feel when the cold night air played upon her fevered cheeks!

Snow was falling, but very lightly.

It was whirled hither and thither by an eddy wind.

It must have been falling, however, for some time, for the streets, and the trees, and all the buildings were quite covered with it.

All was white.

It was a still night hour, and a strange hush was over the sleeping city, which the snow seemed to produce.

The delightful feeling of coolness rapidly passed away, and Edgeworth Bess shuddered as the wintry blast swept through her scanty clothing, for, though the dress she wore was befitting a lady, yet it was never intended to protect anyone against the inclemency of a winter's night.

Edgeworth Bess shivered, and looked with a feeling of apprehensiveness in the young nobleman's countenance.

He seemed to be suffering deeply from vexation.

CHAPTER CCCXXI.

JACK SHEPPARD AND BLUESKIN OBTAIN AN UNEXPECTED CLUE TO THE WHEREABOUTS OF EDGORTH BESS.

THE unprincipled tailor, who thought he had done such a good thing for himself by selling the two suits of clothes to two inebriated gentlemen, for the extravagant sum of twenty guineas, was so taken aback by the suddenness with which the events of the last few moments had taken place, that he was unable to offer the least resistance to Blueskin rifling his pockets.

Nor did he dare to speak, and scarcely even to breathe, for fear the pistol should go off, and blow his brains out.

The mortal terror which he suffered during the few moments which Blueskin occupied in emptying his pockets were almost an ample punishment for what he had done.

It was a lesson that lasted him the remainder of his life.

The manner in which Jack had spoken convinced him that his drunkenness was only feigned, though for what purpose he had acted as he had done he had no idea.

The reader may be sure that our old friend did not need to be told twice to empty the tailor's pockets.

He set about the execution of the task with hearty goodwill.

It was not the first time Blueskin had done such a job as that, and the manner in which he cleared his pockets, one after another, evinced what a practised hand he was.

While in the service of Jonathan Wild, he had had plenty of practice in that sort of thing, and he had by no means lost his dexterity through lapse of time.

In less than two moments, every article of value the tailor possessed was transferred to his own pockets.

Not only did he get back the twenty guineas which Jack had so recently paid him, but a large sum which was carefully tied up in a leather bag.

Even the dread of the pistol exploding could not prevent the tailor uttering a dismal groan.

The money that bag contained he had received only that very day.

A customer who had given him no end of trouble to collect his bill had paid him.

He had almost feared he should lose his money, from the length of time the bill had remained due; and now, after the unexpected pleasure of receiving it, he found it go entirely.

Blueskin had no pity upon him, however; and, for our own part, we cannot help thinking he richly deserved the treatment he had received.

The idea of offering him any serious personal injury never once entered their minds.

All they wished to do was to give him a thorough fright, and in this they succeeded completely.

The tailor thought his last moment had surely come.

"I have done," said Blueskin, as he removed the last article from the tailor's pocket.

"Right!" said Jack. Then, turning to the tailor, he added:

"Now, sir, run indoors, and if you are not upstairs before I count three, I will fire after you, and chance the consequences."

"Murder!" exclaimed the tailor, and he made a wild kind of rush into the passage of the house in the direction of the stairs.

Jack Sheppard did not wait to see whether he ascended them or not, but slammed the front door shut in a moment.

"The coast is clear," said Blueskin, who had looked carefully up and down the dark, deserted street. "At length we have baffled our foe."

"We have had a good deal of trouble in doing it," said Jack, cheerfully; "but never mind, old friend, we are free at last."

Just as he spoke, they heard a window somewhere close at hand thrown up with a prodigious clatter, and then a voice, which they recognised as the tailor's, cried:

"Fire! murder! thieves! watch! watch! Oh, murder! thieves! thieves!"

The outcry was tremendous, and an alarm would soon be general.

"We will get away from this place as soon as we can," said Blueskin, "or we may even yet be interrupted."

"True, and though I fancy Jonathan must be some distance off, yet it is quite possible that he is lurking close at hand."

"There is no dependence to be placed upon him; he is generally where he is least expected to be."

"Increase your speed, then, my friend. We will get clear of this locality as quickly as we can."

"It will be best," said Blueskin, as he set off at a trot, which Jack was easily enough able to keep up with.

In a very short time they got a considerable distance from the scene of their last exploit, which had in every respect been a most advantageous one.

They had got clear of their foes at a moment when they were exceedingly hard pressed. They had obtained two suits of clothes which made them a capital disguise; and, into the bargain, they had received a very large sum of money.

It is scarcely to be wondered at that they now experienced a great elation of spirits.

No sooner, however, had the excitement of danger passed away than the channel of Jack's thoughts was once more directed to Edgworth Bess, from whom they had been so long diverted.

As they reduced their speed to a walk, Jack said :

"Oh, Blueskin, my friend, now that we are safe, tell me what I am to do to recover Edgworth Bess! Alas—alas! how bitterly do I repent of having caused her to leave me!"

"Regrets on that score are quite useless, Jack; and if you will take my advice you will, before you attempt to seek her, or even to decide upon what course of action you shall adopt, turn in somewhere, and get that amount of rest so necessary both to you and me, and indispensable, in fact, to our success."

"I cannot but admit you are right; and yet, my impatience is so great——"

"I can understand all that; but do for once be guided by me."

"I will. I had no intention of not doing so. I am sure you must feel the effects of what we have gone through during the last few hours most severely."

"I do—I do. My wound troubles me yet, and though it is now nearly well, it has left a frightful weakness behind it."

"No doubt—no doubt. I can judge of your feelings by my own. I am entirely exhausted!"

"Then let us rest awhile. We have no choice in the matter. Then, when our limbs no longer ache, as they do at present, we will endeavour to hit upon some means of discovering whereabouts the poor girl is."

"When I think of her forlorn and unprotected condition—when I think of the dangers to which she is every hour exposed—my brain whirls round, and I feel as though I was going mad!"

"Then for the present let us drop that topic of conversation, and turn our thoughts to something else. The first and most important point, in my judgment, is the consideration where we are likely to obtain a secure night's shelter."

"Do you know this neighbourhood?"

"Very slightly."

"Then you could not say where was a safe place?"

"No, we must chance that. Before we go much further, we shall probably find a coffee-house open; if so, we shall have no difficulty in procuring a bed."

"I don't know that we can do better."

"Look around you, then; we cannot possibly go far without meeting with a house of the description mentioned."

As far as they could see, however, all was darkness—from no house within view came forth a single gleam of light.

They kept on, however, and paused before each turning which they passed, and looked narrowly down it.

At length they perceived, some distance down a narrow street that ran at right angles to the principal thoroughfare, a feeble beam of light.

In the hope that this would lead them to what they sought, they proceeded towards it.

They were not disappointed in their expectations.

The beam of light came from the window of a small shop of obscure aspect, the exterior appearance of which, so far as our friends could judge in the darkness, was not very prepossessing.

But they were not in a position to be over particular.

Without hesitation our friends entered.

The shop was empty.

They sat down in one of the boxes near the door, and asked for refreshment, for the pangs of hunger began to make themselves felt now that their excitement had passed away.

They were waited upon by a dirty, untidy girl, whose personal appearance well accorded with the exterior of the house.

A card affixed to one of the walls intimated that there were "good beds" to let, and accordingly our two friends made application, after having despatched the meal that had been placed before them.

They were not very particular, it seemed, about appearances, for the girl agreed immediately upon the stipulation that the money was paid down beforehand.

This, of course, was no obstacle, and they were conducted to a bed-chamber.

Here they slept for several hours, and did not descend until the evening of the next day was close at hand.

They remained in the coffee-room till dusk, judging it would be too dangerous to venture out before.

As soon as the friendly darkness came, they sallied forth.

Both had thoroughly washed themselves, and properly adjusted their new clothing, so that they now presented quite an ordinary appearance, and were not at all calculated to call forth the attention of anyone who passed them in the street.

They now occupied themselves in devising some means of discovering Edgworth Bess.

They could not help thinking, however, that their search was a hopeless one.

They could think of no better plan than that of making their way to the spot where the poor girl had disappeared, and commencing their inquiries at this point, directing them all round, and gradually increasing their range.

More than once they asked themselves whether she had fallen into the hands of Jonathan Wild; but, after a great deal of consideration upon the subject, they came to the conclusion that she had not.

They supported this view of the case by the demeanour of the thief-taker.

If he had had her in his possession, they were quite of opinion he would have acted rather differently towards them.

They had then no clue whatever to direct them in their search, though they hoped ere long to obtain one.

To reach the spot where he had last seen her was an easy enough matter to Jack Sheppard, for that place was continually before his mental vision.

Upon arriving here, they began in a very methodical manner.

The whole night, however, was consumed without their having been able to obtain the slightest scrap of information to cheer them on to further efforts.

At length day dawned, and then for a time it became necessary for them to relinquish their efforts.

They were compelled to remain out of sight during the daytime.

In this manner—searching by night, and resting and sleeping by day—nearly a week elapsed, and the end of that time saw them no nearer to their object than when they commenced.

This was disheartening to a degree, but still they persevered, convinced that sooner or later they must obtain some information which would turn their exertions in one particular direction.

Still, day after day passing by in this manner with no result decreased their hopes.

What could have become of her?

That was a question which they asked themselves a thousand times, but always without being able to return any reply.

Without our entering into any minute description, the reader will doubtless be able to form a tolerably good idea of the state of Jack's mind.

It bordered at times upon absolute frenzy.

At length, one evening, about the accustomed hour—that is to say, just as it was growing dusk—they descended from the chamber in which they had passed the night to the coffee-room on the ground floor, where they partook of a meal while waiting for the dusky twilight to deepen into darkness.

They were in the neighbourhood of Westminster.

In the box before them two men were seated.

They were attired in great coats, with a number of capes, such as were worn by coachmen, or the drivers of hackney carriages.

They were talking in rather a loud tone of voice to each other, and sitting so close to them as Jack and Blueskin were, they could not avoid overhearing every word.

At first they listened indifferently, but presently became deeply interested in the conversation which was taking place.

"Of course, Bill," said one, "driving a hackney isn't what it used to be."

"You are right there."

"But still, as I said before, very 'stornary things happens sometimes. Now, I tell you one thing wot's hung on my mind ever since it happened, and I can't get rid of it nohow."

"Was it very 'stornary, then?"

"Oh, very 'stornary indeed, as you'll say when I tells you. It's as nigh a week ago as possible—leastways, it ain't no less, and it can't be much more—as I was sitting on the box of my coach, waiting for a fare, and thinking of nothing at all, I prezenly sees at the corner of the street a very 'stornary-looking old 'oman. As soon as she twigged me she hiked her hand, which I understood to mean as how she wanted a coach. So I woke the old hosses up, and rolled up to where she stood. I was jest pulling up to the kerb, close to which she was, when sez she, 'Don't stop here, but foller me round the corner.' 'All right, mum,' sez I, and I faked the horses up again, and turned round the corner into a quiet street; and now comes the 'stornary part of the bizness!'

CHAPTER CCCXXXII.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD ARRIVE AT THE HOUSE IN SPRING GARDENS.

THE hackney-coachman paused to take another draught of coffee, for talking dried his mouth, and Jack Sheppard and Blueskin, with a strong feeling of interest, leaned forward on their hands and listened with increased intentness.

The coachman's companion, too, seemed greatly interested by this narrative, and he waited impatiently for his comrade to resume.

"Now, Bill, as I said afore, this here's the 'stornary part of the bizness. I follers this rumny old 'oman round the corner. She only goes a yard or two, and then stops before a house. In coorse I pulled up, and then I saw, a-sitting on a door-step, one of the prettiest little girls as ever I saw in my life. Sez I to myself, 'Summat's in the wind, Joe; keep your blessed eyes open.' 'Don't be afraid!' sez myself to I. Well, this here old 'oman, whose dress had as many bright colours in it as a drop of oil a-floating on the top of a puddle of water—this here old 'oman goes up to the door-step, and stops before this here little gal—leastways, she wasn't so very little, but she wasn't nowhere near as big as our Bet. Howsomdever, that's neither here nor there, and was nothing to do with the 'stornary bizness.'"

"Cut along, then, Joe—let's hear it!"

"Don't be impatient. Well, this pretty young gal as I was a-telling you about, wot was a-sitting down upon the door-step, wasn't dressed noways according to her beauty. Her clothes was very ragged. I don't know whether I told you before, but she seemed to be in a kind of a faint or a swoond, or summat of that sort, for the old 'oman opened her "ridicule" and takes out a little bottle. Then she pulls the stopper out, and holds it just under the gal's nose, who opens her eyes and looks about her as though she didn't know where she was. Well, atween us, we got the gal into the coach; but as soon as she sat down on the seat she seemed to go off into a swoond again. Howsomdever, I didn't say nothing, but shuts the door. 'Spring Gardens!' sez the old 'oman. Now, what do you think of that, Bill? Bless if I couldn't have chucked a stone on to the very place!"

"Go on, Joe!"

"I'm a-going! Well, in coorse I was obliged to drive where she directed, but I smelt something 'stornary; so I thought I should have a downright good fare. So, when I got to Spring Gardens, I jumps off the box, opens the door, and helps them out. Well, this here gal had fainted again; so I picked her up, and carried her up the steps to the front door of the house, where they took her off me. Well, when I had done this, how much do you think the old 'oman gave me? You'll never guess, so I'll tell you. It was five bob!"

"That's just what I expected."

"Well, I tell you, I expected a good deal more, but I didn't get it. I grumbled, and cursed, and swore, but that didn't do no good, and in the end I was obliged to give in and be off. When I drove away from that there house, I thought to myself, 'Now, there's something 'stornary in all this, only I can't just make it out. I wonder who that gal was?—such a pretty gal as that belongs to somebody, I know, and I wonder what that old 'oman wants to take her to that house for?—no good, that's clear.' Well, do you know, Bill, this here gal stuck in my mind, and I couldn't get rid of her nohow, so I thought I would make some inquiries about this fine-looking house in Spring Gardens, and at last I found out all about it. Now, what do you think that house was?"

"I don't know, Joe."

"Lean over the table, and I'll whisper it in your ear."

Something was then said in a low tone of voice, but what it was, Jack and Blueskin could not tell, though they strained their ears to the utmost.

Whatever it was, seemed to surprise the man who had been called Bill by his companion.

Our friends, however, determined to know more, and that at once.

Just as they came to this conclusion, the two men left the coffee-shop.

Jack and Blueskin rose too, immediately, and followed them out.

The one who had told the 'stornary narrative, as he called it, was removing the nose-bags from his horses' heads, for his coach was waiting outside the door.

His companion was similarly engaged.

Our friends hailed the former, and, with a bow, he came towards them.

Blueskin addressed him:

"I want to have a few words with you, my friend, and I think it is very likely I shall be able to put you in the way of earning a guinea."

The man's eyes sparkled, and he became all attention in a moment.

"I heard you telling your companion about a circumstance that happened to you a short time ago."

"Yes, sir; and a very 'stornary circumstance it were, too!"

"So I think, and I feel much interested in it. Look—here is the guinea!" and, as he spoke, Blueskin drew the coin mentioned from his pocket, and held it up to the inspection of the hackney-coachman.

"You shall have this," he continued, "if you will tell me the number of the house in Spring Gardens, and what it was you found out about it."

"Tip us the quid, your honour! The number was 57."

"57?"

"Yes."

"And the house?"

"Why, the house is what they call a house of accommodation for West-end swells. Do you twig my flower of langwidge?"

"Good heavens!" exclaimed Jack. "Can it be possible? My worst fears are more than confirmed!"

The hackney-coachman looked rather surprised at this speech, and he said:

"Well, this is 'stornary! If I don't believe you belong to that gal!"

"We do, we do—I am sure we do!"

The coachman gave a long whistle.

"Then I am sorry for you, for that there house is one of the awfullest dens in all London!"

"Stay, stay! Describe this young girl you have mentioned!"

The coachman did so, and then no doubt remained in their minds that it was Edgworth Bess of whom he spoke.

Jack's despair was terrible.

In his darkest moments he had never anticipated anything so bad as this.

"Well, bless if I didn't think something more would come of this affair!" ejaculated the calman; "and I am very glad being as how you have found me out, 'cause I'll do the best for you I can!"

"Drive us to this house—drive us there at once, and I will level it to the ground if they have injured one hair of her head!"

"Now, my young friend, don't you be violent and hasty. You had much better listen to what I have to say."

"Speak!" said Blueskin, who was much calmer than his companion; "speak! No doubt you can give us important information and advice. If you do so, you may rely upon being well recompensed."

"Thank you, sir. I take it you belongs to this here pretty young gal?"

"Yes, yes!"

"And in coorse you are much put about to think she has got into such hands as those of Mother Robotham?"

"Who?"

"Didn't I tell you?"

"No!"

EDGORTH BESS TAKES A FRANTIC LEAP INTO THE RIVER.

"Well, then, Mother Robotham's the name of the old 'oman I have been talking about."

"Go on—I understand."

"I say you would be glad enough to get her out of such hands, of coorse, but you must be very careful, or you will never do it. You must use no violence; if you do, you will never succeed. You must take 'em all by surprise."

"I understand."

"You must get into the house and get her out of it without the blessed old 'oman being aware of what you are arter. If you talk of levelling the house to the ground, you'll do no good at all."

"You shall be well paid for this!"

"All right, yer honour! Of coorse, my time is my money."

"To be sure; and I think you will find your time was never of such value to you before."

The coachman's eyes sparkled with pleasure

"Then you take my advice?"

"Certainly!"

No. 67.

"I know the young gal's there, and you will get into the house on the sly——"

"Just so; you leave that part of the business to me."

"All right, sir, only I should just like to know that we understand each other. You will then try to bring this young girl away without kicking up a rumpus."

"That is our intention, though it would not be a trifle that would keep us back."

"Well, then," said the coachman, "I'll tell you what had better be done."

"What?"

"In the first place, if you will get into the coach, I will drive you to Spring Gardens. It won't take two minutes."

"Agreed."

"Well, when we are there, I will show you the house, and leave you to get into it. In the meantime, I'll wait about with the coach, and when you come out, I shall be ready waiting. You can put her inside the coach, get in yourselves, and off we should be before they knew where they were."

"That arrangement suits me very well," said Blueskin. "I should think this is not the first job of the sort you have had to do with."

"Well, that's neither here nor there, you know. I might and I might not; but if a hackney-coachman was to tell all his history, it would be as strange a one as ever was listened to."

"No doubt—no doubt! But we are ready now. We will get in."

"All right, and you will find yourself at Spring Gardens before you know where you are."

"The sooner the better."

As they spoke, Jack and Blueskin got into the hackney coach.

The driver ascended the box, and the cumbrous but comfortable vehicle was set in motion.

Jack was so overcome by the disastrous intelligence they had so unexpectedly received, that up to the present moment he had felt himself unable to command his voice sufficiently to speak.

Now, however, he endeavoured to address his faithful comrade.

"Oh, Blueskin!" he exclaimed, "this news is of a far more dreadful character than I anticipated! I shudder, and my blood runs cold in my veins, when I think of what may have happened."

"Do not distress yourself too much. Things may not be so bad as they appear; though, goodness knows, what we have heard is bad enough!"

"Oh, it is horrible! Never—never did I think of her being menaced with such a fate! Better—oh, better would it have been had she fallen into the hands of the thief-taker himself!"

"Come, come—calm yourself! If you do not, we shall stand but a poor chance of success. Control your emotions, I pray you; in a minute or two more we shall reach the house."

Jack shuddered, but was silent.

"This man," continued Blueskin, "whom I consider it very lucky we have met with, has mapped out a capital plan of proceeding, and I cannot myself see how it could be improved. He does not know, though, what an easy thing it would be for us to enter a house. That part of the business will be attended with very little difficulty, I fancy."

"We can do that; but when we find her——"

"Let us hope for the best," said Blueskin; "it can do no harm, and things may turn out much better than we have dared to anticipate."

"I can see no room for hope."

"Come, come—do not be so cast down! It may be—and I fervently hope that such may prove the case—that we may be fortunate enough to arrive at a moment when she has most need of our presence. Who can tell? Once more, Jack, let me advise you to hope for the best."

"I will try to do so," said Jack, who was somewhat encouraged and reassured by the view which his companion took of the case.

In the meantime, the coach rumbled on, until at length it pulled up with a jerk.

Before they could open the door, the driver had descended from his box, and stood at the door.

"I haven't driven up to the door of the house," he said, "because I don't want to excite suspicion; but if you will get down here, I will show you the house where the old woman took the young gal."

Our friends were well pleased to observe this fresh instance of the driver's acuteness, and they alighted in a moment.

"I will just slip the nose-bags on the horses—I sha'n't be a minute—and then, when I have done that, I shall be able to leave them—they won't move while they are eating."

To this they consented, and it was accordingly done.

The coachman then walked a little distance, and crossed over the road, being all the time closely followed by Blueskin and Jack, who were anxious in the extreme to see this house.

He paused close to the railings in front of a mansion, the appearance of which was in every respect first-class.

It would not have disgraced any gentleman to have taken up his residence in such an abode.

Our two friends were much surprised at the magnificence of it, and they almost felt inclined to doubt the truth of what the coachman had told them.

"Are you sure," said Blueskin, "that it was to this mansion that you drove the woman you have described?"

"I am quite certain of it. I told you the number was 57. Step this way, and I will show it to you on the door; there is a lamp which will enable you to see it."

As he spoke, the coachman crept on until he was on a level with the front door.

There was a lamp over it, and this cast a tolerably bright light around.

By the aid of this, and assisted a little by their imagination, since they had been told what figures were on the door, they perceived the number.

It was 57.

CHAPTER CCCXXXIII.

EDGORTH BESS INDIGNANTLY REJECTS THE YOUNG NOBLEMAN'S INSIDIOUS PROPOSAL.

EDGORTH BESS, although, as we have said, she did not comprehend the scene which had just taken place between the young nobleman and that singular specimen of feminine humanity, Mother Robotham, still could not but be aware that the vexation so palpably visible, not only in the looks, but also in the whole demeanour of him who stood by her side, proceeded solely from what had taken place between them.

There was much in what had passed which Edgworth Bess would at no time have understood; but, labouring under such excitement and terror as she was, it was nearly all incomprehensible to her.

She was clearly conscious of but one fact only, and that was, that she was free from the precincts of that dreadful house, the recollection of which would to her be always a thing of horror.

She was free.

She had escaped those frightful dangers with which she had been menaced; she was safe from the clutches of that hideous female, Mother Robotham.

Can we be surprised, then, that her heart overflowed with gratitude to her young preserver for all that he had done on her behalf?

She felt annoyed to think she had been the cause of the vexation which now filled his mind.

Timidly, then, and with a slight shiver as the keen wintry blast swept past her, she looked up into his countenance.

That this young nobleman had committed himself in some way or other, and was in the power of Mother Robotham, the reader need scarcely be told.

He will have surmised as much, as well as the nature of the secret which gave her power over him.

It was not, perhaps, the knowledge of this unpleasant fact which produced the effect described, so much as the mortification he could not help experiencing at the thought that the exposure should have been made in the presence of the young girl who had so confidently placed herself under his protection, and in whose eyes he doubtless wished to appear to as much advantage as possible.

This was the reflection which pressed heavily upon his mind when Edgworth Bess gave that furtive glance into his countenance, and noted its expression.

The young nobleman observed this glance, and his mortified feeling increased.

He was conscious that he appeared in a despicable light, and that his presence in that house, and the woman's demeanour towards him, redounded little to his credit.

A strange thrill shot through his heart when the poor girl glanced up at him.

She had made a deep impression upon a heart whose greatest fault was a too keen susceptibility of female loveliness.

The form and features of Edgworth Bess could only dimly be discerned in the darkness of the street, but the light which came from the oil lamp over the door, and the reflection which seemed to come from the white surface of the snow upon the ground, revealed sufficient of both to recall forcibly to his mind the appearance which she presented when in the brilliantly-lighted chamber in which their strange interview had taken place.

And that he should have been thus impressed with the personal appearance of our fair heroine is not to be surprised at.

Never in her life had her charms been exhibited to such advantage.

Her costume was magnificent and rich in the extreme, and the varying emotions which swayed her mind during the whole of the conversation imparted to her cheeks a lovely crimson glow, and to her eyes a brilliancy which made the diamonds the young nobleman wore about his person appear dull.

To him she seemed the loveliest being in the form of woman he had ever in his life beheld.

It was the deference which her beauty exacted that prompted him to treat her as he had done since their explanation, but it was the desire of obtaining this lovely creature for himself which made him so solicitous to remove her from that house.

And thus we see that, generous and noble as his conduct appeared, he was in reality actuated by a selfish and ignoble feeling.

In a low voice he addressed her.

"At last," he said, "we are free from that house, and you can go now in whatever direction you may think proper."

"Oh, my lord," exclaimed Edgworth Bess, in tones of fervent gratitude—"for such I hear is your title—how can I utter thanks sufficient to repay you for the inestimable service you have rendered me? I shudder and turn pale when I think of the frightful peril from which you have snatched me, and feel altogether incompetent of expressing my gratitude."

"Say no more—say no more upon that point, I beg. What I have done, I have done willingly enough, and I take shame to myself for having behaved towards you as I did."

"That was because we were both deceived," said Edgworth Bess. "Fain would I erase from my mind all recollection of the unpleasant topic."

"Generous girl, I can see you are willing to extenuate my unworthy conduct! But I will listen to no such extenuation. I say again, I take shame to myself for having acted towards you as I have, and all that I have since done I hope you will look upon as some kind of reparation."

"If it pleases you, my lord, I am willing to look upon it in that light; but I can never forget the service you have done me!"

"It gives me pleasure to listen to your thanks, although I am convinced that I do not deserve them. I see, now, the ground is covered with snow, and a keen wind whistles through the street. It was thoughtless of me to remain speaking to you here. Tell me, to what place of shelter can I conduct you?"

These words pierced the heart of poor Edgworth Bess. She knew not what to say.

Upon the spur of the moment she was unable to name any place of refuge and security to which she could be escorted.

In a voice of extreme agitation, she replied:

"Nay, nay, my lord! I cannot suffer you to trouble yourself any more about a poor girl like myself. Already I feel under the weight of too much obligation to you, and cannot consent that the load should be increased."

"Do not, I pray you, look upon what I have done in such a light as that. Besides, you must be aware that at night the streets of London are scarcely safe for anyone to walk in, and least of all for a young girl like yourself. I must, therefore, insist upon not quitting you until I have succeeded in restoring you to your friends. It is my duty to see you to some place of safety."

The young nobleman proceeded thus far in his speech because the agitation of Edgworth Bess was so extreme that she was unable to command her voice so as to interrupt him.

"Let me entreat you," she at length exclaimed—"let me entreat you, by what you have already done, not to press this point upon me. Leave me here, I beseech you. I am not afraid of encountering danger in the streets."

"With any other request uttered by you, I should most certainly comply, because I should not be able to deny you anything; but in the present instance I must be firm. I cannot allow you to rush blindly into this fresh peril."

"Oh, my lord, you distress me—indeed you do!"

"Distress you?"

"Yes—yes!"

"I do not understand."

"Do not—pray do not press me for an explanation!"

Calm yourself, my dear girl—calm yourself! There is no necessity for this agitation."

"You know not, nor would I have you know for worlds!"

"You speak in riddles."

"No matter. Let us part here."

"Never!"

"My lord, I renew my request. Let us part here."

"I cannot consent to it."

"You must—you must! Farewell, my lord! For all that you have done, believe me I am most deeply grateful, and should I live a hundred years, I shall never forget you or the peril which I have luckily escaped through your intervention. Farewell, my lord! Say farewell to me, and we will part, for that we shall ever meet again is scarcely probable."

"Nay, nay, I will never consent to such a separation!" and as he spoke the young nobleman grasped the poor girl's hand so tightly that she was unable to extricate it. "It is impossible that we can part like this. I cannot consent to it. For your own good, I implore you to tell me to what place I can escort you. Where is your home?"

"My home!" mournfully ejaculated Edgworth Bess.

Her companion did not seem to understand what the tone of her voice implied, for he continued:

"Fear not to tell me," he said. "I pledge you my word of honour as a gentleman that I will take you in safety to your own door."

"I do not doubt you," said Edgworth Bess, her voice half suffocated with tears. "There was no need for you to have given me your last assurance."

"Nevertheless, I repeat it."

"There is no need to do so."

"Once more let me entreat you to tell me, where is your home?"

"It is impossible."

"Impossible?"

"Yes."

"I do not understand you."

"I say, my lord, it is impossible, and do not press me further."

"I see it all now. You are agitated and excited, and scarcely conscious of what you are saying."

"Not so, my lord."

"You are much agitated."

"I admit that."

"Then calm yourself."

"I shall be calm the moment you cease to press me upon this topic. It is from this cause alone that my agitation proceeds."

"You bewilder me. I know not what to think. Can it be possible—"

"What, my lord?"

"Pardon me if I offend you by speaking my thoughts, but—"

"What?"

"From what you have said, and the manner you have spoken, I am driven to the conclusion that you have no home."

A gasping sob from the young girl's breast was his reply.

"Ah!" he cried; "I see now that I have pained, and perhaps offended you."

"No—no!—believe me, you have not. It is best, however, that you should know the truth. You are right; in your conjecture—I have no home."

"No home? Good heavens! What am I to think? What is your future purpose? Whither was it that you intended to go?"

"I know not."

"Know not?" he repeated, in accents of surprise. "Oh, listen to me—hear what I have to say!"

"I am compelled to listen, my lord."

"These words are intended as a reproach. It is true that by retaining your hand in my grasp I keep you here against your will, but I do so for your own good. Listen, then! Discard from your thoughts all idea of leaving me. Believe me, I both can and will provide you with a home, and such a one as you might feel proud to have. I have rank and I have wealth—I am uncontrolled in my actions

—I am in no way fettered. Ponder, then, upon my proposal—”

“Enough—enough, my lord! For the sake of the good opinion which I have formed of you, let us part here—now, at once—and say no more! Our paths lie in opposite directions!”

“Not so, by heavens!—not so!” exclaimed the young man, vehemently. “Abandon from this moment the rash resolution which you have formed. I am convinced it is impossible that you have reflected upon the consequences of such a step.”

“There needs no reflection.”

“Indeed there does—serious, grave reflection—and there it is that you fall into a mistake. You know not—dream not of the danger which will assail you. That from which you have so providentially escaped will sink into insignificance by comparison. Peril will await you at every step you take!”

“No matter—I am resolved!”

“Do not be so hasty, but hear me out. Would it not be much wiser upon your part to comply with the proposition I was about to make when you interrupted me?”

“My lord—”

“Nay, let me speak!”

“Do you wish to forfeit my good opinion, and undo all the good you have achieved?”

“I am not afraid of that. Once more I ask you to listen to me. You have no home—you have confessed that. From this it is only fair to infer that you have no relatives. You are, then, alone in the world. To a young girl, what position in life could be more forlorn and wretched? None, and nothing but misery will await you. That is one side of the case; and now attend to the other. I have had the good fortune to do you a service—to occupy, indeed, the enviable situation of your protector. I have freed you from one danger—I am willing to stand between you and all others. I desire to place you where peril will no longer have the power to reach you. You have no home—I will provide you with one. You have no relatives—I will supply their place. With your kind consent, I will be as in all to you! That is my proposal. I will not press you for any reply to it now. I am willing to allow you as much time as you think proper to reflect upon the matter, and weigh it carefully in your mind. For the present, however, I must insist upon placing you in some place of security. To leave you here in the street a prey to all kinds of disaster and without the least chance of seeing you again is impossible! Come, then! Let me place you in safety. Your decision I will ask you for at some future opportunity, when you are less agitated than you are at present. Come!”

As he spoke, he attempted to lead the young girl along the street, but she resolutely refused to stir.

The long speech which we have set down was uttered with extreme rapidity, and with such impetuosity that, though Edgworth Bess strove to interrupt him twice or thrice, she failed to do so. He continued, heedless of what she said, and some strange kind of fascination seemed to compel her to listen to all he said.

When he ceased the charm was broken, and the attempt he made to lead her forward roused her into action.

“Release me, my lord!” she cried in tones of great decision. “Release me! Two persons so widely different as we are can, I am convinced, have nothing in common with honour to myself. Your proposal I reject! Once more I thank you for what you have done! Once more I demand to be released! Farewell!”

As she uttered this last word, Edgworth Bess succeeded by a sudden movement in disengaging her hand.

No sooner did she feel herself at liberty, than she darted off with the speed of the wind, and in a moment was lost to view.

CHAPTER CCCXXXIV.

EDGWORTH BESS ONCE MORE FINDS HERSELF FRIENDLESS, ALONE, AND UNPROTECTED, IN THE STREETS OF LONDON.

FRANTICALLY did the young nobleman call after Edgworth Bess, and implore her to return.

She heeded not his cries.

Intent only upon escaping from them, she flitted over the snow-covered ground like a spirit.

He lost no time in commencing a pursuit, but he soon abandoned it.

The young girl once lost to view, he knew full well that it would be madness to attempt to overtake her.

Breathlessly did Edgworth Bess continue on her course. She did not stop to listen—she did not pause to look behind her.

She felt convinced that she was pursued, and this conviction gave her strength to run with great rapidity.

But at length exhausted breath and failing limbs compelled her to stop.

Fearfully and tremblingly she came to a halt, and looked about her.

All was still.

No human being was in sight.

No sound broke upon the deathlike stillness.

Entirely overcome, she sat down upon the snow, nor did she rise until several minutes had passed away.

Innocent as she was, and favourably disposed as she was towards the young nobleman, yet she could not close her eyes to the true meaning of the proposition he had made to her.

Pained and grieved at this instance of baseness in one who she thought to find all honour, she had felt herself suddenly endowed with strength sufficient to enable her to release herself from his detaining grasp.

How thankful she felt when at length she rose from the spot where she had fallen!

She had been preserved from two terrible dangers that night, and she shuddered as she wondered to what new peril she should now be exposed.

Desirous, however, of placing as great a distance as possible, not only between herself and the young nobleman, but also between herself and that ill-omened house in Spring Gardens, she hurried onward.

Growing now somewhat calmer, and less apprehensive that someone was following her, she slackened her speed soon afterwards, and looked about her.

As before, her eyes and ears convinced her that no one was pursuing her.

She then glanced up at the houses, but did not recognise them.

Keeping on steadily, she soon saw before her the dim outlines of a large building, which, after gazing at it for a little while, she found was Westminster Abbey.

This gave her a clue to her whereabouts.

Turning to the left, she proceeded over Westminster Bridge.

Not the present elegant structure, but the one which preceded it.

One remarkable and often-described feature in this bridge was that on either side, at certain distances, were recesses of a semi-dome-like shape, and fitted with seats.

Edgworth Bess passed by the first of these; but upon coming to the second, she resolved to seat herself on it, and rest awhile, for she was terribly fatigued.

Accordingly she did so.

But she felt the cold most acutely.

Not only was it a most inclement night, but her clothes were scanty, and a chill water-wind blew off the river.

She shivered like one in an ague fit.

How long she sat there she knew not.

Occasionally persons passed like spectres over the bridge, as the snow was now sufficiently deep to deaden the sound of footsteps.

At length that gloomy winter's night passed away.

Day broke.

The bridge now became every moment more and more thronged with people.

Now that daylight was fast approaching, Edgworth Bess left her resting-place.

Her limbs were cramped and stiff with sitting in the cold, but still she did not feel quite so much fatigued.

With a somewhat lighter heart, and with a brisker tread, she continued her way over the bridge.

She soon discovered, however, that her appearance attracted universal attention; and that it should do so was a fact scarcely to be wondered at.

To see a female, attired as she was, walking the streets only an hour or so after daybreak was a spectacle which the inhabitants of Westminster had never before beheld.

Taking little apparent notice of this, Edgworth Bess continued on her way, terribly puzzled and perplexed as to what would be the best thing for her to do.

She by no means wished to attract such universal attention as she did.

On the contrary, she would fain have crept along the streets without being noticed by a single human being.

That it was the extraordinary style of her dress that excited curiosity, and directed all eyes towards her, she felt certain; but she did not know how to get rid of it.

She had no money—not so much as the smallest coin.

How, then, she asked herself, could she possibly purchase a change of apparel?

This was a question she could not solve.

She was forced to continue onwards as she was.

At length, on passing down a street she saw a shop, the shutters of which had been taken down, and a boy was busily occupied in hanging up various articles of second-hand apparel.

She hesitated as she passed this shop, and after going a few steps farther came to a halt.

After a moment's deliberation, she resolved to turn back, and try whether she could procure what she wanted at this shop.

She felt timid and frightened, but really there was no occasion for it.

She paused again before the shop, and at last, with an effort of desperation, followed the boy in on one of the occasions when he entered for a fresh supply of clothes to hang up.

Owing to the window and door being covered with garments, the interior of this shop was very dark indeed; but still Bess was able to see a woman who was standing behind the counter.

With that peculiar accent and pronunciation which denote the children of Israel, this woman inquired her business.

She spoke respectfully, for this Jew woman's eyes were used to the gloomy obscurity of the shop, and she could see that the clothing worn by her early customer was such as befitted a duchess.

It was some time before Edgworth Bess could make known her wishes; but at length, in a faint and tremulous voice, she said:

"I want a change of dress!"

She would have said more, but was unable to command her voice to steadiness.

"All right, my tear," said the woman; "you have come to the right shop and no mistake! Whash is it you would like to have?"

"I have no money!" said Edgworth Bess.

"No monish, eh?" said the woman, with a decided change in her voice and manner; "but perhaps," she added, brightening up at the fresh idea and renewed hope of doing business, "perhaps you have got monish worth?"

"Yes, yes!" cried Edgworth Bess, eagerly.

"Well, whash have you got to offer in exchange?"

"There is this dress," said the poor girl; "look, it is a costly one, and made of the best materials. I want you to give me a common one in the place of it, and a bonnet for my head!"

"Oh, my tear, you ask too much—sadly too much! I could not do it—s'help me Joshua, I could not do it!"

"Alas, alas!" moaned Edgworth Bess. "That hope is gone! What am I to do now?"

As she uttered these words in a low and mournful voice, she turned round and was about to leave the shop.

Hastily, however, the woman called her back.

She was by no means desirous of losing so good a customer.

"Shtop!" she said. "Shtop, my dear! and I will try what can be done."

Revived by this faint hope, Edgworth Bess turned round.

"Whash sort of a bonnet and dress did you require?"

"Any kind—no matter what; the commoner the better."

"I will try what I can do, my tear, just for the look of you, though I am shure to lose by this bit of bizness."

The Jew woman took down from a peg a common and tattered sort of dress.

She had bought it the night before for fourpence.

From a drawer she produced a hat such as was generally worn by females at that period.

This was irretrievably damaged.

"I've got these two, my tear, but I want two shillings and the dress you have on before I can part with them. I do, s'help me Joshua!"

"Alas, then, I must remain as I am, for, as I told you, I have no money!"

"Well, here, take 'em—take 'em! It's my failing to be generous. I shall lose awfully by this; but it's all for your sake, my tear! Step inside a minute, and then you can change your dress."

Edgworth Bess was only too glad to comply with this request, and she changed her dress accordingly, leaving the beautiful dress she had worn in exchange for the miserable rags the Jew woman gave her.

Edgworth Bess, however, was well enough pleased with her bargain; but reflecting that a shawl or cloak of some kind would be requisite not only for appearance's sake but for protection from the cold as well, she, after a great deal of trouble, succeeded in getting a cloak—which was, however, only fit to be worn by a mendicant.

Highly pleased with her bargain, she left the shop, and once more continued her way along the street.

These wants having been supplied, the pangs of hunger began to gnaw at her heart, and she anxiously asked herself how she was to succeed in obtaining food.

No sooner was she out of one difficulty than another stared her in the face.

She was pleased to find that she no longer formed such an attractive object as she had done a short time before.

A glance of compassion was now all that was bestowed upon her.

As she wandered on she became plunged in profound thought.

What was she to do? was the question that stared her in the face.

She did not know.

Sick and faint with fatigue, cold, and want of food, her spirits suffered great depression.

She began to lose all hopes of ever again being united to Jack Sheppard.

Certainly, it seemed as though she would perish of cold and want before the meeting took place.

Eventually, she thought, she must discover him—but when?

For aught she knew, Jack Sheppard might, by this time have received his death-blow from the thief-taker; and, if so, what was to become of her?

She must act for herself.

London was a place where money could be procured, and in many different ways.

It was necessary that she should have money; but how was she to earn it?

Not long did this question perplex her.

She recollected she had a trade in her fingers, and wondered how she had forgotten it till now.

By it she could at least earn sufficient to save her from utter destitution.

It was a horrid, soul-depressing, and body-wearing trade.

The reader will, doubtless, recollect that when Edgworth Bess was first introduced on the stage of this narrative, it was as a shroud-maker.

That was the trade at which she thought she could obtain a livelihood.

She had worked for Mrs. Roblet for a length of time—until, indeed, the woman who she always thought was her mother died, and then she was suddenly deprived of her employment.

It was on the night when this took place that Jack had the good fortune to rescue her from the attack which Lord Donmull and his man Steggs made upon her.

From that hour she had had no employment.

Now, however, thrown so entirely upon her own resources as she was, she determined to look about her until she found a place where she could obtain work of this description to do.

Having now a purpose in view, she forgot to a great extent her fatigue and the hunger that was gnawing at her breast.

With renewed hope and cheerfulness, she looked into shop window after shop window, hoping to find one of the particular description she sought.

In this she was for a long time unsuccessful.

She travelled a great distance before she came to where these articles were made.

Entering, she requested employment; but the man in the shop, glancing suspiciously at her habiliments, sternly bade her begone.

Downcast and trembling, the poor girl left the shop.

As soon as she got outside, she wept long and bitterly.

Many saw her, but none inquired the cause of her grief, or attempted in any way to assuage it.

At length, from sheer exhaustion, she ceased weeping, and, looking up, found she had paused opposite another shroud-maker's.

Such an effect had her former rebuff had upon her, that her heart sunk at the bare idea of entering this shop and making another attempt.

Still some kind of fascination kept her hovering about the spot.

At length she walked up to the window, and looked at the ghastly and ominous articles exposed in it.

Upon her, however, they produced but a slight effect, for she was familiar with them.

At length she caught sight of a card.

It was a small one, and upon it were scrawled, in scarcely legible letters, two words.

Yet they were expressive—to the poor girl who deciphered them especially so.

The two words were, "HANDS WANTED."

Although she saw this announcement, and understood it so well, yet the poor girl was afraid to enter.

She could not forget the manner in which she had been treated such a little time ago.

Her spirits were by far too delicate and sensitive to bear up against such rude rebuffs, or even an unkind word.

And so, shivering with cold and hunger, she stood hesitatingly before the window.

Alas, how sad it was to see her in such a situation and in such a frame of mind!

She was unable to tear herself away from the window, and she felt it to be equally out of her power to summon up the courage to enter.

Yet she strove very hard to do so.

She reasoned with herself upon the subject, but without being able to do as she desired.

The dread of the reception she might receive was too vividly before her.

At length, a sharp pang of hunger accomplished what she had been in vain trying to bring herself to do.

She entered.

It was a desperate chance.

She might obtain work, and she might not.

She tried hard, however, to console herself with the reflection that, if she failed, she could not meet with worse treatment than she had received at the place where she first made application.

CHAPTER CCCXXV.

EDGORTH BESS AT LENGTH SUCCEEDS IN OBTAINING THE EMPLOYMENT SHE SO WISHED FOR.

EDGORTH BESS entered the shroud-maker's shop.

The first thing she noticed was that a number of men were at work in it.

Shrinking and terrified, she crept towards the counter. She hardly dared to raise her eyes.

She was startled by a sharp voice asking what she wanted.

Looking up as these words fell upon her ears, she saw that they were uttered by a thin, waspish-looking woman, who was standing behind a counter, busily engaged in folding up some articles.

For the life of her, Edgorth Bess could not reply to the query so roughly and sharply put.

She drew in her breath, and opened her lips, but she was unable to articulate a sound.

The question was repeated, and this time in tones of even greater asperity than before.

The poor girl's confusion increased.

"What do you want?" asked the woman; and then, jumping to a conclusion caused by the appearance which our heroine presented, she added, with very particular emphasis:

"We never give nobody nothink!"

"I do not want you to give me anything," faltered Edgorth Bess.

"Oh! Well, p'raps you'll tell me your business!"

"I saw a card——"

"Oh, you have come after work, have you?"

Edgorth Bess inclined her head.

"Then, why did you not say so at once? I have got no time to waste upon you. But then, it's just like you poor people. You are every one of you bone idle!"

"I am willing to work," said Edgorth Bess, who was spurred on by the increasing pangs of hunger to make a desperate effort. "Give me work to do, and I will do it! I am starving."

"Well, what if you are?" was the unfeeling rejoinder, "do you think I have got time to listen to all my work-people's troubles?"

"I do not want you to listen to mine," said Edgorth Bess, meekly. "All I desire is employment."

"Are you used to the shroud-making work?"

"Yes, I have worked at it for years."

"And is that your manners?"

Edgorth Bess looked at the speaker in surprise.

She could not at first see the connection between this question and what she had last said.

"It's just like you workpeople, however," continued the shopkeeper; "you none of you never has no more manners nor a pig."

The reader will perceive that this woman was very prodigal of her negatives.

She might, perhaps, have fallen into the mistake of supposing that they gave additional force to what she said.

"I am at a loss to think of what breach of good manners I have been guilty."

The woman held up her hands in amazement.

"Oh, save and deliver me!" she exclaimed. "Well, if ever I heard anything to come up to that!"

Then, slightly changing the tone of her voice, she added:

"Well, since you are so ignorant of what good manners is, I would just tell you that when workpeople say anything to me, they always, in a manner of speaking, say 'Mem!'"

"I understand you," said Edgorth Bess, "and will not offend again. I tell you once more, I am starving. I am quick at the trade, as you will soon find if you will give me employment."

"Well, perhaps you may be; but you must know that shrouds is cheaper now than ever they was, and we have been obliged to reduce the wages according."

"I am willing to work for a small sum. I am, indeed, ready to do anything to save me from starvation."

"Well, that's your business, and not mine."

"I am aware of that, ma'am."

"Oh, you can speak as you ought to when you like, I hear!"

"I shall try to give you satisfaction in every way possible," replied Edgorth Bess.

"Well, that's all right."

"Shall you be able to give me anything to do, ma'am?"

"I don't know."

Edgorth Bess gave a sigh of disappointment.

"You don't look strong enough for our work—you are sadly too delicate."

"I am used to the work," said Edgorth Bess, imploringly.

"Very likely, young woman—very likely; but, you see, what with the competition we have to fight against, and what with the awful price of material, we are not only obliged to reduce the wages, as I told you before, but have everybody at work longish hours. I work longish hours myself."

"I am willing, ma'am," replied the poor girl, "to submit to the rules of your establishment, whatever they may be."

"Oh, very good! Now, that's about the most sensible thing I have heard a workwoman say for a long time. They are always talking some nonsense or other about being hungry, or having to work too many hours, or not feeling well, or some ridiculous thing or other. Why, nothing of that sort never ails me."

"Can you employ me, then?"

"I will take you on trial, and see what you can do."

"Thank you, ma'am—thank you! I don't know what to say—you have snatched me from death—death!"

And the unfortunate heiress burst into tears.

"Now, no snivelling!" cried the shopkeeper. "If you want to please me, you'll stop that sort of thing. I can't abide snivelling."

Edgworth Bess dried her tears and stifled her sobs as well as she was able.

"As I said before, I don't mind taking you on trial for a few days. The wages is—"

The woman hesitated.

Edgworth Bess watched her eagerly, anxious to know the price of her toilsome labour.

"The wages is," continued the shopkeeper, "three shillings a week, and you will have to find your own needles and thread."

The poor girl looked at this vampire despairingly.

Small as had been the sum she earned with unintermitting toil while working for Mrs. Roblet, it amounted to nearly double the sum just mentioned.

But she was starving, and she felt that she did not dare refuse to accede to the infamous terms proposed.

In a faint, desponding voice, she answered:

"Very well, ma'am."

The shopkeeper screwed up her lips.

She had scarcely expected Edgworth Bess would consent, but finding she did so, with the rapaciousness which formed part of her disposition, regretted that she had not named a smaller amount.

She was discontented with herself, though of all the poor creatures she had got at work for her, there was not one receiving so small a stipend as three shillings a week.

She consoled herself with the thought that she should be able to make a reduction.

"Them's the wages," she continued; "not much, perhaps you will say; but still, it's as much as I can afford in the present state of the trade. Then there's one more thing we have got to settle, and that's the hours."

"Yes, the hours," replied Edgworth Bess; "what are they?"

"Well, in a manner of speaking, they are rather long; though, to be sure, not so long as they might be."

"Indeed!" said Edgworth Bess, reviving a little at this intelligence. "What time should I have to be in the workroom every morning?"

"Why, now, you see, just at this time of year, when it's so dark, you workpeople have got the advantage. You do not come so many hours as in the summer, when there is more light to work by, you know."

"Yes, ma'am," assented the poor girl, who knew not what else to say, but who thought, as the woman paused, that she ought to say something.

"Being winter now, in course the hours is shorter—you would not be wanted to come earlier than half-past four."

"Half-past four?" Edgworth Bess involuntarily repeated.

"Yes; what have you to say against that?" asked the woman, tartly.

"Nothing—nothing; and when should I be done at night?"

"Twelve."

"Twelve o'clock at night?"

"Yes."

"Good heavens!" she exclaimed, and clasped her hands over her brows.

"Them's the hours, young woman. You can have a job, if you think the place will suit you."

Edgworth Bess struggled a moment, and then she said:

"I accept it."

"And very wise of you, too, I should say. On, I forgot to tell you! There's something more, and we may as well have all things settled right off at once as not."

Edgworth Bess looked up, wondering what was coming next.

"You know, I don't allow my workpeople to go running out for their meals. It disturbs them at their work, and makes them lose too much time. I shall want you to bring all your meals with you when you come in the morning, and then, you know, you will have no occasion to disturb yourself by getting up and down from your work."

At the utterance of this last piece of monstrous iniquity Edgworth Bess groaned.

What a prospect had she before her!

She was not, however, allowed any time for reflection.

"Now, young woman," said the shopkeeper, "I have no more time to waste with you. Them's the terms. If you likes to agree to them, why, I sets you on at once."

"Oh, ma'am!" exclaimed Edgworth Bess, in tones so pathetic that they would have made an impression upon anyone, save the obdurate being to whom they were addressed. "I am starving—absolutely starving! You will, therefore, comprehend that it is not in my power to refuse your terms, however hard they may be. I accept the place; but, before I begin to work, I must have something to eat."

"Oh, I have no objection to that! You can go down in the kitchen, and have something to eat, and welcome; but you must understand that what you have will be stopped out of your first week's wages; and not only that—I can't allow you to leave the premises until you have done sufficient work to make up the sum."

To these exactions poor Edgworth Bess was compelled to succumb.

She was wholly in the power of this monster in female form.

She had clutched her, and she could not escape.

After having delivered herself in the manner we have recorded, she took our heroine down into the kitchen, and placed before her a small quantity of the coarsest food.

Hunger, however, has a sharp tooth, and Edgworth Bess commenced eating ravenously.

Poor girl, her trials and sufferings, so far from being over, were only just beginning.

Having placed the food before her, the shopkeeper retired, leaving her to eat it in solitude and silence.

Many and bitter were the tears with which the unfortunate heiress washed down this sorry meal.

When she thought of the terrible price she would have to pay for what she had eaten, she shuddered, and the blood ran cold in her veins.

Three shillings a week!

That was the amount of the wages she was to receive, and out of that miserable pittance the stipulation was that she should find her own needles and thread.

This may seem a trifling matter, but it ceases to be so when it is considered in connection with three shillings a week.

These cheap and simple articles would in that time make a great hole in such a sum; and so poor Edgworth Bess was well aware, from previous sad experience.

And then, the hours!

It was winter, when it was cold and dark, and the were from half-past four until midnight.

That left four hours and a half to seek her lodgings, to sleep, and to return to the workroom.

Then there was to be no respite to this dreary time.

She was to take her seat at the hour first mentioned, and not quit it until the church clocks in the metropolis had chimed out the hour of midnight.

Her fingers would only stay their toil for a few moments while she hastily devoured the meals which she had been bidden to bring with her.

Such were the sad thoughts that occupied the mind of our heroine.

But she was not for long permitted to indulge in them.

The shrill voice of the shopwoman struck upon her ears.

"Now, young woman," she said, "if you've finished your vittles, come up here, and I'll show you the way to the workroom, and set you some to do!"

With a heavy heart, Edgworth Bess rose from the chair upon which she had been sitting, and crossing the dark kitchen, groped her way up the still darker staircase that conducted to the ground floor.

Here she found the shopwoman waiting for her.

"Have you finished your vittles?"

"Yes, ma'am," was the reply.

"I thought you had—you have had time enough, goodness knows! Come on after me, and you shall soon have something better to do than to sit down in idleness."

To these harsh and unfeeling words Edgworth Bess did not, and could not, make any reply.

She felt her heart swell, and so painful did it become, that she feared it would burst.

Silently, then, she followed the shopkeeper up so many flights of stairs, that when she reached the top she was ready to sink with exhaustion.

By clutching tightly at the balustrade, however, she sustained herself.

Pushing open a small door, the shopwoman strode into a room.

The poor heiress followed her.

She was greeted with a gush of foul and heated air, which had been generated in that small room by so many breaths.

A rustling sound, as the weary workers turned over their work, as occasion required, was the only sound that broke the otherwise intense silence.

Not a word was spoken—scarcely a look exchanged.

The poor girls were packed as closely together as they could be packed, and where Edgworth Bess was to find a seat was a mystery.

The shopkeeper, however, by compelling the crowded workers to sit closer together, contrived to make room for the new comer, who was greeted by her fellow-workers with a different expression, according to the nature of their disposition.

Some pitied her, others hated her; not one, however, welcomed her, or seemed glad to see her.

The majority felt sorry that another being had been inducted into their own miserable existence.

At the command of the shopkeeper, Edgworth Bess seated herself, and was then supplied with so large a quantity of work, that it positively looked disheartening.

Edgworth Bess knew that it was the hard labour of very many hours.

"There," said the shopkeeper, "I can't let you move until you have done all these, and then you will have earned what you have just eaten!"

CHAPTER CCCXXXVI.

EDGORTH BESS, MADDENED WITH SHAME AND GRIEF, TAKES A LEAP FOR DEATH INTO THE THAMES.

WITH a heart brimming over with despair and grief, Edgworth Bess took up one of the shrouds.

Needles and thread were placed before her, but she was carefully told that the amount they represented would be deducted from her wages at the end of the week.

Having seen her commence her work, the shopwoman retired.

When the door had closed behind her, our heroine ventured to look more closely at those who surrounded her than she had done hitherto.

Very little curiosity respecting herself was, however, manifested by any of them.

One glance at her fragile and attenuated frame seemed to suffice for them.

Not one spoke.

Edgworth Bess was surprised.

She had thought Mrs. Roblet's a most wretched place; but now her thoughts reverted to the time when she was there, and a feeling of absolute pleasure came over her at the recollection, so great was, comparatively speaking, the difference.

At Mrs. Roblet's, the girls, though compelled to work very hard, and a great many hours, were tolerably cheerful and happy, and they cheated time of much of its dullness by chatting to each other.

Now, all was silent as a nunnery.

Edgworth Bess could not work for her tears.

In vain she strove to force them back—they would throng into her eyes, and prevent her from seeing properly what she was about.

What chance would she have of finding Jack Sheppard now, and what chance would he have of finding her?

It would be quite impossible for her to seek for him, since it was clear that she would not be allowed sufficient time to take that rest which her body required.

Then, the idea that Jack would attempt to look for her there, seemed quite out of the question.

There was not, then, one cheering point to which she could direct her thoughts.

The blackness of despair alone presented itself before her.

She made but very little progress with her work.

All her companions noticed it, because their attention was much fixed upon her.

But they said nothing.

At length, one who sat next her whispered in her ear:

"You had better make more haste with your work, or you will catch it."

To this she made no reply, but asked how it was no one spoke.

"That is against the rules," answered this girl. "If any of us were caught talking by Mrs. Flume, we should all be fined."

"Who is Mrs. Flume?"

"The forewoman."

"The one that came in with me?"

"No!" was the reply, given in some surprise. "That is Mrs. Pike."

"Who is Mrs. Pike?"

"The woman who belongs to the house."

"Where is Mrs. Flume?"

"I don't know; she went out a little while ago, and has not returned. I dare not stop talking to you any longer. I am neglecting my work, and very likely Mrs. Flume is outside the door, listening. She often is; and then she bursts in all of a sudden, and, if she can't find out who has been talking, she threatens to fine all round alike, and so she is always sure to find out the right party. Hush!"

The speaker was suddenly silent.

Edgworth Bess was about to inquire the reason, when the door was opened, and a woman walked in, who, from her very manner, and the effect she produced upon the workwomen, she was sure was the very Mrs. Flume of whom they had just been speaking.

"I heard some one talking," said the new comer. "Who was it?"

All was as still as the grave.

"Who was it?" cried Mrs. Flume again, adopting a defiant attitude.

Another pause.

"If you don't speak, I'll fine you all round."

This seemed such an unjust proceeding, that Edgworth Bess was no longer able to continue silent.

"I spoke," she said.

The other girls stared at her aghast.

Not one of them had ever owned that they had been talking, as she had.

The plan was adopted of accusing one of their number, and the accused party was then fined.

It had never entered the minds of one of them to boldly avow that they had been talking.

Mrs. Flume appeared to be no less surprised.

She stared at Edgworth Bess, as though she had seen some remarkable creature.

"You spoke, did you?" she said, mocking our heroine's voice.

"I did."

"I s'pose you're the new hand Mrs. Pike spoke to me about?"

"Yes."

"Confound you, where's your manners?"

This time Edgworth Bess understood what was meant. She corrected herself.

"Yes, ma'am," she said.

"Oh, indeed! Then step this way, and let me have a look at you. I always like to perogee the faces of the new hands."

Edgworth Bess stepped forward, as she was bidden.

Mrs. Flume took hold of her by the arm, rather rudely, and turned her round to the light.

As soon as the forewoman looked in her face, however, she started back, uttering a loud scream.

This was an occurrence which called forth our heroine's utmost astonishment, as well as roused all the other workwomen from their usual state of torpidity.

What could this mean?

Mrs. Flume seemed in danger of fainting.

"Oh, horror!" she exclaimed. "Oh, horror upon horror! The viper! Oh, dear me! What shall I do? I shall faint! No, I sha'n't! I'll call Mrs. Pike. Oh, the venomous viper!"

These ejaculations were no less extraordinary than the scream which she had at first given utterance to.

As for Edgworth Bess, she came at once to the conclusion that she was mad.

Nevertheless, in spite of this conviction, she observed all her actions with the greatest curiosity and interest.

Mrs. Flume dashed open the door of the workroom, and ran to the head of the stairs.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD ENTER THE HOUSE IN SPRING GARDENS.

Then, in a voice of extreme shrillness, she shouted :
 "Mrs. Pike! Mrs. Pike! Oh, Mrs. Pike! My dear, kind mistress, do come up here! Oh, Mrs. Pike!"

"What's the matter, Flume?" asked a voice from below. Instead of replying in a rational manner to this very rational question, Mrs. Flume continued her extraordinary ejaculations.

"Make haste, Mrs. Pike! Oh, do, for goodness sake, make haste! You little think what you've got in your house at last!"

Mrs. Pike was alarmed at these ambiguous outcries, and hastened up the stairs as fast as her legs would carry her.

No sooner did she reach the top of the attic stairs, than Mrs. Flume made a rush at her, and dragged her into the workroom.

During the time this was taking place, Edgworth Bess remained standing in the same position, unable to move or do anything besides observe what was going forward.

"Oh, Mrs. Pike!" said Mrs. Flume, "you little think what you have done! To think I should have been here the best part of my life, and then such a thing to occur! Oh, it makes my very hair stand on end, that it do! Oh, Mrs. Pike, what should you do without your faithful Flume?"
 No. 68.

"What's the matter?" asked Mrs. Pike, nervously, who, from her forewoman's manner, every moment expected the disclosure of some terrible catastrophe. "Do tell me what's the matter!"

"Oh, Mrs. Pike, I don't know how to tell you—indeed I don't! And then, to think—Oh, dear!—oh, dear! It's dreadful! It gets dreadfuller and dreadfuller the more you think about it!"

"What—what, Flume? Tell me what, or you will drive me mad!"

"Me drive you mad, mem? Oh, dear, no! Not by no means; but you will go mad when I tell you!"

"What—what? Speak at once! Let me know the worst! Nothing can be more terrible than this mysterious suspense!"

"I'll tell you, Mrs. Pike. You know, whenever we has any new hands, I always perogees their faces, to see whether I know them, and so as to be able to recognise them again."

"Well—well, Flume, what of that?"

"Everything! You engaged a new hand while I was out. Of course, when I comes in, according to my duty, I begins to perogee her face. The moment I clapped my two blessed eyes upon it—oh, dear!—oh, dear!"

"What, Flume?"

"Oh, the viper! Oh, the scorpion! That ever such a baggage should come into a respectable workroom like this here! Oh, lauks! Well, after that, you might, in a manner of speaking, expect anything!"

"But you have not told me, Flume! Do you know the new hand?"

"Do I know her? Oh, mem!"

Mrs. Flume groaned, and turned up her eyes until only the whites were visible.

"You do know her?"

"Oh, yes, mem! I know her, and I know all her history! Oh, she's the most awfullest character as ever was known to be! She is called Edgworth Bess! That's her grand name, mem! Oh dear, yes; she used to work for Mrs. Roblet, in Lincoln's Inn Fields! But she left there, and she took up with a young rascal, named Jack Sheppard. He was a runaway apprentice, and then he turned highwayman, and housebreaker, and murderer! He murdered his old master, as you know very well, mem, because you must recollect all about it; and he was to be hung, but he broke out of prison; and this new hand of yours, mem, has tramped it all over the country with him; and I dare say she has come here on purpose to find out everything for him to be able to break in, and murder us all! Oh, mem! I shall faint—I know I shall!"

And Mrs. Flume, exhausted by her emotion, sank down upon a chair, in a collapsed condition.

Edgworth Bess was quite overcome by this disclosure; but she remained standing just where she was, for she had no power to stir.

Mrs. Pike was overcome, too.

A very particular, pious, upright woman was Mrs. Pike, and the thought of having such a desperate character in her house was awful in the extreme.

"Murder!" she gasped, at length. "We shall all be murdered in cold blood! Call the watch! Call the officers! Oh, what shall I do? I am a lost woman!"

Mrs. Flume began to utter her outcries again.

Edgworth Bess summoned up what courage she possessed.

Dreading capture at the hands of the myrmidons of the law, she made up her mind to make one desperate effort to escape.

With one rush she passed Mrs. Pike.

Mrs. Flume saw her movement, and tried to intercept her.

It was in vain.

The suddenness with which the poor girl darted forward overturned her, chair and all.

Still, Mrs. Flume continued her hold on the poor girl's apparel.

Fortunately for our heroine, this was old and rotten, and came away in the forewoman's grasp.

With the breathless speed of a hunted hare, Edgworth Bess rushed down the rickety staircase—how, she hardly knew.

At length the bottom was reached.

Flinging open the door, she dashed into the shop, and from thence into the street.

A wild cry came from the rear, but heeding it not, she flew onward.

Maddened by all that she had that day undergone, she tore along with all the fury of a maniac.

People made way for her, and allowed her to pass by.

It was evening, and the streets of the metropolis were involved in gloom.

Needless and unconscious of this, the young girl continued her frantic career.

The demon of madness had taken possession of her, and she knew not what she was about.

All her ideas were in inextricable confusion.

Her brain spun round and round.

Much had she suffered and put up with patiently, but this last scene of all was beyond endurance.

The cold and wintry wind swept past her; but she knew it not.

The snow came down in large fleecy masses, and covered the ground thickly, but of this she was unconscious also.

At length she was obliged to stay her progress.

She could go no further.

This roused her somewhat, and she looked round.

She was standing on the banks of the Thames, some distance above Westminster Bridge.

The lamps upon this structure were dimly visible through the falling snow, and so, too, were their reflections on the murky water.

Edgworth Bess clasped her hands over her forehead.

The plashing of the water suggested a new thought, and a most horrible one.

It was, that she would take one leap into that dark and turbid stream, and by that act put an end to the life which had been nothing but misery to her.

That she was mad when this idea took possession of her heated brain, there can be no doubt.

In her rational moments she would have shuddered and shrunk back from the bare contemplation of such a deed.

Now she experienced no such feeling.

It seemed to her as though, by one plunge into the water, she should obtain rest and peace—those two blessings which seemed to be denied her.

When this thought once crossed her morbid and excited imagination, it was followed up by a thousand thoughts, all urging her to do the deed.

The dark waters, as they surged up on the muddy shore, seemed to say to her, "Here is rest!"

She listened, and repeated these words over and over again.

Then she laughed a shrill, unmeaning laugh, which echoed far over the surface of the water.

Before her was a barge.

To get on to it would be easy—to spring off the other end of it into the water was more easy still.

In a moment her mind was made up.

With superhuman agility she sprang on to the clumsy vessel.

Someone was aboard.

It was the watchman.

He had been sleeping.

He felt something rush past him.

He looked up.

The dark and shadowy outlines of a female form met his gaze.

In a moment he understood all.

He stretched out his hand, and strove to grasp the flying figure.

But he was too late.

With another of those laughs, which were enough to curdle the blood in the veins of those who heard it, Edgworth Bess, a prey to madness, sprang from the prow of the barge into the Thames.

CHAPTER CCCXXXVII.

BLUESKIN AND JACK SHEPPARD SUCCEEDED IN EFFECTING AN ENTRANCE INTO THE HOUSE IN SPRING GARDENS.

WE left Blueskin and Jack Sheppard at the door of the mysterious house in Spring Gardens, along with the driver of the hackney-coach whom they had been fortunate enough to encounter.

The information which he had given them was correct in every particular, but it was given them too late.

Edgworth Bess had been in that house, but she had gone; for it was on the evening following the one upon which the interview between the young nobleman and Edgworth Bess had taken place that our friends stood before the door.

The result of that interview is known.

Through the assistance of the young nobleman, the persecuted heiress had left that infamous den, by needlessly adventuring into which her only protectors and friends were about to incur such deadly peril.

But Jack, and Blueskin, and the hackney-coachman had no idea of what had taken place on the preceding night, nor was there any means by which they could obtain such knowledge.

While they were standing needlessly here, Edgworth Bess was flying through the streets, with the fire of madness lighted up in her brain.

She was close to them, being merely divided by the River Thames.

Under the impression, however, that she was still in that handsome and imposing-looking house, they gazed eagerly at the polished door, and with straining eyes made out the number to be 57.

So far, then, the coachman's information was borne out by proofs.

"You see, gemmen," he said, "that I was quite right in what I told you."

"Yes, yes!" said Jack, hurriedly; "and nothing now remains but to decide upon the means by which the house shall be entered."

"Well, I leave that all to you; only, let me recommend you not on no account to use violence; because, if you do, you will be sure to be defeated. Everything must be done on the sly if you are to succeed."

"We will bear what you say in mind."

"Do so, gemmen. In the meantime, I'll look after my nags, and keep a sharp eye on this here blessed front door. When I see you with the gal, I will roll up in no time."

With this understanding, the driver returned to his coach, while Blueskin and Jack Sheppard conferred together as to the means they should adopt to enter the house.

"There's no mode so easy as the roof," said Jack, "and, so far as my experience goes, I should say that was the best manner."

"It is in most cases," said Blueskin. "The difficulty is in getting on to the roof."

"Ah, there it is!"

"Look up at this house, Jack, and see what a height it is. No doubt there is a trap-door on the roof, through which we could get easily enough; but the difficulty is to reach it."

"What means, then, do you propose, if you do not intend to try the roof?"

"We must reconnoitre first, before we decide upon anything. There is no knowing what we may discover. Besides, we ought to obtain all the information we can with respect to our situation, in case an emergency should occur."

"Right, my friend!" said Jack. "I must get you to think for me to-night, for my mind is not so clear as it generally is."

"I can tell that. You are excited by the importance of what we are about to do."

"How could I be otherwise?"

"It is nothing but natural. But come—if we stand talking here we shall be sure to excite suspicion, and our time is too precious to be lost."

As he spoke, Blueskin turned away from where he had been standing, and crept towards the next house to No. 57, which he examined attentively.

He was closely followed in all his movements by Jack Sheppard.

No. 56—for that was the number of the house before which they paused—was externally the same as No. 57.

Perceiving this, our friends next proceeded to look at No. 58.

They were not aware that Mother Robotham occupied two houses, instead of one.

Not only was No. 56 externally the same as No. 57, but internally also.

Upon reaching No. 58, the first thing that struck our friends when they glanced upon it was, that no light came from any of the windows.

Even the lamp outside the door was unlighted.

Blueskin closely examined the whole of the structure, and then, in a whisper, he said to his companion:

"I wonder whether this house is empty."

"It has the appearance of being to let. I was thinking so myself at the moment you spoke."

"If such should luckily prove to be the case," said Blueskin, "all will be easy. The question is, how are we to ascertain?"

"The coachman!"

"Thanks for that idea! Doubtless the coachman will be able to tell us. We will cross over to him."

As he spoke, Blueskin and Jack crossed over to the opposite side of the street, where the hackney-coachman was waiting.

Observing their approach, he immediately came towards them.

"What now, gemmen?" he asked.

"We have been looking at the houses on each side of No. 57," replied Blueskin. "Do you happen to know whether that one is empty?"

He pointed at No. 58 as he spoke.

"You will perceive," added Jack, "that there is no light visible at any of the windows, and even the hall-lamp is not burning."

"It's to let," replied the coachman; "but whether it's empty is more than I can tell you."

"What do you mean?"

"Why, I know it's to let, because I saw the card in the window myself the last time I was here by daylight. But don't you know that very often people are put to stay in these great houses until they are taken?"

"To be sure—to be sure! You think, then, that most likely there is someone in that house to let who has been placed there in charge of it?"

"Just so."

"Have you any particular grounds for thinking so?"

"No; nothing more than that I know such is usually the case."

"Thanks! That will do. Be careful to keep watch."

"All right, gemmen! You can depend upon me."

Once more Blueskin and Jack Sheppard made their way towards No. 58.

"Do you intend to risk entering it, Joe?" asked Jack Sheppard.

"I think so."

"By what means?"

"The front door."

"Why?"

"Because, if, as I suspect, the house is empty, the people who left it would fasten all the rest of the house as securely as possible, and merely lock the front door after them when they went away."

"I did not think of that."

"If this is the case, we sha'n't have much trouble. You have a picklock, have you not?"

"Yes; here it is."

"That will do, then. If, after we have shot back the lock, the front door gives way to our touch, we may safely assume that there is no one in it; because, if there was, they would take care to fasten it in some other way as well."

"Certainly—certainly! Come—I am all impatience to make the trial."

"Be careful. In an expedition like this you cannot make use of too much caution."

"I am aware of it."

"If can once get inside No. 58, we shall be able to make our way on to the roof of No. 57 without difficulty; for, if you look up, you will perceive the houses are just the same."

"They are."

The two friends had now reached the doorway of No. 58.

Jack held the little crooked piece of steel called a picklock in his hand, and he eagerly thrust it into the key-hole.

The lock was a large one, and this made Jack's task all the easier; for in those days the notion that the strength of a lock was in proportion to its size had not exploded.

Jack Sheppard only had to rattle the picklock a few times, and then he succeeded in taking a firm hold of the wards.

A dexterous twist of the wrist was all that was now required, and the next moment the bolt of the lock shot back with an alarming snap.

Blueskin pushed the door, impatient to a degree to know whether it would yield.

It gave way before the pressure he applied to it.

With a feeling of delight which we leave our readers to imagine, he pushed it open further still, until both were able to glide into the passage.

The next thing was to close the door, and then to remain perfectly still and listen.

The closing door raised a thousand echoes in the dreary building, but the reverberations gradually died away.

The interior of the hall was very dark, and our two friends found themselves unable to see anything.

Total darkness did not, however, prevail, and of this they soon became conscious.

Through the fanlight that was over the door there came a faint, misty kind of twilight; and, as they stood listening, they gradually became able to see about them.

In front was a broad staircase.

This, however, they did not yet venture to ascend, until assured that they had not disturbed anyone by their surreptitious entrance.

The continued silence at length inspired them with confidence.

Convinced that if anyone had been in the house their entrance must have been heard, they reasonably enough came to the conclusion that they were the sole inmates of it, and in this opinion they were strengthened by having found the door merely locked, and not bolted.

It was some strange kind of instinct, however, that made them creep across the hall on tiptoe.

Then the stairs were reached.

When once they had taken hold of the massive balustrades, it was easy enough to ascend, although they had to feel their way.

A light would have been very serviceable to them, and they had the means of procuring one, but judged it would be dangerous, lest their presence in the empty house should become known.

This was what they had most of all to dread, so they submitted to the alternative of receiving a few bruises.

At length, without the occurrence of any particular incident, the top of the stairs was reached.

They now stood on the landing from which the doors of the attics opened.

Here, then, was where our friends expected to find a trap-door which would enable them to gain the roof.

To discover this, a light was, however, necessary.

At all risks they would have to show a light, if for a moment only, for otherwise the position of the trap-door could not be discovered.

Jack Sheppard had some thieves' matches in his pocket, and one of these he ignited.

A tiny flame came from the small piece of wood, and endured for a few seconds only; still, as Jack held it in the air, it enabled them to find that of which they were in search.

They saw the outlines of the trap-door, but it was in the ceiling, high above their heads, and to reach it seemed almost an impossibility.

Upon this they conferred for a few moments, and then agreed to ignite another match, and take one more glance around them, in the hope of being able to find something that would assist them to reach the trap-door.

Jack accordingly lighted the second match.

It was now that they noticed something which had before escaped their observation.

Near them was a large cupboard, or wardrobe, such as are frequently to be found in this position.

This at once suggested to Blueskin a means of reaching the ceiling.

He saw the key was sticking in the lock, so he opened one of the folding-doors, with which the cupboard was fitted, without difficulty.

Some bare shelves were then exposed to view.

More than that he saw not, for at this moment the match went out.

Still it had served the purpose admirably.

By the aid of the shelves, Blueskin succeeded in reaching the top of the wardrobe; and, when in this position, it was perfectly easy for him to push the trap-door open.

This done, he placed one foot on the edge of the open door, and grasping the edges of the trap-door with his hands, easily drew himself up.

He was now standing between the ceiling and the tiles.

Here he remained, and lent Jack all the assistance in his power to reach him.

Jack Sheppard was lithe and agile, and he performed this feat with even greater ease than his companion had done.

The only thing that now had to be done was to withdraw the two bolts by which the outer trap-door was secured, and push it open.

To do this took them a few moments only.

The bolts appeared to be literally rusted into their sockets, and they had some trouble in withdrawing them, but at length they succeeded.

The outer side of the trap-door was covered with sheet-lead, which made it a great weight, and very difficult to move.

Slowly, however, they raised it, and pushed it from its position until they had left a space sufficiently large for them to creep through.

More than this they did not require, so without attempting to move it any further they got on to the roof.

The tiles were very steep, and they had to exercise great caution in making their way over them, as a single false step would have precipitated them to the ground beneath.

Clinging with their hands to the slight projections caused by the tiles lapping over each other, they slowly crept along.

The distance was very short to the trap-door in the roof of No. 57, but our friends were a long time reaching it.

Their progress was slow in the extreme, but at last, to their infinite satisfaction, they arrived at the wished-for spot.

A serious difficulty now presented itself.

The trap-door through which they had just passed was bolted on the inside.

From this, would it not be reasonable to infer that the other was fastened in a similar manner?

If this was the case, how were they to raise the trap-door from the outside?

Its weight alone, and their awkward, insecure position, would make this feat one of great danger to attempt; but should it be fastened, what then?

Our friends, however, did not suffer themselves to dwell long upon this subject.

Taking hold of two corners of the trap-door, they endeavoured to raise it.

They scarcely hoped to succeed when they made the attempt.

Their surprise and pleasure may, therefore, be imagined when they found they could lift it with comparative ease.

This was indeed unexpected good fortune.

It seems strange, however, that this trap-door should have been thus left unsecured.

But we must remind the reader that No. 57 was a strange house, in which strange things continually took place.

The fact of the trap-door being unbolted ought to excite but a small amount of surprise.

There was a motive for it, and with this motive we shall probably in a short time become acquainted.

CHAPTER CCCXXXVIII.

JACK SHEPPARD AND BLUESKIN WITNESS SOME EXTRAORDINARY SCENES IN THE MYSTERIOUS HOUSE IN SPRING GARDENS.

DISPOSED as they at first were to discredit such good fortune, Blueskin and Jack Sheppard quickly found that the trap-door really was not secured in any way.

All they had to do was to remove it sufficiently from the space it covered to enable them to slip through.

Had their positions upon the slanting tiles been less awkward than it was, this would have been an easy matter.

As it was, it became difficult in the extreme.

The trap-door, owing to the sheet-lead with which it was covered, was very heavy, and they found it almost an impossibility to raise it.

They ran a fearful risk at every fresh attempt they made, but undauntedly they again and again applied themselves to their task, stimulated by the hope of rescuing Edgeworth Bess from great peril and danger.

Slowly, then, the heavy door was shifted from its position, but they ceased their efforts as soon as ever they were able to slip through.

Jack was the first to descend.

Cautiously squeezing himself between the frame and the door, he presently stood upon the inner trap-door.

He moved aside to permit his companion to follow him, and in another moment the two comrades were side by side.

What they had now to do was to remove the inner trap-door, but in doing this there was some danger of discovery; for, situated as they were, they could not tell who was beneath.

Their first proceeding was to kneel down and listen.

No sound, however, reached their ears.

Encouraged by the silence, they now ventured to remove the inner trap-door, which consisted merely of a square piece of wood.

This, however, they slipped aside gradually, and as soon as they were able to see down, they stopped.

The first glance reassured them.

No one was in sight.

Noiselessly and speedily the inner trap-door was raised and placed on one side.

The landing below was now fully revealed.

There was a faint, soft light diffused over it, which came from a lamp at the turn of the staircase.

A gush of warm, perfumed air came into their faces, at once conveying the idea of luxury and voluptuousness.

The balustrades of the staircase were handsome, and the landing was covered with a carpet of exquisite pattern and texture, corresponding with that upon the stairs.

Jack was amazed, for he had never seen anything of this description before.

He was aroused by Blueskin, who warned him that he had no time to gaze about him.

Thus reminded, he once listened, and then, finding the silence unbroken, lowered himself through the trap-door.

He clung to the frame with his hands, and when the full extent of his arms was reached, his feet were but a short distance from the floor.

That he should be able to alight upon the carpet beneath without making much noise he felt confident, and therefore he released his hold without hesitation.

He took care to drop upon his toes, and by this means the violence of the concussion was reduced as much as possible.

His first act, however, was to spring to the stair-head and listen.

No indications of an alarm having been given reached his ears, and he made a sign with his hand to Blueskin to follow his example and descend.

Our old friend obeyed instantly, though of necessity he made more noise in alighting than his lighter and more agile companion.

Scarcely, however, had his feet touched the ground, than a scream arose of so awful a character as seemed to freeze the very blood in their veins, and deprive them of all power of motion.

Their first impulse was to clasp their hands over their ears, and shut out the terrible cry.

The scream came again, and their second impulse was to rush downstairs.

Fortunately, Blueskin restrained himself, and was in time to clutch Jack by the collar, and hold him back.

"Caution!" he said, in a hoarse, guttural whisper. "Are you mad?"

Jack struggled for an instant to release himself, and then became still as he grew conscious of the sense of Blueskin's injunction.

"Be cautious, Jack! Do not let anything cause you to forget the danger which must result from a discovery. You must not be surprised at anything that takes place here."

"But those screams!" said Sheppard, in the same energetic yet whispering tone. "They were terrible! They ring in my ears now!"

"Be careful, I say again, and then doubtless we shall discover all!"

Jack became silent, but nodded his head acquiescingly to his comrade's remarks.

Like spectres they stole down the stairs.

The sound must have come from below, because they were in the highest part of the house.

But it was this alone which afforded them a guide.

Had it not been for this accidental circumstance, they would have been at a loss to say whether the screams came from above or below, or from all sides at once.

After the two shrieks all was still.

There was no bustle or alarm as though anyone had been aroused by them.

The house still maintained its oppressive, silent character.

Impatient in the extreme, however, to learn the exact signification of those frightful shrieks—which they could not help thinking were, in some way or other, connected with Edgworth Bess—Blueskin and Jack descended to the next landing.

This was by far more spacious than the one above it, and indications of the greatest luxury were everywhere apparent.

From it numerous doors opened.

A low, meaning sound now became audible.

It was continuous, and our friends listened intently in order to determine the precise direction from which it came.

This they found puzzling, and they were in the end compelled to listen at each door.

All were closed.

At length they paused before one from which the sounds appeared to come with increased distinctness.

After listening more attentively, they became convinced that it was from this source they proceeded.

Another fact also obtruded itself upon their notice.

As they leaned slightly against the door to listen, they found it gave way before them.

It was not fastened.

As soon as they made this discovery, they ceased to press against it.

They found the door was now sufficiently ajar to enable them to see into the room.

To their surprise, nothing was visible but darkness.

The door had been pushed close to, but the latch had not caught, and now that it was opened a little way, the moaning sound became more audible, so that, beyond all doubt, they were in the right direction.

Finding all was dark, Blueskin pushed the door a little further open, until, in fact, he could put his head into the room.

The first glance explained everything, and, somewhat to Jack's surprise, his comrade entered, and beckoned to him to follow.

Jack Sheppard obeyed immediately.

He found himself in a dark room.

Blueskin closed the door softly behind him.

Turning round, Jack now perceived that at some distance was another door leading into an inner chamber.

This door was only partially shut, and it could be seen that the apartment with which it communicated was illuminated with tolerable brilliancy.

Blueskin grasped Jack by the hand, and then both stole on tiptoe to the second door.

They reached it without creating a sound, for the floor was covered with a carpet of such thickness that their feet sank into it at every step, and precluded all possibility of sound.

Mingled with the moaning, they could now distinguish someone speaking in a harsh tone of voice, and eagerly they listened to catch the words that were uttered.

They filled them with surprise, and so did the scene which they beheld, for the crevice between the hinges of the door, as it stood partly open, enabled them to command a view of this inner room.

The same luxurious style of furnishing was visible, and the light proceeded from a handsome candelabra, which stood upon a table.

A large and cheerful fire was blazing in the grate, and the whole appointments of the room were superb.

But although their eyes took in all this at one comprehensive glance, yet it did not retain their attention.

They were wholly absorbed by the living creatures they beheld within.

The first person they saw was Mother Robotham.

They had no doubts about the matter, for the description of her personal appearance which they had received from the driver of the hackney-coach was so graphic and complete, that they recognised her in an instant.

Her countenance had now assumed an unusual amount of fiery rubicundity.

It was, too, distorted with the most fiendish wrath that our friends had ever seen depicted in anyone's features.

In one hand she held a long, thick strap, but which, however, despite her fury, she made no attempt to use.

Crouching down in a corner was a young girl.

She it was who was moaning so bitterly, and doubtless it was from her lips that those horrible shrieks had come.

Only one glance was needed to show Blueskin and Jack that this was not Edgeworth Bess, as they had at first feared.

There was no resemblance whatever.

Satisfied upon this head, they began to look about them with greater calmness than they had hitherto been able to command.

Curiosity was now the dominant feeling.

They at once turned their attention to the third person who appeared upon the scene.

This was the one who had spoken with the harsn voice.

He was speaking still.

It was a man—but a man more out of keeping in manner and appearance with the apartment in which he stood could not possibly be found.

He was tall and stout.

His apparel, which was rich and of good material, was soiled and torn.

It was, too, in the utmost disorder, and seemed to indicate that he had either begun to undress himself, or else had dressed himself with great rapidity.

His face was inflamed with wine and passion, and his eyes sparkled with anger.

His hands were clenched tightly, and his whole attitude was menacing to a degree.

"I tell you what it is," were the words which first fell upon the ears of the two unexpected listeners—"I tell you what it is, Mother Robotham, curse me if I put up with this sort of thing any longer! I don't trouble you much, but I'll let you know I am master here. Just you touch my little Milly again, and I'll lay the strap about your own filthy carcass!"

Mother Robotham muttered something, but it was in too low a tone for our friends to catch it.

She glared at the man, but did no more.

Perhaps she knew from experience that she was no match for the burly fellow who stood before her.

If she submitted, however, it was with a very bad grace, and the strap shook in her grasp as though she longed to inflict a blow with it.

"Do you hear what I say, Mother Robotham?" asked the man fiercely. "Do you hear what I say?"

"Yes, I hear you!" was the reply. "But how do you expect me to do any good when you encourage these hussies to set me at defiance? But I'll—"

"No threats, mother—no threats! Raise your hand against Milly if you dare!"

"Do you know what she has done?"

"No, I don't, and curse me if I care!"

"What right had you, then, to burst into the room like you did, and interfere with what you knew nothing about?"

"The best of all rights, mother," was the reply. "I am master here, and you shall know it!"

The old woman muttered something which was inaudible.

Then, in a louder voice, she added:

"It's all very well for you to come interfering, but just through this mixx we have lost the best chance of getting a trifle that ever we had. Old Sam brought in a young chap not long ago. He was an officer on board a ship, and had reached London this very day. His pockets were crammed with money, for he had just come off a long cruise."

"Oh, curse your tales! I don't want to hear them!"

"But you shall hear them! How often is it that we lime a bird so well feathered as this young officer? Why, not once in a twelvemonth! Old Sam picked him up and brought him in. He was quite muzzy when he came, so we should have been able to deal with him easily enough. He was introduced, you know, and picked out Milly here; and when they were together, instead of her plying him with drink, as she ought to have done, she told him to fly—th t his life and money were in danger; and the consequence was, the young sailor jumped through the window and made off!"

Although he had at first said he did not want to listen to her tales, the burly man became visibly interested as she proceeded.

His face glowed with additional anger, but this time it seemed as though the girl whom he had saved from violence was the object of it.

He looked at her crouched-up figure fiercely, and when Mother Robotham had finished speaking, he said, angrily

"Is this the truth?"

"Every word of it!"

"But the young officer did not get off?"

"Yes, he did—clear off; and after she had told him what she had! It's enough to ruin us! And the young fellow's pockets were crammed with gold!"

A terrible oath came from the lips of this man, who now seemed about to change from the young girl's defender to her persecutor.

With a lowering countenance, he strode across the room, and seized her rudely by the arm.

The young girl uttered a cry of pain and fear, for the grip was so tight as to hurt her sadly.

Timidly and terrified, however, she glanced into the burly ruffian's face, and what she saw there made her dread the worst.

"Mercy—mercy!" she cried, imploringly. "Oh, pray have mercy upon me! Spare me—spare me!"

The man looked at her as though he would read her very soul, as he asked:

"Is what Mother Robotham has just said the truth? Tell me at once, or you shall suffer for it!"

The young girl was silent, and trembled like an aspen-leaf.

"Is it the truth?" asked the man, threateningly.

"I—I—warned—the young officer—of—of—his danger!" "Oh, you did, curse you, did you?" said the man, with a horrible imprecation. "I am sorry I interfered!"

CHAPTER CCCXXXIX.

JACK SHEPPARD IS ENTIRELY OVERWHELMED BY THE TERRIBLE THINGS HE HEARS RESPECTING EDGORTH BESS.

THE poor girl uttered a shriek of dismay when the man spoke these words, and in the most imploring and piteous accents, she said:

"Spare me—spare me! Have mercy upon me!"

Mother Robotham came a step nearer.

A strange look was on her face.

It was compounded of rage and triumph.

The young girl retreated as far as she was able, but that was not far.

The man held her too firmly for that.

Mother Robotham crept still nearer.

She wished, by the slowness of her movements, to inflict upon her victim the tortures of suspense.

She raised the strap in the air with sickening deliberation.

Then addressing the man, she said:

"It is not too late for you to repair the mischief you have done. Hold her tight, and we will punish her as she deserves. If she screams much, put your hand over her mouth, and stifle her cries. They might annoy someone, and there's several particular visitors in the house."

"All right, mother!" was the reply, uttered with ferocious willingness. "Lace her well. I'll hold her. She deserves to be hung, drawn, and quartered!"

Mother Robotham was now satisfied, and flourished the strap round her head, preparatory to striking the first blow.

The poor girl uttered a shriek.

It was wrung from her by the thought of what she was about to suffer.

She renewed her entreaties, but they were not heeded.

The man who had interfered to save her from ill-usage, and who seemed to have some power over Mother Robotham herself, was now as desirous that she should be punished as the infamous woman was.

"We'll see whether you are to spoil our trade, and get us into trouble into the bargain! You shall bitterly rue the consequences. You shall be well punished for what you have done, and then perhaps you won't do the same trick again, for fear of receiving the same reward. Take—"

Mother Robotham paused suddenly and abruptly in what she was about to say.

She did not finish her sentence, though the utterance of one more word would have completed it.

Nor did she strike her intended blow, although the strap was actually descending upon her unhappy and helpless victim.

She had great reason for not doing so. To explain this mystery, however, it will be necessary to revert to the proceedings of Jack Sheppard and Blueskin.

It was not long before they fully comprehended all that was taking place before them.

Enough had been said by the different actors in the scene to make all clear to them.

Part they knew—the remainder they could easily surmise.

When they saw the turn affairs were taking, they did not hesitate what to do.

They scarcely thought of the risk they should run, and the obstacles they should place in the way of the achievement of their enterprise.

Still less did they consider the amount of danger they would personally incur.

But both felt that it was quite impossible for them to remain passive spectators of the scene which was about to be enacted.

The idea of a girl being barbarously ill-used was abhorrent to them.

No consideration would have sufficed to hold them back.

To stand by and see a poor girl brutally flogged for saving the life and property of another was what they could not possibly do.

Their presence in the house would infallibly become known.

But for this they cared nothing.

Their feelings were wrought up to the highest pitch.

They resolved, upon the impulse of the moment, to do that of which calm reasoning would approve.

They determined to rush forward, and, by their active interposition, prevent the perpetration of this deed of brutality.

They were inadequately armed for the conflict which they were quite certain would ensue; but, reckless of all this, they resolved to make the attack.

Jack Sheppard, however, had his wits about him, and he employed them to his advantage.

His quickness and fertility of invention were really wonderful, and they were scarcely ever better exhibited than on the present occasion.

They had not been listening at the door long before he discovered that the apartment into which they had thus surreptitiously made their way was fitted up as a bedchamber.

The light which came from the inner room enabled him to see this.

The outlines of the bed were clearly distinguishable.

A fresh thought darted into Jack's mind, and he sprang towards it.

Hastily he seized the two pillows that were upon it.

They were very large feather ones.

With one in each hand, he rushed towards the door.

It gave way before him.

With a swift and well-directed aim, he flung one pillow at the candelabra on the table.

It overturned it with a crash, and the candles were extinguished in a moment.

Almost simultaneously he discharged the second pillow with full force at the head of Mother Robotham.

It was this which had so suddenly checked her in what she was about to say and do.

They followed up the attack closely.

Long ere Mother Robotham and her associate could recover themselves from their astonishment, our two friends were upon them.

Blueskin seized the burly man from behind, and held him in a grasp of iron.

"Let go your hold upon that girl," he cried, "or, as sure as you now breathe, I will blow your brains out!"

The man let go in a moment.

He was almost frightened to death by the suddenness and unexpectedness of the attack.

The idea that was uppermost in his mind was, that the young sea officer who had made his escape had returned with a body of police officers.

The darkness of the place puzzled and confused both him and Mother Robotham, and they were at a loss to think by what means the sudden extinguishment of the candles had been brought about, and more puzzled still to think what could be the meaning of it.

Having thrown the pillows, Jack Sheppard seized hold of Mother Robotham.

She uttered a dismal yell of apprehension.

"Hold your row," cried Jack, "without you want me to stop your breath for you!"

"Murder—murder!"

"Silence, I say, or it will be the worse for you!"

The poor girl, who had been thus unexpectedly saved from such ill-usage, lost her consciousness, and, when the man released his grasp, she fell at full length upon the floor.

Blueskin had but little trouble with the man himself.

He was a thorough coward, and did not offer the least resistance.

Under these circumstances, it was perfectly easy for Blueskin to remove his voluminous neckcloth and tie his arms firmly behind his back with it.

Finding that Mother Robotham paid no attention to his commands, Jack slipped off her apron, and twisting it round until its shape resembled a rope, he placed it over her mouth and tied it firmly at the back of her head.

She was now wholly incapacitated from making a noise.

Indeed, she found it a matter of some difficulty to be able to breathe.

Jack hastened to follow up his advantage, and in a moment or so had Mother Robotham bound hand and foot, and lying on the floor in a perfectly helpless condition.

He then turned towards Blueskin, with the intention of rendering him some assistance.

But he found that his services were not needed.

Unaided, Blueskin had succeeded in securing the man, and was now endeavouring to restore the poor girl to consciousness.

Jack Sheppard knelt down by his side.

Should they not be interrupted, they doubted not that they should be able to glean some important information from this girl, upon whose gratitude they had certainly established a claim.

The house was a strange one.

The terrible shrieks the young girl had uttered would, one would have thought, have had the effect of bringing every inmate of the house to the scene of action.

But no one came, and no notice whatever appeared to be taken of them.

Apparently the same result would follow the noise of the attack and the cries of Mother Robotham.

In fact, brawls and disturbances of various kinds were so very common in that house that no one troubled themselves when they heard a shriek or two, but contented themselves with thinking that it was none of their business.

So on the present occasion, although several had heard the "row," as they termed it, yet none of them thought for a moment of interfering.

This was what Mother Robotham herself had repeatedly enjoined; but now, as she lay writhing on the floor and gasping for breath, she bitterly repented having done so.

Both her and her no less infamous associate were, however, so thoroughly helpless that our two friends ceased to trouble themselves in the slightest degree about them.

They could make no noise, and were powerless to make any attack upon them or leave the room.

The young girl received, then, the whole of their attention, and they soon had the satisfaction of perceiving her come back to life, and open her eyes.

Assuringly and soothingly Jack spoke to her, telling her that she had no longer anything to fear, and that they would see her in safety out of that horrible abode.

She thanked them earnestly.

The room was too dark for them to see each other's faces distinctly, but Jack soon remedied that by going up to the fire and causing it to burst into a bright blaze by giving it a vigorous poke or two.

The room was then tolerably well illuminated.

At her request, the young girl was raised to her feet, and again she poured out her thanks to our two friends for their timely interference.

"How you came to be here, I know not," she said.

"But, oh, take me away, or they will kill me!"

"We will take you away, never fear!" said Blueskin; "but we want you to give us some information."

"What, what—tell me, what! I shall rejoice if I am able to do anything to repay you for what you have done for me."

"Our errand here," said Blueskin, "concerns a young girl like yourself. Do you know anything of her?"

"Who is she?"

"I forgot. I have not yet given you any particulars. The young girl we wish to find was, we are informed, brought here in an insensible state a few days ago. Do you know anything about it?"

"Yes, yes!"

"What?"

"A young girl was brought here some days ago," replied the girl.

Blueskin and Jack Sheppard exchanged glances at this corroboration of what the hackney-coachman had told them, and whatever doubts might have lingered in their minds were now completely dissipated.

"Tell me all you know concerning her," said Jack, in a tone of voice which showed how deeply he was interested in the inquiry. "Do not omit any one particular, no matter how unimportant it may seem. In the first place, however, describe the appearance of the young girl to whom you allude."

This was done, and the description given entirely corresponded with the appearance of Edgworth Bess.

Jack groaned at the simple words fell from the girl's lips, and she looked up at him, surprised at the exhibition of such extraordinary emotion.

"Go—on!" he cried, when she had ended her description.

"Go on! Tell me what else took place!"

"Mother Robotham brought her here in a hackney-coach. She seemed almost dying—I fancy more from want of food than anything else. She was placed in a bed, and every attention paid to her. In a short time she perfectly recovered, and then Mother Robotham proceeded to make use of her."

"Make use of her?" cried Jack, vehemently. "How—what? Explain yourself."

"She dressed her out in the very best apparel, and then led her to a magnificent room downstairs, where she left her, and where a young nobleman who frequents this house was introduced to her."

At hearing these terrible words, Jack clasped his hands over his face and groaned bitterly.

Blueskin placed his hand upon his shoulder kindly.

"Cheer up!" he said, in an assuring voice as he could command. "Do not give up yet, but wait and hear all that this girl has to say. We have not heard all."

"I dread to hear any more than has just fallen upon my ears," replied Jack, mournfully.

The young girl's countenance exhibited the utmost degree of curiosity and surprise.

"I have told you the worst about her," she said.

"There, Jack!" said Blueskin. "She says she has told you the worst."

"Let me hear all!" cried Sheppard. "Where is she now? Take me to her—take me to her at once!"

"Impossible!"

"No—no! Not impossible! Where is she?"

"I know not."

"Know not? Did you not say, a moment ago, that a young nobleman was introduced to her?"

"Yes."

"Well—where is she?"

"I tell you, I do not know."

"How—why?"

"Because she left the house with him, and I have never heard or seen anything of either of them since."

This was terrible information.

For a moment Jack Sheppard stood looking at the young girl with a countenance expressive of blank despair.

He did not groan now—he did not move.

His agony was too great to be exhibited in any ordinary manner.

Suddenly his countenance changed.

An expression of fierceness came over it.

"Here is some terrible juggle," he cried—"I will not believe it! Lying wench! Is this your gratitude to us for having saved you from the dreadful punishment with which you were threatened? Retract your words—retract them in a moment! Tell me that all you have just said is false!"

CHAPTER CCOXL.

JACK SHEPPARD AND BLUESKIN ARE INTERRUPTED IN THEIR ATTEMPT TO ESCAPE.

CARRIED away by the insensate fury of his grief, Jack Sheppard seized the girl with so much violence, that she cried out with the pain his grasp occasioned. But, altogether heedless of this, Jack continued to give utterance to the torrent of words with which the last chapter concluded.

It was well that he was not alone.

It was well that he had one with him whose intellect was clear, and whose mind was less excited than his own.

Blueskin, although for a moment stunned, as it were, by the terrible revelation which had just been made, recovered himself quickly, and occupied himself in restraining the violence of his young companion.

He knew too well the character and disposition of Edgworth Bess to believe that she had voluntarily left the house with the young nobleman in the equivocal manner suggested.

If she had really gone, he felt certain in his own mind that she had some good and pure motive for so doing.

At once, then, he made Jack acquainted with his thoughts; and there was something so plausible in what he said, that Sheppard immediately grew calm, and felt ashamed of himself for having, for a moment, harboured an evil thought against her.

"You are right, Blueskin!" he said—"you are quite right! I am unfitted for this inquiry; question the girl yourself."

"Willingly, Jack! We ought to feel glad that chance has thrown us in the way of obtaining such information, without which we should have wandered in vain over this house, and exposed ourselves to a thousand dangers."

"Go on!" replied Jack; "question her! Obtain from her all the information she is able to give you."

Having thus spoken, Jack Sheppard turned aside and indulged in his emotions.

He felt it to be quite out of his power to obtain the mastery of them.

Perceiving this, and not without hope that by further inquiry he should learn something more assuring, Blueskin did not offer to interrupt him, but turned his attention to the girl, who was sobbing violently, and down whose cheeks the tears were rolling plentifully.

"Forgive the harshness and impetuosity of my friend," he said. "If you know how much he has at stake in this matter, you would cease to wonder at the violence which he has shown. He is most deeply interested in all that concerns the young girl about whom we are making these inquiries. For his sake, then, let me ask you to tell me all you know, and to reserve no single circumstance."

"I will, indeed I will!" she sobbingly replied. "In fact, I have already told you almost all. During her illness I frequently waited upon her, and I am sure there is no doubt about her being the same. Then, as I said, Mother Robotham had her dressed off in the best style, and introduced to the young nobleman. What passed between them I know not. They remained in the room some time together, and then came forth. Her hand was resting on his arm. In the hall they encountered Mother Robotham. A quarrel took place between them, which terminated in the young nobleman leading her out of the house. More than this I know not, for I have not seen either of them since."

At this plain and straightforward narrative, about the truth of which Blueskin had no doubt, his emotions almost overcame him.

The conclusions that were to be deduced from it were terrible.

There was something in the conduct of Edgworth Bess which he could not comprehend.

In fact, all was doubt, confusion, and dismay.

By a tremendous effort, he mastered his feelings.

"Who was this young nobleman?" he asked. "Tell me his name."

"Alas! I know it not."

"But you said that he was in the habit of frequenting this house."

"So he is, sir; but I do not know his name, for all that. We never learn their names."

EDGWORTH BESS IS RESCUED FROM THE RIVER.

"I see, I see! And you said he was a nobleman. How did you learn his rank?"

"By his dress."

"True—I forgot that. When did these events take place?"

"Last night."

"Last night?"

"Yes."

"Then if we had come here last night, instead of to-night, we should have been able to intercept her?"

"Probably you would, sir, for she was here until nearly daybreak."

Another groan from Jack Sheppard made Blueskin aware that he was listening to all that was taking place, and had just become conscious of this last piece of intelligence.

Blueskin himself clasped his hands in despair.

"Alas, alas!" he cried; "what is now to be done? Once more, it seems, we are without the slightest clue to guide us!"

No. 69.

The girl for awhile was silent. At length she said:

"I am sorry I could not give you any better news; but I assure you, sir, that I have spoken the truth."

"I do not doubt you," said Blueskin, "I do not doubt you for a moment; and our best thanks are due to you for the information you have given us, unpleasant as it is. Without it, we should have been exposing our lives in vain. Accept our best thanks."

"Nay, it is from me that the thanks are due," said the girl, "for having saved me from the ill-treatment to which I was about to be subjected; and if——"

"If what? Speak freely. Do not be afraid to give utterance to anything which you might wish to say."

"I was about to ask you to place me under still further obligation to you."

"In what manner? Again I say, do not be afraid to speak."

"I imagined, then, that, as the girl of whom you are in search is no longer here, you would shortly leave this place."

"Such is our intention. We can do no good by remaining here, and therefore it behoves us to be gone."

"I thought so, sir, and—"

"What is it you wished us to do?"

"To allow me to accompany you out of this house."

"Most willingly!"

"Thanks—oh, thanks! I will not trouble you any further than to allow me to go with you to the front door. Once in the street, I shall not care. If I remain in the house, I am sure to be ill-treated, perhaps murdered; for I can assure you, sir, the people here are by no means particular as to what they do. And to leave this house, unless under your protection, would be impossible."

"Think nothing of that—think nothing of that!" said Blueskin, soothingly. "We will willingly enough see you free from this den. Indeed, we should have done so had you not made the request."

"Thanks, thanks!"

"We will leave at once," said Blueskin; and as he spoke he turned round towards his comrade.

Jack Sheppard was wholly overcome.

The information he had just received was by far of a more terrible character than he had anticipated.

Not in moments of the blackest and deepest despair had he pictured to himself anything so dreadful as this.

Nothing could be worse.

At first, Blueskin found all his efforts to rouse him vain.

He had sunk down on a kind of ottoman near the fire.

His head was buried in his hands, and his whole attitude denoted the deepest and most abject grief.

By degrees, however, Blueskin succeeded in making himself heard.

"Come, Jack!" he said, "be a man—be firm! Things look bad now; but, then, their aspect may be altered. There is not much room for hope, I confess; still, I think you ought not to give up without further proof than you at present possess. No further good will result from our remaining in this house. Let us, then, leave it, while we have an opportunity of doing so. Come, Jack, come!"

"No matter, no matter, Blueskin! Leave me here—as well leave me here as anywhere. Seek your own safety, and do not heed mine, for I no longer heed it myself!"

"I will not!" replied Blueskin, "I cannot! How do you know under what circumstances Edgworth Bess left the house? It may be that she won upon the sympathies of the young nobleman so far as to induce him to escort her from this house; and, at the present moment, it may be that she is waiting in some place of security for us to present ourselves before her."

This was but a frail hope, and Blueskin felt that it was so; but still, no better suggested itself upon the spur of the moment, and he had the satisfaction of perceiving that, slight as it was, Jack Sheppard caught at it.

He removed his hands from his face, and, looking up, said:

"It may be so—Blueskin, it may be so; for I cannot bring myself to think that Edgworth Bess would leave the house in the manner intimated. Blueskin, I feel that you are right!"

"That is well, then. Rise and quit this house, and we shall at least have some opportunity of ascertaining whether this surmise is, or is not, correct."

"We shall," said Jack, starting to his feet, and trying to banish the remnant of his emotion.

"Be careful!" said Blueskin, "I fancy that we shall find it by far more difficult to leave this place than we did to enter it!"

"By what means do you propose to leave it?"

"I have not thought of that. Doubtless, upon this point the girl will be able to give us important information by telling us which would be the easiest and the readiest means for us to gain the street."

"Ask her; doubtless, from having been an inmate of this house, she will be able to tell you what you desire to know."

Blueskin turned round, and once more addressed himself to the girl, who had been watching them eagerly during the time this little conference had taken place.

"Tell me," said Blueskin, "which do you think will be the best way for us to quit this house?"

The young girl made no immediate reply, and Blueskin, fancying she did not understand his question, added:

"I mean, which way can we leave this house so as to incur the smallest possible amount of danger?"

"I understand you, sir," was the reply; "I was considering which would be the best."

"Take time to reflect; by no means reply hastily."

"The principal people in the house are here," said the girl, pointing to the prostrate forms of Mother Robotham and her associate; "we shall have no one but the servants to contend with."

"In which way should we stand the best chance of avoiding them?"

"I do not think you could do better than descend the staircase into the hall, and pass out by the front door."

"Who shall we be likely to meet?"

"I think only the porter, who sits in the easy chair, and whose duty it is to let people in and out. In all probability he will be asleep."

"Then we should have a good chance of passing him unperceived?"

"Oh, yes!"

"Then the front door be it! What do you say, Jack?"

"The front door, by all means!"

"Come, then, at once—there is no time to lose!"

"I am loth to go," said Jack, "without first punishing those two wretches yonder."

"Leave them," replied Blueskin—"leave them; they are utterly unworthy of your resentment."

"I am unwilling."

"Nay, nay! By lingering we may bring upon ourselves great danger. Take good advice. Follow this young girl, who will lead the way."

"Yes, yes—oh, yes!"

"Come!"

Blueskin grasped Jack's arm as he spoke, and led him after the girl, who had already crossed the apartment.

She went direct to the door of the bedchamber through which our two friends had come.

Crossing this, she emerged on to the landing.

Here the little party paused to listen.

No sound, either from above or below, however, saluted their ears.

The stillness of the very grave reigned in the house.

Before leaving the room in which this singular scene had taken place, they were careful to ascertain that their prisoners were perfectly secure.

They then closed all the doors, so as to preclude the possibility of any sound they might make being able to reach to any great distance.

Encouraged by the silence, the trio now ventured to commence the descent of the stairs.

The staircase was a broad and ample one, and was most beautifully carpeted, so that it was the easiest matter in the world for them to descend without making a sound.

At convenient distances lamps were placed in niches, and these lighted up the whole of the place.

This was at once an advantage and a disadvantage.

The landing below was reached in safety and silence, and here they again paused to listen.

The stillness was unbroken.

Suddenly one of the doors close behind them was opened.

An ejaculation fell upon their ears, and the door closed again before either of our friends had time to turn round and look.

"Quick!" said the girl. "Descend at once!"

"Who was it?"

"I know not; perhaps someone who was about to emerge, and who then drew back upon seeing us. I do not think there is much ground for apprehension if we are speedy."

"Come on, then!"

Again the descent was commenced, and almost immediately afterwards a turn in the staircase disclosed the hall below.

At some distance was the front door, and near it a huge, easy chair, in which they had been led to suppose the porter would be sitting.

A second glance convinced them of the correctness of this information, for the legs of that individual could be seen, all the rest of his body being hidden in the profundities of the stuffed leather chair.

Whether he was asleep or awake was a question that had yet to be solved.

CHAPTER CCOXLI.

EXPLAINS TO THE READER THE CAUSE OF THE SUDDEN AND UNEXPECTED APPEARANCE OF THE POLICE OFFICERS.

At any rate, at present he appeared to be unconscious of their presence, for he made no movement whatever.

The critical moment had now arrived; but, from the general aspect of affairs, they anticipated but little difficulty in being able to leave the house.

Those anticipations were, however, doomed not to be realised.

Jack was exceedingly confident.

"I will go first," he said, in a faint whisper; "you remain where you are for a moment."

"What are you about to do?"

"I will steal silently up to the old porter, and thrust the muzzle of a pistol into his ear, commanding him, on pain of having his brains blown out, to open the door!"

"Go on," said Blueskin; "that will do!"

"You wait here, then."

"All right!"

Upon receiving this assurance, Jack crept slowly, but noiselessly, down the staircase.

The hall was covered with some soft, carpety substance, so he was able to stride over it without making sound enough to disturb anyone.

The amount of stealth and caution made use of may have been greater than necessary, but if so, it was a mistake made on the right side.

At length Jack stood within arm's-length of the huge leather chair.

As yet there were no indications of his approach having been noted.

The porter did not move, and by his deep and stertorous breathing, which was now plainly to be heard, Jack concluded he slept.

One step more, and he stood before him.

The light of a lamp near the door streaming full upon the porter's countenance confirmed this supposition.

He was sound asleep.

This changed the current of Jack's intentions.

Seeing his condition, he doubted not that they should all be able to leave the house without attracting his observation.

He resolved, at any rate, to make the attempt, and turned towards the front door.

That he should be able to remove the fastenings readily, he did not for a moment doubt.

Scarcely, however, had his hand touched the knob than the porter awoke.

He uttered an exclamation, and, springing from his seat, seized Jack in a moment.

But Sheppard saw him coming, and was by no means taken by surprise.

He grappled him by the throat, which he compressed so forcibly as to make further speech impossible.

Then, thrusting the muzzle of the pistol into his ear, as he had at first intended to do, he cried, in a low, hoarse, guttural voice:

"Silence—silence, for your life! Open the door, and allow us to depart, or, as sure as this is a pistol, I will blow your brains out!"

The porter's countenance changed when this ferocious speech fell upon his ears, and he nodded his head violently, as though to intimate that he would allow them to pass out.

All this Blueskin had seen from the distance, and he now hastened to the door, accompanied by the girl, whose delight at the apparently near prospect of freedom knew no bounds.

Just, however, when Blueskin reached Jack's side, a sudden uproar took place without.

In the street, the trampling of many feet and the hum of voices came plainly to their ears.

What this portended they could not guess, and they remained motionless and aghast, looking in each other's faces for some explanation of the uproar.

It was in vain.

Before they had time to recover from their amazement, the trampling feet paused outside the door, upon which a shower of heavy blows was immediately rained.

Every one seemed to strike upon our friends' hearts, and render them incapable of motion.

"Open, open!" cried a loud voice; "in the name of the King, I call upon you to open the door!"

The porter trembled.

He was no less terrified and astonished than our two friends.

Finding no notice was taken of their command, another violent succession of blows were rained upon the door, before one of which it gave way.

This fact was, the door, for convenience in opening and closing, was only fastened with a spring latch, the strength of which was quite inadequate to support the door should an attack be made upon it.

Jack, bewildered by the sudden and unexpected nature of this assault, released his hold upon the porter, and retreated in the direction of the staircase.

He was rapidly followed by Blueskin and the young girl.

A glance showed them that the attack had been made by a large body of police officers.

Not Wild's myrmidons, be it understood, but genuine Bow Street Runners.

What could be their errand in that place it would be hard to say, though naturally enough Blueskin and Jack connected their sudden appearance with themselves.

In this they were in error.

This attack by the police upon the mysterious house in Spring Gardens had nothing to do with our two friends, who happened most unluckily to be there at that particular time.

The officers never dreamt that they should find Jack Sheppard there, whose capture they had almost begun to despair of effecting, and for whose apprehension such a very large reward was offered.

The explanation of their sudden appearance is simple in the extreme, and we at once hasten to place it before the reader.

It will be remembered, in the conversation which Blueskin and Jack Sheppard overheard between Mother Robotham and her no less infamous associate, allusion was made to a certain young sea officer, who had been lured into that house.

He had been brought by a person whose especial duty it was to creep about London streets in search of victims.

This sea officer was a lieutenant on board a man-of-war which had just come into port, and he in common with many more had come up to London to spend the money which they had just received.

Sailor-like, he fell an easy prey to the person by whom he was accosted and led to the house in Spring Gardens.

By this time he had drunk sufficient to render his brain clouded, though he was far from being intoxicated.

His full pockets and his state did not escape the keen eyes of Mother Robotham.

Her resolve was immediately taken.

He was introduced to the girl who was about to be chastised, and a quantity of drugged liquor placed before him.

Had he partaken of this, he would have become helpless and unconscious.

His pockets would then have been rifled, and every valuable article he carried would have been taken.

Then, still in the same state, he would have been carried to some distant quarter of the metropolis, laid down in the street, or propped up against a door-step.

It was in this way that very many persons had been served.

In fact, it was quite a common thing with Mother Robotham, and no inconsiderable quantity of her revenue was acquired by this means.

Hitherto she had escaped conviction, but not suspicion.

Persons who had been served in this manner, waking up, and discovering themselves in the street, would not wonder at finding their pockets empty, and, generally speaking, their intellects were in too confused a condition for them to be able to recollect with certainty the house to which they had been taken.

In fact, it was part of the duty of the decoy by whom they were lured to destruction to ply them with drink on the way, and so occupy their attention as to make them forget altogether to notice whither they were led.

It was thus that Mother Robotham committed her infamous deeds with impunity.

But the end had now arrived.

At all risks, the young girl who was introduced determined to warn the next victim of his fate.

That next victim was the young officer.

She told him of his danger—informed him that the wine was drugged—that he would be plundered—perhaps murdered.

This startling communication had the effect of sobering him, though his brain was still in a state of terrible confusion, rendering him incapable of acting or thinking as he otherwise would have done.

The conversation that had just taken place had been overheard.

On the other side of the door with her ear against the keyhole, was Mother Robotham.

Boiling over with rage, she called aloud for help, and sprang into the room.

She seized the young officer in her grasp, and doubtless, could she but have retained him until assistance arrived, he would never have been permitted to leave the house alive.

The possessor of such secrets would be ruthlessly murdered in cold blood.

The young officer, however, was quite sober enough to struggle with his assailant.

Not without difficulty he shook her off, and then, having done so, he discovered that fresh foes were in the doorway.

He cast his eyes around.

He had but one idea, and that was to escape.

Before him was a window.

Quite heedless as to where it led, he made a sudden rush and sprang through it.

There was a terrific crash, and the next moment he felt himself come into violent contact with the ground.

But the consciousness that his life was in danger was vividly before his mind, and prevented him from relapsing into insensibility.

Up he sprang.

A glance showed him he was in the street, and no sooner was he aware of this, than he set off at full speed, without taking the least notice of the direction in which he was hurrying.

At length, as his brain cooled and his physical powers failed him, he halted, and then discovered that he was not pursued.

Reflection now came properly back to his mind.

Clasping his hands over his temples, he leant against a doorway and strove to think clearly of the occurrences of the past.

For a time he could not recollect how he came into that house, or where it was situated.

By degrees, however, he remembered the man by whom he had been decoyed, and then he recollected entering a public-house at Charing Cross, almost immediately after which he entered the house.

It was not until this moment that the thoughts of the lieutenant reverted to the young girl to whom alone he was indebted for his escape from the awful den.

For the first time he became aware that their conversation had been overheard.

He shuddered.

That the young girl would suffer some horrible punishment at the hands of the fiends who inhabited the place, he felt convinced.

The danger of returning would be great indeed, and yet his gratitude would not permit him to allow her to remain at the mercy of such people as she would have to deal with.

What to do for the best he scarcely knew.

He had passed nearly the whole of his life on the ocean, and knew but little how affairs were managed on land.

He felt the want of advice, and came to the resolution of taking into his confidence the first person he met.

But the hour was a lonely one, and the streets were deserted.

A light in the distance, however, attracted his attention, and he made his way towards it.

The light came from the windows of a public-house.

Here he determined to enter.

At the bar several persons were standing.

He called for cold rum-and-water, and desired to speak to the landlord.

To this individual he related everything.

The landlord coupled this narrative in a moment with the mysterious robberies that had of late been so frequent, one of which had happened only a day or so ago, and the victim was discovered within a few yards of the house.

It so happened that among the persons who stood at the bar was a Bow Street Runner, as the police officers were then called.

To him the communication was next made.

This officer, scenting something unusual, at once took charge of the young sailor, and calling a hackney-coach, ordered the jayvey to drive them direct to Bow Street.

On their arrival at the head police station, the inspector was made acquainted with the strange story, as well as with the surmises of the landlord of the public-house.

The inspector of course did not hesitate as to what should be done.

A number of the men were called up and got in readiness, and the little party set off in the direction of Charing Cross.

Upon arriving here, the officer pointed out the public-house into which he had been taken, though it was now closed.

The difficult part of the business now remained.

Would he be able to find the house or not?

The sailor thought deeply, and called back to his mind every little circumstance that had occurred.

Then, placing his back against the door of the public-house, as though he had just come out of it, he crossed over the wide open space in the direction of Spring Gardens.

Here he paused irresolutely, and then went on until at length he paused before No. 57.

The officers all looked up at the house, and several recognised it as the den kept by Mother Robotham.

The suspicions which had been previously entertained respecting her were revived with redoubled force, and at length, confident that they were right, and that they were about to make some startling discoveries, the officers rushed into the house in the manner we have recorded.

CHAPTER CXXII.

JACK SHEPPARD IS CAPTURED BY THE POLICE, AND BLUESKIN IS HOTLY PURSUED THROUGH THE EMPTY HOUSE.

SUCH, then, was the simple enough explanation of the apparently mysterious and unaccountable appearance of the police officers at the house in Spring Gardens.

It is surprising how great a difference a few moments will sometimes make.

Had the officers arrived a little later, or had our friends been a little earlier, this very disastrous rencontre would have been avoided.

But fate had ordained it otherwise.

The officer in command had issued instructions to his subordinates to take into custody every person, male or female, that they found within the house, so as to preclude the possibility of allowing one of the guilty parties to slip through their fingers.

The first person seized was the porter.

Despite his struggles, he was securely handcuffed, and left in charge of two of the force.

The remainder having caught sight of the retreating figures of our friends, made a rush towards the stairs, and hastened up after them.

Finding it impossible to leave the house by the front door, Jack and Blueskin naturally bethought themselves of the trap-door, by means of which they had in the first instance gained admission.

Embarrassed as they now were with the young girl, the difficulty of leaving by this means was very much increased.

Still they did not doubt their capabilities to overcome a difficulty of this description.

Away, then, they went up the stairs, with such speed as only those could make who were similarly situated.

In less time than would be believed possible, the top of the house was reached.

But the officers were close behind them, and before it could be possible for them to pass through the trap-door, would stand where they now stood.

Some means must therefore be adopted of checking their advance, so as to give them the time necessary to make their escape.

Hastily Jack opened the door nearest to him.

A faint shriek came from within the chamber, showing that someone was disturbed.

In a stern voice, Blueskin bade them be silent.

Just inside the room was a large chest of drawers.

"This will do," cried Jack, "help me with it. We will roll it down the stairs, and I fancy that will be rather difficult to clamber over."

Blueskin did not reply in words, but showed that he fully approved of Jack's suggestion by putting his shoulder against the chest of drawers and commencing to push it towards the head of the stairs.

In this he was seconded by Jack, and the young girl, too, exerted all the strength which she possessed to the same end.

The brief delay that had taken place in making the watchman prisoner had enabled our friends to get a good start of their foes.

Now, however, they could hear them trampling up the staircase, and it seemed doubtful, after all the trouble they had taken, whether they would be in time to achieve their object.

The proximity of the officers endowed Jack and Blueskin with an amount of strength which was surprising even to themselves.

Swiftly the huge chest of drawers was pushed across the landing.

But when the top of the stairs was reached, the police officers were already visible below.

Another minute, and they would be too late.

Exerting all their strength, however, they pushed the heavy piece of furniture over.

With a crash that seemed to shake the house to its foundations, the chest of drawers plunged down the stairs.

The police officers both heard and saw it coming, and drew back.

The action was an involuntary one.

The chest of drawers did not fall far.

It wedged itself into the first angle of the stairs, and there remained.

Apparently, it was so firmly fixed in its present position that it would be impossible to move it, except from above, and by means of instruments especially adapted for the purpose.

This was enough to fill our friends with exultation, and with reanimated hopes of succeeding in effecting their escape, they turned to the trap-door.

It was just possible that the officers would be able to climb over the obstacle thus unexpectedly thrown before them, but it would be the work of time.

This vigorous proceeding to cover their retreat suggested to the officers that they were on the track of some very desperate persons, for as yet, be it understood, they had no idea that it was Jack Sheppard and the notorious Blueskin who were before them.

Had they possessed such knowledge, their pursuit would probably have been more energetic than it was.

Just, however, as the chest of drawers was rolled down, the foremost of the police caught sight of their antagonists.

They recognised them immediately, and announced that fact by giving utterance to a loud shout.

Indeed, it is certain that at this time there was not a member of the force who was not well acquainted with their personal appearance, for innumerable bills had been circulated both by the Government and Jonathan Wild, in which they were most minutely described.

Despite, therefore, their late change of habiliments, they recognised them at the first glance.

Our friends heard the shout, and came to a tolerably correct conclusion as to the cause of it.

Still they did not permit it to unnerv them.

Apparently with as much coolness as ever, Jack said:

"We shall do it now, Blueskin, if we are careful! Be quick! You are the tallest! Spring up to the trap-door, and I will hand the girl up to you!"

There was no time to argue about what should be done, and Blueskin at once sprang up to the trap-door as his companion had desired.

He managed to grasp the edge with his fingers, but quickly tightening his hold, he lightly and rapidly drew himself up.

No sooner did he feel himself on the rafters, than, lying down on his face, he held his arms in readiness to take hold of the young girl.

In the meantime, Jack Sheppard seized her by the waist and succeeded in lifting her high enough for Blueskin to take hold of her.

Our old friend seized her in a moment, and, not without some difficulty, drew her up into the space between the tiles and the ceiling.

"I am coming," said Jack. "Never you mind me, but leave me to take care of myself. Get the girl out on to the roof!"

Blueskin obeyed.

He was in the act of placing her on the outside, when a pistol-shot and a great tumult warned him that something serious was taking place below.

In a moment he looked down, and nearly lost his life by so doing.

No sooner did he appear, than something whistled past his head, and a bright flash and a report simultaneously occurring, told him that a pistol had been discharged in his face.

By the narrowest chance in the world, he escaped receiving any injury.

But the sight below was one for which he was totally unprepared, and he could scarcely believe that so much had taken place in such a short space of time.

He had scarcely left the trap-door a moment, and now, when he looked down, the landing was swarming with officers, and Jack was struggling desperately in the grasp of several, but hopelessly a prisoner.

This is what had happened.

Jack's attention had been so centred in handing up the girl to Blueskin, and preparing to spring up to the trap-door himself, that he did not notice the progress the officers were making.

They had, however, succeeded in climbing over the barrier, which at first seemed insurmountable; and Jack Sheppard did not see that they had done this until it was too late.

He made a wild spring upwards, and succeeded in catching hold of the edge of the opening.

Fearful that he would make his escape, and as they had instructions to take him alive or dead, one of the officers drew a pistol and fired at him.

He took aim at his head, but a sudden movement which Jack made at the moment saved him, and the bullet struck the fleshy part of his arm instead.

The effect of this was to deprive him of all use in the limb, and he dropped to the floor with an irrepressible cry of agony upon his lips.

Ere he could recover himself, the officers were upon him.

As soon as he felt himself seized, he struggled desperately but vainly with his captors.

The grasp they kept upon him was too tight a one to be shaken off.

But still he struggled, though all he did was to uselessly exhaust his worn strength, for the number of officers kept increasing every moment.

Another of their number, looking up, perceived Blueskin at the opening in the ceiling above, and, doubtless encouraged by the success which had followed the firing of a pistol just before, drew another from his belt, and aimed it at the face which he could only just distinguish.

His shot failed altogether.

The bullet flew high in the air over the house-tops, and fell down again without inflicting the least injury upon anyone.

And now, in spite of his struggles to prevent it, a pair of handcuffs were slipped over Jack's wrists.

As soon as he saw this, and the number of police officers surrounding him, the vague idea which had for a moment filled Blueskin's mind, of jumping down and rescuing him, was quite banished, and he found it would require the exercise of all his energies to escape himself.

He had two alternatives before him, and he did not hesitate a moment as to which he should adopt.

One was, to remain where he was, and be captured along with his comrade; and the other was, to try his best to escape, and leave him to deal with his enemies as best he might.

The latter may sound very much like desertion, but yet it was the course which Blueskin adopted, and no one could ever accuse him of the cowardly action of deserting his companion in the hour of danger.

But Blueskin was well aware that while he was at liberty he should be in a position to render assistance to his friend in captivity.

Should both, however, be made prisoners, it would be utterly impossible for one to be the least assistance to the other.

Besides, he had faith in Jack's own power to outwit his foes.

He had done such a thing before, and doubtless would be able to do so again.

At any rate, as he could do no good by remaining, or attempting the rescue of Jack, Blueskin made his way out on to the roof.

He was compelled to be speedy in his movements, for the officers were preparing to pursue him.

To get on to the roof, and reach the spot where he had left the young girl, did not take Blueskin a moment, and having done so, he said:

"Quick—quick! For my sake be quick! You have nothing to fear from the officers, but I have; and unless I am speedy I shall be captured. I cannot leave you here, but as soon as we reach a place of greater safety we will separate."

"No, no!" said the girl; "leave me here: I am not afraid. The officers will not harm me; and perhaps I shall be able to detain them for a moment, and so give you an additional chance of escape, whereas I feel that if I remain with you I shall be so great a clog upon all your movements, that you will certainly be captured."

The young girl spoke with energy and rapidity.

Blueskin did not hesitate to avail himself of her offer.

He knew that while she remained there she would incur no danger whatever.

The police-officers would have no charge to make against her; and, as she had said, she should be able to detain his enemies for a moment.

Hurriedly thanking her for her offer, Blueskin crept over the tiles with as much speed as was consonant with safety.

The officers were, however, alarmingly close behind him. Already they had emerged on to the roof.

Luckily, the distance to the trap-door was but trifling; and, as it seemed instinctively, Blueskin made his way towards this.

With a recklessness of personal consequences which under no other circumstances he would have exhibited, he lowered himself through the trap-door.

He reached the floor beneath with a rather violent shock; and he limped for a little while afterwards, having slightly sprained his ankle.

About such a trivial misfortune as this he had no time to linger, and with breakneck speed he descended the stairs.

Upon reaching the first floor he paused.

Then opening a door close at hand, he entered a room in the front of the house.

Cautiously approaching the window, he looked out.

As he had expected, he had a tolerably good view of the street beneath.

To his mortification, he discovered it was filled with people.

His original intention had been to make his way to the front door and pass out of it.

The crowded state of the street now rendered it impracticable, for, if he emerged, his detection would be certain.

Some other means must be found, and that, too, without delay.

Turning away from the window, he once more made his way to the landing.

Just as he reached it, a tremendous lumbering sound, which clearly came from above, struck upon his ears.

"It is the officers!" said Blueskin. "Already they have tracked me thus far."

CHAPTER CCCXLIII.

RELATES WHAT HAPPENED TO EDGWOORTH BESS AFTER HER FRANTIC LEAP INTO THE THAMES.

It is now time that we returned to Edgwoorth Bess.

It is true that to do so we leave, for a short time, Jack Sheppard and Blueskin in a situation of great peril, yet the condition of the poor heiress is scarcely less desperate.

It will be recollected that when we saw her last, was when, after having fled wildly and madly from Mrs. Pike's the shroud-maker, she had reached the banks of the river Thames.

Unquestionably the fire of insanity was burning in her brain when she arrived at the spot.

She was only dimly conscious of what she was about, and seemed to be urged towards the darkly flowing water by some evil spirit.

As the waves plashed against the barges that were moored upon the banks or against the walls of the wharves, they seemed to say: "Rest—rest—rest!" and the foamy tips of the waves as they receded from the shore seemed to beckon her towards them.

Thoroughly heartsick and weary of the scenes which she had just passed through, she resolved to plunge into the cold, dark water.

She was led to do so by some indefinable instinct, which she could not resist.

She was no longer mistress of her own actions.

We have stated how she sprang with maniac-like agility on to one of the barges that were moored close at hand, and how, on reaching the prow of the clumsy vessel, she had uttered a wild, shrieking laugh, and plunged into the Thames.

As she sped over the boat, she felt that she trod upon some soft substance, but what it was she did not trouble herself to ascertain.

Nor did she heed the rough ejaculations which fell upon her ears.

The soft substance upon which she had trod was the body of a man.

It was from his lips that the ejaculations had come.

His duty was to remain on board the barge all night as watchman, in order to guard its cargo from the depredations of the Thames pirates.

He was asleep when Edgwoorth Bess scrambled aboard the barge, and was awakened by her foot pressing upon him.

He started up in rather a confused manner, and caught sight of some indistinct object flitting across the barge in the direction of the prow.

Hastily rising to his feet, he scrambled after it, and then perceived the indistinct figure was a woman.

Her horrible, shrieking, maniacal laugh struck upon his ears; and then, in a moment, he comprehended all.

It was not the first time he had seen girls commit suicide by plunging into the river.

As soon as he was conscious of her intent, he blundered forward with still greater speed, and stretched out his hand to take hold of her clothing.

But he was one second too late.

Ere he could grasp it the leap had been taken.

She was gone.

She disappeared from his view in an instant, for the surface of the river was covered with a kind of mist, while from the sky a quantity of sleet—half hail, half snow—poured down, rendering it an impossibility to see anything at a distance.

The loud splash which followed the frenzied leap, however, echoed far and wide.

It was this splash and the icy coldness of the water that restored Edgwoorth Bess to a proper frame of mind.

A wild, thrilling scream came from her lips when she found herself struggling with the waves, and the instinct of self-preservation rose paramount in her breast.

Her intellects were still in confusion.

She was like one in a dream, and was wholly at a loss to account for her presence in the river.

The cold water numbed her, and deprived her of the power of motion.

Her struggles ceased.

She wished to swim to the shore, but could not.

The water hissed and gurgled in her ears.

It foamed and surged over her face as her body was tossed about at the caprice of the waves.

She opened her lips to shriek again, but the water rushed in and choked her.

In vain she tried to prevent it.

Her senses forsook her.

By degrees she became insensible to everything.

Her last consciousness was that something was humming and buzzing in her ears.

After that, all was over.

What happened afterwards was a blank.

We return now to the man in the barge, who had witnessed the poor girl's frantic leap.

This event had thoroughly awakened him, and he proved it by his actions.

Hastening to the after-part of the boat, he shouted out to someone who appeared to be below.

He was answered gruffly, and the next moment a man as rough looking as himself appeared.

"There's a gal overboard!" he said. "Come on! Let's help the poor thing! I daresay she has repented by this time, and wishes herself on the land again. There's a wherry alongside, and we can push off in a jiffy."

The man thus addressed muttered something in a grumbling, indistinct tone of voice, but did not disobey.

He stooped down, however, and produced a long pole, tipped with iron, which is called a boat-hook, and is an indispensable instrument in navigating the river.

In the meantime, his companion had lowered himself into the wherry, which, as he had stated, lay alongside.

He unshipped the oars in an instant, and cast off the moment he was joined by his companion.

He had noted the spot where the girl had plunged in, and immediately rowed towards it.

But nothing of her could be seen.

The falling snow and sleet were baffling to a degree, and they strained their eyes in vain to catch a glimpse of her.

But the surface of the water was uniformly dark, and they were about to return without having achieved their object, when the one with the oars perceived some floating object near them.

It was approaching, and he called out to his companion to keep a sharp look-out.

The man stood up in the boat with his pole in readiness.

His eyes were fixed on the floating something which one more wave would bring within his reach.

It was a human face, and the instant he made this discovery he stuck his boat-hook into the mass of apparel that was floating on the surface of the water.

The instrument took firm hold, and by slow degrees he dragged the inanimate body towards the boat.

The man with the oars looked round, and, seeing that it was a girl, concluded in a moment that it was the one he had seen leap into the river.

The man with the hook now found his task grow difficult, for the body showed a strong inclination to sink.

Without the skill which long practice had given him, he would never have succeeded in lifting her into the boat.

But he accomplished this feat, and no sooner had he done so than his companion rowed with all speed towards the shore.

The other occupied himself in chafing the poor girl's hands, and attempting to instil some life into her.

But he had no encouragement to persevere with his attentions.

Edgworth Bess presented the appearance of a dead body.

Not a particle of life was visible, and her body was as cold as the water from which it had just been taken.

Nevertheless, the man continued his efforts, for, from the nature of his profession, he naturally understood how to treat drowning persons.

The keel of the little wherry grated against the shore without his having been able to extract one symptom of returning life, and he shook his head gloomily in reply to his companion's remark, as he lifted the poor girl out of the boat.

"I am afraid there is no life in her," he said. "However, whether there is or not, we will carry her to the Prince of Wales inn, on the bank yonder."

"All right, mate!" was the reply. "Just wait a moment while I moor the boat, and I'll be with you."

"Come on, then!"

The man was not a moment mooring the boat, and then he hurried off after his companion, who carried Edgworth Bess in his arms as though she had been no heavier than a feather.

The Prince of Wales was the sign of an inn situated very close to the river's edge, which, for the most part, was frequented by boatmen and others employed on the water.

The light that came from the window in the tap-room was dimly visible in the distance, and the two men directed their steps in a straight line towards it.

In a few moments they arrived.

The hour was past midnight, but the front door of the public-house was wide open, and so it would remain until just before daybreak.

Rude sounds of boisterous merriment struck upon the ears of the two men as they entered the inn, but Edgworth Bess heard them not.

She was dead to every outward sensation.

The landlady of the house immediately came forward.

She was known to the two men, and they at once addressed her.

But when she saw what they carried, a cloud of displeasure came over her face.

To her there was something exceedingly unpleasant in the idea of having a dead body brought into her house.

She was well aware that she could not refuse to allow it to remain, but this knowledge only increased her ill-temper.

She foresaw the inquest, and the probably disagreeable notoriety which her house would obtain.

It was her wish to keep it as quiet as possible, for many of her customers came there merely because the situation was quiet, and because there was little likelihood of their being disturbed.

There was no help for it; but in a surly tone of voice she chid the men for having brought the body there.

"Can't help it, mum!" said the one who had manifested such a desire to rescue the poor girl from the river.

"Can't help it, mum! Your house is the nearest, and, bless the poor thing's heart, I don't believe she's dead at all, for she wasn't in the water long enough to drown! Show my mate a place where he can put her down, and I'll run for a surgeon!"

The kind-hearted boatman, knowing that the landlady could not refuse, did not wait to see his instructions carried out, but hastened off for a surgeon.

Being well acquainted with the neighbourhood, he readily found one.

When he re-entered the inn, accompanied by the medical man, he found that the body had been laid upon a table, not far from the fire.

A crowd of eager, curious people were in the room, clustering round the table.

The surgeon frowned as he saw this, and peremptorily commanded everyone to quit the apartment, with the exception of the landlady.

He was reluctantly obeyed.

One by one the idlers left, and then the doctor, securing the door, went up to the table.

The ragged and miserable habiliments of Edgworth Bess were dragged with water, which, too, had drained off them until the table was covered with moisture, which, drop by drop, trickled on to the floor.

Her eyes were closed, and her features, which were before pinched and pallid, wore now so close a resemblance to death, that even the surgeon, skilful as he was in such matters, hesitated to say whether she was indeed alive.

Various restoratives were administered, but without avail.

Her body was icy cold, and every limb rigid.

Under these circumstances, still greater efforts were made for her revivification.

The surgeon was unremitting in his attentions.

He was a hard, matter-of-fact man, and what little sympathies he might have originally possessed had been blunted by his profession.

But they were not wholly destroyed, for when he gazed upon the pallid countenance of Edgworth Bess, a feeling of interest was awakened in his bosom for which he was totally at a loss to account.

It was well that the poor heiress should have enlisted the kindly sympathies of one so powerful as the doctor.

At length his patient efforts to restore her to life were rewarded.

Gradually her pulse fluttered and her heart resumed its proper functions.

She was then instantly carried to a bed, and it was here that Edgworth Bess first recovered her consciousness of what was taking place around her.

An opiate was then administered, and the poor girl fell off into a deep and refreshing sleep.

The landlady was scarcely less pleased to have Edgworth Bess an inmate of her house alive than she had previously been to have her dead body.

The doctor, however, acted as a kind of check upon her uncharitableness.

It was not long after he had taken his departure, and just as the public-house was going to be closed, that a dark figure crept towards the inn, and, after pausing a moment at the front door, entered.

He was a short, thick-set, muscular-looking man, and held his head on one side in a very peculiar manner.

He strode along the passage towards the bar of the inn with the firm, decided step of one who feels that he has a right to command, and that he possesses the power of bending others to his will.

His dress was plain and ordinary in appearance, but composed of the richest of materials, while jewels sparkled in different parts of it.

A dozen strides took him to the little bar window.

The landlady was not within, and the man knocked sharply upon the counter with a short, heavy stick that he took from his coat pocket.

It was a formidable-looking bludgeon, and a heavy blow could have been delivered with it, making it a weapon of terrible efficacy in a combat at close quarters.

The glasses jingled as the sharp knocks were delivered upon the counter, and the next moment the landlady appeared.

Her countenance was convulsed with anger, and the moment she caught sight of her customer, she poured forth a torrent of abuse.

CHAPTER CCCXLIV.

JONATHAN WILD MAKES AN ARRANGEMENT WITH THE LANDLADY OF THE PRINCE OF WALES INN.

THE short, thick-set man who stood at the bar allowed her to go on without making the least attempt to stem the current of her eloquence; but when, at length, the landlady ceased, from pure inability to say any more, he slowly raised his hat, and made an ironical kind of bow.

We have said that day was breaking.

Already the first flush of dawn had crept over all things.

The bar shutters were closed, but through the diamond-shaped holes that were cut in them there streamed two grey, sickly beams of light.

One of these ghastly beams fell full upon the countenance of the man as he raised his hat and bowed.

It revealed the hideous features with great distinctness.

The landlady uttered a scream of dismay, and the whole expression of her countenance changed.

She seemed ready to sink upon the floor with fright.

Then the man knew that he had been recognised, and, with his countenance contorted by a grin of satisfaction, he replaced his hat upon his head.

From what has been just said, the reader will doubtless recognise this early customer at the Prince of Wales inn.

It was Jonathan Wild.

The landlady knew him.

She had seen him many a time, and now her guilty conscience made her tremble as it accused her of numberless actions, any one of which coming under the dreaded thief-taker's notice would suffice for her destruction.

We have lost sight of Jonathan Wild for some time lately.

The last time when we presented him to the reader was when he dashed down the street in pursuit of Jack Sheppard and Blueskin, who, just at that moment, were safely in the tailor's shop.

He was now on a false scent, and though he spent several hours in searching closely, he was unable to see anything of his prisoners.

At last, weary and dispirited, he had returned to his own home, where he was compelled to refresh himself with a little rest and sleep.

Upon awaking, he was informed of the desperate condition of his son, who had been much injured by his fall down the stairs.

This increased the ill-humour under which he was suffering.

He was deprived of a coadjutor who had proved himself of great sagacity and ability, at the very moment when he had most need of his services.

He made his way to his son's chamber, and found him in bed, groaning dismally.

There was the bullet-wound he had received from Jack Sheppard's pistol, and the bruises and shakes he had received when his father and the man fell down upon him and hurled him backwards.

So severe were the hurts he had thus sustained that he had been carried home in an insensible state, and now that he was laid in bed he found himself wholly deprived of the power to rise.

It was with difficulty that he moved any of his limbs.

As soon as he saw his father, a volley of curses came from his lips.

"D—n it!" he cried, "what did you want to fall upon me like that for?"

He thus threw the whole of the blame upon the thief-taker.

Jonathan himself, who had not escaped without several severe contusions and wounds, was in no very amiable mood, and a tempest of passion was at once raised between them.

In the end, Jonathan left the chamber more furious than when he had entered it.

The continual defeats which he had met with had produced a great effect upon his mind.

He found himself unable to attend to his ordinary duties, though numerous important affairs were pressing for immediate attention.

But Wild felt that he could do nothing until he had achieved his so frequently baffled purpose.

He had noticed that Blueskin and Jack were separated from Edgworth Bess, and he was in hopes that this would somehow turn out to his advantage.

Where she could be he could not imagine, but this he trusted his emissaries would ere long discover.

But even for this he could not wait in patience, but sallied forth himself.

He had nothing but his trouble for his pains.

Each day he returned home without having met with the least success.

Nor had his men been any more fortunate.

The precautions taken by Jack and Blueskin effectually baffled them.

Then as for Edgworth Bess, the reader will please to understand that during this period she was an inmate of Mother Robotham's house, and extended helplessly on a sick bed.

It is not to be wondered at, therefore, if he failed to find her.

As day after day passed, Jonathan's uneasiness and anger rapidly increased, and at length, to such an extent did his rage carry him that not one of his men dared approach him.

His son George did not mend very rapidly, and it required nearly the whole of Mr. Snocall's time to wait upon him.

There was some satisfaction in knowing that he was gradually getting better, and this was the only satisfaction Jonathan Wild was able to obtain.

A paltry one for him.

As time passed on without receiving any tidings, a dread took possession of his mind, which he in vain tried to banish.

It was, that the three fugitives had found some means of leaving the kingdom.

He knew this was almost an impossibility without the fact coming to his knowledge, for he had spies everywhere.

No tidings of this description had reached his ear, and yet he could not drive away the torturing thought that they had found some means of slipping off unperceived.

This drove him almost frantic, but nevertheless he did not remit any of his exertions, and urged his spies on by every means he could think of.

In this manner time passed on, until at length the time came when Edgworth Bess quitted the shroud-maker's with so much precipitation.

While hurrying through the streets in a manner so well calculated to attract the attention of the other passengers, she was seen by one of Wild's gang.

JACK SHEPPARD IS RELEASED FROM THE BOX IN THE VESTIBULE OF NEWGATE.

He recognised her, from the description which had been furnished him, and pursued her.

But, all unconscious that anyone was on her track, the poor girl flew onwards, and by sheer speed outdistanced the man, who, to his deep chagrin, lost sight of her.

Once off his view, he knew he had but small chance of seeing her again while she continued to maintain her present rate of speed, and therefore he did the wisest thing in the world, and that was, to set off to Newgate Street, and communicate what intelligence he possessed to the thief-taker, who, meagre and scanty as it was, would doubtless accept of it gladly, and set all his resources at work.

Such a clue as the girl having been seen in one particular neighbourhood would be one that he would have very little difficulty in following up, and ere long he would doubtless make some further discoveries.

The man hastened along with all the speed he was able to make, but ere he had performed one-fourth of the distance which intervened between Westminster and Newgate Street, he was startled by a sudden command to stop, No. 70 which was uttered by a voice familiar in the extreme to him.

He obeyed instantly and instinctively.

The voice which had pronounced the word "Halt!" was the voice of Jonathan Wild.

Restless and uneasy, he was once again roaming the streets, in the hope of picking up some information.

It was while thus engaged, and allowing nothing that took place around him to escape his notice, that he perceived this member of his band hurrying towards Newgate Street at a speed which seemed to indicate that he was the bearer of unusually important tidings.

It was in consequence of this that he called out to the man to stop.

At the same time he made his way towards him.

"Where are you going?" he asked, with undisguised anxiety and impatience. "Tell me at once what has happened!"

The man opened and shut his mouth, and gasped convulsively, but he was breathless, and no articulate sound came from his lips, though he struggled hard to speak.

Jonathan, however, saw nothing of all this, and, in a more peremptory manner than before, called upon him to state what had happened.

At length the man managed to gasp out his information.

But when the thief-taker heard that he had lost sight of her after having once commenced the pursuit, he burst out into a furious rage.

He had ascertained, however, whereabouts she had vanished from his view, and leaving the discomfited janizary to recover his wind in the best manner he was able, he set off towards the place.

Upon arriving here, he commenced his inquiries, and almost the first thing he learned was that a girl had committed suicide a short time before by jumping into the river.

Though this was an act which he scarcely thought Edgworth Bess would perform, yet when he thought of the strange manner in which his man had described seeing her fly through the streets, he could not help thinking there was a disagreeable probability of it.

At any rate, he determined to learn whether the body of the girl had been recovered, and if so, to have a look at her in order to confirm or disperse his doubts.

With this intention he made his way towards the river-bank, but taking care to prosecute his inquiries on his way.

He elicited scarcely anything of importance, however.

Upon reaching the water, he looked about him for any signs of commotion.

Ere long he perceived a group of people at a short distance.

He made his way towards them without delay, and imperceptibly mingled in the throng.

Here he stood listening.

As he had hoped and anticipated, the subject of the conversation was the suicide of the young girl.

One man was relating to the rest the particulars of what had occurred.

It was the watchman who had been aroused by Edgworth Bess springing on to the boat.

Having deposited her in safety in the inn, he had refreshed himself with a stimulant, and returned to the boat, which having been left in his charge, he was responsible for the safety of all that it contained, so he did not dare leave it for any length of time.

Before Jonathan had stood among the group a moment, he heard that the body of the young girl had been taken to the Prince of Wales inn.

Upon receipt of this information, the thief-taker turned away.

Nothing more would be said that would interest him.

As he strode slowly away, he repeated over and over a great many times the name of the public-house.

At length he recollected it, and ere long his extraordinary memory furnished him with numerous particulars about the tenants of it.

The information he possessed would, he felt certain, enable him to exercise a certain power over them, should circumstances so fall out as to make it necessary for him to do so; and now with a more rapid step he directed his way to the public-house.

We have described how he entered it.

We have alluded, too, to the consternation exhibited by the landlady.

And now, having accounted for the presence of Jonathan Wild, which otherwise would have appeared not a little mysterious and remarkable, we will resume.

The alarm of the landlady, when she saw who it was stood at the bar, was great and unfeigned, and the thief-taker, as he perceived the impression and alteration which his recognition had produced, grinned hideously, and made another of his ironical bows.

"Don't faint, Mrs. Pickman, I beg!" he said. "Now pray don't! I am on the wrong side of the bar—I could not save you if you were to fall, indeed I couldn't!"

Mrs. Pickman, for such appeared to be the name of the landlady of the Prince of Wales, clutched the knob of a drawer to save herself from falling.

"Oh, Mr. Wild!" she said, "you have given me a turn, and no mistake! Oh, lawk, sir, I didn't know it was you! Excuse my being in such a flusteration; I cannot help it!"

"All right, Mrs. Pickman," he replied, with a frightful leer; "you have no occasion to be afraid!"

"Thank you, Mr. Wild! Do pray walk in! This way, if you please, my dear sir! I have not much to offer you in the shape of accommodation, for, as you see, it's rather a orkard time in the day!"

"Stop your gab!" said Wild, rudely cutting short her apologies. "Stop your gab! I've got something I want to talk about!"

"I know, Mr. Wild, but I am in such a flusteration now that I don't know what I am about!"

"Keep still, and listen to me! Shut the door!"

As he spoke, Jonathan Wild seated himself astride a chair, and leaning his arms on the back, rested his chin upon them.

In this attitude he prepared to commence his speech.

Mrs. Pickman had in the meantime closed the door.

But it was perfectly easy for anyone to see that she was in a terrible state of mental agitation, which the assurance to which Jonathan had given utterance very little abated.

Still, she had some of her wits about her, and, turning round immediately after having closed the door, she said:

"Before you begins to talk, Mr. Wild, be good enough to tell me what you would like to have to drink!"

"Bah! Nothing! Hold your jaw, I tell you! Why don't you listen to what I want to say?"

"I am a-listening, Mr. Wild, if you please! What do you want?"

"For you to be silent—I will do the talking!"

"Very good, sir; I'll be as dumb as a door-mat!"

"I suppose, then, Mrs. Pickman," said Jonathan Wild, suddenly changing the tone of his voice—"I suppose that you are well aware that I could hang you at Tyburn any day I liked?"

CHAPTER CXXIX.

JONATHAN WILD RECOGNISES EDGWORTH BESS, AND COMES TO A PERFECT UNDERSTANDING WITH MRS. PICKMAN.

"The Lord be good to us!" said Mrs. Pickman, staggering back until she came to a chair, into which she sank with such force as to make all the glasses on the shelves in the bar jingle in such a manner that one would have thought they must have fallen off—"the Lord be good to us!"

"Amen!" said Jonathan Wild, with a hypocritical whine; "I hope he will."

"Oh, Mr. Wild, you have given me two such turns!"

"Shut up! I s'pose you know I can scrag you any day I like?"

"Oh yes, Mr. Wild!"

"Oh you admit my power, then?"

"You are a wonderful man, Mr. Wild," replied the landlady, "and I could not think of setting myself up in opposition to you."

"Very good," said the thief-taker—"very good! I have then really found a sensible woman. If you will just do what I require, you need not feel alarmed about my getting you into trouble."

"Oh, my dear Mr. Wild, you are the nicest man! Now, what can I get you to drink?"

"Since you are so kind," replied the thief-taker, "I don't mind if I do have something."

"Only say what you'll have, my dear sir, and you shall have it—that is, if I have got it in the house."

"Oh, thank you!" said Jonathan, with another hideous leer. "Have you got any brandy?"

"Oh yes, Mr. Wild, and some of the very best quality."

"Then bring me half a pint in a basin, and stir it up with a red-hot poker."

The landlady looked rather surprised at this order.

Nevertheless, she got up and drew the brandy, and then went out of the room for a basin and a red-hot poker.

During her absence, Jonathan rested his head on his arms, and gave himself up to deep and earnest thought.

He was arranging in his mind what he should do.

He was disturbed in his ruminations by the entrance of Mrs. Pickman, who had literally obeyed his orders, and carried in one hand an empty basin, and in the other a red-hot poker which she had just taken from the fire.

Very gravely, then, Wild poured the brandy out of the little pewter measure into the basin, and stirred it vigorously with the red-hot poker.

He then offered the truly fiery beverage to Mrs. Pickman, who, however, declined to partake of any of it.

Wild then quaffed it himself, and having returned the poker to the landlady, desired her once more to seat herself and listen to what he had to say.

"You think it will answer your purpose best, then, to keep in with me?" he said.

Mrs. Pickman nodded.

"So do I," replied Jonathan; "and, as I said a little while ago, if you will give me the information I require, you will have nothing to fear from me."

"What is it you want to know?"

"A girl has been brought here—"

"Yes, there has," interrupted Mrs. Pickman. "I think it's a shame my house should be a home for such hussies!"

"Home?" said Jonathan. "She is not dead, then?"

"Dead? Oh dear no, nothing of the sort!"

"Good!" said the thief-taker, gleefully rubbing his hands together. "Describe her to me—tell me what she looked like!"

Mrs. Pickman did so.

From the words she uttered, Jonathan became immediately convinced that he was on the right scent, and that the young girl brought in was really Edgworth Bess, though what could have occurred to prompt her to commit suicide he was quite at a loss to think.

He had other matters to attend to, however, and he reserved a consideration upon this point until another opportunity.

Eagerly Jonathan put the next question.

"Where is she now?" he said. "What has become of her?"

Mrs. Pickman, who, with a woman's penetration, saw in a moment that Jonathan was interested in this girl's fate, and that his presence there on that occasion was solely owing to her, replied at once:

"The doctor came to see her. She has recovered, and now she is upstairs in bed."

"Indeed! Can it really be so?"

Wild chuckled, and his eyes grew bright as he spoke.

After so many defeats and his late want of success, he could scarcely bring himself to believe in the reality of such good fortune.

"Oh yes, she's upstairs safe enough, never fear!"

"You must let me see her."

"You, Mr. Wild?"

"Yes, me!"

"But she is asleep!"

"So much the better; I would not have her see me for worlds. If she is asleep, take me up to her. One glance will convince me whether it is the girl of whom I am in search."

"I can't refuse you anything, Mr. Wild. Please to follow me."

Jonathan needed no second bidding.

On tiptoe he followed Mrs. Pickman up the stairs.

At length the landlady paused before the door of a bedroom.

"Wait a moment," she said, in a whisper. "Wait here, and I will go in and see whether she really sleeps."

"Do so—do so!" said Wild, as he stood aside and allowed her to pass him.

On tiptoe the landlady entered the bedchamber.

Just sufficient of the dim light of early day struggled in through the window to enable her to distinguish the various familiar objects in the room.

It was a rude bed upon which poor Edgworth Bess had been laid, and was by no means the best in the house.

There were no curtains to shield it from draught.

The four bare posts looked cheerless and poverty-stricken.

Cautiously Mrs. Pickman approached the bed.

The first glance that she cast upon it showed her that Edgworth Bess was still sleeping.

Turning round, she was about to retrace her steps to the door, when she saw that Jonathan had projected his hideous head into the apartment, and was looking earnestly towards her.

She beckoned for him to approach, and at the same time placed her finger on her lips to enjoin silence.

Jonathan's boots creaked ominously as he crept across the uncarpeted floor, but the noise made was not enough to have aroused the lightest sleeper.

In one more moment Jonathan gained the bedside.

The very first glance confirmed those hopes which he had been almost afraid to entertain.

It was indeed the poor heiress whom he so much desired to have in his own keeping who lay slumbering before him on the wretched bed.

He could not conceal his exultation and satisfaction from the piercing gaze of the landlady, who resolved, if possible, to turn it to her own advantage.

The thief-taker chuckled, and, clasping his hands behind his back, gazed long and earnestly upon the pinched and pallid features.

He did not give utterance to a single word, but his thoughts were nevertheless busy.

He could see directly that the state of Edgworth Bess was by far too critical to make it possible to remove her without incurring very great danger of her life.

This it was to his interest to preserve.

To leave her, however, where she was, would be attended with a certain amount of danger.

He had lost her so many times when he thought he had her safe, that he could not feel secure now without she was immediately under his eye.

And this seemed impossible.

His only hope lay in the landlady, and from the fact of her being so deeply in his power as she was, he thought he should be able to bind her over to his interest.

These cogitations occupied his mind for some moments while he stood gazing upon the girl's countenance, which, as the light grew stronger, he could see with greater distinctness.

He was warned of the impropriety of lingering longer by a slight movement.

He drew aside.

Mrs. Pickman trod softly in his steps.

The stairs were descended and the bar reached without the exchange of a single word.

Upon arriving here, they mechanically assumed their old positions.

Then Wild spoke.

"I want that girl upstairs taken particular care of," he said.

"I know that," rejoined Mrs. Pickman, with a satisfied nod.

Wild frowned.

He did not want this woman to know too much.

"I hope you'll bear in mind that I have the power to bring you to Tyburn if I think proper. I wish to keep that idea prominently before your mind in order that it may have a proper influence upon any arrangements we may come to with each other."

Mrs. Pickman shuddered and turned rather pale at this allusion to Tyburn.

It was by no means pleasant to her, and she saw that in all probability the only reward she would have for seeing Wild would be the negative one of being allowed to remain undisturbed in her malpractices.

The large reward in the shape of money which she hoped to be able to extract from the thief-taker dwindled away.

Jonathan Wild was by far too sharp for the landlady.

"I don't suppose you like it," he continued; "but it is, nevertheless, necessary for you to bear it in mind. I say, then, that I want that girl taken care of. I would not trouble you if I could help it, but I can see she is not in a fit state to be removed. Do you understand that, Mrs. Pickman?"

"I quite understand you, Mr. Wild."

"Very well, then. Mind this—I shall hold you responsible for the safe keeping of that girl!"

The words were pronounced with peculiar and indescribable emphasis.

"Me, Mr. Wild?" said Mrs. Pickman.

"Yes, you!" continued Jonathan; "and if she escapes, in any way whatever, woe be to you, for the very next Monday after that event takes place you will swing at Tyburn! I always keep my word in such matters, and should think no more of having you scragged, than I should of smoking a pipe!"

Mrs. Pickman shuddered in spite of the effort she made to appear unmoved.

She fully believed what Wild said, and had no doubt that, in this instance at least, he would keep his word.

"That's it, Mrs. Pickman. When I come to fetch her, if I find she is not here, your life will most assuredly pay the forfeit, so I hope you will see the policy of looking sharp after her."

"Do—do you—think—that—that there is much fear of her getting away?"

"I don't know—I can only say she is a very slippery customer, and has got away even from me!"

A cold sweat burst out on the unhappy woman's face.

The thief-taker grinned derisively.

"So I would advise you to keep a sharp look-out after her, and don't let anybody go up into the room besides the doctor and yourself. As soon as ever she is well enough to be moved, you may depend upon my ridding you of the charge of her."

Mrs. Pickman sighed.

Most fervently did she wish that the poor girl was well enough to be removed at the present moment, for the prospect she had before her was anything but a pleasant one.

Her countenance afforded Jonathan a tolerable idea as to the state of her mind, and now, imagining that he had frightened her sufficiently, he thought that the proper time had arrived to offer her some inducement.

"You are quite sure you understand me, Mrs. Pickman?"

"Oh, quite!"

"And I hope you see the policy of looking very close after the girl, and see that no one spirits her away?"

"Yes, yes!"

"Very well, then. I have got something further to say, which may not sound so disagreeable."

Mrs. Pickman looked at him expectantly, but did not speak.

"If you take care of the girl, and I find her when I come here to fetch her," said Jonathan, slowly and emphatically, "I shall make you a present of a fifty-pound note for your trouble."

"Oh, Mr. Wild, you are too good!"

"Not a bit of it! When I come for the girl, if I find her here all right, I shall give you fifty pounds down; but, upon the other hand, if I come here and find her gone, I will hang you at Tyburn as surely as I now sit here upon this chair! There now! It will be no good for you to fly, for I would hunt the world over but what I would find you and carry out my intention!"

Mrs. Pickman was visibly impressed by these words, but the prospect of earning a fifty-pound note placed her somewhat at her ease.

"You may depend upon my looking sharp after her," she said; "and if she has managed to escape on former occasions, I think she will find the difficulty of getting the better of me!"

Jonathan was well enough pleased with this speech, and the resolute manner in which it was uttered.

"The fifty pounds," he said, "I intend to be clear reward. Look—here are ten guineas!"

Jonathan counted out the coin from his pocket as he spoke.

"These are for expenses," he continued, pushing them across the table towards her. "You will see that she has the best medical advice, and every attention paid to her. The sooner she gets well enough to be moved, the sooner you will have a serious responsibility off your hands, the sooner you will receive your fifty pounds, and the better I shall be pleased."

"Yes, Mr. Wild!"

"Above all, be careful and don't let anyone know a word about my having been here—above all, don't whisper it to the girl, for as sure as you do she will be off, and you will never be able to stop her! You can give the doctor what reason you like for your desire to have every attention paid to her, and ascertain from him when she will be ready to be moved. When he tells you, communicate with me, and I will have her off pretty quick!"

To all this Mrs. Pickman consented, and after a few more words Jonathan Wild left the inn.

The landlady could not repress the utterance of a sigh of relief when she saw him take his departure.

As, however, the reader will doubtless surmise, Jonathan Wild did not go far.

Indeed, he took care not to lose sight of the inn.

Then, standing still, he took a whistle, which he carried suspended from his neck by a chain, and blew three shrill blasts upon it.

The signal was responded to by three men—members of his gang—who quickly made their appearance.

In a low tone, he gave them instructions as to what they were to do.

As soon as he had finished speaking, these three men directed their steps towards the Prince of Wales inn.

Jonathan Wild watched them for some distance, and then, turning round, he walked slowly from the spot.

CHAPTER CCCXLVI.

BLUESKIN HAS A PERILOUS ADVENTURE WITH THE SENTINEL IN ST. JAMES'S PARK.

When the police officer who fired at Blueskin saw that the bullet had produced no effect, and that our old friend beat a precipitate retreat, he called out to some of his companions to follow him.

To have got through the trap-door by springing up and catching hold of the edge of it was a feat which they were doubtful about being able to perform; and besides which, it would take so long to reach the roof one after the other in this manner that Blueskin would get a hopelessly long start of them.

With a quickness of thought for which he deserved credit, one of the officers opened the door on the landing that was nearest to him, and entered the chamber into which it led.

Hastening towards the window, he seized a table.

Several toilette articles were upon it, but he remorselessly swept them on to the floor, and hastened back to the landing with his prize.

This table, then, he placed immediately under the trap-door, and was about to mount upon it, when another of the officers came forward with a chair.

This chair was placed on the table, and it then became a perfectly easy matter to reach the trap-door.

All this was done with a rapidity that was really bewildering.

Up they sprang, one after another, and got on to the roof.

Here, of course, the first thing they saw was the young girl.

A momentary delay took place, for they could not control their astonishment.

Nevertheless, they did not lose sight of the original object of their pursuit.

Leaving two of their number with the girl—who, in accordance with the commands of their superior officer, they took prisoner—the remainder scrambled over the roof as fast as they could, in the hope ere long of finding something that would put them on the track of the fugitive.

The night, however, was unfavourable in the extreme for them.

The snow and sleet came down uncomfortably compounded, making the tiles so slippery that it was with the utmost difficulty they retained their footing.

The open trap-door over the empty house attracted their attention.

They gave one glance around them, and not being able to see a trace of a human being, they not unnaturally came to the conclusion that he had made his way in this direction.

Acting upon this supposition, they one after another jumped down on to the landing, and this was the lumbering sound which had reached Blueskin's ears after turning away from the window in the front room.

He would now have to be speedy in all his movements if he wished to escape capture, for, from the manner they had already behaved, he could tell the officers were desperately in earnest.

Despite, then, the pain which his sprained ankle occasioned him, Blueskin hastily descended the remaining flight of stairs.

In the passage below he was compelled to pause.

Wistfully he looked towards the front door, through which he would fain have made his way.

But that was impossible.

His sole hope lay in being able to find some mode of getting out at the back.

Unfortunately, however, he had no idea what kind of house it was, nor the plan upon which it had been built.

All he could do was to trust to his luck, with the hope that it would befriend him, as it had done on former occasions.

Almost at random, then, it may be said, he opened a door and passed through it.

He imagined it led into a room, but whether it did so or not he could not tell, for the most utter darkness surrounded him.

His first care, after having passed through this door, was to close it, and then feel for the fastenings.

There was a lock, but no key, so this was useless.

At the top and bottom of the door, however, was a bolt, and he immediately shot them into their sockets.

This would be a barrier to the approach of his foes, even if a slight one.

For a moment he was safe, and so he lighted a match, of which he had plenty in his possession.

The tiny flame which this gave forth enabled him to see that, as he had suspected, he was standing in a room.

It was entirely destitute of furniture.

Straight before him was the window, the shutters of which were closed. He advanced towards it immediately, but before he could reach it the match expired.

He did not delay to ignite another, but walked on in the dark with his hands extended before him.

He soon came in contact with the window, and, guided by his sense of touch alone, found the fastening by which it was secured, and undid it.

Quickly raising it in the sash, he felt for the fastenings of the shutters.

These consisted merely of two bolts, which he drew back readily enough, although they were literally rusted in their sockets.

The shutters were composed of two perpendicular leaves.

One of these he swung back, and then hastily got through the window.

As he did so, he could hear his enemies approaching.

In order to leave as little trace as he could of the route he had taken, he paused to close the window, and the shutters also, though of course, as he stood outside, he could fasten neither.

This done, he looked about him, and found himself in a rather large garden, which was thickly overgrown with vegetation.

Across this he made his way at full speed until he came to some palisades, which effectually prevented his further progress.

Here he paused, and looked back.

The trampling of feet struck upon his ears, and showed him that his foes had already tracked him to the garden, and were by no means disposed to give up the pursuit.

What was on the other side of the palisades it was now his business to discover.

At first he was baffled, but his joy may be imagined when he found that he was looking into St. James's Park.

Could he but gain this vast enclosure, he felt that he should have a better chance of making his escape than he had yet possessed.

The difficulty was to climb over the palings, which were a great height.

The crashing of the bushes warned him that the officers were very close behind, and this nerved him to make a desperate effort.

Jumping up, he caught hold of the branch of a tree, and using this as a means of raising himself, contrived to get to the top of the palings.

Once having accomplished this, the rest was easy.

Standing on them, he released his hold of the branch of the tree and jumped down, although the depth was considerable.

Just as he sprang into the air, a shot was fired.

One of the officers had seen him, but owing to Blueskin having changed his position so quickly, his aim was destroyed.

Our old friend reached the ground unhurt, but found that his troubles were by no means over.

Scarcely had his feet touched the ground, and before the report of the pistol had fairly died away, before he was startled by the dull tramp, tramp of many footsteps.

They were approaching him, and from the regular time that was kept he could tell they were soldiers on the march.

More he did not wait to hear, but sped across the spacious piece of ground near the Horse Guards with the blind haste of a hunted hare, intent only upon reaching the enclosure.

Suddenly he saw a man plant himself directly in his path.

It was a sentinel, who, alarmed in his monotonous walk, first by the pistol-shot and then the other noise which had succeeded it, placed himself directly in the way of the fugitive, thinking by this means to stop him.

Blueskia came on like a hurricane.

He saw the man place himself before him.

He saw him hold his musket horizontally before him.

But Blueskin could not stop himself, nor did he see the man until it was too late for him to turn aside.

A collision was inevitable.

It was a violent one.

In vain the sentinel strove to keep his feet.

He was dashed to the ground in an instant, and Blueskin tore over his body with scarcely diminished speed.

The soldiers he had heard approaching were those who were going the round, as it is called, to relieve the sentinels on duty.

The officer in command of them, perceiving that something of an unusual character was taking place, cried out "Halt!"

At this moment the police officers made their way into the park, and acquainted him with the particulars.

The officer then immediately ordered three blasts to be blown upon a bugle.

This signal he knew would be understood by the sentinels on guard at the different entrances and exits of the park.

Its meaning was, that they were to allow no person to pass out, but to take prisoner any person who attempted to do so.

The clear, shrill notes of the bugle rang out with beautiful effect in the silent park, and were clearly heard by all the sentinels, who immediately closed the gates and placed their backs against them.

Blueskin heard the sounds, and wondered greatly what they signified.

He was, however, unable to come to any conclusion further than that it was a signal of some sort.

It was not without difficulty that he escaped the clutch of the sentinel; but he did so, and directly afterwards reached the palings skirting the enclosure.

These were of no great height, and he vaulted over them easily.

He paused here for breath.

He could see nothing of his foes, though he strained his eyes to the utmost in endeavouring to do so.

To have lingered, however, would have been dangerous in the extreme, so he struck straight across the enclosure until he came to the water.

This he was obliged to skirt.

His idea was to throw his pursuers off his track if possible, and make his exit at one of the gates which happened to be at the greatest distance from Spring Gardens.

He little thought that all the sentinels were watching eagerly for him to make his appearance.

On he ran, then, somewhat comforted to find that the officers were not at his heels.

After some deliberation, Blueskin resolved to make his way out by Buckingham Gate.

Towards this he went in a straight line.

As he neared it, he slackened his pace.

It would be necessary to approach with caution, and in such a manner as would not excite suspicion.

He walked forward slowly and steadily.

He saw the soldier leaning against the gate; but, never dreaming for a moment that he would bar his progress, Blueskin steadily advanced towards the gate.

The soldier did not move.

Blueskin thought this strange, but, nevertheless, kept straight on.

No sooner, however, was he within a yard or so of the gate, than the soldier suddenly started forward and seized him.

"You can't pass here!" he said. "You are my prisoner!"

Our old friend now comprehended the full extent of his danger, and knew if he did not succeed in mastering this sentinel that the remainder of his enemies would be upon him, and then escape would be quite out of the question.

A desperate struggle ensued.

Finding himself seized, Blueskin strove his utmost to disengage himself from the soldier's grasp.

This, however, he found to be a by no means easy task, and in the encounter the sentinel's musket exploded.

The report was tremendous.

Blueskin uttered a curse at the occurrence of this unlucky incident, for he knew it would have the effect of informing the remainder of his enemies just where he was.

He renewed his efforts to get free; and, to his unbounded surprise, found the sentinel's hold gradually relax, and when Blueskin loosed him he fell heavily to the ground.

Our friend now understood what had taken place, and the event which at first seemed so inimical to him turned in his favour.

When the musket exploded, the charge had entered the sentinel's breast.

He had held on bravely to the last; but his strength failed him, and he fell backwards, either insensible or dead.

Which of the two it was, Blueskin knew not, and scarcely cared.

Stepping over the prostrate body of his foe, he reached the gate, and opened it wide enough to allow him to squeeze through.

When he stood on the outside, he felt in safety.

Looking through the palings, he could both see and hear his pursuers rapidly approaching.

More he did not wait for.

Now was his time to get fairly off.

At full speed, then, he turned to the left, and quickly gained the precincts of Westminster.

He so wound and doubled upon his course, that he felt confident his foes would not be able to track him, and then paused.

The night was about as uncomfortable now as well could be, and scarcely anyone was abroad.

For some time Blueskin had listened, but no sounds or signs of his late pursuers came upon his ears.

That he was terribly exhausted by all that he had gone through and the exertions he had made, the reader will readily believe.

He felt that to go further without rest or refreshment would be impossible, so he looked about him for some place where he could procure both these necessities.

But the streets were universally dark.

All the houses were closed, and Westminster streets at that time were only lighted by such dim rays as came through the windows of the various dwellings.

Slowly he staggered on, until in the distance he saw a faint glimmer, and towards that he directed his steps.

Upon reaching the place from which it proceeded, he found, as he had anticipated, that it was a small public-house.

He entered without hesitation, for both the house and the landlord were known to him, and he was aware that he could trust the latter.

He entered, sat down, and called for refreshment.

He was served, without being made the object of attention; and his first keen feeling of fatigue and exhaustion over, Blueskin buried his face in his hands, and, supporting his elbows upon the table, endeavoured to come to a decision as to his future course of action.

CHAPTER CXXIV

RELATES THE NOVEL EXPEDIENT WHICH THE BOW STREET RUNNERS ADOPTED TO CONVEY JACK SHEPPARD IN SAFETY TO NEWGATE.

HAVING seen Blueskin so far safely through the dangers with which he was threatened, we will return to his less fortunate companion.

So sudden was the attack which was made upon him, as we have related, that he really had no chance.

He was overwhelmed with numbers; and though he struggled gallantly to the last, yet he gained nothing by it.

His wrists were secured by handcuffs, and his captors kept a tight grasp upon him.

The members of the police force had some rather extraordinary ideas with regard to Jack Sheppard's powers.

Had he melted into air, or disappeared in any such extraordinary manner, they would scarcely have felt surprised.

On so many previous occasions he had proved himself such a slippery character that they were quite prepared for anything.

For the most part, they could scarcely bring themselves to believe that they had at last got the daring offender in their custody.

The chief officer, however, had the good sense to send off to Bow Street for a reinforcement.

In the meantime, various plans were talked over for keeping their prisoner in safety.

Not one, however, was deemed satisfactory, and the debate continued until the reinforcement arrived.

It was deemed fitting to carry him direct to Newgate, and not to risk confining so adept a prison-breaker in one of the prisons, or houses of detention, as they are called.

They had no warrant to take him to Newgate, and there was some little informality in the proceeding; but this they imagined would be overlooked, especially when the fact of his having been sentenced to death was taken into consideration.

At any rate, whatever blame they might incur by so doing, they resolved to take him to Newgate; and here a fresh difficulty presented itself.

How was he to be conveyed thither?

No ordinary mode of transit would suit so extraordinary a character, and some special means must be devised.

They had the dread about their hearts that, somehow or other, he would elude them, and therefore they puzzled their brains to find some means which would render this impossible.

While this was going on, Jack Sheppard was surrounded by about a dozen police officers, everyone of whom had hold of him somewhere, and their number was sufficiently great to completely surround him.

His chances of escape were now few indeed, but his captors were very far from feeling either satisfied or safe.

But the question how he was to be taken from Spring Gardens to Newgate remained unsolved.

One mode that had been proposed and received with a tolerable amount of favour was, that Jack should be securely bound hand and foot in such a manner as not to be able to make the slightest movement.

In this helpless state he was to be placed in a hackney-coach, and as many police officers as the vehicle would hold were to get in after him, and some more on the box along with the driver and on the roof of the coach.

But this proposition was rejected as not being sufficiently secure.

They were afraid that at the last moment he would slip through their fingers.

At length it was agreed upon, as an amendment to the last proposition, that a strong box should be found of a size large enough to hold the prisoner.

In the bound and helpless state already described, he was to be placed into it, and then the lid of the box having been firmly fastened down, he was to be carried into the vestibule of Newgate, when the lid could be removed, and the prisoner lifted out.

This proposal was received with universal acclamation.

The only difficulty was the obtainment of a box.

This, however, could doubtless be got over, and those police officers who were not occupied in holding Jack dispersed themselves over the house in search of the article they required.

On the very floor upon which these events took place, and in a room close at hand, they found a large chest.

It was filled with linen, but they bundled this out very quickly and remorselessly.

Then they dragged the box out on to the landing.

The other officers hailed its appearance with a shout of satisfaction.

That they were all very much elated with the prize they had made the reader may feel sure, and not even the presence of their superior officer could repress it.

Jack looked at the large, lumbering-looking box with dismayful eyes.

He could not see how he was to escape from that.

The officers looked upon it, however, with very different feelings.

The lid was thrown back, and a glance at the interior showed that it was capable of containing a much larger person than Jack Sheppard.

Attention was now given to the task of pinioning him with rope, a great quantity of which had just been brought by an officer who had been despatched to fetch it.

Jack was now bound over and over again, until, to look at him, he presented the appearance of a huge mass of knotted rope.

Fancying him sufficiently secure so far, they now lifted him as they would have lifted a corpse or any other mass of inanimate matter, and laid him on his back at the bottom of the box.

The lid was then shut down.

A key was sticking in the lock of the box, and this was at once turned by the chief officer, who placed the key in his pocket.

This was not, however, considered a sufficiently secure fastening for the box.

It was corded over in every direction with the remainder of the rope, every inch of which they used for this purpose.

The hearts of the police officers grew light.

When they looked upon the strongly-corded box they were at ease.

Clever as they believed Jack Sheppard to be, they did not for a moment think, with all his cleverness, he would be able to make his escape.

A muffled noise came from the interior of the box.

The prisoner was endeavouring to make himself heard.

Doubtless, although the sound came so faintly to their ears, he was shouting at the very top of his lungs.

One of the officers put his ear close to the lid of the box.

Jack's voice then became more audible and distinct.

"Air—air!" he cried. "Give me air, or I shall be suffocated!"

The officer looked up.

"What does he say?" asked the other officers.

"Why, he says he wants air," was the reply.

"Air—air?"

"Yes," said the chief police officer, who luckily happened to have a little more sense than his companions. "We must bore some holes in the box to let air in, or else the poor devil will be suffocated before we can get him to Newgate."

This intimation was received with dissatisfaction.

They feared that if the smallest hole was bored in the box, it would enable the prisoner to escape.

They looked, therefore, with the greatest distrust upon their chief when he said:

"Go and fetch a red-hot poker, somebody. We must make one or two holes, or he will be dead before we get there."

With very bad grace, one of the officers made his way down to one of the rooms where a fire was burning, where he could obtain a red-hot poker.

We may as well say here that the remainder of the force had searched the house, and made prisoners of Mother Robotham and the rest of their gang.

The police officer did not, of course, find a poker red-hot and ready to his hand.

He had to thrust one into the fire, and wait while it heated.

As the fire was a good one, it did not take very long, and so, with the instrument white hot, he made his way back to the landing at the top of the house, from which the box had not yet been moved.

Jack Sheppard continued his vociferations for air, and in some way or other managed to drum with his feet, either against the bottom or end of the box.

The chief police officer took the red-hot poker from his subordinate, and burned three holes with it in the top.

Jack Sheppard was really grateful for the fresh air that came in through these holes.

The chest was nearly air-tight, and had not his demand for air been attended to, he would certainly have been defunct by the time they got to Newgate.

However, after one or two inhalations of the fresh air he felt all right, and in order to show his captors that he was by no means dismayed or cast down by the triumph they had achieved over him, he cried out:

"Thank you, old fellow, I'm all right now, and Jack Sheppard is not the one to forget a kindness!"

The first impulse of the officers was to laugh at the very comical idea of their powerless prisoner doing them a kindness.

But, upon second thoughts, they became suddenly silent, and looked with fresh suspicion and distrust at the holes which their superior had bored.

They fancied Jack had some deep motive for making his request, and the words he had just spoken, as well as the tone of voice in which they were uttered, confirmed them in this idea.

They resolved to keep an extra sharp look-out, for if Jack Sheppard did escape, they made up their minds it should be through no want of vigilance upon their part.

They were aroused from these reflections by the voice of the chief officer, who commanded them to carry the box downstairs.

As each end was furnished with a strong and convenient iron handle, they found this task comparatively easy.

But the most amusing part of the business was to see the amount of solicitude with which each officer regarded the chest.

The two who had hold of the handles were looked upon with envy by the rest, who, however, comforted themselves with the prospect of a change in the bearers taking place.

Had their wishes been consulted, each one would have desired to have hold of the chest somewhere or other, for under no other circumstances could they feel that the prisoner was safe.

In this manner, then, and without the occurrence of any accident or incident, the chest was carried downstairs into the entrance-hall of the house, where, for a moment or two, it was deposited.

The chief police officer was not a whit less anxious for the security of Jack Sheppard than his inferiors, so he determined—although the distance to Newgate was considerable—that he would not trust to a hackney-coach, but have the chest carried to its destination, the officers under his orders to take in turns the task of carrying it.

When he made known this determination to his men, it was received by them with evident pleasure.

Of the two, they would much rather not have trusted to a hackney-coach.

They preferred the honour of carrying the chest to Newgate.

These instructions having been given, and as there was no need for any additional delay, the box was raised by two of the officers, and the remainder falling into a kind of procession in the rear, awaited their turn to carry the chest.

As they emerged from the house in Spring Gardens into the street, it looked like some strange and grotesque funeral train.

There were sufficient officers among those who had arrived as a reinforcement to take charge of the house, and to convey the prisoners to the lock-up, and those were the duties that were delegated to them.

As for those who had gone off in search of Blueskin, they had not yet returned.

We happen to know that they had rather a long chase after the object of their pursuit.

Leaving all these, however, we will direct the whole of our attention to the officers who carried the box in which Jack Sheppard lay in such a critical condition.

The weather, then, on that night—which, from its eventful character, we have so frequently had occasion to describe—had by no means improved.

The snow and sleet still came down, but it was now accompanied with a driving wind from the north-east, which much augmented its disagreeable character.

It blew steadily in the face of the officers nearly all the way to Newgate.

The sharp, icy particles with which it was laden seemed to strike their faces like so many needles.

But the exultant state of their minds made them comparatively heedless of the inclemency and disagreeableness of the weather.

On they trudged steadily enough, pausing every now and then to change bearers; for, though Jack himself was not heavy, the chest in which he was confined was, and the officers found it a great task upon their muscles to carry their burden far.

Accordingly, the chest was frequently put down and taken up again, to the great personal discomfort of the prisoner, who was rolled about from side to side with very little consideration.

For the information of those unacquainted with London, it may be as well to state that the distance from the house in Spring Gardens, where Jack Sheppard was captured, to Newgate, is somewhere about two miles.

Owing to the slow rate at which they were compelled to walk, the journey consumed a considerable quantity of time.

Still the officers were satisfied.

At every step they took, the confidence they felt in having their prisoner secure increased.

Scarcely for a moment had one of them removed his eyes from the precious chest which contained so great a treasure.

They were reconciled to their labour, to the hail and snow and sleet—in fact, they were oblivious of all but one object, and that was to get Jack Sheppard safely within the doors of Newgate.

They calculated, and very plausibly too, that when once the box was safely inside Newgate, the lid could be raised, and the prisoner taken out without his having the slightest chance afforded him of making his escape.

Indeed, they told themselves that, before the lid of the box was raised, such precautions could be taken as to make it quite impossible.

We shall see how they got on after being so far successful.

For a moment, however, let us bestow a glance upon Jack Sheppard in his most uncomfortable abiding-place.

His demand for air was most certainly necessary; and had not the holes been bored in the lid of the box in the manner we have described, he would inevitably have been suffocated.

When the relief came, he was only just able to draw his breath in sudden and fitful gasps; and he could feel that the veins in his head were swelling and threatening to burst.

Almost the first mouthful of fresh air that he obtained, however, had the effect of alleviating these symptoms.

But he found his situation the most uncomfortable one that he had ever been placed in.

Bound hand and foot as he was, in such a manner that he could not make the slightest movement without the greatest difficulty, and placed in this helpless state in a box that was four times larger than it need have been for such a purpose, it is easy to conceive how unpleasant he found it when the chest was lumbered about anyhow, for the officers did not study his personal comfort in the least.

Going downstairs was the worst.

Jack suddenly felt one end of the chest raised much higher than the other, and bump went his head against the other end.

CHAPTER CXXLVIII.

THE POLICE OFFICERS MEET WITH A SLIGHT SURPRISE ON OPENING THE LID OF THE CHEST.

THE force of the blow was sufficiently great partially to deprive Jack of his consciousness, and the remainder of the stairs were descended while his intellects were in too confused a state for him to have a very clear idea of what was taking place.

The bang with which the chest was placed down on the floor of the hall assisted to restore him to consciousness.

As the holes were in the lid of the chest, he was able to hear the consultation of the officers, and at first he listened with greedy attention.

Presently, however, becoming disgusted with their needless fears, he set his brain to work to devise some means of bettering his condition.

Desperate as his situation was, he had not abandoned all hope of making his escape, though he was well aware that the difficulties in the way of achieving his object were very great indeed.

But Jack was not of a disposition to magnify difficulties or to meet trouble half-way.

As he told himself, there was no harm in his trying to escape, even if he failed in doing so.

Accordingly, as a preliminary step, he set himself to work to find some means of disencumbering himself of the mass of rope with which he was covered.

Could he, like the Brothers Davenport, have called in the spirits to his aid in untying the knots, the said spirits would have been more useful than they have shown themselves to be as yet.

But Jack had no power of summoning spirits to do such material work.

Nevertheless, he was not without the knack of freeing himself from ropes tied about him, of which the gentlemen just alluded to have made so golden a harvest and so many fools.

Sensible minds cannot but have one feeling with regard to the effects produced by these exhibitions—or spiritual manifestations, as they are called.

That feeling is regret.

Regret that in the present day, so eminently the age of universal intelligence, people could be found with such imbecile minds as to place credence in so ridiculous and degrading a superstition.

But let the world be as wise as it will, there will always be fools.

It is a pity, perhaps; but so it always has been, and so it always will be.

We must ask the reader's pardon for digressing thus.

The similarity of the incident will probably be some excuse.

Jack then, we say, if he could not call in the spirits to aid him, as the Davenport Brothers pretend to do, yet was in possession, to a certain extent, of the old juggler's feat which they perform.

Accordingly, he set himself to work upon the ropes.

But he found his task one of extraordinary difficulty.

He could not make the least use of his hands or his feet.

But he was able to raise himself up into a curious kind of sitting posture, and by the aid of his teeth, which had been left at liberty, he set to work to gnaw through some of the cords by which his legs were bound together.

This was a task so tedious that probably no other person than Jack Sheppard would have attempted it.

But at length he got hold of a knot in his teeth, and with much more ease than he ever would have thought possible he untied it.

The same operation he performed upon another and another, and by the time the officers had finished their dispute, and picked up the chest to carry it into the street, he had freed himself of so many of the ropes as to be able to move with much greater ease and freedom than before.

Stimulated by the success with which his efforts had so far been crowned, he continued them with fresh vigour.

He was terribly at a loss for the use of his hands, and at first it seemed impossible for him to release them.

But having so far rid him of the ropes as to make the attempt to do this much easier than it had been, he tried and tried with a determination to succeed.

His wrists were secured by handcuffs, and his elbows were pinioned behind his back with rope.

His first effort was to remove the handcuffs.

As his hands were so small as almost to be styled diminutive, and so supple and flexible as to bend easily, he did not doubt that he should be able to achieve the feat which he had more than once before performed of slipping them off.

The only thing was that he was in an unfavourable and awkward position to make the attempt.

He tried.

The handcuffs were small, and fitted his wrists somewhat tightly.

Nevertheless, screwing his hand up into the smallest compass, he tried to draw it through the hard iron ring.

He tugged at it manfully, and bore the excruciating pain which every effort occasioned with the fortitude of a stoic.

His teeth were clenched, and his lips tightly compressed together.

But no sound—not even a murmur escaped him.

The skin was torn off the back of his hand in long strips.

He did not care, however, as long as he got his hand further and further through the handcuff.

At length it was free, and then, and not till then, did he almost give utterance to a cry.

It would have been one of triumph.

But he checked himself.

So long as one hand was released from the handcuff he cared not for the other.

JACK SHEPPARD IN THE STRONG ROOM OF NEWGATE.

He was content for the present that he should remain encumbered with it.

What he had next to do was to remove his arms from the cord by which they were secured.

This was hardest of all, for at first he could not attack it with his hands or his teeth.

By pressing his elbows together though, and writhing his body, he contrived to slip the rope lower and lower down his arms until at length he was freed from it altogether.

He was now quite released from all the bonds which his captors had placed upon him.

His whole body was at liberty, and if he did anything more towards his escape, he would have to make an attack upon the box.

It was just, however, as he had got rid of the noose that confined his arms behind his back, that the box was put down with a sudden crash which shook every bone in his body.

Of course Jack could not see where he was, and, therefore, he did not take so much notice of this as he would have done had he been able to look about him.

It was not the first time by a great many that the box had been set down in this unceremonious manner.

In fact, it happened whenever a change of bearers took place, and this was pretty often as they drew nearer to Newgate, for the men's arms were tired.

They had no consideration for the comfort of their prisoner.

Each time they halted, down went the box with a bang, and not as though there was anything capable of feeling inside of it.

We have said, then, that as soon as his limbs were at liberty, the box was set down in the violent manner described.

Then the next sound which struck upon Jack's ears was a tremendous knocking.

Then he came to a correct conclusion as to where he was.

He had been put down on the pavement outside the prison, and the knocking which he heard was a summons for admission upon the wicket of Newgate.

This was a discovery which made him almost mad, and he beat frantically against the sides of the chest in a vain effort to free himself.

The officers noticed this and laughed.

The apprehensions which had for so long held possession of their minds had for the most part vanished.

They had little doubt about being able to get their prisoner inside Newgate now that they had brought him so far.

The man on the lock must have been sound asleep for no notice whatever was taken of the officers' vigorous appeal, and they renewed it.

This time they met with a grumbling response, and a sleepy-looking jailer made his appearance at the wicket.

"Hullo!" he cried. "What is it? Is the blessed place afire?"

"No. But we have brought Jack Sheppard a prisoner."

The utterance of these few words produced a marvellous effect.

The man who seemed so sleepy became suddenly wide-awake.

There was the click of the well-oiled lock, and then the door of the prison grated open upon its hinges.

Once more, and for the last time, the officers stooped and took hold of the handles of the chest.

Two of them raised it, and it was not without some difficulty it was got up the narrow flight of stone steps and through the narrow door into the vestibule or lobby.

Upon the stone floor of this place the chest was again set down with a force sufficient to dislocate every bone in poor Jack's body.

A thousand echoes were raised in that dreary, vaulted place by the violence of the concussion.

The man on the lock looked with the utmost surprise upon the wooden chest, and it was not until he had reflected for some moments that he came to the conclusion that the famous Jack Sheppard must be within it.

Two more night-turnkeys, who had been sitting asleep in the little room adjoining the vestibule, aroused by the clatter and confusion of the new arrival now made their appearance.

As soon as he caught sight of them, the chief officer addressed them sternly.

"Go and call Mr. Noakes," he said. "Tell him we are here with a prisoner of the utmost importance."

"The gov'nor won't be very pleased at being disturbed, I can tell you," replied one of the turnkeys, grumblingly.

"Never mind that. You tell him that I am one of the chief officers from Bow Street, and have brought Jack Sheppard a prisoner to him, for whose body I want a receipt."

The effect produced upon the two turnkeys by this announcement was quite as great as that which it had produced upon the man on the lock.

"Ja—Jack Sheppard?" stammered one of them, at length.

"Yes, idiot!" cried the officer, in a rage.

"Ganmon!" said the turnkey, as he glanced knowingly around him. "Where is he?"

"In that box," replied the officer.

The turnkeys gave one glance towards it.

That satisfied them, and they made their way at once into the interior of the prison, taking the route to the governor's apartments.

Until Mr. Noakes arrived, the officers could do nothing but keep their eyes on the chest.

This they did, and not satisfied apparently with this, several seated themselves upon the lid.

And so the time anxiously passed, until the governor made his appearance.

He was not long in coming.

The intelligence the two turnkeys communicated to him was of a character well calculated to induce him to make the utmost expedition.

He hastily slipped on his clothing, and having done so, took down a blunderbuss that hung from two hooks over the mantelpiece in his bedroom.

Armed with this formidable weapon, which he always kept loaded and ready for use, Mr. Noakes descended the stairs with the turnkey who had brought the intelligence close at his heels.

On their way this man described the box in which Jack Sheppard was said to be, but, of course, he could give the governor of the prison no idea of how he had been put in it.

The governor had a personal feeling against Jack Sheppard.

He hated him with an intensity that knew no bound.

This is not to be wondered at.

Jack had, by his escapes, been the means of getting him into serious trouble with the authorities, and upon one occasion he nearly lost his situation.

In fact, had he not been backed up by people possessing great influence, he would infallibly have been discharged.

As it happened, he was allowed to remain in office; but this narrow escape engendered a feeling of the deepest hate in his bosom against Jack Sheppard, which would only be satisfied with his death.

That this daring offender was once more within the walls of Newgate was such a piece of good news that he dreaded to give credence to it, lest he should be disappointed.

With an anxiety which we leave the reader to depict, he made his way towards the vestibule.

When he made his appearance, a general movement took place among the officers.

They had for the most part clustered round the box containing their living treasure, but now they drew aside and disclosed it to view.

Upon seeing Mr. Noakes, the chief officer stepped forward.

"I have brought an important prisoner, Mr. Noakes," he said, "and one I should advise you to look sharp after, for fear he should slip through your fingers again."

The governor made a wry face.

Any allusion to Jack's escapes was excessively distasteful to him, and so, in a by no means pleasant tone of voice, he said:

"What prisoner have you brought, Mr. Officer?"

"No other than the notorious housebreaker, Jack Sheppard."

"Indeed! Where is he? I do not see him," said the governor, pretending ignorance of the contents of the chest.

"He is in that box, Mr. Noakes," said the chief officer, pointing to the object named.

"In that box? How came he there?"

"We captured him and bound him securely, but knowing what a slippery customer he was, we got that box and put him in it, and so have brought him safely to Newgate."

"A good plan," said the governor, with a grim smile. "If you have got him in that box, I will answer for it that don't get out of Newgate again."

"That's all right, then! He is in the box, never fear, so give me your receipt for having him in your custody."

"Fair and softly, good sir! Not so fast, if you please! I have not got him in custody yet. I must see whether he is in the box or not before I give a signature for him."

"Oh, that's all right enough!" said the officer. "You be prepared, and we'll have him out of the box pretty quick."

Mr. Noakes turned round, and directed his men to see that all the doors leading from the vestibule of the prison were properly closed and fastened.

This done, he next ordered them to furnish themselves with either blunderbusses or pistols.

There were plenty of these weapons in the lodge, and the turnkeys armed themselves with them.

The police officers drew their pistols, and cocked them.

All then stood round the box in an irregular circle, while the chief officer fumbled in his pocket for the key.

CHAPTER CCCXLIX.

JACK SHEPPARD IS CONIGNED TO THE STRONG ROOM IN NEWGATE, CALLED THE CASTLE.

UPON the countenances of all present an expression of great anxiety was depicted.

The chief officer having found the key, advanced with it rather nervously towards the box, and much of the confidence he had felt with respect to the security of his prisoner vanished.

He felt the necessity, however, of screwing his courage to the sticking place; and so, calling out to his men to be upon their guard, and requesting two others to approach and seize the prisoner as soon as the box was opened, he thrust the key into the lock and turned it round.

There was a sharp, clicking sound, and at the same moment the lid of the box was dashed violently open.

They were astounded.

Jack Sheppard, who they thought was so securely bound by cords, stood up in the box, with his limbs as free as their own.

Ere he could spring out and alight among his captors, as he fully intended to do, he was seized by the chief officer and his two subordinates.

Jack struggled desperately with them, but he could not shake off their grasp.

He was too overawed by the numerous firearms pointed at him.

It was impossible for him to escape all of them, and he gnashed his teeth together as he found that all his efforts had been in vain.

He had exhausted himself, and that was all.

This was indeed a most disheartening discovery to make, and he could not for a moment obtain the mastery over himself, so deeply was he disappointed.

Of this moment the police officers of course took every advantage, and several, laying aside their weapons, closed round him and held him secure.

Mr. Noakes had already taken the precaution to send to the smith to bring the fetters, and a tremendous clanking din in one of the corridors without now announced his approach.

He had got hold of the irons with one hand.

They were too heavy to carry, and so he dragged them along the stone floor of the passage after him.

It was the scraping of the iron over the stones that made such a clatter.

At a sign from Mr. Noakes a door was opened, and then the smith entered.

In addition to the irons, he carried with him a small portable anvil, and a hammer and rivets.

His face expanded into a grin when he saw Jack Sheppard, and without a moment's hesitation or delay he walked right up to the box.

"Aha, Mr. Sheppard! how do you do?" he said, in a taunting voice, and throwing his implements down as he spoke. "You don't look quite so fresh and well as you did the last time I performed this little service for you! Ah, well, you have given me a deal of trouble; but when you escaped last time I made up my mind that I would keep you secure if ever you passed through my hands again, and so I set to work to make a set of jewelry heavier and stronger than had ever been seen before. I thought I was never going to have an opportunity of using them; but here you are again, and here are the irons, and if you get out of them I will forfeit my head."

While running on in this style, the smith was busy in arranging his different articles, and began to place them upon Jack.

The fetters were really of enormous size and great weight, and no doubt they had been made expressly for Jack Sheppard.

The smith handled them affectionately, and clasped the rings round Jack's ankles, and riveted them there with an expression of satisfaction on his countenance that would, under other circumstances, have been highly amusing to witness.

Jack Sheppard had no chance of making any resistance, and he forbore to attempt it, for he knew how utterly useless it would be.

So he stood still enough there while the smith gabbled on, and while the fetters were secured to his person.

When this was finished, he found himself loaded with about two hundredweight of iron; but, for all that, the officers did not deem it safe to release their grasp, though Jack could not possibly have moved, except slowly and with great difficulty.

The chief officer, however, now ventured to renew his request to the governor for a receipt to the effect that he had delivered the prisoner, and this Mr. Noakes could no longer refuse to furnish.

He accordingly filled up and signed the printed form that was used on such occasions, and handed it to the officer, who he at the same time requested to remain until he had seen Jack properly disposed of in a cell.

To this no objection was made, and the governor called out to one of the turnkeys to get the key of the Castle.

The Castle was the name that was given to a strong room in Newgate which in former times, tradition said, was the place where many valuables were kept, though what valuables were likely to be in Newgate to require guarding we know not.

Neither do we know why it was called the Castle, without it was in reference to its strength.

The turnkey looked surprised at the governor's mandate, though he said nothing, but simply took down the keys as he had been bid.

The other turnkeys provided themselves with lanterns, and the whole party formed themselves into a procession, and proceeded in the direction of the Castle.

What kind of a place this was Jack Sheppard had no idea, for he had never heard of it before, and the strangeness of the name filled him with curiosity.

The distance from the vestibule of the prison to the strong room was not very great, but Jack found the excessive weight of his fetters made it painful in the extreme for him to walk.

The officers, the turnkeys, and the governor noted this with satisfaction, for it seemed to them an additional assurance that Jack would not this time be able to escape.

The smith rubbed his grimy hands together, and chuckled with satisfaction.

Headless, but not unconscious of all this, Jack kept on steadily, summoning all the strength he could, and disguising, as well as he was able, the effort it cost him to walk.

At length, to his relief, the door of the Castle was reached.

The whole party halted in the passage while the turnkey unlocked the ponderous door.

A long time had elapsed since that room had been last entered, and the wards of the lock had got rusted, so that the key acted upon them with difficulty.

By exerting his utmost strength, the turnkey succeeded in forcing back the bolt of the lock, and then a vigorous push sent the door open upon its hinges.

The lanterns which the turnkeys carried only insufficiently illuminated the place, but Jack took care to make all the use of his eyes that he possibly could.

He took in everything at one comprehensive glance, and dwelt upon those details which he thought would be of service to him.

He was not allowed so much time for this as he could have wished, for his captors turned him into the cell.

It was a gloomy-looking place, though somewhat large. But its smooth, damp walls had a disagreeable aspect.

There was one grated window, and through this there came the first faint rays of the approaching daylight, which, mingling with the light of the lanterns, gave the place an appearance of additional ghastliness.

Jack Sheppard was led to one portion of the wall where two staples were driven into the masonry.

From both of these depended an iron chain of massive links.

He was placed close to one, and the smith attached the chain to the iron band that was fastened round his waist.

Surely, now one would have thought he was helpless enough, but his foes were not satisfied.

They had noticed how he had contrived to get rid of the other pair of handcuffs, and another pair a size smaller was produced.

These were fastened round his wrists, in which they made, when clasped, deep and painful indentations.

The governor, and those who were with him, now at last thought he was secure, and having, one after another, examined his fetters, he was left to himself.

The heavy door was dragged shut.

The key was turned in the lock, the bolts shot into their sockets, and every means taken to make it fast.

With a feeling of satisfaction they all made their way to the vestibule again, where Mr. Noakes congratulated the officers, and they separated mutually pleased with each other.

Let us return to Jack in his lonely prison cell.

This was a sudden and unexpected reverse of fortune.

It had come upon him at a moment when he least expected such a catastrophe, and his brain was puzzled to know how it had been brought about, for Jack was not in possession of those facts with which we have made the reader acquainted respecting the presence of the police-officers at Mother Robotham's, in Spring Gardens.

This was a mystery to him, and was likely to remain so, for he had no means of obtaining any intelligence upon the subject.

When his captors left him, Jack did not attempt to move from his position.

He felt the need of a little reflection, and so he simply leaned his back against the wall and folded his arms across his breast.

In this attitude he gave himself up to thought.

There was much to distress, and nothing to comfort him, and he sighed heavily when he thought of his position.

There was nothing cheering either in the objects with which he was surrounded or in the future that lay before him.

For the first time in his life, Jack Sheppard felt a sensation akin to despair, or hopelessness.

The reader can account for it.

Throughout the many and strange incidents of his chequered career we have seen how he has borne light-heartedly, every reverse of fortune.

Jonathan Wild found him more than a match in consequence of his undauntedness and extraordinary energy.

Hitherto Jack had risen superior to every misfortune which had assailed him, and had set at defiance all that an adverse fate could accomplish.

Never before had he been so cast down as he was at this moment.

Never had he felt so unenergetic.

And why? Edgworth Bess was the cause.

While he had seen her the object of the thief-taker's persecution he had felt himself possessed of the vigour of a dozen men.

But the last intelligence he had heard respecting her was the cruellest shock of all.

Patiently and perseveringly he had traced her to Mother Robotham's infamous abode.

Up to this moment it was clear that she had not been allowed to act according to her own will, but had been compelled to succumb to that of others.

But what dreadful news concerning her had the young girl not communicated?

Edgworth Bess had been introduced to some young nobleman, and had voluntarily quitted the house in his company, and had not been seen or heard of since.

This was a thought that was maddening to Jack, and, strive as he would, he could not banish it from his mind.

What was he to think of such a circumstance?

Full well he recollected the circumstances under which he had parted with Edgworth Bess.

He knew she had fled from him in anger and disgust.

He had refused her requests—he had turned a deaf ear to all her entreaties.

For doing so, she left him, and he had never seen her since.

She had eluded his closest search, until by accident he learned that she was at Mother Robotham's.

He arrived here only to receive news a thousand times more distressing than any which had come to his ears.

Probably she no longer loved him, since he had shown her that he could refuse that which she so earnestly requested.

He ground his teeth, as he thought that this young nobleman had constituted himself her champion and defender, and had, as a preliminary step, rescued her from that house.

He pictured in his mind the poor heiress instated in her rights by means of this unknown nobleman, and then what would be more natural than for Edgworth Bess to bestow her affections upon him, as a recompense for what he had done.

With these and a thousand similar tortures did Jack rack his mind until he wrought himself up into a state of positive frenzy.

He felt, indeed, that he was rapidly going mad, and he dashed his head against the stone wall with all the fury of delirium.

Could but some one at that moment have whispered in his ears a full account of all that had taken place!

What a startling effect would that communication have produced!

No longer would he have given way to the impotency of madness and grief.

Once more would he have been endowed with that wonderful and resistless energy which surprised the whole world.

Impossible as the task may have seemed, he would have set about making his escape.

Little did he think that all those tortures he suffered so exquisitely were created by and existed solely in his imagination.

Such, however, was the case; and at that very moment Edgworth Bess was more securely in the power of the villainous thief-taker than she had ever been, for both Jack and Blueskin were in ignorance of her situation.

CHAPTER CCCL.

THE GOVERNOR OF NEWGATE RESOLVES TO LOOK SHARP AFTER HIS PRISONER, AND HAS AN EXTRAORDINARY INTERVIEW WITH JONATHAN WILD.

MR. NOAKES, the Governor of Newgate, after bidding adieu to the chief officer from Bow Street, stood for a moment on the flight of stone steps which lead from the door of the prison into the street.

There was a look of extreme satisfaction visible upon his countenance as he gazed after the retreating forms of the officers, and he chuckled oddly in his throat.

"I have him here once more!" he said, rubbing his hands one over the other with disagreeable briskness. "I have him once more; and I will take such precaution this time that were he ten thousand times as clever as he is he should not have the least chance of escape. I will make it my special business to look after him myself, and I care not how much inconvenience I may have to put up with in consequence."

Muttering these words half aloud, half to himself, Mr. Noakes turned round and entered the prison.

Giving a few orders to his men, he made his way to his own bedchamber.

Upon arriving here, however, he felt but little inclination to turn in again, and still less when he found that day had fairly dawned.

He had dressed himself rather hastily when he had been summoned, but now he set to work to change all that.

"Ha, ha!" he muttered, "I wonder whether Jonathan Wild is up. I dare say he is. We have not been quite such good friends lately as we used to be. Well, I don't wonder at it, for no doubt he thought I was careless; but we shall be good friends now. I will go and tell him that I have got Jack Sheppard again—ha, ha!"

The prospect of making this communication to the thief-taker seemed to please the Governor exceedingly.

Soon, however, his thoughts took a fresh direction.

"I must take care he don't escape again," he said, "or I shall never be able to show my face. But I haven't much fear. It's no good trusting to those turnkeys, though! I believe they are all in league with him. I will take the matter entirely into my own hands. Let me think now, what had best be done?"

Mr. Noakes finished the rest of his toilet in profound reflection.

He had rather a thick head, and thinking was always a difficult task for him.

As for inventive power he had none, and yet, at length, by dint of hard thought he hit upon a scheme that really was excellently adapted to answer his purpose.

He was quite pleased with it.

"I know what I will do," he said. "Capital! That will astonish Mr. Jack, I rather think! I will go every two hours and visit him in his dungeon. That's the plan! Why if he was to try to escape, he could not do much in two hours. That shall be it. I will go regularly, and never miss. They won't get the better of me this time, I know!"

These words were on his lips as he descended the staircase.

Upon reaching the ground-floor, however, he paused, "Let me see!" he said. "I was going to run round the corner and see whether Jonathan was at home or not, but before I do, I will pay Mr. Jack his first visit; I can't be too careful."

Mr. Noakes accordingly changed his course, and instead of going out he repaired to the vestibule.

The turnkeys looked rather surprised and confused when he entered, for they by no means expected that he would make his appearance again so soon.

They had been standing in a group near the man on the lock, talking about the prisoner, and making bets whether he would, or would not, escape.

As soon as Mr. Noakes came in they separated.

The Governor looked all round and frowned, but said nothing.

He walked straight up to the hook upon which a particular bunch of keys hung, and taking them he unlocked a door, and closing it after him, disappeared.

The turnkeys were naturally much surprised at this unusual proceeding, and wondered what it meant.

They were, however, unable to come to any conclusion, and stood staring at the door until the Governor returned.

He was not long absent.

He threaded the passages leading to the Castle with rapidity which practice alone could have acquired.

Upon reaching the immense door he removed the ponderous fastenings and opened it.

A dim sort of twilight filled the cell, and by the aid of this he saw Jack Sheppard sitting done on the stone-bench that was near the portion of the wall to which he was chained.

He saw the prisoner's white face bent seriously upon him for a moment, and then withdraws.

As soon as he saw who it was that had come to pay him a visit, Jack resumed his old position, and took no more notice than he would if he had still remained alone.

Mr. Noakes entered the cell and closed the door behind him.

He came close up to Jack, who once more raised his head and looked him full in the face.

Mr. Noakes said nothing in reply to his inquiring glance, but, with a well-practised eye, examined the fetters in every part.

Indeed he was not satisfied with his eye only, for he felt them also with his hand.

They were quite secure, and at present it was certain that they had not been tampered with in any way.

With a grunt of satisfaction he then turned away.

Once Jack opened his lips as if about to speak, but he closed them again without uttering a word, as though, upon second thought, he had deemed it most prudent to remain silent.

He shrank back slightly when the Governor touched him, but he could not escape.

Mr. Noakes, however, saw the movement and understood it, and he scowled.

He, too, remained silent, and as soon as he had assured himself that his prisoner was perfectly safe and in the same condition as he had been left, he closed the door, and fastened it on the outside with scrupulous care.

He then retraced his steps to the lobby, where he hung the bunch of keys upon the peg from which he had taken them.

The turnkeys had not yet recovered from their surprise.

Their curiosity was excited to the utmost degree.

They guessed the Governor had just been to Jack's cell, but for what purpose after he had so soon been placed in it, they were at a loss to imagine.

The more the Governor thought of his scheme the more his mind approved of it, and there was a contented smile upon his face as he said to the man on the lock:

"Open the door, Smith! I am going out, but I shall be back in less than five minutes!"

Smith obeyed instantly.

He took the brightly-polished key from his pocket and inserted it in the lock.

There was a click, and then the door was open.

"Keep careful watch, Smith!" said the Governor as he crossed the threshold.

"Never fear, sir!" was the reply.

Slowly Mr. Noakes descended the steps and stood on the footpath of the Old Bailey.

He was smiling more contentedly than ever.

He thought what a pleasing reception Jonathan Wild would give him, and how acceptable the intelligence would be which he was about to communicate to the thief-taker.

The breach which had for some time existed between them would be completely healed over, and Mr. Noakes well understood the advantage derivable from being on good terms with the villain Jonathan.

With an airy, springy step, the Governor walked along the Old Bailey and turned the corner into Newgate Street.

It was very early in the morning.

The sun had risen, but none of his beams as yet shone into the streets.

There was an uncomfortable hazy mist hanging about, and the air was raw and cold.

The roads, owing to the fall of snow and sleet during the night, were in a shocking state, but Mr. Noakes heeded not all this; in fact, he was scarcely conscious of it, although he shivered as he went along.

The distance, however, from the door of Newgate to Jonathan's house was very trifling, and he soon stood upon the doorstep of No. 1, Newgate Street.

Raising the ponderous knocker, he brought it down with such force as threatened to split the panel.

There was not a second's delay in opening the door.

The reason was that Jonathan was expected.

It was Tonks who appeared, and he looked much surprised when he saw the Governor of Newgate, for he knew that he and the thief-taker had not been very good friends lately.

Mr. Noakes's face, too, was full of importance, and so Tonks jumped to the conclusion in a moment that something extraordinary had taken place.

"Mr. Wild is not in!" he said, anticipating the Governor's question.

Mr. Noakes frowned and looked disappointed.

"Not in?" he repeated, interrogatively. "Are you sure of that? I have some intelligence of the most important character to communicate!"

"No, he is not in!" was the reply. "He has been out all night!"

"When do you expect him to return, then?"

Tonks grinned.

"I do not know, Mr. Noakes. Old Johnny always manages to arrive when he is least expected!"

"Then you can give me no information as to when he is likely to return?"

"No, sir, nor nobody else, but I'll tell you what I can do?"

"What?"

"Why, if you like, when he comes in, I will either send word to let you know, or else tell him you want to see him."

"Very well, Tonks. Tell him to come to the prison to me, as I have some intelligence of the utmost importance."

"All right, Mr. Noakes!"

The Governor turned round and was about to descend the steps when he caught sight of a hackney-coach crossing over from Skinner Street.

He noticed it because it was the only vehicle which happened to be in sight.

He paused in his descent, for he thought there was just a chance that it contained the thief-taker.

He resolved to see.

It was indeed Jonathan Wild who was approaching.

The reader will recollect that after he left the Prince of Wales Inn, he gave instructions to three of his men to watch the house closely, and they walked away.

Ere he had gone many steps he was overtaken by a hackney-coach.

He hailed it instantly, and instructed the coachman to drive him to Newgate Street.

Upon nearing his destination the thief-taker projected his head out of the window of the carriage in order to tell the driver where to stop.

As he did so, to his great surprise he saw Mr. Noakes standing on the door-step.

He knew in a moment that something of an extraordinary character had occurred, for the Governor's face was full of expectation.

Jonathan hastily alighted from the vehicle, paid the man his fare, and then ran up the steps.

Mr. Noakes retreated into the hall.

"What has happened?" asked Wild, instantly.

"I will tell you in a moment!" replied the Governor, with a bland smile. "It is good news that I have to communicate!"

"Come this way, then," said Jonathan, and as he spoke he made his way upstairs.

Mr. Noakes followed closely.

The thief-taker led the way to the sitting-room, which we have so frequently had occasion to describe.

He motioned to his visitor to take a seat, and sank down himself upon a chair opposite.

But Jonathan took this precaution.

He sat with his back to the window, while the Governor of Newgate had his face turned towards it.

"Well!" said Jonathan, the moment he had seated himself. "What is the news?"

"I will tell you, Mr. Wild, first of all, I want to make a few remarks!"

"Cut it short, then!" was the growling response.

"I shall be happy to comply with your wishes in this respect as well as others, Mr. Wild. Of course I need only say that of late we have not been quite such good friends as we were some time back. Nor need I mention the reason. I am sure I am very sorry for what has occurred, but really it was no fault of mine—I could not help it."

"Oh, never mind all that! If you have got anything to say, let's have it without so much d—d preface!"

"Very good, Mr. Wild, only I really did wish just to mention these things. But, however, since you don't like it I will say no more, except that when that unfortunate event happened I made up my mind to atone for it if possible, and that is the reason I have never come near since; 'for,' said I to myself, 'of course Mr. Wild is very much vexed about what has taken place I know he had set his heart upon having the sentence carried out, and—'"

"Oh, curse all that!" said Wild, in a rage. "If you are going on like that I am off!"

"I only wanted to prepare your mind."

"Prepare be d—d! What has happened?"

"Nothing very serious! Don't be alarmed! You will be pleased when you hear that—"

"What? Curse you, why don't you go on?"

"Why, that Jack Sheppard is a prisoner in Newgate."

CHAPTER CCCLL

JONATHAN WILD PAYS A VISIT TO JACK SHEPPARD IN THE CASTLE.

JONATHAN WILD had half risen from his chair in his anger at the Governor's prolixity.

But when he heard the startling and unexpected intelligence that Jack Sheppard was once more a prisoner in Newgate, he sunk down in his seat literally gasping with astonishment.

Recovering himself in a moment, however, he sprang up with a yell that was enough to electrify anyone, and then he grasped the governor by the throat.

He shook his head to and fro with great violence, and so tight was his grasp that poor Mr. Noakes very rapidly got red in the face.

"What do you mean?" roared Wild, "What do you mean? How dare you come and tell me such a thing to my face! Jack Sheppard in Newgate? Impossible!"

The Governor gesticulated violently, for speak he could not.

The first excitement produced by the surprise being over, Jonathan released his grasp.

"Speak!" he said, "Tell me that again!"

Mr. Noakes rubbed his throat and looked wishfully at the door, as though he would gladly enough have made his way out of the apartment.

There was nothing to hinder him now that Wild had let go, but he had too much dread of his ferocious companion to make the attempt.

He relapsed into his chair again, and Wild sank down down into his.

Thus the pair sat and contemplated each other in silence, while the Governor was wholly occupied in attempting to recover the proper use of his breath.

He opened and shut his mouth, gasping like a fish that is suddenly lifted out of the water and placed upon the ground.

The thief-taker, in the meantime, recollected himself, and overcame the first shock of his surprise.

"Speak!" he said at length. "Speak, I say, and tell me! Can it be possible that—that—; but no, it is folly! there is some mistake——!"

"You have treated me very roughly, Mr. Wild!" said the Governor, ruefully; "very roughly indeed! I little thought that you would repay me in such a manner, for bringing you such important intelligence——!"

Jonathan frowned.

"Once for all," he said, "tell me, and tell me truly, is this some jest, or is it really true that Jack Sheppard is in Newgate?"

"It is perfectly true, Mr. Wild! Believe me it is, and no jest! I left him then not a quarter of an hour ago!"

Jonathan again started to his feet, but sank back into his seat.

"More!—more!" he cried. "You must tell me more about this extraordinary affair! I cannot believe it! Tell me all the particulars."

Mr. Noakes did not hesitate to do so.

He told him not exactly all that the reader is acquainted with, but very nearly all—at any rate, sufficient to make Jonathan clearly understand the aspect of affairs.

Its circumstantial character had the effect of removing all doubt from Jonathan's mind, who was at first afraid to believe in so much good fortune, lest it should in the end turn out to be untrue.

Now, however, he felt almost certain.

He questioned the Governor very closely; for it puzzled Wild to think how they came to be in the house in Spring Gardens.

He could not, for the life of him, imagine what brought them there.

He was already sufficiently puzzled about Edgworth Bess.

That she was separated from her two protectors he well knew; but he imagined she had been left in some place of safety by one of them.

How came she then to be flying through the streets?

How came she to attempt to commit suicide by leaping into the Thames?

Some powerful motive must have led to it he knew; for it was the last deed which he thought she would have committed.

This was an enigma which the thief-taker had no power to solve; and he tortured his brain to no effect.

He trusted ere long to be able to discover more.

"I cannot doubt any longer!" said Wild, at length. "Pardon me for treating you as I did, it was the effect of excitement, merely. However, as you said at first, we have not been such good friends lately as we used to be; but there is no reason why that should continue, so give me your hand, and we will forget the transactions of the last few weeks!"

"I am quite willing!" said Mr. Noakes with a grin, as he took the huge rough hand extended towards him. "I would much rather have you for a friend than an enemy!"

"We shall get on best you may depend, while we are friendly," returned Jonathan; "because we are in a position to be of great service to each other!"

"Just so!"

The thief-taker went to the cupboard, and produced a bottle of brandy and two glasses.

"We will just have one dram," he said, as he filled his own glass and pushed the bottle towards the Governor—"just one dram, and we will drink to our future friendship!"

Mr. Noakes filled up his glass, and drank off the contents with great readiness.

"Although my doubts are now quite at an end," said Jonathan, as he put his glass down on the table, "still I am sure I shall not feel perfectly satisfied until I have been to Newgate and seen the prisoner with my own eyes."

"Very likely, Mr. Wild," was the rejoinder "I can quite understand what that feeling is. I was, indeed, going to propose that you should do so, only you did not allow me an opportunity."

"Well, well—it's all right; but I feel that it would do my heart good, and reconcile me to all my recent failures, if I could see him so secure as you describe him to be!"

"You will find I have not deceived you in any respect, Mr. Wild!" said the Governor, rising; "and if Jack Sheppard, with all his cunning and cleverness, gets out of Newgate this time, I will forfeit my hand!—My hand, did I say?—I mean my head!"

"You had better keep him secure!" said Jonathan, significantly; "for if he was to escape again, you would most certainly lose your situation."

"I am not afraid," said the governor, complaisantly. "He is so heavily ironed, that he cannot move at all, except with the greatest difficulty; and then, I have hit upon another device for keeping him safe. Trust me, he shall not escape!"

"What is your device? Tell it to me, in order that I may judge of its excellence."

"Well, Mr. Wild, it involves a great deal of trouble and inconvenience upon my part; but then, it is such a serious matter, that I don't mind that."

"What is it?"

"I have determined, no matter what shall stand in the way, to personally pay a visit to Jack every two hours, and ascertain for myself that all his fetters are secure. He can't do much in two hours, and I should find it out directly, so I take it he cannot possibly escape!"

"It is an excellent plan!" said Wild, in genuine approval. "And you deserve great credit for having devised it! I have never heard of a better plan. It is far superior to trusting to fetters, bolts, or bars."

"I am glad it meets with your approval, Mr. Wild," said the Governor—"very glad, because it convinces me of the excellence of the scheme!"

"Mind you fully act up to your intentions. Let me caution you against growing careless!"

"You have no need whatever to do so, I can assure you!"

"Well, I do believe it would give you almost as much pleasure as it would give me, if you could see him safely tucked up at Tyburn."

"It would—it would!"

"I thought so, for he has brought you into trouble enough already."

"Curse him! yes, so he has."

"He has, and so let me caution you not to grow careless. You will only have this trouble for a few days, for I will make it my business to see the Secretary of State upon the matter, and will do all I can to get him executed with as little delay as possible, and I have no doubt my representations will produce full effect!"

"No doubt they will, and I trust you will carry out this resolution, for I can tell you it is not a pleasant duty!"

"I know that, but it will not do for you to depute it to anyone else!"

"Certainly not. There is no one that I can place sufficient trust in, and the least neglect—"

"Will be taken the utmost advantage of, for I know Jack's character well. But come, fill up your glass! We will have just one more before we start!"

The brandy was poured out in no stinted quantity into the two goblets, and drank in large draughts.

Both Jonathan Wild and Mr. Noakes had good reason to feel perfectly satisfied with each other.

The thief-taker's brain was, however, too busy to allow him to remain long in one position.

He was the first to empty his glass, and he rose to his feet as a hint that he was ready, and waiting to make a start.

The Governor took the hint, and swallowed down the brandy at one gulp.

"I am at your service entirely, Mr. Wild—entirely at your service!"

"Come, then, I am waiting to go. You have no idea how impatient I feel to satisfy myself that Jack Sheppard is really the helpless prisoner you state him to be!"

"Follow me then, Mr. Wild, and you will find, when you enter the Castle, that I have told you nothing but the bare truth!"

"I shall be so much the better pleased, then, and I shall have no room to doubt."

Mr. Noakes opened the door, and held it by the handle in order that the thief-taker might pass out before him.

Jonathan was pleased with this mark of respect, and he descended the stairs with a feeling of greater satisfaction about his heart than he had felt for some time past.

Tonks saw them descend, both wearing such an amiable and contented expression upon their countenances, and he marvelled greatly what could be the cause of it.

Seeing them come towards the door, he opened it, and both passed out, arm-in-arm.

Tonks watched them walk past the prison wall, and turn the corner into the Old Bailey.

"There's summat up!" he remarked, when he closed the door, after they had vanished from his sight. "There's summat up I feel confident, but I'm blessed if I can think what!"

The hour was a very early one yet, for the Governor's interview with the thief-taker had not occupied a very long time.

The streets were growing fuller of vehicles and pedestrians; but most of the shops were closed, and the business of the day had not begun.

The intelligence of Jack Sheppard's capture had consequently not become generally known, indeed there were at present few acquainted with it except the officials of the prisons.

The news would soon spread, however, and upon turning the corner of the Old Bailey Mr. Noakes and Jonathan saw that a small group of people had already collected round the wicket of Newgate.

When he perceived this Mr. Noakes said:

"You see the news is getting wind, Mr. Wild!"

"Curse them, yes! What do they want to stand there for like a parcel of idiots? I hate to have to pass through a crowd!"

This was the truth, for Jonathan was very unpopular among a very large class of persons, and he was sure to hear something unpleasant, and perhaps be roughly treated too.

Mr. Noakes noticed his vexation, and he said:

"It rejoices me to think that I am again in a position, to render you a service!"

"What service?"

"I can enable you to reach the interior of Newgate without passing through that crowd!"

"How?"

"Easy enough! Look—here is the door leading into my apartments in the prison—we can enter this way!"

Mr. Noakes paused as he spoke at the private door leading into the Governor's house.

He rang the bell rather sharply, and Jonathan took care to stand with his back to the people, for he did not even wish to be recognised if he could help it.

The Governor's summons for admission was very quickly responded to, and then the pair entered.

Jonathan was exceedingly pleased to think he had avoided the people; and now he said, in quite a brisk tone of voice:

"Do not hesitate or dally any longer, Mr. Noakes. Make your way to the cell as quickly as you can, for I confess my impatience to see him knows no bound."

"You shall not be detained any longer than it takes us to walk from here to the Castle. By-the-by, do you know where the Castle is situated?"

Jonathan reflected a moment.

"It is under the Red Boom, is it not?"

"Yes, that is it."

"It is a very strong room, is it not, and one that has not been used for a cell for a long time?"

"Yes, I believe so. At any rate, since I have been in office here, it has never been used."

"I thought not; and the Red Chamber above—that is a strong room?"

"Oh, yes, and the lock of that door has not been undone for at least seven years."

"He ought to be safe then."

"You are right!"

Whilst this conversation took place, the speakers did not remain still, but made their way towards the vestibule, which place they reached just as the Governor uttered the last words.

The turnkeys looked rather surprised when they saw him appear, for they had no idea that he had returned, and their astonishment increased when they saw Jonathan Wild at his heels.

Without saying a word to anyone, Mr. Noakes went up to the peg again, and took down the bunch of keys.

Wild kept close to him, following him everywhere.

The Governor passed through the first door, and closed it after them.

They then stood in a rather dark passage, and Jonathan said:

"Shall you not want a light?"

"No, Mr. Wild," was the reply. "Follow me!"

"But the cell—is that light?"

"Oh, yes! There is a good-sized grated window, and you can see everything distinctly enough."

"Right! That is all I desire."

Jonathan Wild now directed all his attention to following in the steps of his companion, for the passages were for the most part involved in darkness, and the thief-taker was by no means so familiar with the intricacies of Newgate as the Governor, and it behoved him to be careful.

The distance from the door of the vestibule to the door of the Castle was not great, and they soon reached it.

Jonathan noted with satisfaction the ponderous fastenings with which it was secured.

The Governor removed them, and then unlocked the door.

Jonathan's breath came short and thick in the intensity of his anxiety and curiosity to catch sight of the stripling who had been the bane of his life—who had caused him more trouble than all the rest of the world beside, and who had thwarted him in his most daring schemes.

Wild did not wait for the Governor to open the door, but as soon as he heard the snap of the lock, he rushed at it, and pushed it violently back up its hinges.

CHAPTER CCCLII.

JONATHAN WILD EXULTS OVER THE AGONY AND DESPAIR OF HIS VICTIM.

LET us just take one passing glance at the proceedings of Jack Sheppard.

Gloomy and wretched in the extreme, as we have described in a former chapter, were his reflections in that lonely and dreary prison cell.

How Jonathan Wild would have exulted if he could have seen him thus depressed with despair.

But Jack indulged in his emotions, and gave way to these sad thoughts, simply because he believed himself in utter solitude.

Had he fancied for a moment that any eye was fixed upon him, he would have preserved a defiant demeanour to the last, no matter how wretched the state of his mind might really be.

Gradually the faint light which struggled in through the grated window of the cell increased in brightness, so that, almost before he was aware of it, Jack found he could see all around him with tolerable distinctness.

To anyone coming into the cell from the open air, the place would seem to be involved in almost total darkness, but Jack's eyes had become habituated to the gloom.

Slight as this circumstance was, and dim as was the light, yet it had a cheering effect upon Jack's saddened spirits, after being so long in total darkness, as he had been.

He recovered himself so much as to stand up without the assistance of the wall, against which he had hitherto been leaning.

He tried the length of the chain by which he was attached to a staple driven in between two huge blocks of stone.

It was short, indeed.

It was just long enough to enable him to reach a stone bench that was fixed to the wall, and that was all.

As soon as he noticed this bench, Jack resolved to sit down upon it, for, as he stood, the weight of the fetters distressed him sadly.

It was not without some difficulty, however, that Jack carried out his intentions.

All his limbs ached, and the weight of the irons caused him great torture when he attempted to move.

When he at length sat down he experienced a great feeling of relief, though he soon found that if he remained long in one position his limbs got cramped.

Deep and bitter curses against his foe came from his lips continually, as his eyes roamed constantly and restlessly over the four walls of the cell.

He resolved to think no more of Edgworth Bess.

He made up his mind that he would banish her entirely from his thoughts, and to do so the more effectually he occupied himself with other reflections.

He thought of Blueskin, and speculated upon his fate, which he could not help thinking was very doubtful.

All he knew about his comrade was, that he had only had a very short start of his pursuers, who, as his own case exemplified, were men who were determined to effect their purpose.

Blueskin might have escaped, and he might have been taken prisoner; about the latter, however, he had heard nothing—not even the remotest allusion had fallen from the lips of either the Bow Street runners or the Governor of Newgate, and so he indulged himself with the hope that he had succeeded in getting off.

But this was very uncertain.

Had Blueskin, however, been so fortunate as to elude his foes, Jack doubted not that he would lose no time in taking prompt and efficient measures to aid his own escape.

When he reached this point in his reflection he paused and sighed, for he no longer felt the powerful impulse to urge him on that had previously existed.

Insensibly then his thoughts came round to the original point from which they had started.

It was in vain he resolved to forget the young girl whose companion he had so long been.

Suddenly he was interrupted.

The sound of footsteps in the corridor without smote upon his ears.

Nearer and nearer they came until at length they paused opposite the cell door.

Curiously and expectantly he turned his eyes towards it, much wondering who it was that had come to pay him this early visit.

There was something unusual in it, for he had not been an inmate of the cell above an hour.

With usual deliberation the fastenings on the outside were withdrawn, and the door itself cautiously opened.

To Jack's astonishment, no other than his old enemy, Mr. Noakes, the Governor of the prison, came in.

Jack had raised his head to look, but now, when he saw who it was, he covered his face with his hands again, and bowed his head upon his knees.

He determined to take no notice, nor did he until the Governor approached and touched him.

Then he shrunk back as he would from the contact of some loathsome or venomous reptile.

We have already stated the particulars of the visit, and also made the reader acquainted with Mr. Noakes's motive for making it.

When he left the cell, Jack again raised his head.

He had now fresh food for reflection.

He puzzled his brains to think of the motive which had caused the Governor to make this visit.

But he could arrive at no conclusion.

He was thoroughly baffled and bewildered.

That there was something behind it he felt confident, but what he was quite at a loss to think.

A thousand strange thoughts crowded into his brain, but none of them furnished him with the least clue as to the meaning of the Governor's conduct.

At length, after perplexing his brain for a long time, he gave up the attempt in despair.

Once more he assumed his old attitude, and his thoughts reverted to Edgworth Bess.

He did so unconsciously, but the sad reflections which filled his mind completely unnerved him.

But he was destined to be soon aroused from these thoughts.

He was destined to be interrupted.

Again came the sound of footsteps, but this time they reached his ears with greater distinctness than before.

He listened attentively.

Then he became aware that on the present occasion two persons instead of one were approaching.

"Can it be possible," muttered Jack to himself, "that I am going to have more visitors? Oh dear no, such an idea is ridiculous and impossible."

Nevertheless, although he uttered these words, he continued to listen to the approaching footsteps.

They paused opposite his door, and he heard the fastenings removed.

What could be the meaning of this?

Was it the intention of his foes not to allow him any rest or repose whatever?

JONATHAN WILD AND THE GOVERNOR OF NEWGATE EXULT OVER THE MISERY OF JACK SHEPPARD.

Was his solitude to be thus continually broken in upon?

He gnashed his teeth in impotent rage as he heard the murmuring of voices outside and the rattling of the key in the lock.

No sooner, however, was the bolt forced back than the door was thrown open with such violence that it struck against the wall.

A figure rushed in and paused before the prisoner.

It was a short, bulky figure.

Jack cast but one glance upon it.

That, however, was quite enough.

It was Jonathan Wild.

His first impulse was to spring to his feet and clutch his persecutor by the throat, and hold him until he was strangled.

He did attempt to start up, but his fetters held him down.

He had forgotten them, and the suddenness with which he attempted to rise gave him great pain.

No. 72.—BLUESKIN.

A mocking laugh came from Jonathan Wild's lips.

"Ha, ha! my pretty bird!" he said, "your wings are clipped, are they? You find it rather difficult to fly now, don't you? Ha, ha! And Jack Sheppard has really got back to his old quarters at last!"

It was not so much the words themselves that enraged Jack.

It was the thought of the person by whom they were spoken, and the taunting tone in which they were uttered.

Jack was like a chained tiger, and Wild was well aware that he was safely out of his reach.

The Governor of Newgate, too, having with superfluous caution closed and secured the door, now advanced towards his friend the thief-taker.

In his hand he held the huge bunch of keys which he had used to open the doors.

He linked his arm in Jonathan Wild's, and the pair stood gloating over their victim, who now seemed wholly in their power.

What power could save him when he had not even the spirit to try to save himself?

It was perhaps as well that the heavy chain checked Jack when he first attempted to rise.

Nothing would have pleased Wild so much as to be able to work him up to the pitch of rage.

Such, indeed, was one of his motives for visiting the cell.

Jack thought of this, and resolved to baulk the thief-taker and the Governor of their anticipated pleasure.

He assumed a moody aspect, and behaved as though he was totally unconscious of their presence there.

This was a course of action that was above all others most exasperating to Jonathan Wild.

He wanted to make his victim frantic.

But without he adopted some further means than he had yet attempted, there remained no hope of him being able to succeed in his object.

Jack remained immovable.

Jonathan then tried the effect of exasperating his victim by talking at him.

He therefore addressed the Governor tauntingly, and Jack could not avoid hearing every word.

His hot blood boiled, but still he retained perfect command over himself.

Wild felt the necessity of changing his tactics.

He was resolved to carry out his intention, and the resistance he met with only served to make him more determined.

He could not bear the thought of Jack obtaining the victory over him.

"Why, Jack," he said, "can this indeed be you? Ha, ha! Well, I must say that the air of Newgate has made a remarkable alteration in you. Why, you do not seem the same? Noakes, my friend!" he added, turning to the Governor, "you have surely made some mistake? This contemptible, paltry, chicken-hearted fellow, who does not seem to have a word to say for himself, cannot possibly be the celebrated Jack Sheppard? I am sure there is some mistake."

Mr. Noakes shrugged his shoulders.

Jack took no more notice than if not a word had been spoken.

"I am sorry this is not the right man, Noakes?" continued Wild. "If it had been the celebrated Jack Sheppard, I have some information for him which he would gladly give his ears to know—that he would."

Still Jack maintained command over himself, though his heart beat wildly as Jonathan spoke.

He seemed to have some dim idea of what was about to be said.

And yet he scarcely believed it.

A word from him would have set his mind at rest, but he resolved not to allow his old foe to obtain even such a partial triumph over him as that.

So, although it cost him a tremendous effort, he did not move or speak, or betray in any way that he had heard what had just been said.

"I am sorry," said Wild, "to find the right Jack Sheppard is not here; the news I had was so very important."

"Indeed!" said the Governor, with an air of pretended interest, for he fully understood what Wild meant. "Is it of such very great importance?"

"Well, it is to Jack Sheppard."

"Oh, indeed! What might be the nature of it?"

"It can do no harm to say."

"Certainly not."

Jonathan Wild glanced at Jack again, and he had to grind his teeth to keep down the curse which came to his lips when he found he had not apparently succeeded in arousing his victim in the least.

But he fancied he possessed the power to arouse him.

"The information I had to give," he said, in low guttural tones, "concerned a young girl."

"A young girl?" said the Governor, like an echo.

"Yes, a young girl."

Oh, how Jack Sheppard's heart bounded when he heard these words.

His brain seemed to fill with blood, and he started slightly.

The movement—trifling as it was—did not escape the lynx-like glance of Jonathan Wild.

He knew that he had touched upon a tender point, and if Jack withstood this proof, he should despair of achieving his purpose.

"What young girl?" asked the Governor.

"Well, one that you have no doubt heard of, and one in whom Jack Sheppard feels the greatest possible interest, I believe."

"Oh, indeed! then I presume you allude to——"

The Governor purposely left his sentence unfinished, in order that his friend, the thief-taker, might complete it for him.

"I allude to the young girl called Edgworth Bess."

Jonathan spoke the words as slowly as possible, and with half-closed eyes gazed steadfastly upon Jack, as he pronounced the name.

But he was deceived.

Its pronunciation did not make that effect which he thought it would.

The prisoner did not even start.

The reason was this.

With a species of intuition, Jack divined who was the young girl alluded to.

Therefore, his first surprise over, he schooled himself to bear with immobility the mention of her name.

Outwardly he succeeded, but his mind was in a terrible state of agitation.

The reader will have no difficulty in believing this when he remembers the tenor of Jack's reflections.

Wild now was furious.

He resolved to try his prisoner to the utmost, and under the dominancy of this feeling, said things which in cooler moments he would have kept locked fast within his bosom.

He felt inclined, however, to sacrifice a great deal rather than avow himself defeated.

As for Jack, he clenched his teeth tightly to keep in the words which struggled to escape his lips, and could but. Jonathan Wild have fully realized the state of torment that his mind was then in, he would have left the cell at that moment.

It will be seen, however, how he committed himself, and the important events that occurred in consequence.

CHAPTER CCCLIII.

JONATHAN WILD'S COMMUNICATION PRODUCES AN UNEXPECTED EFFECT UPON JACK SHEPPARD.

"JACK SHEPPARD!" said Jonathan Wild, at length addressing himself to the prisoner direct, "Jack Sheppard, I say! Look up!"

Jack obeyed.

He could not refrain from doing so.

He fixed his eyes keenly upon his tormentor.

But he did not speak.

"What change can have come over you, I know not!" continued Wild, "and were it not that I had such good acquaintance with your features as I have, I should really feel disposed to entertain the doubt that some mistake had been made, and that you were really not Jack Sheppard. But your countenance is one which I could never mistake. Listen to me! I have something to tell you."

Jonathan paused in the hope that Jack would say something.

But he was disappointed.

Nevertheless, he continued:

"I have something to tell you about that girl—about Edgworth Bess as she is called—though you know her right name well enough. I have something to say to you about her—something that it concerns you to know—something that you would give your right hand to ascertain."

Poor Jack made no other reply than to clench his teeth together with still greater tightness.

Not unnaturally, he came to the conclusion that the news Wild had to tell him in some way concerned the young nobleman with whom he had been told Edgworth Bess had left the house in Spring Gardens.

The reader must not forget the terrible misapprehension under which Jack laboured.

He knew nothing of the conversation which had taken place in the snow-covered street between the young girl and her deliverer.

Still less did he surmise its termination.

Jack's thoughts upon this point had been terrible enough, and now he imagined he was about to receive some horrible confirmation of them.

"Don't you want to hear what I have to tell you?" asked Wild.

Even this question met with no reply.

"You may think to aggravate me by keeping silent like this," said the thief-taker, whose rage began rapidly to get the master of him. "You may think to aggravate me, but I tell you, once for all, you will not succeed in doing so. You would like to hear what I have got to tell you, and it is just for this reason that I will make you know it. You cannot refuse to listen. Although you would fain make me believe the contrary, I can tell you are eager to hear me speak. Well, then, Jack Sheppard, you are a prisoner—a hopeless prisoner! You have escaped from Newgate twice, but do not think that you will perform such an unparalleled feat a third time. No, no! you are safe! The best of precautions have been taken, for the Governor feels that his situation now depends upon his being able to keep you safely."

"You won't escape this time," said the Governor, confidently, as he thought of his capital scheme. "I will answer for that!"

"If I thought," continued Wild, "that there was the remotest possibility of your recovering your liberty, I would bite my tongue off rather than tell you what I am about to say! But you are safe, and so I do not fear; and it will serve to make your confinement more bitter than it has already proved—and that is bitter enough, if I may judge by the change in your demeanour. But I will increase its bitterness tenfold."

No words could possibly portray the tone of malevolence in which Wild spoke.

He seemed scarcely human.

Jack shuddered, for he felt that now he would no longer have the relief of refusing to believe all that his heart prompted.

"You may shudder, Jack, but you will shudder more when I have spoken! I tell you, that Edgworth Bess—do you hear me?—I tell you, Edgworth Bess, last night, was seen flying like a maniac through the streets of Westminster. What may have occurred to cause her madness, I shall leave you to conjecture. She flew to the river bank, mounted upon a barge, and sprang into the Thames!" Jack Sheppard uttered an inarticulate cry.

The intelligence which he just heard was so totally different to what he had expected, that it destroyed his self-command.

Perceiving the effect he had already produced, Jonathan Wild proceeded with more candour than prudence, to relate what had further taken place.

By doing so, he hoped to make the prisoner doubly wretched.

Little did he dream how different would be the effect which his communication caused.

"She committed suicide, Jack—think of that! What should you imagine drove her to it? What is it that drives young girls to make a mad and desperate plunge into the muddy river—what is it Jack? Answer me that?"

A groan was Jonathan's only response.

This news overwhelmed Jack completely.

Edgworth Bess dead—drowned?

The bare idea was horrible!

He was totally unprepared to hear of her death!

Such a thing seemed impossible, for he had never contemplated the occurrence of such an event.

And now, if Jonathan Wild had only possessed a little prudence, he would have stopped here and said no more.

But, encouraged by the effect which he had already produced, he resolved to heighten it if possible.

He fancied, and not without a certain amount of probability, that what he had further to tell Jack concerning her, was far worse than death.

And in this he was quite correct; but, with a blindness of which one could scarcely fancy him guilty, he omitted to take into his calculations the change which this communication would make in Jack's whole deportment.

While he thought Edgworth Bess was dead, he would have had no incentive to struggle to avoid the fate which impended over him.

But if he knew she lived, he would fight to the last.

It may be that Wild thought of this, and relied upon the security with which he would be kept a prisoner.

His revenge would feel better satisfied if Jack was taken to Tyburn fighting fruitlessly to the last, than if he went there inanimately, as some did.

But, be the cause what it will, Jonathan Wild went on.

"She is not dead, Jack!" he said. "She jumped into the river with the intention of committing the crime of self-destruction, but she was not allowed to carry out her purpose. She was rescued and taken to a certain place, which there is no need for me to mention. She had immediate medical attention, and has recovered. She is weak, but a few days will set that all right. One word more, Jack, and then I have told you all. She is my prisoner! Do you understand that? She is my prisoner, and has no power to escape! You are here, and cannot move a finger in her behalf, and such a close hunt is being made for Blueskin, that he will have quite enough to do to save himself from capture!"

Jack's eyes glittered.

While his foe spoke, he felt that that indomitable energy, which he fancied he had lost, return to him with redoubled force.

No longer did the fetters seem to weigh him down!

He felt as though he could have risen to his feet, without being sensible of their weight.

But he remained immovable, waiting with undisguised impatience and anxiety to what Wild had to say.

The thief-taker continued:

"You see, then, Jack, that I am fully master of the situation. You cannot stir; Mr. Noakes will pledge his head at any moment that you are safe, and will not make your escape. From you, therefore, I have nothing further to fear in the shape of interference. Then, as for Blueskin, ere long he will be in the same delightful position as yourself, for he cannot long elude the close search which is being made after him. Then, you see, I have Edgworth Bess all to myself! In a few days I am convinced she will be of age, and then all will be well. Don't grind your teeth, Jack! Do that when I am gone. I will give you further cause, if you like. I have told you so far, and, as I feel I am talking, as it were, with a dead man, I don't mind talking for a little more. Well, then, I have got possession of all the papers necessary to prove who Edgworth Bess really is. They are in my house—safe! What do you think of that? Jack, through your opposition, I have had a difficult game to play; but I have won—won completely. You have lost, Jack, and you will have to pay the penalty of losing!"

This last speech roused Jack completely.

He no longer felt like the same being.

He spoke.

"I thank you, Jonathan Wild," he said, "I thank you from the bottom of my heart for what you have just told me. Your words have driven away the blackest despair that ever filled my breast, and in its place you have put hope. Jonathan Wild, the game is not yet won. You may think you have the best cards in your hands; but wait—wait—until the game is quite played out, then we shall see whether you have won or not!"

"That sounds like Jack Sheppard!" said the thief-taker, with a derisive grin. "I know you now, but I did not recognise you before. Fancy what you like! Cheat yourself into the hope that you are not defeated! Continue to do so to the last, and then your disappointment will be all the greater. Ha, ha! Jack, we shall see!"

"We shall!" returned Jack.

"We shall see you hanging on Tyburn Tree!"

"Don't make too sure of that! I tell you that your neck is destined for the hangman's rope; and, whether I live to see it placed around it I care not, but I know the event will come sooner or later."

Jonathan Wild turned white with passion, and trembled.

There had always been a disagreeable conviction in his mind that, at some day or other, he would have to pay the just debt of his iniquities, and these words, spoken by Jack in so confident a tone, made a deeper impression upon him than he would have acknowledged even to himself.

Recovering himself with a palpable effort, he said:

"I heed not your empty words—your foolish predictions!"

"You cannot heed them less than I do yours! I tell you again, the game is not yet played, and it yet remains to be seen who will be the winner!"

"Pho—pho!"

"You may say 'pho—pho,' Jonathan Wild, but, in your heart, you acknowledge the truth of what I say. Jonathan Wild, beware of me, for the day will come when I shall make you suffer dearly for all that you have heaped upon my head!"

"This is glorious, Jack!" said Wild. "This is the treat I promised myself when I came to pay you this visit, though at one time I feared I should be doomed to disappointment. But in this, as in all things else, I have succeeded, though, for a time, circumstances went against me. Ha, ha! Jack, you are doomed! Beat your wings against the stone walls as much as you like—the more, the better I shall be pleased; you will break your wings, not the stone walls! And then, in a very little while, Jack, I shall have—ha, ha!—the greatest treat in the world—to me the treat I have been waiting for so long and which I never despaired of having. The treat of seeing you swing at Tyburn!"

"Rail on, Jonathan Wild, I pay no heed to your present words; I think only of what you told me such a little while ago—that is all I want to think of. Jonathan Wild, I thank you heartily for your visit!"

"You think to escape, do you, my bawcock? Go on—try it! I should feel more satisfied, than that if you were to go to Tyburn unresistingly!"

"I shall say nothing as to my intentions, Jonathan Wild."

"There is no need for you to do so; but come, Mr. Noakes, I think we have been here long enough! If you recollect, I have some other important business to perform?"

"You have, Mr. Wild, and I humbly think that it is quite time you set about it."

"It is!—it is! Jack, my boy! I am going to a particular friend of mine—a very particular friend. He fills the very important post of Secretary of State for the Home Department. Ha, ha! How funny—isn't it?"

"If he treats you as you deserve he will have you kicked out of his house by his footman!"

"Ha, ha! He knows better than that! I am going to see him on your account, Jack—entirely on your account. Isn't that kind of me? I am going to see whether your execution cannot take place with the least possible delay. I am going to try whether the warrant against you—which is now lodged in Mr. Noakes's possession, and has been ever since your former escape—will not answer without the delay of drawing up a fresh one. Ha, ha! I'm off, Jack! I'm off! Good bye! Keep your spirits up! The Secretary of State will listen to my arguments, I know. Ha, ha! Good bye, Jack, for the present! I'll come back and let you know how I get on!"

CHAPTER CCCLIV.

JACK SHEPPARD IS PUZZLED BY THE GOVERNOR'S FREQUENT VISITS TO HIS CELL.

WHILE Jonathan Wild was giving utterance to this highly-facitious speech, his friend, the Governor, opened the cell door.

The thief-taker followed him, and spoke the last words as he was in the act of crossing the threshold.

Mr. Noakes slammed the door and carefully fastened it.

With burning eyes Jack watched their every movement, and when his foes had fairly disappeared, he, despite the weight of his fetters, sprang suddenly to his feet.

He drew himself up to his full height and shook his fist in a menacing manner at the door.

"I shall live to have my revenge upon you both!" he said. "I shall live to have my revenge upon you both! You may think that the hour of your triumph is close at hand, but you are deceived—deceived! Something within my bosom tells me that I shall be revenged upon you all!"

After this the gust of his passion grew less, and he sank back upon his seat.

But the terrible dejection which we have described as being produced by his sad thoughts, no longer remained.

He held his head up bravely and defiantly.

"Jonathan Wild!" he said at length, in a muttering voice, "I thank you for this visit. You little dream of the effect which your words have had upon me! Doubtless you calculate upon plunging me still deeper in despair, but you have failed—failed utterly and completely. I feel that all my old energy has come back to me! I will escape—escape!"

He glanced around him as he spoke.

The blank stone walls which seemed so strong and massive, were enough to crush out the least hope of escape.

But Jack Sheppard was not dismayed by their appearance.

He had proved more than once that it was quite possible to break out of Newgate—and why should he not succeed this time?

"I will be free," he continued, "and that before I am many hours older! If I remain here, with my brain in such a whirl as it is now, I shall assuredly go mad! What can be the meaning of Jonathan Wild's communication, is it true or false? True, I think! Good heavens! His words prove how much injustice I have done the poor girl! How could I have suspected her of such an act so contrary to her nature? But this attempt at suicide! What am I to think of it? Oh, my poor brain! I feel as if I was going mad!"

The unhappy prisoner clasped his head tightly with his hands as he spoke.

Of a truth were his reflections maddening and perplexing to a degree.

By exercising many efforts, however, he grew calmer.

"Something terrible must have happened to her," he continued, "or she would not have taken that leap into the river! And then to think that after she had done so, she should fall into the power of the villainous thief-taker! And I here—caged, unable to raise a finger in her behalf! But this state of things shall not continue long—I am determined!"

He paused again, for a thought had struck him.

He found he had hit upon a means by which his liberation could be effected.

"Blueskin!" he said, pursuing this fresh chain of thought. "I want Blueskin's help, but I sadly fear he is powerless to assist me! Now that I am as he thinks secure, Wild will devote all his energies to his capture, and Blueskin will have much trouble to escape him. Moreover he will be anxious about me, for he knows my whereabouts. He will doubtless try to liberate me, and that will give Jonathan a better chance of success! I must rely upon myself. Much as I should like to have his assistance—invaluable as it would be to me—I must not think of it. I must depend entirely upon my own exertions—perhaps that will be better. Let me think—let me think!"

Once more did Jack Sheppard allow his head to rest between his hands, but it was with a far different feeling.

He was now at work to follow out the thought which at first occurred to him.

But it seemed nothing short of madness for a youth, a stripling, like he was, burdened with fetters that weighed twice as much as he did, and which had been riveted upon him with more than usual care!

Then the cell, certainly the strongest in the whole prison of Newgate.

How could he hope, unprovided with tools, as he was, first to free himself from the galling fetters, and then to force his way out of that strong cell.

But even when he had done this, how many and formidable obstacles intervened between him and freedom.

Such obstacles which would appal the stoutest heart by their very insurmountableness.

Had Jack endeavoured to look at all his difficulties at once, he would doubtless have been overwhelmed by their magnitude.

As it was, however, he looked at them one at a time, and scarcely even so, for he troubled himself about little more than how to get rid of his fetters.

When he had done this he thought there would be time enough to think about the next thing to be done.

How to get out of his fetters was a most serious problem, and while he still sat pondering over its solution, he was again aroused by hearing the fastenings of his door undone.

He looked up, and an exclamation of anger came from his lips.

This perpetual interruption vexed him exceedingly.

He much wondered who it was that was coming now.

A wild hope that it might be Blueskin sprang into his mind, but he dismissed it instantly.

To his chagrin, and to his astonishment too, the Governor of Newgate appeared.

He came just inside the cell, and looking at Jack, said: "Oh, it's all right!" and then departed.

Of course the reader will be able to comprehend the meaning of this visit.

To them it will be simple enough, but not so to Jack.

He sat gazing at the door, after the Governor had disappeared, for some moments in silence.

He was perplexed.

"What's all right?" he asked, at length.

He found himself unable to reply, though he cudged his brains well for an answer.

"There's something up!" he remarked. "I am sure there is, but what, puzzles me to tell? Old Noakes has got some scheme into his head. I wonder what it means?"

With all his wondering, however, Jack could not get any nearer to a solution of his difficulty.

He now recollected that he had received no less than three visits, and yet he had not been an inmate of the cell for more than six hours.

This seemed strange.

There was some deep motive in this excessive attention, he was convinced of that, but with all his cleverness he could not divine it.

But he now found it quite impossible to concentrate his thoughts upon how he should get out of his fetters as he had before.

Do what he would, his thoughts continually reverted to Mr. Noakes's repeated visits, and speculations as to the cause of them.

In this manner about two more hours passed.

It will be remembered that Mr. Noakes made up his mind to visit his prisoner every two hours without fail.

At the end of that time, therefore, he came.

But he began to find this a terrible trouble, and already felt almost inclined to depute the service to one of his subordinates.

Upon the occasion of this fourth visit, he went muttering and cursing all the way from the vestibule to the door of the cell.

He opened the door, as he had done before, and just peeped in.

He saw Jack still sitting in the same position.

As on the former occasion, the Governor said, "All right!" and closed the door.

It would be hard to say which feeling was uppermost in Jack's mind, vexation or curiosity.

Vexation at being thus continually interrupted, and curiosity to know why the Governor took the trouble to poke his head into the cell at such frequent intervals.

"I have it!" he cried, at length, "I am sure I understand it now! How was it I did not think of it before? Of course that must be it—the Governor said he would take care I did not escape, and this is the notable scheme he has hit upon to prevent me. He will come here as often as he can to look at me, so that I should not have a chance to do so much between the times when he comes! That is it! That is the scheme! It is a good one, I confess, but I will set to work and try to get the better of him, and I doubt not I shall succeed."

Although Jack spoke thus confidently, he was, nevertheless, rather uneasy.

He saw that, if Mr. Noakes continued to carry out his intention, these frequent visits would prevent him doing anything without being discovered.

Then to prevent these visits being paid, was certainly not in Jack's power.

He could not by any possibility exercise the least control over the Governor's actions.

In these visits, however, Jack fancied he could detect the cunning hand of the thief-taker, but here he was in error.

It disconcerted him more and more as he continued to think upon it.

He could not help owning that this continual supervision was a more effectual means of keeping him a prisoner than the strongest cells and the heaviest fetters.

What was to be done?

How was he to escape?

If he made any attempt at freedom, before he had been at work two hours he would be detected.

Then, to hope to be able to escape altogether from Newgate in such a short space of time as that was a feat that even Jack Sheppard was compelled to admit was impossible.

Yet these hindrances and impediments, far from abasing his spirits, had a contrary effect.

He felt that there was a trial of strength between himself and the Governor and Jonathan Wild.

Which would be the victor?

He resolved not to submit without a struggle, and having come to this determination, he returned to his old idea and intention—namely, to free himself from his fetters.

They weighed upon his limbs, and appeared to weigh down his spirits.

Besides, ere long the night would come, and the thought of remaining all those hours with the fetters upon him was torture.

But in what way was he to free himself from them.

The turnkeys had taken care not to leave a single article of any description in his pockets.

He had no tools to effect his purpose save his hands, and what assistance would they be to him in a case like this.

None.

He could not hope to again perform the feat of drawing the handcuffs off his wrists, for those he now had on fitted so tightly as almost to stop the circulation of the blood.

The daylight was fading, and Jack anxiously and despairingly glanced round his cell in the vague expectation of being able to see something that would be of service to him.

But in vain.

Nothing but the stone walls met his eager and inquiring glance.

Suddenly, his quick, keen eye rested upon a small object.

So small was it that it was no wonder he had not seen it before.

The wonder was that he had seen it at all.

Sticking in the wall not very far from where he sat was a nail.

Yes—a nail.

It was a small one, and driven into the mortar between the stones until it was almost buried.

The head and a very small portion of the shank alone remained in sight.

How Jack's heart bounded when he saw that nail.

It would answer the very purpose he required.

Could he reach it?

He was almost afraid to try, lest it should prove to be out of his reach.

At length he rose to his feet, and crept along towards the nail.

As he feared, he could not reach it.

He made several vain attempts.

It was almost within reach of his hand, but not quite.

Two inches more would have enabled him to touch it; but his chain was unelastic—it would not stretch.

Still he tugged and tried, but all in vain.

His fingers were so close to the nail that they almost touched it, but being, as it was, just out of his reach, it might as well have been on the opposite side of the cell, or in any other inaccessible place.

No words can express the state of Jack's mind at this disappointment.

The very thing that he required—the article that would have enabled him, no doubt, to pick the lock of his fetters was there—in his sight, but out of his reach.

Oh, how he tugged at the chain, straining himself uselessly and vainly! It would not yield in the least.

He was thus engaged when he heard footsteps again approaching his cell, and, with an ejaculation of anger and vexation, he resumed his former attitude.

CHAPTER CCCLV.

EDGEMOUTH BESS RESOLVES TO ESCAPE FROM THE PUBLIC-HOUSE ON THE RIVER-SIDE.

THE perilous position of Jack Sheppard has caused us to devote the whole of our attention to a relation of his various proceedings, and, as a matter of course, while doing so, we have neglected others in whom it is hoped the reader feels an almost equal interest.

It is necessary now, however, in order that proceeding events may be properly understood, that we should leave Jack Sheppard for a short time in his dungeon, while we take a glance at Edgworth Bess.

Poor girl, it seemed as though she was destined to know no friends.

Even the landlady of the Prince of Wales inn was her enemy, for was she not devoted to the interests of Jonathan Wild?

Whether she served him voluntarily or compulsorily mattered little, since the ultimate result was just the same.

She had everything to fear from this woman.

There was no hope that she would be able to persuade her to assist her to escape from her relentless persecutor.

Mrs. Pickman would have turned a deaf ear to all such entreaties.

And yet one good thing followed.

Had it not been for the fear she entertained of the villainous thief-taker, Edgworth Bess would not have received the attention she now did.

She might even have been maltreated.

Now, it was the policy of the landlady to see that she had the best of attendance, and, indeed, that everything was done that was in any way calculated to restore her to a better state of health.

The surgeon who had been called in understood in a moment the nature of her malady, and prescribed for her accordingly.

She rapidly got better.

Her brain was at first in a state of sad confusion.

A long time elapsed before she was able to recollect the last event which had happened to her.

Her remembrance was baffled.

By starting from one point, however,—her escape from the house in Spring Gardens—she was able to call to mind one after another, the different incidents which had befallen her until she arrived at the period when the forewoman at the shroudmaker's proclaimed who she was, and stated, in opprobrious terms, the nature of her connection with Jack Sheppard.

She had an indistinct recollection of flying from that place at headlong speed, but after that came a blank, and, in spite of all her efforts, she could not fill it up.

The next thing she recollected, after her flight, was waking up and finding herself in bed.

But where?

In what house was she?

How had she been brought there?—and when?

These, and a thousand other important and unanswerable questions which would naturally suggest themselves, perplexed her brain, until, in sheer despair, she was forced to give up the attempt.

It was not long after this that she heard the door of her bed-chamber unlocked.

This alone was an unpleasant circumstance, since it showed her that she was a prisoner.

For what reason had she been locked in that room.

Her heart turned as cold as ice within her bosom as she thought that she had at length been so unfortunate as to fall into the power of the villainous thief-taker.

This impression came so strongly upon her as almost to amount to conviction.

She almost fainted.

The approach of someone to her bedside aroused her.

She recovered herself, and looked to see who it was, dreading all the time that her eyes would fall upon the hideous countenance of the thief-taker.

But she was mistaken, and a sigh of relief came from her lips when she saw that the person who had entered was a female.

But whatever satisfaction she might have felt quickly disappeared when, at a second glance, she noted the expression of this woman's countenance.

It was Mrs. Pickman, the landlady.

Edgworth Bess had had many bitter lessons of experience, and now she could tell at a glance that this woman was an enemy.

It was proclaimed by every feature in her physiognomy.

The poor heiress sighed.

"Oh! you have woke up at last, have you?" said Mrs. Pickman, as soon as Edgworth Bess turned her eyes full upon her—"you have woke up? And a nice pretty baggage you must be to come into a decent woman's house as you have come into mine! I should be ashamed of myself, that I should!"

Edgworth Bess looked up not a little surprised at this harangue.

She was at a loss to understand it, and she gazed with a vacant expression into Mrs. Pickman's face.

That individual now had time to come to her senses.

In speaking as she had, she had only obeyed the instincts of her own evil heart, but directly she had spoken she was alarmed for the consequences of what she had said.

She had a most exaggerated idea of the powers of Jonathan Wild.

She believed him to have more than human power, and she could not tell at what moment he might unexpectedly present himself at her elbow.

Her contrition for what she had said was only brought about by the fear that her words might, by some unlucky possibility, be overheard by the thief-taker.

Edgworth Bess, perceiving her sudden silence, and being quite at a loss to account for it, asked her a multitude of questions respecting herself, and entreated her to give some explanation of the words she had first uttered.

But Mrs. Pickman was now upon her guard, and she replied to all by maintaining a resolute silence.

Seeing, indeed, that her prisoner was quite safe, and much better, she turned to leave the room, since she had only come to satisfy herself that she had not escaped.

She was pleased to discover the signs of such a marked improvement, because it promised that she would be all the sooner relieved of her charge.

Glad indeed would she be when Jonathan Wild removed her to his own keeping.

She could scarcely sleep at night now for thinking of the penalty she would incur should her prisoner disappear.

Now that she was conscious, extra vigilance would be required.

And so, with an uneasy mind, she descended the stairs, and when she entered the bar she soled herself with a drop of something to drive away care.

As soon as she had left the room, Edgworth Bess sat up in bed.

She heard the landlady lock the door after her, and descend the stairs with a deliberate tread.

The poor girl was much better.

The rest she had had, the medicine and food which had been given her, had all conspired in a most beneficial manner.

She felt herself stronger and better than she had been for a long time past, and naturally enough the first idea that was suggested to her mind was to attempt to escape from her prison, for such that room, to all intents and purposes, really was.

The impression that she was again in Jonathan Wild's power grew stronger and stronger.

A voice seemed to ring in her ears and urge her to escape—to escape while yet she had an opportunity of doing so.

A few minutes were passed in earnest deliberation, and then the poor girl arose.

Attiring herself quickly, she crept towards the window.

It was twilight, but darkness was fast creeping over all things.

Surely, she thought, all things are propitious for the attempt.

She resolved, however, not to try to escape until night had fairly come.

She had not long to wait; and the time that elapsed, she occupied in noting the position of the different objects that she could see.

The window of the room in which she was confined overlooked the Thames.

Beneath her was a small yard, filled with litter and rubbish of every possible description.

This yard was divided by the muddy bank of the river by a low wall.

This was an obstacle which she was quite certain she should be able to surmount, and when that was done, she thought further flight would be comparatively easy.

The thing would be to reach the yard.

In this feat she did not perceive anything very difficult. The room was on the first floor, and the height of the chamber beneath was not great.

If she could get through the window and lower herself down until she hung by the grasp of her fingers upon the sill, she thought she could drop the remainder of the distance, without running the risk of doing herself the slightest injury.

A dozen steps would take her to the wall, and then she would be free.

This prospect was such a delightful one that she could scarcely control her impatience sufficiently to wait for darkness to come.

With a great effort she did so, and kept continually counting the chances she had of success.

The more she thought upon the matter, the more feasible did the whole scheme seem.

At last the wished-for darkness came.

It was increased by a thick, disagreeable fog, which arose from the surface of the river, and spread quickly over the land that adjoined its banks.

All this inspired the poor girl with additional hope that she should be able to make her escape.

She resolved to make the attempt without further delay.

She had already ascertained that she could throw the window open noiselessly, and she did so.

A chill, raw, damp air rushed into the apartment.

She shivered as she felt its influence.

Nerving herself to the task which lay before her, she mounted on to the window-sill, and gradually lowered herself through the casement until she hung out the full length of her arms.

Then she let go her hold.

She had a distance of less than two feet to fall, consequently she reached the ground unhurt.

Scarcely had she done so when she was startled by the sudden opening of a door somewhere close at hand.

Paralysed with fear, and doubting not that her attempt at escape had already been discovered, she sank down on to the stones, with which the yard was paved, unable to move or speak.

A stream of bright light issued from the open door, and the form of a man appeared at it.

This Bess saw as she crouched upon the ground.

The door was closed again with considerable violence, and she could hear the footsteps of the man approaching the spot upon which she lay.

Oh, how she wished for the power to rise and fly, and attempt at least to make her escape.

But she could not.

Her body was no longer obedient to her will—she was like one under the dominion of some fascinating spell.

It was fortunate that she did not move.

The man passed her.

He did not see her, evidently, nor was he on the look out for her.

With straining eyes Bess watched his retreating figure.

As he receded, the fog made his form appear to grow to giant-like proportions, until at length he faded away altogether.

The next sound she heard was the opening of a door, and the sound came from the direction the man had taken.

He had gone towards the low wall which Edgworth Bess had noticed, and over which she thought to climb.

It seemed as though she would be spared the necessity of doing this.

Revived by this prospect, and encouraged by the ease with which she had avoided this first danger, she slowly rose, and with cautious movements, followed, as well as she was able in the footsteps of the man.

In a little while she reached the wall, and here she paused a little while to listen.

All was still.

The man had evidently taken his departure.

All that remained for her to do was to find the door through which he had unquestionably gone.

She commenced her search.

She was unable to find what she sought.

Just as she was about to give up the attempt in despair, her hand encountered woodwork.

She could tell by the difference of the feel.

The next moment she touched the latch.

Her heart beat so violently that she could not raise it, so fearful was she that she should find it otherwise secured.

At length she found strength.

She raised the latch easily enough, and pressed against the door.

A sigh of disappointment, almost a groan, came from her lips.

It was as immovable as a rock.

Her worst fears were realised.

Unconsciously, as she released the latch, she pulled the door towards her.

To her astonishment and delight it gave way.

The door opened inwardly, and not outwardly, and she ought to have pulled, not pushed.

The suddenness with which she made this discovery, almost overcame her.

It was too much happiness.

Summoning once more her fleeting spirits and failing strength, she pushed the door further open.

Again she listened.

Reassured by the silence which still prevailed, she glided out into the darkness like a spirit.

CHAPTER CCCLVI.

EDGWORTH BESS IS CAPTURED AND TAKEN TO WILD'S HOUSE IN NEWGATE STREET.

So far all was well, and drawing the brightest auguries from the unhopd-for success which had attended upon her efforts, the poor girl drew her breath in short fluttering gasps, and bounded forward with all the speed she could make.

She was free, she told herself—free—free! Free from that dreadful house, where she was wholly in Wild's power.

The mist baffled her, but she hastened onward.

Suddenly she started, and uttered a faint scream.

A gruff voice had cried out for her to stop.

Instead, however, of obeying this unwelcome mandate, she hastened on.

But despair was about her heart.

She could hear rapid footsteps behind her, and then she felt someone grasp her tightly.

"Quietly, my beauty!" he said. "Quietly—quietly! Don't go so fast!"

The terrified girl struggled frantically to get free.

In vain.

The grasp in which she was held was one that would have required ten times her strength to shake off.

She was ready to swoon with terror.

Who could have intercepted her, and what could have been the motive of the interception.

It was not Jonathan Wild who had seized her, nor was Jonathan Wild the man who had pursued her, and who now just arrived upon the scene.

She could tell this because she had heard both men speak, and she was too familiar with the thief-taker's voice to make any mistake.

What could it mean, then?

Again she struggled to release herself.

At the same time she spoke:

"Let me go!" she said. "Let me go! I have done you no harm—why should you interrupt me? Let me go!"

"Not if we know it—eh, Bob?" replied the man who held her, and addressing his companion.

"Certainly not! Just tell the young gal it's no good making a rumpus. If she will give in quietly, we won't hurt her!"

"In course not. What do we want to hurt the chicken for? But we must do our duty!"

"Come, young woman, it's no good for you to go for to resist.—not no good, at all! So come along with us!"

"Where—where?"

"Don't speak so loud, miss. Leastways, it don't much matter, for there's no one about to hear you, to my certain knowledge. As to where we are going to take you, that's our business!"

"Just so!" said the other. "Don't let's have any more palaverin! Call Jack, and we will be off!"

The man addressed, whistled sharply, and another man made his appearance.

"Game's up!" said one, as soon as he arrived. "We've got to go back, now!"

"And a good job, too, for I was getting infernally tired of this sort of work! I'm ready!"

Edgworth Bess listened to all this while in a state which is aptly described by the phrase more dead than alive.

She was stupefied at this sudden reverse.

She had only just before been congratulating herself upon her freedom, and now she found herself ten times more a prisoner than before, for now there was no hope of escape.

So overcome was she, that she had no power to resist.

Nor could she command her voice enough to shriek out for assistance, though in that lonely spot upon the river's bank, her cries would probably have been unheard, and certainly unheeded.

Resistlessly, then, the men led her forward in the direction which they had desired her to take.

Then one called out something, but what the poor girl did not know.

Her conductors paused, and the rumbling of wheels followed.

The men had hailed a hackney-coach, and it now drew up close to where they stood.

Still passive, Edgworth Bess was lifted into the vehicle.

Two of the men entered with her, the other one got on to the box along with the jarvey, and directed him where to drive.

Edgworth Bess was completely overcome by what had just taken place, and, as might naturally be expected, she felt the effects still more in consequence of the reaction which set in after her recent exertions.

She had very greatly overtaxed her strength, and now she was suffering for it.

Without, then, being precisely in an insensible state, she sat in the hackney-coach opposite to the two men.

She had a dim consciousness that they were before her, and that she was sitting in some vehicle which was in motion.

In this dreamy state she remained during the greater part of the journey.

The reader long ere this will have understood the meaning of her capture, and also by whom it was effected.

They cannot have forgotten the three janizaries who Jonathan had summoned to his side after he left the Prince of Wales Inn.

His instructions to them were simple enough.

They were to take their duty in turns.

Thus two men were always to be hovering about the exterior of the inn, and one always within it.

All were to look after Edgworth Bess, of whose personal appearance the bulldogs had already been furnished with a description.

She had been seen to emerge from the door in the wall by one of them, and his cries at once attracted the attention of the other on duty outside, who captured Edgworth Bess by throwing his arms around her, in the manner we have recorded.

The third, who was summoned by the whistle, came out of the house where he had been sitting, the whistle being an agreed upon signal for him to do so.

Jonathan had instructed them, in the event of their capturing Edgworth Bess in the act of making her escape, to take her direct to his house in Newgate Street with the least possible delay.

The men obeyed his orders implicitly, they had too much dread of the consequences of disobedience to attempt it.

Towards the thief-taker's residence the hackney-coach was rumbling at as swift a rate as the poor anatomies of horses that were harnessed to it could be induced to make.

Gradually, however, Edgworth Bess felt herself recovering, both bodily and mentally, from the shock which she had received.

She resolved to make at least an attempt to escape while there yet seemed a faint chance of success.

She surmised correctly enough that she was being taken to Wild's house in Newgate Street, and once within the walls of that gloomy habitation, she knew it would be impossible to escape unaided.

She must, then, make one more effort.

The interior of the coach was dark; but the men who were guarding her seemed to have eyes like cats, so closely did they watch her.

A quick movement alone could be successful.

The poor girl, rendered desperate by the nature of her situation, resolved upon a bold action.

It was, to open the door of the coach and spring out.

She might hurt herself severely; but, then, she might escape.

This was sufficient encouragement for her to make the requisite attempt.

With a sudden bound, which, as she had rightly anticipated, took the men completely by surprise, she reached the door of the coach.

She put her hand out in a moment and strove to turn the handle.

But it was stiff, and required the exercise of considerable strength to turn it.

That strength Edgworth Bess could not exercise, awkwardly situated as she was; and the men, who were now aware of what she was about, seized her by her arm and shoulder and drew her back on to the seat.

Foiled in this desperate attempt, the poor girl was no longer able to control her tears, and she sobbed violently.

She had now lost all hope.

She felt that now she could do nothing but passively submit to that malignant destiny which seemed ever to pursue her.

Her conductors now changed their position.

They sat on either side of her, instead of opposite, as they had done before.

She was thus completely in their power.

She might have screamed, but she really had not the heart to do so; and if she had, her cries would have been stopped in a moment, in a manner by far more effectual than pleasant.

At length, the coach came to a standstill.

The cessation of the movement caused Edgworth Bess to look up.

She found her forebodings fully realised.

The coach stopped opposite the thief-taker's house in Newgate Street.

As if by magic, the door of that doomed abode flew open before the revolution of the wheels had ceased.

The men opened the door of the coach and dragged their prisoner out with them.

Maddened with despair and desperation, the poor girl determined to make yet another effort for her freedom.

She set up a succession of the most piercing shrieks with so much suddenness, as to have almost a paralysing effect upon her guards.

So shrill were they, that they filled the whole street with their sound.

But they were abruptly put an end to.

One of the janizaries placed his hand rudely over her mouth, and then she was hurried into the house with breathless rapidity.

The door was closed the moment they entered, and the hackney-coach rolled away.

All this had taken place so quickly, that by the time people came running hastily to the spot to ascertain what had taken place, nothing was to be seen, and all was still.

One was bold enough to knock at the door of the thief-taker's house, and finding no notice was taken of his first summons, he repeated it.

Wild answered the door himself.

He took from his pocket the formidable bludgeon which he was scarcely ever without.

Then, holding it in readiness to strike, he opened the door quickly.

He just caught sight of someone.

Down came the bludgeon with the full force of his arm.

There was a disagreeable, sickening, crashing sound, and the man, with his hat knocked down over his eyes, rolled backwards down the steps into the street.

With a satisfied chuckle, Jonathan closed the door.

In the meantime, Edgworth Bess had been placed on the bench on which the man who was on the lock generally sat.

She no longer struggled, she no longer shrieked.

She was well aware of the futility of both.

The time had passed by when either would be of service to her.

In the thief-taker's house her struggles would be unheeded, and her shrieks would produce no more effect than if they had never been uttered.

SIR JAMES THORNHILL PAINTING JACK SHEPPARD'S PORTRAIT.

Jonathan Wild, having disposed of the inquisitive gentleman outside, came up to her.

With an affectation of excessive politeness, he took off his hat and made a very low bow.

Bess shuddered.

"I have to congratulate you!" he said, in a sneering, mocking voice—"I have to congratulate you upon your sudden, but nevertheless most welcome recovery from your illness! I was afraid I should be deprived of your society for some time longer yet; but fate, I see, has willed it otherwise! I am glad of it!"

The poor girl's heart sank within her at this address.

She would ten times rather have had Jonathan Wild ferocious and cruel, than thus pretending to be agreeable and kind.

She dreaded the worst from it.

But she did not speak.

She felt that she could not address herself to the villain who had been the bane of her young life.

"I regret," he continued, "that you are not pleased with the accommodation in my house, but I cannot remedy that just at present. You must wait a little while, and then you will have no cause to complain. Come, give me your hand, and I will lead you to your apartment."

NO. 73.—P. UESKIN.

Wild grinned facetiously as he uttered this last word with particular emphasis.

But Edgworth Bess did not move, or show the least symptom of obeying him.

Wild, however, came a step nearer, and took hold of her with one hand by the waist, and the other by the arm.

He was then easily able to raise her to a standing posture.

This done, he turned to Tonks, who had been a curious and amazed spectator of this singular scene.

"Quick, villain!" said Wild, "get a lantern and show me the way upstairs!"

Tonks flew to obey his commands.

A dark lantern was burning on a bracket near the door, and he took hold of it, saying:

"Here you are, if you please, Mr. Wild! This way! The lantern is alight!"

"Bah! Go on, will you!"

Tonks ascended the stairs backwards, in order that his imperious master should have the full benefit of the light he carried.

Up he went, until at length he was commanded by Wild to pause before a door.

It led into a chamber adjoining the one in which Blueskin had been confined.

The key was sticking in the lock, and Tonks opened the door.

Then he stood on one side.

Jonathan half-carried Edgworth Bess into the room.

"There!" he said, as he released her. "You can remain here until I have completed my arrangements."

CHAPTER CCCLVII.

JONATHAN WILD WRITES A LETTER TO THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

WITHOUT saying another word, Jonathan Wild retreated towards the door, and, crossing the threshold, closed it after him.

He took particular care to lock and bolt it; and then, with a sigh of satisfaction, he acknowledged that all was secure.

She could not escape.

That door would be proof against ten times the amount of strength which she could bring to bear upon it.

Then, the window was not only a giddy height from the ground, but was strongly protected with iron bars.

There was no fear, therefore, of her escaping that way.

Oh, how Jonathan Wild chuckled, and laughed, and rubbed his hands together as he descended the stairs, followed by the wondering Tonks.

His heart was elate at the fruition of his deep-laid scheme.

Upon reaching the landing on the first-floor he paused.

"Go down!" he said to Tonks; "if anything particular occurs I shall be here!"

The thief-taker entered the sitting-room as he spoke.

He was not a little surprised to find it completely filled with smoke, the odour of which proclaimed evidently enough that it was produced by the combustion of tobacco.

He entered, and was immediately greeted by a voice, the tones of which were familiar to him.

"Hullo, guv'nor, here you are at last! D—n me, if I thought you were ever coming into this room again, and I can't stir about!"

It was Wild, junior, who spoke.

"I did not know you were here, George," growled the thief-taker, as he strode across the room, and sank down in his accustomed seat near the fireplace.

"Well, guv'nor, I laid in bed till I could lay no longer, d—n me if I could! So, with a little assistance, I dressed myself and got down here, and here I have sat in this d—d hard chair ever since."

"I am glad to find you are well enough to get up, George," said Wild. "Events are approaching a climax."

"Are they? I thought so, d—d if I didn't!"

"What made you think that?"

"Why, this confounded wound of mine. Oh, d—n it! I can't help groaning now and then, it gives me such pinches."

"You have need to be thankful you are no worse."

"Well, I suppose so! But, come, guv'nor, tell us the news. How have things gone on—well or bad?"

"I should say well, but for one circumstance."

"What is that?"

"Oh, you know well enough!"

"I'm d—d if I do."

"I mean the loss of Lord Donnull's papers. If I had those, I should have the game entirely in my own hands."

"Then fortune has been favouring you of late, guv'nor?"

"Well, I have been a little luckier," said the thief-taker, with a complacent grin.

"What has happened? Tell me what good news you can, for I am so d—d melancholy, I don't know what to do with myself."

Jonathan paused a moment in reflection.

He hardly knew whether to tell his son or not.

Had he been less rejoiced or elated than he was just then, he would probably have held his peace.

As it was, he had not sufficient command of himself to do so.

"Jack Sheppard's in Newgate," he said.

"That's good news, at any rate," said Wild, junior. D—n his hide, I shall be glad to see him tucked up at Tyburn."

"No doubt you will; so shall I. Make haste and get well."

"That will recover me. When does the execution take place?"

"In a very few days."

"The devil!"

"I cannot fix the precise date."

"But the warrant for his execution is already signed, sealed, and delivered—is it not?"

"Yes."

"Then why don't you act upon it?"

"The document requires to be re-endorsed or something of that sort."

"Is it done?"

"Not yet. I went to see the Secretary of State this morning."

"Well?"

"He is somewhere in Scotland, but his arrival is expected every day."

"Oh, indeed!"

"I went because I thought I should have influence enough to induce him to let the execution take place without delay."

"But you could not see him?"

"No."

"How d—d unlucky, to be sure! What shall you do? Write?"

"I have already written."

"Oh, curse me, guv'nor, you are a real man of business, and no mistake!"

Wild grinned, and looked pleased at this compliment.

"What did you say in the letter?" continued his son.

"I have got a rough copy of it in my pocket-book."

"Read it, then—read it, guv'nor. It will do my heart good to hear it."

Jonathan Wild did not want much pressing.

Diving his hand into one of his capacious pockets, he drew forth a pocket-book, whose size corresponded well with the receptacle from which it had been taken.

It was crammed with papers of various descriptions, and, after some trouble, Jonathan produced one.

It was the rough draft of the letter he had written and forwarded to the Secretary of State.

His son George watched him eagerly while he unfolded it.

Then Jonathan, drawing the candle to the corner of the table, so as to have a full advantage of its light, began to read.

His son listened attentively.

The thief-taker read as follows:—

"My Lord,

"I write these few lines to you on a very important matter, which I hope will be my excuse for doing so. That infamous and notorious wretch, Jack Sheppard, the housebreaker and murderer, has at length, through the indefatigable exertions of your most humble servant to command, been recaptured and lodged in his most Gracious Majesty's prison of Newgate. This information will, I am sure, well afford you very great satisfaction. I have, your lordship, taken upon myself to look closely after his safe custody, and I am assured that the precautions which I have given Mr. Noakes, the Governor, to take, will effectually prevent this daring prison-breaker making a third escape. I much regret that your lordship should be absent at this juncture, as you are aware the warrant, which is already delivered for the execution of the prisoner, cannot be acted upon until endorsed by you, and through this the execution will be delayed, which I should like and advise should take place at the earliest possible moment, as any delay may only afford the prisoner opportunities for escape which he would not have if the execution took place at once.

"I therefore hope that your lordship will, with as little delay as possible, send authority for the wishes of your humble servant to be carried into effect, though you may depend no means will be left untried to keep him safe. His notorious companion, Joseph Blake—better known as Blueskin—I have also certain knowledge of, and in a few days I hope to be able to announce his capture and safe lodgment in gaol.

"This comes from your lordship's

"Most obedient and humble

"Servant to command,

"JONATHAN WILD."

The thief-taker read this letter with extraordinary unction, and when he had finished, folded it up carefully, and replaced it in his pocket-book with an air that said plainly enough that he was exceedingly well pleased with his performance.

"That's a d—d good letter, guv'nor!" was the comment made by his son as soon as he had done reading it—"a d—d good letter, and no mistake!"

In this the reader will probably agree, seeing that the thief-taker took to himself not only the capture of Jack Sheppard and safe lodgment in Newgate, but also the precaution which Mr. Noakes had devised and taken of visiting the prisoner frequently in his cell.

A politic man was Jonathan Wild, and it is beyond all doubt that by some such means as this, he contrived to get the credit he obtained.

"I hope it will achieve its object," he said, in reply to his son's commendatory remark; "I shall be more pleased and satisfied with it then."

"Don't trouble yourself about that, guv'nor. If the Secretary of State reads it, he will adopt your suggestions, never fear!"

"Do you really think so?" said Wild, whose weakest point was too great a susceptibility to be won over by a little flattery.

"I will wager my head against a brass farthing that he does!" replied his son, emphatically.

"Then all will be well. I shall sleep better when Jack Sheppard has taken his last look at this world at Tyburn."

"Ah, guv'nor, that reminds me! What other luck have you had lately—any?"

It was the flattery George had just administered that induced his father to reply:

"Yes, George," he said, "I have had a little more luck!"

"What? Let us hear it! You can't do a better thing than take me into your confidence!"

"I don't know that!" returned the thief-taker, sharply, whose suspicions had been aroused by this last remark, "I don't feel satisfied in my mind about the loss of those papers!"

"Oh!" exclaimed George, with an offended air, "If you are going to bring that subject up again, I am off to bed at once! I cannot stand it!"

"I can't help having my suspicions."

"I don't say anything about that, but I am d—d if anything will satisfy you or remove them! I have told you over and over again that I have not got them, and don't know where they are, but you won't believe me!"

"Well, well, I—"

"D—m me, if I won't have this affair settled one way or the other," interrupted George Wild, speaking in a tone of great resolution. "I say this affair shall be settled one way or another, and d—m me if it shan't this very night!"

"Listen to—"

"No, I'm d—d if I listen to you or anyone else! You listen and I'll speak, guv'nor, we can settle this here difference easy enough. It lies in a nutshell. You must either drop your suspicions, treat me with confidence, and be my friend and partner, or else I shall drop you and turn round against you! Do you understand that, guv'nor? You would not like to have me for an enemy—should you? There's no d—d weakness about me, and I should think no more about helping to scrag you than anyone else! I know one or two little things about you, guv'nor, that you would not care about having brought to light, but I would not mind doing it, not a bit; not if I knew you would be led off to Tyburn at once! So, guv'nor, I hope you understand me!"

George Wild spoke these words in a tone of great determination and menace, and he was encouraged to proceed by the visible effect which they had produced upon his parent.

He could see Jonathan wince and tremble as he spoke.

It was a bold and dangerous course to adopt, but George felt that his case was desperate, and that some desperate remedy would be required to effect a cure.

His bearing staggered the thief-taker in his suspicions.

"Now, guv'nor," continued George, "a word will settle this business. I am convinced that you suspect me. You have tried to take me by surprise—you have come upon me when I least expected a visit—you have searched my room in every nook and corner, and you have overhauled my clothes! What have you found? Nothing, because there was nothing hidden, and so, of course, you found nothing!"

"George!" replied Wild, "You have said quite enough! I can now see plain enough that my suspicions have been unjust. Think no more of it! We will be friends! We will place mutual confidence in each other! Are you willing?"

"Quite, guv'nor! I believe it will answer our purpose a great deal better to be friends than it would to be enemies."

"Shake hands, then!" said the thief-taker, "and we will consider the matter as settled!"

"With all my heart!" said George, as he took his father's hand within his own and pressed it.

It was a curious transaction, and it would indeed be a most difficult matter to say which of the parties was most sincere.

They were deceiving each other.

As he thought over the matter, Jonathan felt that his suspicions were by no means removed.

But under these circumstances he judged that his most prudent course would be to dissemble.

He felt how dangerous his son would be should he turn against him and become his enemy, and therefore he resolved to conciliate him by his real feelings.

Time, he thought, would unravel most things, and he had no doubt ere long something would turn up which would either confirm his suspicions or dissipate them.

CHAPTER CCLVIII.

JONATHAN WILD AND HIS SON BECOME BETTER FRIENDS WITH EACH OTHER.

AND so this precious pair shook hands with each other.

Wild, junior, was satisfied.

He believed that he had really succeeded in hoodwinking his very clever parent, and so he shook hands with the greatest cordiality.

The result of this hollow friendship will be exhibited in the sequel.

It will be shown that, by attempting to overreach each other, they materially helped to accelerate their own downfall and ruin.

The progress of events will, however, exhibit this.

We have now to deal with the transactions of the present time.

A pause followed the shaking hands, which was so disagreeable to George that he broke it.

"Well, guv'nor," he said, "now that we have made matters all right between us, let us have the piece of luck that you have met with! Have you captured Blueskin?"

"No, not yet."

"What then, guv'nor? Speak out, or I shall think you are playing fast and loose with me!"

"Don't be afraid of that, George! Something very important has taken place!"

"Then why don't you tell me what?"

"Cannot you guess?"

"Not, not without—"

"Without what?"

"Without what have captured the heiress?"

Jonathan nodded.

"Have you really done so?" said George, in a tone of voice which betokened how interested he was in the reply.

"I have!"

"When? How? Where is she?"

"How anxious you seem, George!"

"Of course I am anxious! Haven't you told me how important to our interests it was that the girl should be in our possession?"

George laid particular stress upon the two pronouns.

"But you seem so very anxious, George!"

"So you think so, guv'nor?"

"I do!"

"Well, it's the truth. I am very anxious, for I think, guv'nor, if we can only bring that scheme to perfection, we shall be able to retire!"

"So we shall, George! But there is much to be between now and then!"

"I am aware of that, but it seems to me that no small portion is already accomplished."

"I have been lucky, George!"

"You have. First, there's that son of a devil, Jack Sheppard! You say he is in Newgate, and that the strictest care will be taken of him?"

"You are quite right."

"Then you say you have the heiress in your hands?"

"Yes, she's under my keeping!"

"Where? D—n it all, why don't you speak out?"

"You should not be so impatient, George. I will tell you all in good time. Edgworth Bess, for so I suppose I shall always call her, is safely locked up in one of the strong rooms at the top of the house."

George took careful note of this.

"Good!" he said. "Take care that she does not make her escape!"

"There's no fear of that."

"Well, then, take care that none of her friends rescue her!"

"Leave that to me! You need not trouble yourself about that! I have taken such measures as absolutely assure me of her safety!"

"Very well, guv'nor, you ought to know best, but I really must congratulate you upon the present aspect of affairs."

"It is promising to a degree, but not so promising as I could wish."

"What's the matter?"

"Jack Sheppard is not yet executed!"

"But he will be?"

"If I can bring that desirable event about; nevertheless, he is not executed!"

"Well, I grant that, guv'nor. What next?"

"Blueskin is not yet captured!"

"But he will be?"

"He must be!"

"Well, I don't see anything impossible, or even any difficulty about either of these?"

"Perhaps not. Still, before we can deal with Edgworth Bess, both these things must be accomplished."

"It will be best."

"Then, when those two meddling villains are out of the way, my course will be easier, but even then there will be difficulties."

"A mere trifle."

"No, no!"

"What is there, then?"

"The papers!"

"Oh, d—in those papers!"

"So say I, but for all that, they must be had, nothing can be done without them!"

"But supposing you had got the papers, guv'nor, what then?"

"Then our troubles would be over. We would obtain possession of all the money and estates, and divide the lot equally between us!"

"An excellent plan, guv'nor, and one that I shan't grumble at, you may depend!"

"You ought not!"

"Well, guv'nor, I will try to serve you all I can. You shan't have cause to repent of taking me into confidence and partnership. And now, guv'nor, about this young girl!"

"What about her?"

"Why, I must caution you not to make too sure of her safety! I have got a little scheme to propose for making her escape impossible!"

"What is it?"

"Why, guv'nor, I am far from well, and it will be some time yet before I am able to get about or go out of doors."

"Well, well?"

"I propose, then, that I should take up my quarters in the room which adjoins the one in which this girl is placed. I might as well be there as anywhere else, and I should be able to keep such a sharp look-out that I would stake my life she did not escape!"

Jonathan Wild glanced furtively into the face of his son as he made this proposition.

But George's countenance afforded no index to his mind, and Wild, astute as he was at reading other people's thoughts, was completely baffled by his son.

Whether he was anxious to undertake this duty from a proper motive, or whether he had some ulterior design of his own which such a proceeding would further, he could not tell.

At that moment Jonathan would have given anything to be assured of his son's good faith.

If he was sincere and acting straightforwardly towards him, nothing would have pleased Jonathan better than for George to have took up his guard in the way he had mentioned.

But he could not drive the papers out of his mind.

He could not help thinking that George had abstracted them, and concealed them somewhere.

If so, it would answer his purpose best to get on good terms with the heiress, and this proximity would afford him every opportunity of achieving his purpose.

A cold shiver crept over the thief-taker as an unpleasant conviction suggested itself to his mind.

Could it be that his son was merely making use of him as a tool?

Could it be that he (Jonathan) was taking all this trouble for the aggrandisement of another?

He sickened at the thought.

George had once before served him a rascally trick, and why should he not do so a second time?

What if George only made use of him for his own ends.

Suppose, when all was achieved, instead of receiving his share, his son was to turn round upon him and hand him over to the executioner!

He knew that his son was in possession of certain occurrences which, if disclosed in proper quarters, would have the effect of consigning him to the scaffold.

He was also too well acquainted with his son's disposition to think that he would for a moment scruple to do so.

He was certain he would not hesitate.

Even in this world, then, Jonathan began to be aware that there was such a thing as retribution.

It came upon him in the form of his son.

Indeed, what he then suffered was an instalment of the punishment which he deserved, and which he was destined to receive on earth.

Had Jack Sheppard been able to comprehend his feelings, he would have felt a certain amount of sorrow for him.

He could not have helped pitying him.

So acute were his feelings that the thief-taker could not repress a groan.

His son started as the unexpected sound came upon his ears.

He wondered what could have produced it.

"Hullo, guv'nor!" he said, roughly; "what is t'other matter?"

Jonathan recovered himself, and looked up.

"I have been hurt," he said, "and I felt a sudden pain."

"Ah! I know what that is; I don't wonder at your groaning!"

"It was sharp and sudden!" said the thief-taker, who, by a second effort, succeeded in thoroughly obtaining the mastery over his emotions.

"Well, but you haven't told me what you think of my proposition!" said Wild, junior, after a short pause.

"I think it a very good one!" replied the thief-taker, with another groan, but this time it was an inward one, and inaudible to his son.

"Well, that's just what I think, guv'nor! You leave her to me, and I will be answerable for her safe keeping. You ought to be glad to have that trouble taken off your hands, because it will allow you to devote more of your thoughts, time, and attention to Jack Sheppard."

"It will!"

"And I am sure he requires it! You must not leave Noakes to keep him secure. If you do, you will find yourself in the wrong box, for Noakes is nothing better than a d—d fool!"

"I believe that," said Jonathan. "Do not fear! I shall look closely after Mr. Jack myself. I have already paid him two visits since his imprisonment—one not long ago. I examined all his fetters, and looked all about the cell; but all was quite safe, and just as it had been left!"

"I should advise you to go again early in the morning, guv'nor. You can't tell what he might be at to-night!"

"Very true; and I would not have him get loose again upon any consideration!"

"Nor I, or else you would have all your trouble over again."

"It is an unfortunate thing that the Secretary of State is not in London. If he was, we would get Jack executed on Monday. As it is, there is sure to be a delay, because the sessions begin on the Monday following."

"That's d—d awkward, guv'nor!"

"It is, because I don't suppose I could get a special hanging-day appointed for him, and so he would have to wait until the Monday after that."

"Oh, the devil! That will never do!"

"I am afraid we shall have to put up with it, George. To-night is Friday—or, as I suppose, is fast getting towards Saturday morning. If the Secretary of State is in Scotland, it is impossible for me to have an answer back in time."

"But you said he was expected to return every day!"

"So he is!"

"He might come back to-morrow?"

"He might, and that is our only chance; I must say, it is a very slight one."

"Very indeed!"

"You will now comprehend my anxiety to have this business over quickly. There are eight men in Newgate under sentence of death, and in all probability they will everyone be executed next Monday morning. Now, I wanted to get Jack Sheppard in among that batch!"

"It would be a d—d good thing if you could, guv'nor—it would indeed! Don't you think you could get him in somehow, and have the warrant signed afterwards?"

"I daresay I could, but that pig-headed Sheriff Mooney has a spite against me, and opposes me all he can, so I should not be able to get his consent."

"Then it appears, guv'nor, that Jack Sheppard will have to be in Newgate for rather more than a fortnight?"

"It will be a fortnight next Monday to the next hanging-day!"

"Then it's a shame, that's all I can say! We are to miss all this week through a pig-headed sheriff and a d—d Secretary's signature!"

"Just so. I am afraid there is no hope of getting him to appoint a special hanging-day for Jack. The sheriffs would oppose that again."

"Oh, d—n the sheriffs!"

"Amen! with all my heart!"

"I'll tell you what it is, guv'nor!—you must leave that girl, Edgworth Bess as you call her, entirely to me, as I said before, I will be answerable for her safety! You must forget all about her, and direct the whole of your energies to keeping Jack Sheppard safe in gaol for such a long time. It strikes me you will find it no easy matter."

"I am afraid so, too!"

"Well, then, that ought to show you the necessity of never quitting him. Why, d—n it, if I was well enough I would sit outside his cell door, and never move till he was led out to be pinioned!"

"I will look after him, never fear!" said Jonathan, in a revengeful tone of voice. "I have a grudge against him, and rest assured that I will see it paid. As you say, George, you shall look well after Edgworth Bess, and I will do nothing else but see that Jack Sheppard does not make a third escape from Newgate."

CHAPTER CCCLIX.

JACK SHEPPARD SUCCEEDS IN UNDOING HIS FETTERS WITHOUT THE AID OF A KEY.

WE confess we fairly tremble for the safety of Jack Sheppard.

This time we fear he stands a very poor chance of escaping an ignominious ride to Tyburn indeed.

The many events we have described in the course of this narrative will prove that Jonathan Wild was a man of no common order.

The main cause of his want of success in his great designs was that he undertook too much, so that, of consequence, his attention was divided.

Now, however, he was no longer to be perplexed like the sportsman in the fable.

His son George had taken the care of Edgworth Bess off his hands,—the police officers were directing all their attention to capturing Blueskin.

He was, then, in a position to devote himself entirely to Jack Sheppard, and make it his special business to see that he did not escape.

The Governor of Newgate had resolved to neglect everything else to achieve the same object, and with these two implacable and personal enemies, what chance would Jack have for the exercise of his extraordinary ingenuity and industry?

He was doomed.

Then there was the application which had been made to the Secretary of State.

The issue of that application was very doubtful, for none could tell how soon that official personage would be in London.

He was hourly expected, and, of course, the very moment he arrived, Jonathan Wild would instantly be communicated with.

Even if he came so late as Sunday night, it would be in time.

The reader must not forget that at the time of which we write, no rapid means of communication existed.

The electric telegraph and the locomotive engine were both undreamt of.

Truly did Jack's fate hang upon the merest thread.

Let us return to him.

We left him vexed and angry.

He had been tugging vainly at his chain in the endeavour to reach the nail in the wall.

While so engaged, he heard footsteps, and undesirous of discovery, he had relinquished his efforts, and resumed his old attitude upon the stone bench.

He was only just in time.

The door opened, and the Governor and Jonathan Wild appeared.

While speaking to his son, the thief-taker stated he had had two interviews with Jack Sheppard since his capture.

The first has been described; the second was now about to take place.

There was nothing important in the details.

As night was coming on, the thief-taker had judged it advisable to have one more look at his prisoner.

The two hours having again elapsed, the Governor willingly accompanied him; but, instead of just putting his head inside the door, and giving a hasty glance around, as he had done on the previous occasion when alone, he followed Jonathan into the cell.

Wild glanced keenly at the prisoner, who, however, relapsed into his former sullen mood, refusing to speak or to take notice of anything that was going on around him.

Mr. Noakes carried a lantern in his hand, for the passages through which they had to pass to reach the strong room were dark ones, and Wild requested him to bring it in order to ascertain whether the fetters had been tampered with.

The thief-taker was surprised to see Jack sitting there so quietly.

He could not make it out, and he was suspicious accordingly.

So far as he could see, however, all was well, and the prisoner did not seem to have stirred hand or foot since he left him.

Of his failure in obtaining an interview with the Secretary of State, Wild said not a word, and Jack Sheppard never addressed a single question to him.

The thief-taker was not satisfied, though, with the cursory examination he had made.

He would not feel satisfied until he had looked at the fetters, link by link; and he now took the lantern from the Governor for that purpose.

Jack Sheppard scowled when his old enemy approached him, but that was all the notice he thought fit to take.

Jonathan observed it, and said, mockingly:

"Don't be angry, Jack, lad—don't be angry! I won't hurt you, but I cannot rest until I have seen that your pretty jewellery is not out of repair anywhere!"

Jack calmed himself.

He wished to mislead and deceive his foes as much as possible, and knowing that the fetters were in just the same condition as they were when put on, he had nothing to fear from Wild's examination, so he permitted him to make it unresistingly.

Jonathan was forced to confess himself satisfied.

The fetters were all right.

He was convinced that not even an attempt had been made to tamper with them.

He could scarcely believe this, and was forced to come to the conclusion that either Jack was convinced of the hopelessness of making an escape, or else he had some deep-laid scheme maturing in his brain.

The latter seemed most likely.

But Jack persisted in maintaining his obstinate silence, and eventually the Governor and Jonathan withdrew.

Jack listened until he heard their footsteps become inaudible in the distance, and then he said:

"I see it all now! Their plan is clear enough. There is no longer room for me to doubt it. They made up their minds to visit me at these frequent intervals, being under the impression that by so doing they will most effectually prevent my escape. Such a course, if they continue it, cannot fail to answer their purpose and consign me to despair. Before I made any progress I should be discovered. I have no chance without I can succeed in tiring them out. This is a faint chance indeed, when the dispositions of these two men are taken into account. Still, they may grow weary after a time, when they find that they have no recompense for their trouble. After a time, do I say? How do I know how soon they may drag me forth to execution? Perhaps the day after tomorrow! If so, farewell hope!"

Jack Sheppard let his head fall between his hands, and for a few moments gave way to despondency.

Rousing himself, he bethought himself of the manner in which he was engaged when he was interrupted by his late visit.

The prospect of having to remain all night in his fetters was so distasteful a one that he resolved to prevent it if he could.

Jack had a peculiar faculty of picking locks.

The rudest tool sufficed for his purpose, so very dexterous was he, but then the locks with which he had to deal were not by any means complex pieces of mechanism.

A crooked nail he felt sure would be the very thing to answer his purpose, and there was a nail sticking in the wall only an inch or two out of the reach of his fingers.

Despite his former failure, he resolved to try once more whether he could not succeed.

He rose painfully and slowly, for his limbs were cramped terribly.

His first care was to see that the chain by which he was secured to the wall was not twisted in any part, so that he might have the full advantage of its length.

Having done this, he proceeded to creep along the face of the wall towards the nail.

A cry of joy—of overpowering joy—came from his lips.

He could reach it.

When he had overcome the sensations of delight which this discovery afforded him, he began to tax his brain to account for being able to reach it on this second occasion, when he had failed to do so on the first.

This for a long time baffled him.

There was but one solution of the difficulty that he could think of, and that happened to be the correct one.

On the previous occasion he had forgotten to straighten his chain.

Consequently it was twisted and shortened two or three inches.

He was unable then to reach the wished-for object.

Now, however, that he had taken the precaution to see that the chain was not kinked up anywhere, he was enabled to touch the nail with the tips of his fingers.

Having accounted for the circumstance in this manner, he proceeded to loosen the nail in its setting.

But this he found was a far more difficult task than he had expected.

The mortar with which the stones were cemented together was almost as hard as the stones themselves.

Patiently, however, Jack tugged at the nail, pulling it backwards and forwards, and loosening it by slow degrees.

This encouraged him to persevere with his efforts.

He knew that in the end he must succeed.

But it was a tiresome, tedious operation, and his fingers ached terribly.

Indeed, the pain became so great that he had to pause and rest.

But he went to work again with renewed vigour and determination.

It was quite dark, though, before he succeeded in drawing out the nail, but he did it.

He had won.

The victory was his.

Never did a miser feel so delighted at the acquisition of some priceless treasure which had cost him much toil, than did Jack Sheppard when he at length held this nail in his hand.

But his blissful anticipations were quickly put to flight. He was startled by footsteps in the corridor.

This told him that another two hours had elapsed.

What to do with the nail was a puzzling question.

Where could he conceal it?

If he put it in any of his pockets, there was every risk of its being found.

If he hid it under the bench, it would very likely be seen by some one.

Where, then, was he to put it?

He had little time to decide.

He felt inclined more than once to stick it in the wall again as though it had not been disturbed.

But he naturally shrank from this exposure of his treasure to anyone who might enter the dungeon.

And yet Neakes and the thief-taker had visited him several times without appearing to perceive it.

If he removed it and left the hole in the mortar visible, it might immediately attract his foes' attention.

All these thoughts swept through his brain simultaneously.

He had no time to deliberate.

He could not think of a better plan than restoring the nail to the place from whence he had taken it, and with many misgivings he did so.

Then he had barely time to seat himself before the door opened.

A bright flash of light streamed in, and he perceived the countenance of the Governor.

Mr. Neakes was getting sick of this continual visiting to the cells, and had it not been for the fear he had of Jonathan Wild he would have given the job to some one else.

But he dared not.

But he performed his duty in a very careless manner.

He cast one glance around the cell, and then withdrew.

Jack breathed more freely.

His nail was safe.

Afraid, however, lest the Governor should make a sudden and unexpected return, he waited for some moments in a state of great impatience before he stirred.

But all having become quiet, he rose to his feet and crept towards the nail for the third time.

He seized it, and drew it out with the utmost ease.

Then, sitting down, he went to work with it.

He made his first trial upon the padlock which secured him to the chain that was fastened in the wall.

This was the largest.

With almost as little trouble as he would have had if he held the proper key in his hand he undid it.

He placed the chain down quietly, so that a sudden clank upon the stones should not be the means of spreading an alarm.

So far he was free.

He was free to walk to any part of the dungeon that he thought proper; and even this seemed liberty after his late severe confinement.

But he did not pause.

Stimulated by his success, he set to work upon the other locks, and in a few moments undid them all.

He was now hampered only by the handcuffs round his wrists and the fetters which were riveted to his ankles.

Neither of these he was able to remove; nor did he, indeed, attempt it.

The reason will be seen presently.

Having disencumbered himself of the heavy irons, Jack made no further attempt to escape, but lay down on the stone bench, in order to obtain, if he possibly could, a few hours' repose and rest.

He was much fatigued; and though his bed was so hard, yet in a few moments he was fast asleep, and continued so until just before daybreak.

Mr. Noakes paid one more visit to the cell during the night.

He gave one sleepy glance around, and perceiving his prisoner was on the bench, concluded all was right, and retired without discovering that he was unfettered.

CHAPTER CCLX.

JACK SHEPPARD FINDS A GOOD HIDING-PLACE FOR THE NAIL WHICH DID HIM SUCH GOOD SERVICE, AND GIVES AN AUDIENCE TO SOME VISITORS.

Of this nocturnal visitation Jack Sheppard remained oblivious.

It was very incautious of him to sleep so soundly, but he was not master of his own actions.

Had the Governor performed his duty in a proper manner and as carefully as Jonathan Wild thought he would perform it, he would have discovered that Jack was sleeping more comfortably than he should have been.

But, as we have seen, through the carelessness of the Governor this discovery was not made.

It was about an hour before daybreak when Jack Sheppard awoke.

His limbs were somewhat cramped, and he felt chilled through to the bone.

Nevertheless, the deep, uninterrupted sleep he had taken had refreshed him in no ordinary degree.

He felt light-hearted and blithe.

His first care was to run hastily about the cell, in order to circulate the blood and remove the stiffness of his joints.

He found this did him a world of good, and he continued the exercise for a long time, running round and round the cell, and sometimes pacing up and down it with rapid strides.

At length he was warned by the increased light that found its way through the grated window, that it was high time to desist.

He could not tell how soon after daybreak he might be troubled with another visit, and he had the fetters to put on again.

This would probably be a long and difficult operation, for he would have to perform it in such a manner as to prevent his foes seeing that the fetters had been tampered with.

He sat down, then, on the stone bench, and patiently set to work to secure himself again.

With much more ease than he had dared to anticipate, he locked the padlocks again by means of the nail he had so fortunately acquired.

In less than a quarter of an hour all was done, and not even the most experienced person could have told that they had been removed.

He was highly satisfied with his achievements, but soon found himself in a great dilemma as to what he should do with the nail.

If by any unlucky accident he should be deprived of it, he would no longer be able to enjoy even the semblance of a comfortable night's repose.

He did not altogether like the idea of restoring the nail to the place from whence he had taken it.

If he did so, there would be great danger that some time or other Jonathan Wild or the Governor would catch a glimpse of it, and, conceiving it to be dangerous, would remove it.

But then, on the other hand, both might know, from previous observation, that a nail was there, and its disappearance would not fail to excite their suspicions, even if the hole in the wall from where he had taken it did not attract their observation.

Jack was in a dilemma.

Could he but have hit upon some really capital hiding-place, where he could feel sure there was little or no fear of its being found, he would not have troubled himself in the least about the discovery of the hole in the wall.

But where within the limited dimensions of his cell was he to find such a place?

His cell, did we say?

For it to be of any service to him, he would have to conceal it somewhere within his reach while he was chained.

He puzzled his brains in vain to think of a hiding-place.

There was not one that occurred to his mind which offered sufficient prospect of safety.

He thought once of keeping it in his pocket until he heard some one come to the door, and then have slipped it into his mouth; but he rejected this, as the first time he spoke he must have inevitably betrayed himself.

What was to be done?

At length he hit upon a happy expedient, and yet so simple a one that he was completely at a loss to think how it was the idea had never occurred to him before.

The floor of his cell was paved with large flag-stones, several of which were broken, while others were very uneven.

Between all, however, was a wide space where they were joined together by mortar.

The floor of the cell was damp—the mortar would consequently be soft.

What, then, would be more easy than for Jack to press the nail down into the mortar with his foot?

To withdraw it, when necessary, from so soft a bed would be an easy enough matter.

It would thus be completely buried, with the exception of the head, and this being of the same colour as the mortar itself, there did not seem to be the least possibility of its discovery, even if the closest search should be made after it.

Jack was so pleased with this expedient, that he lost no time in adopting it.

He selected one of the joints in the stones just where he could put his foot, so that there would be this additional means of concealment.

As he fully expected, the mortar was so soft and moist with the damp, that he pressed the nail in with the utmost ease.

He placed his heel upon it and stood up, thus making sure that the head of the nail was on a level with the adjoining stones.

Jack was well pleased with what he had done, and he seated himself with a contented air.

He felt now that no inconsiderable step towards accomplishing his freedom had been taken; and he could now, he thought, afford to wait with patience.

While the Governor and the thief-taker continued to pay such frequent visits, he felt that it would be neither more nor less than ridiculous to attempt anything, since discovery would be the only result.

He had but one chance, and that was to tire them out.

He judged, and not without some reason, that they would grow weary of such frequent and resultless visits after a time, and so it behoved him not to do anything that would at all arouse their suspicions.

If he could only lull them into a sense of false security—if he could only succeed in making them believe that the prospect of making his escape was so hopeless that he did not intend to attempt it—all would be well.

But there was one point upon which he could not help feeling a terrible amount of uneasiness.

That was as to the day which was fixed for his execution.

He knew Jonathan Wild would use every effort to get it to take place as soon as possible; but then the affair did not rest in his hands, powerful as he was.

Indeed, Jack was by no means clear whether he would not have to take another trial, or be examined before a magistrate, or something of that sort.

At any rate, he felt certain that he would have a day or two's notice.

Had he been aware that the Secretary of State was not in London, and that if he did not return before Sunday night, his execution could not take place until a fortnight afterwards, he would not have cared a jot.

In that time he felt certain that he should be able to tire his foes completely.

He was the more inclined to think this, because he perceived that Mr. Noakes was fast growing tired of his extra and self-imposed duty.

Jonathan Wild was the man he had most to fear. Nevertheless, Jack did not think the prospect before him was altogether a hopeless one.

He resolved to wait with patience, and not destroy the faint chance he had by undue precipitation.

He was hungry, and day fast advancing, so that he expected a fresh visit almost every moment.

He was not deceived in his expectation.

A short time afterwards he heard the well-known scound which heralded the approach of persons to his dungeon.

Jack's ears were quick, and he could tell long before they paused before the door, that on this occasion three persons were approaching.

He looked curiously towards the door to ascertain who they could be.

He was not long kept in suspense.

The door opened, and the forms of Jonathan Wild, Mr. Noakes, and a keeper were revealed.

The latter carried in his hands a small quantity of rough food and a pitcher of water.

Jonathan Wild strode into the cell with a triumphant smile upon his face.

He was followed closely by the Governor.

The former having glanced at Jack, looked carefully around the cell.

But the hole in the wall from whence the nail had been taken being small, escaped his observation.

Nor did Mr. Noakes appear to notice it.

Satisfied with this general survey, the thief-taker now approached the prisoner in order to examine his fetters.

Jack resolved to allow him to do so unresistingly.

He kept his foot over the place in the floor where the nail was hidden.

If he resisted Wild, or in any way hindered him from making the examination, he rightly thought that it would merely serve to make him suspicious.

He knew very well that he had nothing to fear in the shape of discovery, if the closest search was made.

He certainly had, on this occasion, adopted the wisest and most prudent course he possibly could.

Jonathan looked at the fetters closely, but could detect nothing wrong, and when he had finished, it was with the conviction in his mind that the irons had not been touched.

In order to appear more at his ease, Jack took up the bread which the turnkey had brought and began to eat it, though, had he been less hungry than he was, his stomach would have rebelled against it.

Forced to be content, Jonathan turned aside.

He said nothing about the Secretary of State, of course, for he wished most particularly to keep from Jack's knowledge all that had occurred.

He attempted to draw Jack into a conversation, but failed to do so; and having made a few remarks of too trivial and unimportant a character to be set before the reader, he and his precious friend the Governor withdrew.

Jack was heartily glad when they had taken their departure, and went on with his meal in silence.

The food was bad, but it was better than none, and he was under the necessity of eating something in order to support nature.

The pitcher contained a small quantity of tolerably clean water.

Jack, in a general way, preferred a stronger and more palatable beverage, but now he had no choice, and he drank out of the pitcher with avidity.

When this was done, he leaned back on the bench in as comfortable a position as he could.

All he had to do was to wait for the time to pass away.

That day he knew was doomed to be one of inaction to him.

Little, though, did he dream of the important events which were destined to take place.

The day was a busy one.

As may be readily believed, the news of Jack Sheppard's capture and incarceration, had spread with great rapidity throughout the metropolis, and for some time the keenest interest was felt in all his actions.

This is not to be wondered at, when we think that he had twice done that which had hitherto been deemed an impossibility—that was, escaped from Newgate.

The greatest curiosity was felt by almost everybody to have a glance at this lad, who had done so much, and who had made himself so famous.

Those who had the power to grant orders of admission to see the prisoner were literally overwhelmed with applications.

As a matter of course, the titled and the rich were favoured, and to these orders in great numbers had been given.

Poor Jack knew nothing about this, and little dreamed that he would be kept in Newgate on purpose to be looked at and talked about, as people would about some wild and curious animal.

That day, however, was destined to witness the arrival of a great many of these visitors.

Jack had scarcely despatched his miserable breakfast and comfortably seated himself before he was disturbed by footsteps and voices.

He started up in surprise.

The tones were different to any he had heard during his sojourn in the prison, and he wondered what could be the cause of it.

His surprise and astonishment increased when several persons entered the cell.

They had manifestly come to see him, and by the rich dresses worn by several he could tell they belonged to what is called the upper class of society.

The following extract from the "Newgate Calendar" proves this to be truth, not fiction:—

"The curiosity of the public being greatly excited by his former escapes, he was visited by great numbers of people of all ranks, and scarce any one left him without making him a present in money; he would have more gladly received a file, a hammer, or a chisel—but the utmost care was taken that none of his visitors should furnish him with such implements."

That this was excessively distasteful to Jack Sheppard the reader will easily believe.

He did not like the idea of being made a gaping stock of, but he had no choice in the matter.

The money which was offered him he took readily enough, because it would enable him to have better food than the prison regulations allowed.

Nor did Jack feel that there was any need for him to make enemies of these people, so he received them all civilly enough, and answered their questions quickly and pleasantly, being not without the hope that by so doing he should be able to excite a popular feeling in his favour.

It served, too, to pass away the time.

The day would otherwise have hung very heavily upon his hands.

These visits continued up to a late hour in the evening.

No one stayed very long, but as fast as one departed another took his place.

At length, the last one departed, and then Jack found himself in possession of a tolerable sum.

With reckless prodigality, he gave the turnkey a couple of guineas to get him a nice supper, and told him he might keep the change himself.

This made Jack a friend in a moment, and on that night at least Jack fared better, so far as eating and drinking were concerned, than he had done for a long time past.

CHAPTER CCCLXI.

DESCRIBES THE UNCOMFORTABLE MANNER IN WHICH JACK SHEPPARD SPENT SUNDAY IN NEWGATE.

JACK was glad when night came.

The fetters had galled him terribly during the day, and he longed for the time to come when he should be free from them.

He did not dare, however, attempt to unlock his chains until the Governor and his coadjutor, Jonathan Wild, had paid him his last visit.

But to his surprise they came not, though he was sure it was long past the hour at which they visited him on the preceding evening.

What could be the meaning of it?

Surely they had not given over and got tired already?

No, Jack could not think that.

Something of an unusual nature had taken place.

That portion of Newgate in which Jack was situated was far removed from any of the habitable parts of the building.

BLUESKIN IS CAPTURED BY JONATHAN WILD.

He was, therefore, unable to estimate with any exactness how late it was, but he judged from the time that had elapsed since he had taken his supper that it was close upon midnight.

Surely it was too late for his foes to come and visit him.

He almost felt inclined to unlock his fetters, so assured did he feel that they would not come.

It is easy to understand his impatience.

Presently, however, as he stooped to pick up the nail with the full intention of unfastening the irons, a thought occurred to him which made him pause suddenly and change his mind.

He put his fingers at the side of his nose, and shook his head in a sagacious manner.

"I have it!" he muttered. "They have not paid me a visit because they thought I should be thrown off my guard if they did not. That is it—I feel sure that is it! Ha, ha! How lucky I thought of it! Jonathan, with all your monstrous cleverness, you will be foiled again."

No. 74.—BLUESKIN.

Jack sat down with a contented air, resolved to wait with patience until his persecutors appeared.

He no longer cared about the weight of his fetters now that he believed he was about to discomfit Jonathan Wild.

But plausible as the hypothesis which he had started seemed, yet it was not the real solution of the mystery of the non-appearance of Jonathan Wild and Mr. Noakes.

The cause which produced it was far different, and the reader will find shortly, when we describe the events which took place on the outside of Newgate on that eventful Saturday, that the circumstances which produced it were more intimately connected with Jack Shepard than he thought they were.

It was, however, quite natural for Jack to think that the reason why his old enemies had not made their accustomed appearance was because they hoped to throw him off his guard.

He leaned back, but as time passed by without their coming, he felt inclined to run the risk of taking off his irons.

Luckily, he did not.

Shortly afterwards he heard the sounds in the passage which indicated their approach.

Directly afterwards, Wild and the Governor appeared.

The latter carried a torch in his hand, and, by the aid of its lurid light, Jack was able to observe the expression of their countenances with great exactness.

He was surprised to see upon both such an expression of triumph as he had never witnessed before.

They seemed to be boiling over with it.

Jonathan Wild advanced with a mincing step.

He made that curious chuckling sound in his throat which he always did when something had occurred to greatly delight him.

He paused before Jack, and placed his hands behind him.

"Ha, ha!" he said.

He ceased as abruptly as he had begun.

Jack Sheppard looked at him with wonder, in which uneasiness was mingled.

He was utterly at a loss to think what their strange behaviour meant.

The Governor, too, who had according to custom closed and locked the door, now came forward, and stood by the side of Wild.

"Ha, ha!" he said, very much in the same manner as the thief-taker.

What could they mean?

Was their object to mystify Jack Sheppard?

If so, they succeeded most completely.

He gazed at them in absolute wonderment.

"Are you all right, Jack?" said Wild. "I must have a look. Ha, ha! I'm very sorry I kept you so late. But no matter! Better late than never! I have been detained by some business of importance. Oh, Jack, I have news—rare news—but I would not let you know what has taken place for all the world!"

"Take that, then!" said Jack, and, as he spoke, he hit the thief-taker rather a sharp blow on the head with a fetter. "Take that, and don't aggravate me!"

Jonathan looked up from his task of examining Jack's fetters.

"Ha, ha!" he said. "Very funny, isn't it? Why, you seem quite playful, Jack. But, never mind! Ha, ha!"

It was strange, but Wild did not resent the blow which Jack had given him.

Was his exultation so great that it blinded him to everything else?

It would seem so, for he still chuckled in his throat as he turned round to follow Mr. Noakes from the dungeon.

"Good night, my lad!" he cried. "It's rather late, and I am going home to bed. I hope you will sleep comfortably with all your jewellery upon you. Ha, ha! Jack, you little dream of what has taken place, and what has caused me to be so late in visiting you to-night."

The door closed, and the bolts were shot into their staples, and the key turned.

Jack Sheppard was alone, and in darkness.

He passed his hands in a confused manner over his head as he murmured:

"What can it all mean? What has happened?"

But though he taxed his brain to the utmost, he was unable to find any solution to that difficulty.

There was nothing that he could think of that would account for Wild's extraordinary exultation.

At length he gave up the attempt in despair, and set to work to unlock his fetters.

This did not take him many minutes, and he passed the night in the same manner as the preceding one, though his sleep was not so sound, for his brain was perplexed by what had just taken place.

Before daybreak he ran up and down his cell to circulate his blood, and then put on his fetters.

It was Sunday morning, and the turnkey generally made his rounds a little later on that day, so that Jack had to sit a long while before any of them made their appearance.

At length, the same man who had brought him his supper entered, and asked him what he would like for breakfast.

There was now no longer a necessity to eat dry bread and water.

Thanks to the munificence of his visitors on the preceding day, he was in a position to have what he liked to eat and drink, for such a proceeding was not at that time at variance with prison regulations.

On this morning, then, Jack Sheppard fared sumptuously.

Scarcely, however, had he despatched the meal than the Governor, the chaplain—or ordinary, as he was called—accompanied by several turnkeys, entered the cell.

Jack gazed at them in astonishment.

But he was quickly made to understand what was meant.

On Sunday morning all the prisoners in the gaol were compelled to attend service in the chapel.

The hour had not arrived for the prisoners to be marshalled to their pews, but it was judged expedient, as Jack Sheppard was such a desperate character, to take him there, strongly guarded, before the rest.

This was done.

He was unchained from the wall, and some of the heavier portion of his fetters taken off, and then, hemmed in by about half a dozen turnkeys, he was led towards the chapel.

The Governor and the ordinary, between whom, as they were kindred spirits, a very good understanding existed, brought up the rear.

Jack Sheppard did not attempt the least resistance.

He was well aware that it could not avail him in the slightest.

He contented himself with observing as closely as he could everything that he saw.

The knowledge of the precise position of his cell would one day be useful to him.

Accordingly he paid the most particular attention to the route by which he was taken to the chapel.

He noted every passage, and counted every step in the staircase which he ascended.

At length the door of the chapel was reached.

It was a small stone chamber, and a chill air hung about it.

Jack shivered when he entered.

The silence of the grave prevailed in the place, for it was quite empty.

It was dark and gloomy-looking.

Jack was led to one particular pew which had been prepared expressly for him.

It was surrounded by boards, so that none could see him, and he could see no one.

Into this box-like place he suffered his janitors to lead him unresistingly.

Two preceded him, and two followed.

Then the door of the pew was securely locked.

Jack was now tolerably safe.

He was well secured by his fetters.

He was locked up in a place which looked more like a huge box without a lid than aught else, and he was seated with two strong turnkeys on each side of him.

There was no fear of his doing any mischief under these circumstances.

Such a thought never entered his head.

He looked up and saw the ceiling overhead, but that was the only thing that met his view.

Suddenly the tomb-like silence which prevailed was broken by a low, muffled, shuffling sound.

It was the prisoners being led into the chapel.

Then another pause took place, and then service commenced.

Jack was heartily glad when it was over.

But all the other prisoners were led back to their cells before he was released.

At length they came to him, and he was taken back to his old quarters, and chained securely to the wall.

It was now dinner-time, and the turnkey who had taken upon himself the office of purveyor brought in a capital meal, to which Jack did ample justice.

He was hardly allowed to finish it, however, for the same procession entered, and conducted him to the chapel.

This was repeated in the evening, and then he was brought back to have his supper in comfort.

Jack had only one consolation, and that was, that he had thoroughly imprinted on his mind the route to the chapel, and he was convinced that if he was once outside his cell he could find his way there blindfold.

Jonathan Wild had not made his appearance during the day.

Doubtless he thought it would be unnecessary, as he would be so closely watched.

But there was, in addition to this, another reason, with which the reader will presently be made acquainted.

At night, however—the last thing—he came, and so did the Governor.

They satisfied themselves that the fetters were all right, and then left the cell.

Jack noticed that they did not stop near so long on this occasion, and he was pleased, for it looked as though they were beginning to grow tired.

As soon as they had got out of hearing, he stooped down, and with very little trouble drew the nail out of the mortar.

He was now quite practised in the use of it, and had the locks unfastened in a trice.

No one could possibly believe the relief it was to him to be freed from his fetters even for so short a time.

Having warmed himself by moving about rapidly, he laid himself down upon the hard stone bench and composed himself to sleep.

But it was long ere he could close his eyes.

His brain was too busily speculating upon the events which had taken place, and those which were in futurity.

The sessions would commence on the morrow.

For this he felt thankful.

He was aware that during this time the attention of all the officials would be directed to the court where the trials were taking place.

The Governor would have to attend there, and so, too, would Jonathan Wild, for scarcely an assize passed without his appearing before the judge in some capacity or other.

It was not likely that this particular one would prove an exception to the general rule.

He would therefore be left more to himself, and he would have a better opportunity of making his escape, for his captors would be compelled to relax their vigilance.

This was a pleasing anticipation for Jack; and he had, moreover, another and distinct cause for congratulation.

His execution would not take place on the morrow, that was certain; for, if so, he would have received an intimation to that effect from either the Governor or the Ordinary.

In fact, the latter would have been compelled to do so.

That, then, was all right; and so, with a more comfortable feeling about his heart, and his mind full of the hope that he should be able to achieve a third escape, Jack closed his eyes and dropped off into a profound sleep, from which he awoke just as the first faint rays of daylight were creeping into his cell.

CHAPTER CCLXII.

JACK SHEPPARD FINDS IT TO HIS ADVANTAGE TO ALLOW SIR JAMES THORNHILL TO PAINT HIS PORTRAIT.

HASTILY rising, he resumed his fetters, and was only just in time, for he heard the tread of footsteps outside while he was in the act of concealing the nail between the stones, when the door was unlocked.

He assumed his old position, however, when the turnkey entered.

It was his purveyor.

A good breakfast was ordered, and when it was brought in Jack asked the man to stay and share the meal with him.

The turnkey looked at the tempting viands with hungry eyes, but declared that he dare not, for if he did he would be deprived of the privilege of waiting upon him.

"The sessions commence to-day, do they not?" asked Jack, carelessly.

"They were to have done so," replied the man.

"And will they not?"

"No."

"How is that?"

"I can hardly tell you, but somehow or other they have been put off."

"Till when?"

"Till Wednesday."

"Oh! That is very strange, is it not?"

"No, not very. It depends sometimes upon whether the list of prisoners is light or heavy."

"And is it light this time?"

"Very so! They will have plenty of time to try them all if they begin on Wednesday."

This was all the information which Jack could elicit, though what little there was was important.

He would have to defer his attempt for two days longer.

After breakfast, Jack sat for some time in deep thought; but he was interrupted by the opening of the door.

The Governor and some other figures appeared upon the threshold.

Mr. Noakes bowed low at every step as he ushered these persons into the cell.

Jack looked at them in surprise.

He was more astonished when he saw a youth appear who carried a number of curious articles.

"This way, Sir James!" said Mr. Noakes. "This way, if you please! Be good enough to walk this way, Sir James! This is the cell, and there is the prisoner."

Mr. Noakes ceased bowing and speaking at the same time, and pointed to Jack Sheppard with his finger.

The gentleman who had been addressed as Sir James inclined his head slightly.

Jack looked at him, and wondered what business a baronet could have with him.

As he looked, however, he could not avoid feeling pleased with the frank and good-tempered expression which appeared upon this gentleman's countenance.

"My name is Thornhill," he said—"Sir James Thornhill. I am a painter; and by the express desire of persons whom I dare not name I have been commissioned to visit you and, if you will allow me, to paint your portrait."

"Paint my portrait?" said Jack, in the utmost astonishment.

"Yes, paint your portrait!" interrupted the Governor. "What do you think of that, Jack? There's an honour for you!"

Jack turned round, as though to show his contempt.

His first impulse was to refuse to sit to have his portrait taken; but a thought struck him, and he hesitated.

It might be of benefit to him.

At any rate, he had an opportunity of having a little revenge upon the Governor.

So, without actually making up his mind as to what he should do, he made a very low bow as he said:

"Sir James, I am much obliged to you, but if we are to have any conversation, or come to any understanding with each other, you must order that meddling fellow to quit the cell!"

He pointed to the Governor.

Sir James Thornhill looked about him in surprise.

The Governor fairly shook with passion.

Indeed, his rage was so extreme that he could not for the life of him utter a single word.

"I am really not in a position to give orders here!" said Sir James Thornhill, in reply to Jack, "though I should be very glad to meet your wishes in any way I possibly could. I will, however, if his presence is displeasing to you, request the Governor to leave us by ourselves."

"By no means!" said Mr. Noakes, at length finding his voice—"by no means! I cannot consent to such a thing! Sir James, I should be afraid—yes, afraid to leave you in the cell alone with such a desperate malefactor!"

"You need have no fear, Sir James; I never yet broke my word, and I assure you, you have nothing whatever to fear from me!"

The painter looked from one to the other in astonishment.

"I am sorry," he said, "to find that you are not on good terms with each other—I do not know what to do!"

"Send him out, the scoundrel that he is! and we shall be able to agree, I am certain."

Now, when Sir James had been commissioned to paint Jack Sheppard's portrait, it was stated that in all probability they would have a good deal of trouble in getting him to consent; and, rather than he should fail, all possible concessions were to be made, short of any that would contribute to his release.

Sir James was therefore perplexed.

He fancied from his manner that the prisoner was by no means averse to the proceeding, the only obstacle being the presence of Mr. Noakes.

This was especially aggravating, because he could not compel the Governor to leave, as he had an undoubted right to be there.

Mr. Noakes was furious.

"Scoundrel!" he cried, "I'll give you, scoundrel!"

"You had best stand off!" said Jack, in a threatening tone of voice, and waving his fetters ominously as he spoke.

The Governor drew back.

Sir James Thornhill touched him on the arm and whispered to him earnestly.

What was said Jack did not know.

At first, however, the Governor shook his head violently, and almost refused to listen to what was said to him, but by degrees he calmed down, and eventually quitted the cell.

As he passed Jack on his way to the door he shook his fist at him in a menacing and violent manner, as he said:

"You shall suffer for this, you young spark, never fear! Just you wait, and you see if you won't repent! Ha, ha! We shall see!"

With these words the Governor retired.

As soon as the door closed behind him, Jack turned towards Sir James Thornhill with an unruffled countenance.

"I am here, sir," he said, "to answer your best pleasure! What is it you desire?"

"I wish you—not on behalf of myself, but on behalf of those by whom I have been sent—to give me a sitting for your portrait."

"If I consent," said Jack, "what advantage will it be to me?"

"It will answer your purpose quite as well as to refuse. I am not in a position to offer you any particular advantages. If you consent you will please certain powerful persons, and I will do what I can for your benefit."

"Agreed, then!" said Jack, across whose mind a sudden thought had glanced. "It is a bargain! I have never had my portrait painted, and I can't refuse the honour!"

The celebrated painter hardly knew what to make of the tone of voice with which these words were uttered, so different were they to the last, but he was not in a position to question that, and he simply made a sign to the youth who accompanied him to make his preparations.

This young man attracted a great deal of Jack's attention.

There was something in his face which he liked, and he fancied he would commiserate him in his unfortunate position.

The young man was Sir James Thornhill's apprentice. His name was William Hogarth.

The world well knows how he excelled his master.

At that time Hogarth exhibited very little of that genius which was to make him remembered to all posterity.

He was nothing but a humble apprentice, and only acquainted with the low rudiments of the art of painting.

Quietly and unostentatiously he unpacked the different articles which he had brought with him, and Jack Sheppard saw that they consisted of an easel, a piece of blank canvas stretched upon a frame, and a box containing a palette and brushes and colours.

The preparations were soon made, and the painter sat down to his task.

Jack stood quietly enough in the required position for some time.

Sir James made rapid progress with his work, and enlivened the time by conversing with Jack Sheppard, in whom, in consequence of his daring achievements, the painter, like all the rest of the world, felt an uncommon degree of interest.

This incident of the portrait is no fiction.

The painting, indeed, is to this day in existence, and many prints have been copied from it.

On the occasion the following stanzas appeared in the British Journal of November the 28th 1724.

"Thornhill, 'tis thine to gild with fame
Th' obscure, and raise the humble name;
To make the form elude the grave,
And Sheppard from oblivion save.

Tho' life, in vain, the wretch implores,
An' exile to the farthest shores;
Thy pencil brings a kind reprieve,
And bids the dying robber live.

This piece to latest times shall stand,
And show the wonders of thy hand:
Thus former masters grac'd their name,
And gave egregious robbers fame.

Apelles Alexander drew;
Cæsar is to Aurelius due;
Cromwell in Lily's works doth shine;
And Sheppard, Thornhill, lives in thine."

At length Sir James stated that he had done for the present, but that he should pay him another visit.

"Sir James," said Jack, in an imploring voice, "I have done all that you desired, and that emboldens me to make a request to you!"

"What is it? If it is in my power I will grant it."

"I want a—"

"No tool to assist you to escape!" interrupted the painter. "I have pledged my most solemn word of honour that I would not supply you with anything, and I cannot break my word!"

"I am sorry for that, Sir James—I was in hopes—"

"What?"

"That you would have given me a file."

"A file?"

"Yes, a file, and no matter how small a one."

"What good would it be to you?"

"It would enable me to escape!"

"My good fellow, listen to me! I am pleased with you, and therefore I give you this piece of earnest and good advice. Abandon all hopes of making your escape! Such a thing is impossible, even if you had a thousand files!"

"Do you think so, sir?"

"I am sure of it!"

"Then where can be the harm of giving me a file? But look you, sir! Give me one, and I will lay any wager you like that in a week after I receive it I am free!"

"No, no! I cannot—indeed I cannot listen to any such request! I have told you I have pledged my word!—but, Hogarth?"

"Yes, Sir James!"

"You have pledged your word—have you not?"

"No, sir!"

"No? Not pledged your word?"

"Certainly not, sir—no one asked me!"

"Oh, indeed! Ah—well, Mr. Sheppard—"

"Yes, Sir James!"

"The light has quite a curious effect as it streams into the cell—has it not?"

"Very, sir!" answered Jack, who thought the great painter must be a little insane.

"Ah, well, I am going to study it for a few moments, and as Hogarth has not pledged his word, it is possible you may be able to persuade him—you understand?"

And Sir James, having made this compromise, folded his arms and looked out of the grated aperture in Jack's cell with so much intentness that for a moment or two, so wrapped was he in his study, that he became quite oblivious of what passed.

Jack understood him, and so did the apprentice.

But Hogarth, although he had a desire to serve Jack as well as he could, was determined not to commit himself too far.

So when Jack renewed his entreaty for a file, he said:

"I am very sorry to refuse you. But my duty will not allow me to do such a thing—it is impossible!"

Jack ground his teeth with disappointment.

The apprentice continued:

"But I have a very bad habit of carrying files and such things about me; and I have had my pockets picked before now, especially those in the skirt of my coat."

"Enough, enough!" said Jack, in a voice of deep thankfulness; "I understand you."

Hogarth walked away, and Sir James Thornhill left the window out of which he had been gazing so intently.

"A very curious effect indeed!" he said. "I shall certainly avail myself of it in one of my next paintings. Now, Hogarth, my lad, pack up."

The apprentice obeyed; and then the painter, turning to Jack, said:

"Thanks for your sitting! We shall be here again tomorrow, and I think that will do. But my apprentice carries such dangerous articles about him! You must upon no account attempt to pick his pockets. Good morning!"

"Good morning, sir!" said Jack. "Heaven bless you, for I cannot! I am a free man!"

"Hush, hush! I should not have acted as I have if I thought you stood the least chance of making your escape. Good morning!"

CHAPTER CCCLXIII.

TAKES A GLANCE AT THE PROCEEDINGS OF BLUESKIN, AND EXPLAINS THE MYSTERY OF WILD'S EXTRAORDINARY EXULTATION.

WE fancy the reader wonders quite as much as Jack Sheppard what was the reason of Jonathan Wild's exultation.

What had occurred on Saturday that had the effect of keeping him so late before he paid his accustomed visit to the lonely prisoner in his cell?

It was something of very great importance, and the last thing that Jack would have thought of.

We will go back, then, and relate what has occurred.

We left Blueskin in a little public-house in Westminster, where he had taken refuge after his flight from Mother Robotham's.

It was an out-of-the-way place, and he felt that he should be in tolerable safety, for there was little fear of his pursuers being able to track him to this place.

For a long while he remained immovable.

He was in deep thought.

There was much to perplex him.

Like Jack, he knew not what to think of the account which had been given him of the departure of Edgworth Bess from the infamous den in Spring Gardens.

He arrived, however, at the conclusion that there was some misconception somewhere—that he had either been told more or less than the truth.

That she had left he felt certain; and having this point to start from, he occupied himself with thinking what the poor girl would be most likely to do if she found herself at liberty to go where she listed.

This puzzled him for a long [time, but at length he started and muttered:

"I have it now! Nothing can be more simple! The thought ought to have occurred to me before. This young man they spoke of she doubtless persuaded to assist her to escape; and then, being anxious to learn something of us, or having nowhere else to go, she would make her way to Johnson's, at the Black Lion, in Drury Lane. That is it, I am certain."

As the reader has already been placed in possession of all the incidents which occurred to poor Edgworth Bess, he will immediately be able to see how far Blueskin was right, and how far he was wrong.

In the first portion of his surmise he came remarkably near the truth.

In the latter part he wandered away from it.

Still, the thought having once taken hold of his mind, appeared to be so plausible and natural, that it is not to be wondered at that he felt so confident as he did.

He felt, too, that he could not rest until he had fully satisfied himself upon the point.

To start just at present, with so many on the look-out for him, was too dangerous, and so he was forced to control his impatience for a time.

He had chosen the most obscure corner in the room, and here he resolved to sit until the heat of the chase had evaporated.

It was early morning, [so he had plenty of time before him.

But his thoughts were not idle.

His brain was busy all the while in thinking upon the best course of action he could adopt.

Time passed.

Hour after hour glided by, and still he was undisturbed.

Still he did not move.

As he had remained so long, he felt that he could not do better than stay until the brief winter's day had come to a close.

Then, under cover of the friendly darkness, he would be able to repair to his destination.

This was a wise determination upon his part.

As soon as it was fairly dark, he rose, paid for what he had had, and took his departure.

He made his way to his destination in a devious, circuitous manner—at one time bending towards it, and at another appearing to go in a contrary direction.

But Blueskin knew his ground, and after a time he emerged from a court into Drury Lane.

It was at the lower part of this thoroughfare, and not far from the Black Lion, that he appeared.

Two steps took him to the door, and he entered without hesitation.

The same scene of revelry was going on.

Every night was just the same; and although it was so long since he had visited the place, Blueskin could detect no alteration.

Passing by the door which opened into the room where the revellers were assembled, he directed his steps towards the bar.

This place was private, and very few were privileged to enter it.

But Blueskin was one of the favoured number.

He placed his hand upon the knob of the door, turned it, and entered.

There was no one in the little room save an untidy, dirty servant, who was doing something at the fireplace.

She was a small, thin creature, with face and hands as black as a negro's.

Here eyes, too, were large and black, and she fixed them steadfastly upon Blueskin as soon as he came in, and rose from her knees.

He, however, paid but little attention to her.

Seating himself in a chair, he inquired for the landlord, and bade her tell him he was wanted.

She departed with great alacrity, and in a moment afterwards Johnson entered.

He was both surprised and pleased to see his old friend Blueskin.

A long time had elapsed since they had last seen each other, and their greeting was a warm one, for they had been firm friends for many years.

"You can, perhaps, guess what has brought me here?" said Blueskin abruptly.

"Nay, that I cannot."

"Cannot! Has not someone arrived here before me?"

"Someone! Who? Speak out; I do not understand!"

"Alas, alas!"

"Why do you cry alas?"

"I find that I am mistaken."

"In what? Speak freely, Blueskin. What is amiss?"

"To be brief with you, I expected to find Edgworth Bess here. Are you sure that she has not arrived?"

"Quite sure."

Blueskin groaned.

"Then I know not what has become of her," he said "Heaven help her!"

"Come, Blueskin!" said Johnson, "tell me all that has taken place. You know you can trust me, and you are safe here, for Jonathan Wild has not paid me a troublesome visit for a long time."

"We have not been near the place lately."

"I suppose that is the reason. But come, tell me what has happened! It may perhaps be in my power to be of assistance to you in some way or other."

"Oh, Johnson, things have all gone wrong—one misfortune has followed another. Jack Sheppard is a prisoner in Newgate, and Edgworth Bess we have lost, and know not where to look for her!"

"The first bit of news I was already in possession of; but about the latter I knew nothing until a minute or two ago. We must talk over this. But you look sick and faint. You must have some refreshment."

"I shall be glad of a little food, Johnson. It is a long time since I have taken any."

"It seems so by your looks."

"It is a long while; and perhaps when I have had a good meal I shall feel in better spirits."

"To be sure you will. Here, wait a minute, and I will see to it. Martha!—Martha!"

But no Martha replied.

Johnson repeated the summons in a louder tone.

The same result.

"Curse that girl!" he said—"I'll discharge her. She is never here when she is wanted!"

Blueskin took but little notice of this, nor did Johnson appear to attach any importance to her absence.

Yet it concerned them materially, and it would have been well if he had looked after her.

She had not long been in his employ; and from the scant satisfaction she gave, she was not likely to remain.

So Johnson did without her.

Little did they imagine how she was engaged at that very moment.

We have said that she looked up when Blueskin entered.

She fixed her large, coal-black eyes upon his countenance with an intentness that would have aroused his suspicions had he been less pre-occupied than he was.

At his bidding she told Johnson that he was wanted by someone in the bar, and having watched the landlord into that place, she stole to the door and placed her ear against the keyhole.

In this listening attitude she did not long remain.

With a bright glitter in her eye and an expression of great satisfaction on her face, she rose and sauntered to the front door of the inn.

As soon as she reached it she stood a moment, and then, confident that no one within the house was watching her motions, she darted off into the darkness, and was in a moment lost to sight in the court on the opposite side of the street, down which she hastened.

On she went through the streets, with her head uncovered and her ragged apparel streaming in the wind behind her.

On she went, threading her way through mazy courts with marvellous facility, darting across busy thoroughfares, and dodging through the ranks of the pedestrians.

Her course was almost a straight one, and at length, panting and exhausted with her exertions, she emerged into the Old Bailey, near the Snow Hill end.

Across this street she hurried, and round the corner of the prison into Newgate Street.

Then she paused for a moment before a house.

Looked at it attentively, and finally sprang up the steps.

She seized the knocker and executed a vigorous peal.

The house was Jonathan Wild's house, and the mystery of her making her way hither will shortly be elucidated.

The portal of the thief-taker's abode was always quickly opened.

The man on the lock looked surprised when he saw who it was.

He was about to close the door against her, but she glided in like a shadow, and demanded an immediate interview with Jonathan Wild.

She was told he was out.

This intelligence filled her with dismay, but she implored that he might be immediately sent for.

The man hardly knew what would be best for him to do, but finally he determined to send a messenger to Wild, as he happened to be close at hand.

A janizary was called and sent after him.

They had not far to send, for Jonathan had only gone to pay one of his frequent and accustomed visits to Jack Sheppard in his cell.

The janizary who had been sent met Wild just as he was leaving the prison, and at once delivered his message.

Jonathan hastened homeward at an unusual speed.

Upon entering the hall he seemed to recognise the girl at the first glance, and he beckoned to her to follow him.

He led the way into the little office and closed the door.

"Oh, Mr. Wild," said the girl, gaspingly—"he's come!"

"Who's come?"

"Blueskin!"

"Impossible!"

"No, sir—he's come! You told me to let you know, and promised me five pounds. Give it to me—he's come!"

"But when?" asked the thief-taker, who seemed to doubt the truth of what the girl said.

"A little while ago. I was a-lighting the fire in the bar, and he opened the door and came in. He asked for Johnson, and I knowed him in a minute!"

"Well?"

"Johnson went to him, and I left them talking to each other about Jack Sheppard and Edgworth Bess. Make haste, Mr. Wild, for I don't think he's going to stay!"

"You shall have the five pounds, girl, if I find what you have told me is correct."

Jonathan did not wait to ask any further questions, but going into the hall, summoned all his janizaries about him.

As for the girl, she was to follow them.

Hastily bidding his men get their weapons in readiness, as they might have some stiff work to do, he proceeded to arm himself.

In a few moments they were all in the street, and at a rapid pace he led the way towards the Black Lion in Drury Lane.

The thief-taker's heart bounded exultingly, for now he felt no doubt he should accomplish the capture of Blueskin, and then he should have things all in his own hands, and be completely master of the situation.

Away they went, taking the nearest and most direct route to their destination, preceded by the girl, who outstripped them all.

This girl was the daughter of one of Wild's janizaries, and entirely devoted to his interests.

He had drilled her well into what she was to do.

She was to go to the Black Lion, and obtain a situation there as a servant.

But she was to make it her especial business to watch for the appearance of either Blueskin, Jack Sheppard, or Edgworth Bess.

As soon as any one of them appeared at the inn, she was to make her way with all possible speed to Jonathan's house, and give the information, and she was to have five pounds for her trouble.

This sum seemed to the poor girl to be nothing short of a fortune.

She was only too delighted at having the chance to earn such a sum in such a manner; and we have seen how readily she had started off to give her information when she had assured herself that it was really Blueskin who had entered.

She recognised his features and his general bearing, for Jonathan had been exceedingly careful to give her a full and perfect description of the appearance of all three of those persons whose capture he so much desired to effect.

CHAPTER CCLXIV.

JONATHAN WILD MAKES A CLOSE SEARCH IN THE BLACK LION, AND DISCOVERS THE HIDING-PLACE ON THE STAIRS.

WITHOUT a thought that danger was so close at hand, Blueskin and Johnson sat together in the bar, talking to each other and endeavouring to come to some definite idea as to what would be the best thing to be done.

Knowing that he could trust the landlord, Blueskin had not scrupled to confide everything to him, and having done so he waited with some impatience and anxiety for his opinion.

It had taken Blueskin some time to relate all that had taken place, and Johnson was just hesitating what to say when someone entered and came to the bar counter.

It was one of Johnson's best customers, and one who was under deep obligations to the landlord.

"Joe!" he said—"Joe, come here in a minute—I have something important to tell you!"

There was something in the man's voice and manner which made Johnson instantly suspect that something was amiss.

"What is the matter, Benton?"

"Well, it may be nothing. It just depends whether you have got anyone particular in the house!"

"How so?"

"Because if you have, look fly—that's all!"

"Speak out, man! What is the matter?"

"Why, Jonathan Wild, with a whole troop of his rascals at his back, and led on by that black devil of a servant of yours, is making straight for the place, and in another minute will be here!"

Blueskin started to his feet upon receipt of this intelligence.

"I have been betrayed!" he said.

"Hush!" exclaimed Johnson. "It's that little black-faced imp! If you remember, she did not answer when I called. Quick!—follow me!—fear nothing!—all will be well! I will hide you where Jonathan Wild, if he was ten times cleverer than he is, would never find you!"

While speaking, the landlord led the way to the staircase.

Blueskin followed him closely.

They were only just in time, for at that very moment Wild was placing his men in various positions, where they could command a good view of the house.

"I am going to hide you," said Johnson, "where I once hid Jack Sheppard when the hottest pursuit was made after him!"

"And he was not found?"

"Oh no, never fear! Do not be alarmed—you were never safer than you are at this moment, and if you will only secrete yourself in the place I shall point out, you may laugh at Jonathan Wild and his impotent search!"

"Where is this place?"

"Here!"

Johnson paused on the staircase.

"Here?" repeated Blueskin, with surprise.

"Yes, here!"

He stooped down as he spoke, and took hold of the top of the stair in the manner we have already described in the hundred and first chapter of this narrative.

Blueskin was naturally enough astounded when he saw the landlord draw away the top part of the stair like a shelf.

"Now then!" cried Johnson—"quick! in with you! I can hear Jonathan below! The place is lined with felt, so you will find it comfortable enough, and you will have no difficulty about breathing."

"It looks like a coffin!"

"Never mind the looks! Get in quick, or it will be too late! When I have pushed this sliding piece of wood back into its proper position you will be safe, and as soon as it is prudent to do so I will come up and release you."

Blueskin made no more demur, though he rather shrank from entering the coffin-like place which was disclosed.

He found, however, that the place was much more comfortable than he could have believed possible.

With all speed, Johnson pushed the sliding piece of board back into its proper place, and then precipitately descended the stairs, for a tremendous hubbub from below reached his ears.

No sooner did he make his appearance than Jonathan yelled out:

"Seize him! Seize that man! Clap the darbies on him—he is a prisoner!"

A dozen men sprang forward to obey this order, and before he knew what had taken place, Johnson found himself securely handcuffed.

"By what authority do you do this?" he asked. "Upon what charge do you make me a prisoner?"

"Upon a very good charge, my friend!"

"What is it?"

"That of harbouring felons in your house."

"Where are they?"

"We shall find them!"

"You must do so before you venture to make me a prisoner!"

"Nothing of the kind. I want to save you all the trouble I can, so a couple of my men will remain here to take charge of you!"

Johnson knew it would be quite useless to say a word, and so he submitted without further bother to his captor's pleasure.

In the meantime, Jonathan Wild, at the head of his disorderly crew, dashed up the staircase.

His motive for this was because Johnson had descended and he jumped to the conclusion that Blueskin was above, and that Johnson had just come down, after putting him in some place of concealment.

On the first landing he placed several of the men, and continued his course upwards.

Blueskin heard their feet upon the stair beneath which he lay, and his heart trembled lest they should discover any difference in the feel or sound.

But all seemed well, and the thief-taker and his band made their way to the next storey.

Above that were the attics, and then the roof.

Jonathan decided upon a thorough search, and so kept on until he came to the roof, on which he posted one of his men to keep watch.

This man could signal to those who were posted in the street, to whom he was clearly visible, in case anything should be amiss.

The attics were closely searched in every corner, but without result.

No trace of Blueskin could be found.

Here, however, another man was left, while Wild and the rest descended to the next flight.

Here the same course was adopted, but their close search met with no success whatever.

It never occurred to Wild to look underneath the stairs.

When they descended to the first floor, Blueskin's hopes revived, and he began to participate in the confidence which Johnson felt.

Reluctantly, Jonathan was compelled to come down to the ground floor again.

A faint smile of triumph appeared on the landlord's lips when he descended.

But he banished it quickly.

Jonathan was furious, and yet he dissembled.

He called Johnson aside.

"Look here!" he said, in a low voice. "This will prove a serious thing to you. I have most certain knowledge that Blueskin is in the house, and I will not quit it until I have found him! I shall take you with me, and it will be the ruin of you when it turns out that you have been concealing Blueskin in your house!"

"Jonathan Wild!"

"That's my name; what do you want?"

"Why, you can spare your breath, that's all! Your fine speeches are quite thrown away upon me! I know nothing of the man you want, and you are heartily welcome to look for him as long as you like! When you have found him, then it will be time for me to talk and make terms with you!"

"Oh, will it?" said the thief-taker, in a towering passion.

"We will see about that, Mr. Landlord. I am certain he is here! I am certain, too, that you have concealed him somewhere upstairs; I could tell that by the smile on your lips when I came down without finding him!"

Jonathan shrugged his shoulders, but made no further reply.

"Now, landlord," continued Wild, "look here! If you have got an atom of sense, you will be able to see that it will answer your purpose very much better to keep in with me than with this Jack Sheppard lot. Just put me on the scent where I am to find Blueskin, and I will overlook all the past, and will take care that you don't get into any trouble over this present affair!"

"I am not afraid of doing so!" said Johnson, resolutely.

"I tell you again, I know nothing of the man you want. If you can find him here, well and good. I know nothing about it—that's all I can say!"

Jonathan Wild turned away with a diabolical curse upon his lips.

He found Johnson quite impracticable.

He had no resource but to recommence his search.

Upstairs he went again, in a state of mind of which the reader may be able to form some feeble idea.

He renewed his search with double strictness, but as he looked everywhere except under the particular stair where Blueskin was concealed, he found nothing, and we need not trouble the reader with the details of his unsuccessful search.

At his wits' end what to do next, Wild all at once be-thought himself of the girl who had brought him the information.

He recollected that since he entered the house he had seen nothing of her, and he now despatched one of his janizaries in search of her, with instructions to bring her to him at once, should she be found.

While the man was absent, the thief-taker occupied himself with examining the places which the men had searched.

The janizary who had been sent after the little servant-girl found her in Drury Lane, standing outside the house, for she was afraid to enter.

Under the protection of this man, however, she was safe from any violence which the inhabitants of the Black Lion might offer to her, and she was led upstairs on to the landing upon which the thief-taker stood.

He beckoned her towards him.

"You are sure Blueskin was here when you left?"

"Yes. Have you not found him?" asked the girl, fearful that she should lose the reward.

"No, I cannot find him, though he is in the house I am confident, but hidden somewhere.

The girl clapped her hands, and her face brightened.

"I have it!" she said.

"What?—what?"

"I know where he is hidden!"

Jonathan shook her roughly.

"You—you? Where? Tell me where?"

"You hurt me! Let me go! I won't tell you if you don't!"

Wild released his hold immediately.

"Now—where?"

"If you find him where I say, how much will you give me?"

"Ten—twenty pounds?"

"Twenty pounds?"

"Yes, but be quick and tell me!"

"You promise me twenty pounds?"

"Yes, if you are quick, and tell me without further delay, not without."

"Well, then, I heard Johnson talking once about a hiding-place in the stairs."

"In the stairs?"

"Yes."

"Well—well, what more?"

"I would not rest until I had found it out."

"You did find it out?"

"Yes."

"Where is it, then? Tell me at once, and you shall have, not twenty pounds, but fifty!"

The girl gasped for breath.

"The fifth stair," she said, at length—"the fifth stair!"

Jonathan called his men around him.

"Show it me!" he said.

The girl went without hesitation to the stair with the movable top, beneath which Blueskin lay.

"You must take hold of it by the edge and pull it," she said. "It will slide off then!"

"Come out of the way, then!"

The girl sprang lightly up the staircase, and crouching down, looked eagerly at Wild and his men.

They had heard the latter part of his communication, and knew what to do.

Blueskin, too, had heard every syllable, and there he lay as though in a tomb, unable to help himself in the least, for the lid of the stair could not be moved by the person within.

There was but one thing he could do.

He was already discovered, and as soon as the top was drawn off he would spring up, and endeavour to take them by surprise.

The janizaries, instructed by the girl, took hold of the edge of the stair, and drew it off.

True to his purpose, Blueskin started up with a suddenness that had in it something marvellous.

But this was exactly what the janizaries expected, and they were prepared for it accordingly, and seized him tightly.

A tremendous struggle ensued, the result of which was that all rolled down to the landing.

Jonathan was standing here, and he now lent his aid towards securing Blueskin.

But they had a difficult task to perform.

He was determined not to give in to his foes without a most desperate struggle, although the odds were so fearfully against him.

But with so many foes he stood but a poor chance, and finally he was secured.

Jonathan's face lighted up with an expression of demoniac joy.

"Ha, ha!" he cried. "Caught at last!—caught at last! Ha, ha! I knew I should have you! Caught at last!"

The men now forced Blueskin to descend the stairs.

He was completely exhausted by his struggles, and Wild stood with his drawn sword in a threatening attitude, so to escape a serious wound he suffered himself to be led down.

CHAPTER CCCLXV.

BLUESKIN IS TAKEN TO NEWGATE BY JONATHAN WILD, AND HENRY FIELDING, THE MAGISTRATE, COMMITS HIM FOR TRIAL.

THE thief-taker's visage expanded into a grin when he thought of the triumph he had achieved over Johnson, the landlord, and he went downstairs with the air and manner of one who was thoroughly and completely satisfied with himself.

He blew his whistle shrilly, which would let all the men know that the capture had been effected, and that it was unnecessary for them to keep a look-out any longer.

It was also a signal to them to repair without delay to the thief-taker, and receive further instructions from him.

Johnson heard the uproar above, and guessed what had taken place, and yet he could scarcely bring himself to believe that the hiding-place upon the security of which he had prided himself so much had been discovered.

He heard the trampling of feet on the staircase, and fixed his eyes steadfastly in that direction.

The first glimpse he caught of Jonathan Wild's face was sufficient to convince him that what he had feared was true.

"Ha, ha, Johnson!" Wild cried. "Perhaps you would like to come to terms now? But it is too late, my friend, and I will take care that you pay dearly for this little game!"

Then turning to his men, he continued:

"Keep him close prisoner; he shall accompany his friend to the old stone jug!"

By this time, Blueskin, completely surrounded by men, had reached the passage.

He felt that resistance was worse than useless, and therefore had the good sense to remain quite still.

He trusted that a more favourable opportunity of making a vigorous effort would presently occur.

This, however, was a very frail hope.

We know full well how Wild had set his heart upon Blueskin's capture.

We also know that it was material to the success of his plans that Blueskin should be lodged in Newgate.

Therefore we think that his chances of having any opportunity afforded him are so small as to amount to nothing.

Yet he did not despair.

Jonathan was determined to lose no time.

He ordered one of his men to call a hackney-coach, and when this drew up before the door, Blueskin was compelled to enter it.

Jonathan Wild got in along with him.

As many janizaries as could squeeze themselves into the vehicle followed.

The remainder were ordered to proceed to Newgate on foot, and to take Johnson thither with them, for Wild was determined to punish him for concealing Blueskin in the house.

The thief-taker sat opposite to his prisoner, who was well secured, and so crushed by the men on either side of him that he could not move a limb.

With such a heavy load, the hackney-coach made but slow progress, and they were a long time in reaching the prison.

Upon their arrival, Jonathan discovered that those who had come on foot had reached there first.

The intelligence was at once communicated that a very important prisoner had been captured, and preparations were made accordingly.

Jonathan was certain that an attempt would now be made to escape, and he redoubled his vigilance.

The event proved that he was perfectly correct.

No sooner had he descended from the vehicle than Blueskin made a most desperate effort to get free.

But it was in vain.

His foes were too numerous for a single man to contend against, and he was hurried up the steps into the vestibule despite his strenuous resistance.

Then the door was closed, and he was safe.

The Governor now appeared, and when he saw who stood before him his delight knew no bounds.

"Ha, ha!" he cried, as he rubbed his hands together in that disagreeable manner which was peculiar to him—

FIGG THE PRIZEFIGHTER PAYS A VISIT TO JACK SHEPPARD IN NEWGATE.

"we shall have a rare session this time, Mr. Wild! Never saw Newgate honoured as it is now!"

He made a mock bow as he concluded this speech.

"We shall have a rare show at Tyburn, Mr. Noakes!" said Wild, with a grin.

The Governor laughed; and then, doubtless considering that he had sufficiently indulged in this pleasantry, he gave instructions for Blueskin's confinement in a strong dungeon in a quarter of the prison as far removed from that in which Jack Sheppard was as possibly could be.

Jonathan and the Governor both saw him carefully bestowed.

He was thoroughly searched, and every article that was in his pockets taken from him.

Then they chained him to the wall, and fettered him much in the same way.

In short, nothing was left undone that would in any way conduce to his safe keeping.

Then they retired, and left him to the solitude and silence of his dungeon.

No. 75.—BLUESKIN.

It was agreed and strictly enjoined that Jack Sheppard should be kept in absolute ignorance of all that had taken place.

Upon no account was he to be informed that Blueskin had been made prisoner.

That knowledge was to be kept from him to the last.

Thus it happened that Blueskin was in the chapel on the Sunday along with the other prisoners without one seeing the other.

We have described how Jack was placed in his pew before the arrival of the rest, and taken from it after all had departed.

Little did Jack dream that Blueskin was, like himself, a prisoner within those walls.

He pictured him at liberty, taking measures to procure his release, and watching over the safety of Edgworth Bess.

What words could describe the exultation which now reigned paramount in the heart of that bold, bad man, Jonathan Wild?

He felt that the hour of his triumph had at length arrived.

No longer was he to be vexed and chafed by the perpetual failure of his schemes.

All was accomplished.

Edgworth Bess was a prisoner in his own house, watched over by his son.

Blueskin and Jack Sheppard were confined in Newgate, and so well guarded and closely watched as to make escape a matter of impossibility.

The sessions would come on on Wednesday.

Monday was the proper day; but this postponement suited Jonathan exactly.

It enabled him to get a case ready against Blueskin, and have him tried in readiness for the next hanging-day, when he should have the inexpressible gratification of seeing both swing together at Tyburn.

In the meantime, however, he had much to do.

When he paid Jack his last visit, it was with difficulty that he restrained himself from triumphing over him by telling him how affairs stood; but he had the prudence to vanquish this inclination.

He went home, and on the way felicitated himself that at length all was accomplished.

Nay, not all.

He recollected that all was not done.

There were the papers.

Those papers of which he had gained possession with so much difficulty, and which had disappeared in so mysterious a manner.

He would have to recover those; but he hoped that ere long they would turn up.

Little did he think that his own hopeful son had concealed them in order to answer his own purposes.

Somehow, after their last interview, Jonathan felt inclined to place confidence in his son.

He was indeed completely deceived by his well-acted indignation.

His first care upon reaching home was to ascertain whether Edgworth Bess was safe.

He was answered in the affirmative, so far as her being in his power and in the house was concerned; but she was suffering from a raging fever which had seized upon her, brought on, it seemed, by excitement and leaving her room too soon.

About this Jonathan cared little when Mr. Snaxall told him that there was no immediate danger.

He had made up his mind not to trouble himself with her until he had seen Blueskin and Jack Sheppard disposed of.

Then he should be quite free from all fear of interruption, which would be much better than taking any active steps while they were alive.

But this close contemplation of success did not make Wild feel so comfortable as he thought it would.

The many failures and reverses he had met with made him fearful that even this time he was going to be disappointed.

Whether his forebodings were groundless, time alone can show.

On the Monday morning when Jack Sheppard had his extraordinary interview with Sir James Thornhill, Blueskin was taken before a magistrate.

It so happened that this magistrate was Henry Fielding, who lives for ever in his novels.

He had a most invincible dislike to Jonathan Wild, and he was never so pleased as when he could check or thwart him in some of his villainies.

On the present occasion, however, no opportunity offered itself.

He well knew that for a long time past warrants had been issued for the apprehension of Blueskin, and a large reward had been offered by the Government for his capture.

When, therefore, Jonathan brought him up and preferred his charge, and some other persons came forward and swore to his identity, the worthy magistrate could do no more than commit him to take his trial at the next sessions.

This was all Jonathan Wild required.

This took place on Monday.

The sessions had been postponed till Wednesday, so there would be no delay in bringing Blueskin to trial.

Wild of course counted upon sentence of death being passed upon him, and in this calculation he was unquestionably correct.

When this little preliminary step had been taken, Wild felt somewhat easier in his mind.

Still he was continually haunted by the dread that at the last moment something would go wrong, and affairs would resume their wonted aspect.

Every care was taken that Blueskin should be led back to Newgate in safety, and he was at length lodged in his cell and heavily ironed as before.

Since his imprisonment a feeling of deep dejection had come over Blueskin.

He could not shake it off, though he strove hard to do so.

His mind was weighed down with a presentiment that all was over—that Jonathan Wild would triumph.

He was a helpless prisoner, so closely watched that it made the bare whisper of escape a mockery.

His comrade Jack was powerless to aid him, for he was already in the same predicament.

Then there was poor Edgworth Bess, he knew not where, but more likely in the power of the thief-taker than anywhere else.

Having such thoughts as these, it is not to be wondered at that Blueskin should give way to hopeless despair.

Indeed, such a change came over him as would scarcely be credited by anyone, and those who knew him best would almost fail to recognise him.

He could see no way out of his difficulty.

Over and over again he blamed himself for relying upon the hiding-place in the stairs as he had, and yet what could he have done better?

Then he thought of Johnson, and was grieved to think of the trouble which he had brought upon him, for the offence with which he was charged was one that was heavily punished.

It will be seen, then, that, let him turn his thoughts in whichever direction he would, he was unable to perceive a single gleam of hope.

The time was short, too, before his trial came on, and with the result of it he was perfectly well acquainted.

He knew that nothing whatever would get him off—that not even the ablest counsel could procure any commutation of his sentence.

He resolved, therefore, to employ no one, but to go into court undefended.

Such a course would answer his purpose quite as well.

With his head bowed down upon his knees, and in a state of utter dejection, Blueskin passed the time which intervened between his committal and the morning of his trial.

Had it not been for the great influence of Jonathan Wild in the proper quarter, and the strenuous exertions which he made, the trial would not have taken place until next session; but he gave such an account of the danger of putting it off, and the opportunities that it would allow the prisoner of making his escape, that he gained his point, and Blueskin's trial was appointed to take place on the Friday, which was the last day, for on this occasion the calendar was lighter than it had been known to be for a long time.

Such, then, being Blueskin's unfortunate position, we will turn our thoughts to Jack Sheppard, who never for one moment dreamt that his old comrade was so close to him.

CHAPTER CCLXVI.

JACK SHEPPARD PICKS HOGARTH'S POCKET, AND MAKES AN APPOINTMENT WITH SIR JAMES THORNHILL.

AFTER the departure of Sir James Thornhill and his apprentice, William Hogarth, Jack Sheppard's heart felt much lighter than it had done since the moment of his capture.

He now saw before him the chance of achieving his freedom, for it was no lightly-made assertion to which he had given utterance when he said he should be free so soon.

There was no mistaking the meaning of his two visitors, though each strove to conceal it as much as possible.

Sir James having given his word that he would not furnish the prisoner with any weapon by which he might effect his escape, of course incapacitated him from yielding to Jack's entreaties.

But he gave a hint to his apprentice, which was acted upon while he pretended to be particularly engaged in noting the effect of light and shade through the window in the cell.

Hogarth had shown himself not less cautious than his master, but yet Jack understood him.

When they were gone, he clasped his hands together joyfully, as he murmured:

"Oh, yes, yes; all will yet be well, in spite of the vigilance of my keepers! I shall achieve a third escape from Newgate! I think even now an abatement in their watchfulness is perceptible."

He sank down upon his seat.

"I must watch every opportunity," he continued. "To-morrow I shall receive a file; that will be Tuesday. On Wednesday the sessions will commence. I shall then be troubled less with the company of the Governor, for he will have to attend in court all day. The turnkeys, too, will have extra duty; and even Jonathan Wild—the man I have to fear above all the rest—some portion of his time will be taken up at the assizes, for there never was a sessions yet when he was not prosecutor or witness against something. All things conspire in my favour. That will be the time, and I fear not I shall accomplish my design! The grand thing will be to get rid of these perpetual visits. While they continue, I shall have no chance at all!"

With these and a thousand other thoughts did Jack Sheppard occupy himself during the day.

He was visited as usual by Jonathan and the Governor, and a crowd of people who had been actuated by their curiosity to come and gaze upon him.

But this scene need not to be elaborated.

They came and gazed upon the prisoner, and left him money, and so the time passed away.

It certainly had the effect of causing the day to seem less tedious to Jack, who, nevertheless, felt dreadfully impatient for the morrow to come.

At length the last visitor took his leave; darkness filled the cell, and the prisoner was left alone.

When the time arrived for it to be safe to do so, Jack removed his fetters by the aid of the cleverly-concealed nail, and slept in tolerable comfort—certainly with more than his captors were willing that he should enjoy.

Then the morning came, which he so anxiously expected.

Long before the time he seated himself on his stone bench, and waited for the arrival of the painter.

At length he came, and it was with difficulty Jack could conceal from the observation of the turnkey the joy which his advent occasioned.

Sir James spoke kindly and freely to Jack, for, if the truth must be told, he felt some fear of him, and above all things he wished to conciliate him as much as possible.

Willingly enough Jack stood in the desired attitude, and the painter went on with his work.

About what had taken place on the preceding day not a word was said, but Jack kept a sharp look-out upon the apprentice Hogarth, in whose coat-pocket, beyond all doubt, was the little tool which he so desired to possess.

But the youth kept purposely away from Jack, for it was his intention not to allow Jack to put his hand into his pocket until the very last moment.

Jack chafed at this, for he felt that could he but have felt the file in his hand he would have been content.

Still, he did not like to say a word about it, as both his visitors remained silent.

But he fretted and fumed exceedingly.

This sitting was a much longer one than that on the preceding day, for Sir James wished to avoid a third visit to the prison.

He worked away, however, with right good will, and presently Jack had the satisfaction of hearing him say:

"I have done! Thank you—that will do! I can fill up the remainder of the portrait, without difficulty, from memory alone. What do you think of it—is it a good portrait?"

He turned the canvas as he spoke, and Jack for the first time had a glance at his work.

The face was all that could be said to be finished.

This, however, was all that Jack looked upon, and he was absolutely astounded with the fidelity of the likeness.

"You are quite satisfied, then?" said Sir James.

"Quite!"

"I am glad of that! I wish you could see it when finished."

"Do you, sir?"

"Certainly!"

"Then I'll have a look at it!"

Sir James attempted to smile.

"When will it be finished?" continued Jack, speaking in a voice of the utmost seriousness.

"In a few days."

"Let me see! To-day is Tuesday. Will it be finished by next Monday?"

"Oh, before then!"

"And where will it be, sir?"

"That I cannot tell. What imports it that you should know?"

"Perhaps more than you imagine. Next Monday, you say, the portrait will be finished?"

"Yes!"

"And will it be at your house?"

"In all probability."

"Then, Sir James, I will take the liberty of calling upon you next Monday evening, some time between sunset and midnight, if you will be kind enough to be at home and show me the portrait!"

"Pho, pho! You must not think of such a thing. Occupy your mind with more serious matters!"

"Will you be at home, Sir James, next Monday evening—and if I call, will you show me the portrait?"

"If you call, I will!"

"You lay adoubtful emphasis upon your promise; but I assure you, sir, that without fail I shall be there!"

Sir James looked rather uncomfortable, but still he felt that he could say nothing further.

"Of course," continued Jack, "I speak——"

Sir James held up his hand.

"Not a word further," he said, in a low voice. "I know what you are about to say, but for my sake pray be silent—we may be overheard!"

This was enough.

Jack was silent immediately.

"All right, sir!" he added, after a pause. "Never fear, sir, I shall call, for I am curious to a degree to see my portrait when it is finished."

While this brief and hurried conversation had been taking place, Hogarth had been busily employed in packing up the different articles, and having finished, he stooped down to the box of colours on the floor, as though about to pick it up.

He stooped down close to Jack's feet, and did so in such a manner that one of the pockets in his coat gaped open.

Jack Sheppard was quick-witted enough to perfectly understand what was meant.

In an instant he dived his hand into the pocket so temptingly open.

It contained but one article, and this he seized.

After glancing at it for a moment, he transferred it to his own pocket.

It was a small and beautifully-made steel file, with teeth which looked as though they would cut through the hardest iron like a saw will cut through wood.

As soon as Hogarth felt that Jack had taken the file, he rose to his feet with the box in his hand.

"I have had my pockets picked before now, Sir James," he said, "when they contained very valuable articles indeed; but you cannot help having things taken off you sometimes—can you?"

"Certainly not."

"It is not my fault if some one else takes anything out of my pocket. Surely I am not to blame!"

"No one would think of blaming you for a moment if you were unfortunate enough to have your pocket picked."

"I thought not, sir."

"Come, my lad, we will be off!"

"I am quite ready, sir."

"Good-bye, Jack," said Sir James. "I am much obliged to you for giving me such a patient sitting."

"Oh, don't mention it, sir—pray don't mention it! I won't wish you good-bye!"

"Why not?"

"I hope, sir, you have not forgotten next Monday night already?"

"Oh no, I have not forgotten it—but——"

"Never doubt it, sir—I shall come, and shall rely upon your honour not to hand me over to the police."

"You have nothing to fear on that account, I can assure you; but I think you had better give up all hopes of such a thing."

"Pho, pho! I shall be free long before then, but I shall have some little matters to attend to first, and I wanted to appoint a time when I should be perfectly at leisure."

Sir James looked at Jack Sheppard with the greatest amazement depicted upon his countenance.

Jack had spoken in such a cool, calm tone that he was absolutely staggered, and he looked round him once or twice to make sure that he was really in Newgate, and that what was taking place was not a dream.

"Well, well, Jack," he said, "you have done some wonderful things in your short life, I admit—I should not have painted your portrait if you had not; but if you escape from Newgate this time, you will outdo all that you have ever done before."

"I shall do it, Sir James. I am one not given to empty boasting."

"I will not say good-bye, then," said the painter.

"Certainly not; for as sure as I now say it, I shall see you on Monday!"

Sir James and his apprentice now withdrew; but before they left the cell, Jack was careful to conceal the file where he had concealed the nail—that is to say, in the soft mortar between the stones with which the floor of his dungeon was paved.

He pushed it in in a slanting direction, and in so clever a manner as to defy detection.

It was well he took this precaution, for just after Sir James and his apprentice had quitted the cell, Jonathan Wild and the Governor entered.

The former looked sharply and suspiciously about him as he said:

"I'll be d—d if I like this portrait-painting job, and I am heartily glad it's over!"

"So am I."

"We will search the cell."

"I do not suspect Sir James," said the Governor. "He is an upright, honourable man, and he gave me his solemn word of honour that he would not supply the prisoner with anything."

"Bah!"

"You would not take his word?"

"No, nor his oath!"

As he spoke, Jonathan advanced towards Jack Sheppard, and rapidly examined him from head to foot.

He searched in all his pockets and felt all his garments.

Of course, he found nothing.

Then he looked closely all about the stone bench and under it, and everywhere, but the thought that they were concealed in the mortar between the stones never occurred to him, nor was it likely to do so, for he would have thought naturally enough that the mortar was hard and impracticable for such a purpose.

With what anxiety Jack Sheppard awaited the result of this close search the reader may perforce imagine.

He trembled once or twice when Jonathan actually passed his hand over the spot where his treasures were concealed.

Should he be bereft of them, it would be good-bye to all hopes of escape.

But they remained undiscovered.

Jonathan at length rose to his feet, satisfied that the prisoner was not only unpossessed of any instrument, but also that his fetters had not been tampered with in the least.

In a false state of security, then, he left the cell in company with his associate.

Jack never moved for several minutes after they had gone, for he thought they might be quite cunning enough to return abruptly, and look in again.

But this apprehension was a groundless one, and after waiting long enough to have no fears of an intrusion, Jack rubbed his hands together briskly, and exhibited other symptoms of delight and satisfaction.

CHAPTER CCCLXVII.

FIGG, THE PRIZE-FIGHTER, PAYS A VISIT TO JACK IN HIS CELL, AND GIVES HIM THE PARTICULARS OF A SINGULAR WAGER.

NEVER was any poor human being so sorely tempted as Jack Sheppard was.

His joy quickly subsided, and being now left alone, he fixed his eyes on the spot where his treasures were deposited, and strove to content himself by looking at them merely.

He made up his mind that, in order to guard against any danger of discovery, he would not disturb the file until he had occasion to use it; but he soon found that to keep his determination required all the strength of his mind.

His fingers itched for it; and every now and then he would stoop down, and then, suddenly recollecting himself, would start up.

He fancied that if he could only hold the precious file in his hand—if he could only turn it over and over and examine it—if he could only feel its sharp teeth against the brawn of his thumb—he should be content; or, at least, more content than he could be by simply eyeing, not it, but the mortar beneath which it was buried.

But he strove to overcome this inclination, for he thought, and truly, that if he gave way thus far he would not be content until he had made a trial of its power and sharpness on his fetters.

This would have never done, for detection would have been the result; so wisely he exercised all the forbearance he could, and combated against the inclination as much as possible.

He succeeded, and the file remained in the mortar between the stones undisturbed.

In spite of all, Jack Sheppard's heart was light.

When he leaned back on the stone bench and glanced around the cell, it was in a contemptuous manner, as though he despised the power of those strong stone walls to keep him there a prisoner.

And yet how slight and insignificant appeared the means which he possessed with which to release himself.

A file and a nail!

Those were all.

Two small, insignificant pieces of iron.

And yet he did not doubt that, skilfully used, they would enable him to pierce through the iron doors and massive walls.

He relied upon his own cleverness to succeed, including the negligence of his enemies.

But he would have to wait, and he thought incessantly upon the time when he should commence his operations.

It was a long time before he could decide upon the hour which would be best for him to commence.

He made up his mind finally that, if no unforeseen circumstance occurred, Friday night should be the time.

During the day, the men would be much engaged in attending at the court, and he would be able to make considerable progress in filing through his fetters before night came.

There was the risk that what he had done would be discovered when he was examined the last thing at night; but he believed he should be able to conceal the places where he had been at work by filling them up with that which, with great pains and patience, he collected off the floor of the dungeon.

It was black and sticky, and being rubbed into the places where the file had been, would not only conceal the brightness, but fill it up; while, from the colour of this mud being similar in tint to the iron of which his fetters were composed, he doubted not that he should be able to pass an examination.

Had he known what was destined to take place on the Friday upon which he so calculated, he would have spared himself the trouble.

The greater part of the short winter's day had been taken up by Sir James Thornhill, and the night rapidly came on.

This was Tuesday, and Jack comforted himself with the assurance that in two days afterwards he should be free.

He wondered many times what had become of Blueskin. He began to think it strange that he had not heard or seen anything of him.

He quite thought that his old comrade would have opened up some means of communication, but he was disappointed.

He could only account for it by supposing that Blueskin was fully occupied in looking after his own safety.

That he, too, was an inmate of the huge prison never once occurred to him.

If he had known, the whole course of his proceedings would have been altered.

At any risk he would have made his way first to his comrade's cell, and then have escaped in company with his old friend.

But of Blueskin's presence in Newgate, Jack was studiously kept ignorant, and nothing but some accident would make him acquainted with it.

As usual, the thief-taker and the Governor paid him a last visit, but nothing particular took place; and when he judged they had been gone long enough, Jack took the nail and unlocked his fetters.

This was a wonderful relief to him, and indeed we may boldly affirm that, had he not succeeded in this, he would have failed in the remainder.

The mere fact of his having his limbs cramped up in one position for such a length of time would have so crippled him that he would never have been able to stir.

We must not forget either to take into calculation the effects which the exercise he daily took produced upon his constitution.

Every morning before he resumed his fetters he circulated his blood and exercised his limbs by moving round and round and up and down his cell until perspiration streamed from every pore.

Then he had—thanks to the munificence of his curious visitors—lived on the best of everything, so that he was in first-rate bodily condition, and equal to the execution of almost any feat, no matter how daring.

On the Wednesday morning the sessions began, and Jack was careful to observe what difference this made in the closeness of the attentions of the gaolers.

To his dismay, he discovered that they were more vigilant than ever.

This filled him with apprehension for some time, until the thought struck him that there was a simple reason for it.

His keepers would no doubt think that he would try to take some advantage of this particular time.

If so, all Jack had to do was to strive to throw them off their guard, and the way in which he behaved was eminently calculated to succeed in doing this.

Every time he was visited he was found sitting dejectedly upon the stone bench, with his arms folded.

Jack perceived the effects of this on the succeeding day.

He was not visited near so frequently, and during the day the intervals between each visit grew longer and longer.

Over this he exulted greatly, but he allowed no sign of it to be perceptible.

This encouraged him, too, to wait with patience, and not commence his operations until the morrow, as he had at first determined.

On Thursday, Jack had several visitors, and among them was the celebrated prize-fighter, Mr. Figg.

He was curious to a degree to see Jack; and, not without some trouble, succeeded in getting an order to admit him.

He was closely searched, for it was fancied that such a one would be likely to convey the prisoner something.

But though the whole of his clothing was rigidly examined, nothing was found.

He was then allowed to enter the cell.

The first glimpse he caught of Jack Sheppard—whose person was totally unknown to him—elicited his utmost admiration.

Stopping short a few paces from the door, he exclaimed:

"Impossible! Here is some mistake. This stripling, with no more strength in his whole body than many have in their hands, cannot possibly have twice effected an escape from Newgate!"

"It's all right!" said the turnkey, as he closed the door.

For some time Figg stood still with amazement, gazing upon Jack.

He had doubtless expected to behold some second Hercules, and not a slim-looking youth as Jack appeared.

In comparison to him, the prize-fighter looked a giant.

Recovering from his astonishment, he came forward and shook Jack by the hand.

But Sheppard noticed that Figg held out his left hand, while he kept his right rather oddly closed.

Jack knew the prize-fighter by sight, having seen him many times, and therefore he responded freely enough to his friendly greeting.

"I am glad to make your acquaintance, Jack," said Figg, as he worked his right hand about in a curious manner—"I am very glad to see you, though it is in such a place."

"I have not many comforts," replied Jack; "but still I might be worse off."

"Very true!" said Figg, as he made a strange choking sound in his throat—"you might be—"

"Oh, don't mention it!"

"I won't, if you don't like it; but, Jack?"

"What?"

"I daresay you wonder what has brought me here to see you?"

"The same motive that has brought others, I suppose?"

"Do you mean mere curiosity?"

"Yes."

"There you are out, Jack; and you would wonder more if you knew what trouble it has cost me—to say nothing of expense—to get an order to come and see you."

"Indeed!"

"Yes—and there was the unpleasantness of being overhauled by a couple of d—d turnkeys!"

"You were searched, then?"

"Yes, I was searched," replied the prize-fighter, with a grin. "But, Jack, my boy, I won't keep you any longer in suspense—I will tell you what has really brought me here."

"I am curious to hear it."

"Well, come a little closer, for I would not be overheard for the world!"

The prize-fighter then said, in a whisper:

"Jack, I have made a bet about you."

"A bet about me?"

"Yes, and a heavy one too, I can tell you!"

"In what manner?"

"That I will tell you in a moment. Hush! Let me speak softly! The other night I was in company with some friends, and the conversation turned upon you, Jack, and your dexterous exploits."

"I suppose I am the common talk of all London?"

"You are, and no mistake!"

"I thought so."

"Never mind that, Jack! You ought to feel proud. However, that's neither here nor there. We were talking about what you had done, and wondering what tools you had for your purpose. Some went so far as to say you had none at all."

"Well?"

"I did not believe that; but I laid a wager of twenty guineas that if a file were given you, in twenty-four hours afterwards you would be free."

"Twenty-four hours after the file was given me?"

"Yes."

"And when should I have the file?"

"Now; here it is. Look!"

Figg opened his right hand, which he had hitherto kept so mysteriously closed, and showed that he had the article he spoke of cunningly concealed in it.

Jack shook his head when he saw it.

"Why do you shake your head, Jack?"

"I am sorry you have laid the wager."

"Why? Do you mean to say that if you have a file given you you cannot escape?"

"Well, not exactly that."

"What is it, then?"

"You will lose your wager if you have stipulated that I shall be free twenty-four hours after I receive it."

"Why? Is the time too short?"

"No, the time is long enough."

"What on earth do you mean, then?"

Jack hesitated.

But presently he said:

"Well, I will trust you. I have already arranged to escape to-morrow night."

"To-morrow night?"

"Yes, Friday night. So you see that if you give me the file now you will lose your wager. If you give it to me to-morrow you will win it."

"Are you sure, Jack?"

"Certain!"

"Then I can get over the difficulty—I can make it all right. Here, take the file."

"Very good, sir—I am obliged to you for it. It will be useful, doubtless; but I should have escaped without it."

"You are a wonderful fellow, Jack!"

"You will keep what I have told you a secret?"

"Oh, depend upon it! If you do not succeed in your attempt, I shall lose twenty guineas by it."

"Oh—ah, of course! It is to your advantage to keep it a secret."

"Just so. And now, Jack, I will be off. Whatever you do, take care of the file, and be sure you do not fail to escape the time you mention."

"On Saturday morning I shall be as free as you."

"Well, if you are, you deserve to be let alone. You are in the very heart of Newgate, you are loaded with chains twice your own weight, and you are watched closely by a score of people; and all I say is, if you can get out without any more aid than I have just given you, you will deserve to retain your liberty for your cleverness."

CHAPTER CCCLXVIII.

JACK SHEPPARD IS PUZZLED AND PERPLEXED BY WILD'S ABSENCE, BUT NEVERTHELESS SETS TO WORK IN GOOD EARNEST TO MAKE HIS ESCAPE.

"I wish I could persuade those who have power in these matters to think the same as you do," said Jack, with a sigh.

"Well, I really think you will deserve your liberty for your cleverness. How you are going to manage it, I don't know!"

"That I must keep to myself."

"Well, Jack, I don't want to pry into your secrets. Good-bye, my boy! You may depend upon it I shall be mum."

"Pray do! If the turnkeys were to have the least suspicions of what I intend, you would lose your wager."

"All right! I'll keep dark, never fear!"

"I can trust you."

Some more words passed between them, and then, with a cordial shake of the hand, they separated.

As soon as he had gone, Jack hastened to bury the second file close to the other one.

When he had done, he looked up, and murmured:

"Surely Fortune smiles upon me! I shall make my escape this time despite my foes. This second file makes all secure, for if the first fails me, I can turn to that. Yes, yes, I shall be free!"

Jack continually repeated the words, "I shall be free!" and it seemed as though the mere act of his doing so gave him additional confidence.

He had now little or no fear that he should fail in his great design.

As he had expected at first, he was troubled less and less with the turnkeys, who were occupied at the court, from which place indeed they could not be spared.

Then on Friday, that being the last and busiest day, he counted upon being more free from them still.

Jack's heart was now light enough, and the time passed quickly by.

When night came, he undid his fetters as usual, but while he did so he made the reflection that the next time he should tell them off for good.

As might be expected, the excited state of his mind prevented him from sleeping soundly.

He awoke at frequent intervals, fancying that something dreadful had taken place.

He resolutely composed himself to sleep again each time that he awoke, for he felt the importance of resting himself thoroughly, so as to be in a position to endure the fatigues of the day and night ensuing.

Nevertheless, he was glad when morning came, and having gone through his accustomed exercise, he sat down as usual.

At breakfast-time, the turnkey appeared with a tempting meal, which Jack Sheppard ate with all the greater relish because he believed that it was the last breakfast he would partake of in Newgate.

When the remnants had been taken away, he believed he should be left for some time unmolested, and so he resolved to begin to use his file at once upon those portions of his fetters which were riveted upon him, and which, of course, could not be removed without filing through them.

Jack set to work with right good will.

Never did he feel more satisfied with an occupation than he did with this.

The file which he had taken from Hogarth's pocket was one of first-rate quality, and seemed excellently well adapted for the use to which it was now put.

In making the fetters no care was taken that the iron selected should be of the hardest quality.

So long as it was heavy, that was enough.

Jack soon found that the iron was of a very soft character, and the file ate into it with great rapidity.

He was careful not to confine his operations to one place, but having filed through one to a certain distance, he would pause and carefully fill up the place with the soft black mud which he had collected for this purpose.

He was glad to find that this concealed his work in a most admirable manner, and only a close examination would have detected it.

But though the iron was soft, the file sharp, and Jack worked with right good will, he nevertheless found that filing through a thick piece of iron was a very tedious process.

Moreover, every now and then he had to pause and listen, lest anyone should come upon him unawares, and more than once had he to hide his file, so sure did he feel that some one was approaching.

The truth was that Jack was in momentary expectation of seeing Jonathan Wild, who had not made his appearance since the preceding night, and he had never gone so long without paying a visit before.

At dinner-time he was obliged to pause, and indeed he was right glad to do so, for his fingers ached with the constant use he had made of them.

After dinner, however, having rested himself somewhat, he resumed his labour.

Still, Jonathan did not come, and this puzzled and disconcerted Jack extremely.

He would ten times rather have had him prying about, but this absence filled him with apprehension.

He was afraid some deep motive lurked behind it, but he was at a loss to think what.

As the day advanced his uneasiness increased to such an extent that he was unable to continue his work.

At each sound he started and trembled, and finally he was compelled to desist altogether.

In a state of mind perfectly indescribable, he leaned back against the wall and waited for Wild to come.

After he had been he felt he should be all right, but not until he had.

Carefully had Jack filled up the gaps in the iron which the file had made, and now that it was growing dark he defied detection.

Still Wild did not come.

Supper was brought as usual, and Jack partook of it heartily.

He longed to ask the turnkey the reason of Jonathan's non-appearance, but dreaded to do so lest suspicion should be aroused.

He thought there was a look of unusual importance in the man's face, as though something very extraordinary had taken place; but Jack did not dare trust himself to speak.

He was glad when the man took his departure, for he found it difficult to exercise control over himself.

After supper, Jack sat quite still.

Later and later it became, but still no one came.

What could be the meaning of it?

A thought now occurred to Jack that chilled his very blood.

His heart stood still, and cold drops of perspiration broke out upon him.

Could Jonathan Wild, by some means or other, have obtained a knowledge of what he was about to do that night?

Had he, with that devilish cunning which he possessed and was so fond of exercising—had he kept away in order to let him go to work uninterruptedly, that his triumph should be greater?

What if, when he had, with incredible labour and fatigue, effected his escape, he should fall into the hands of the thief-taker, when he imagined he was on the very threshold of freedom?

This was a terrible thought for Jack to have, and was one that disconcerted him greatly.

Oh, how ardently he wished that Jonathan Wild would come!

Jack never thought that a time would come when he should so much desire the presence of his arch-enemy.

But it did come.

Jack's agitation increased as the time flew by.

It was so sickening to begin to work under the impression that all the toil would have no other effect than to place him more firmly in Wild's power than he had ever been before.

Jack could imagine his sensations when after, with incredible toil, he had gained the street he should find Jonathan and his myrmidons waiting for him.

He knew Wild was quite capable of such a trick.

He would exult and delight in it.

It would give him the greatest possible satisfaction.

If he knew Jack was escaping, he would watch him at every step, chuckle over his fruitless labour, and then pounce upon him at the moment when the prisoner began to congratulate himself on his freedom.

To such a pitch of excitement did Jack at last work himself that he felt, if he had much longer to wait, he should go mad.

Suddenly a sound came, and he listened to it with the utmost joy.

"He comes—he comes!" he said; "the villain comes, and all will yet be well!"

Some one was indeed approaching his cell, and in a moment afterwards the door was flung open.

Eagerly Jack gazed at those who entered.

But he was disappointed.

Mr. Noakes and a turnkey alone came.

Where, then, was Jonathan?

Jack would have given anything to have had a correct answer to that question.

But he knew better than to ask it.

The Governor having satisfied himself by a glance that all was well, left the cell again to retire to rest, for he was tired out by all that had happened on that eventful day.

When he had departed, Jack clasped his head with his hands, as he said:

"What am I to think of all this? What shall I do? What can be the meaning of Jonathan thus suddenly discontinuing his visits? I have not seen him since last night. Twenty-four hours have never elapsed before during my imprisonment without my seeing him! What can it mean?"

It was in vain Jack tortured himself to find an answer to the question.

He was finally compelled to give it up in despair.

"It is but a thought," he said. "I am probably alarming myself groundlessly. At any rate, the thought, powerful as it is, shall not prevent me from making at least an effort to escape; and now I think of it, I must be wrong. I have made a mistake throughout! If Jonathan wished to lull me into a sense of false security, he would not have done anything calculated to rouse my suspicions. He would have come as usual, so that I should have fallen all the more blindly into the snare. I ought to have thought of this before, and not have alarmed myself in the way I have done!"

Thus fluctuating between hope and fear, as he was swayed by them alternately, did Jack Sheppard spend some miserable hours.

But at length he shook off these thoughts, and, satisfied that all within the prison had now retired to rest, he began in good earnest to set about his task.

Taking the nail from its hiding-place, he first of all undid the padlock, and freed himself in this manner of as many of his fetters as he could.

This done, he placed the nail carefully in his pocket, for he could not tell how soon he might require its services.

He now set to work with his file, and soon got rid of more, but he found time speeding rapidly, and so he determined to go no further with these at present.

He had freed his arms and his waist, and all that remained were the iron rings or basils which were riveted round his ankles.

These were of great thickness, and would require a long time to file through, so he determined to put up with the inconvenience of wearing them.

To these basils a piece of straight iron, about a foot long, was attached, and to prevent this jingling or dragging at his heels he placed it upright against his leg, and tied it there with his garters.

He had now to get out of his cell.

It seemed as though he had done a great deal already, and yet how insignificant it seemed when placed in comparison with what he had to accomplish.

His body was free, it is true, from the encumbrances which it had formerly worn, but that now seemed nothing.

Resolutely enough, however, Jack made his way to the door of the cell, resolved to commence an attack upon it.

He tried it first, and felt it all over.

It was lined with sheet-iron, which was fastened on to the wood with a thousand rivets, while over the lock a piece of drill-proof steel had been fixed.

Jack at once gave up all ideas of passing through that door.

It was impregnable, and would be proof against all that he could bring to bear upon it.

So he gave it up, but he would not have done so so readily had he not thought of another means by which his dungeon could be left.

Finding, then, that the door would resist all his efforts, he determined to adopt this second resource, though, for many reasons, he would have preferred to have worked his way through the door had it seemed at all possible that he would succeed in accomplishing such a feat.

CHAPTER CCLIX.

CONTINUES TO RELATE JACK SHEPPARD'S PROCEEDINGS IN THE CELL.

JACK SHEPPARD did not allow himself to be in the least cast down by this failure.

With as much vigour and determination as ever he continued his work, for he felt that his life wholly and solely depended upon the exertions he made that night.

On a previous occasion, Jack had succeeded in making an escape from a cell by excavating under the door.

The operation was a tedious one, but still it seemed to offer every prospect of success, and so he resolved to attempt it.

He was the more inclined to do this because he had noticed how soft the mortar was between the stones.

They would no doubt be easily raised, and if the ground under them was no harder than the mortar, there would be very little trouble in digging it out, although he had no suitable tools.

With one of the files, Jack now swept away the mortar round all four sides of one of the stones, and having done this much, he proceeded to raise it.

This he accomplished by using a portion of his fetters as a lever, and having raised it sufficiently at one side to place his fingers under it, he exerted all his strength to lift it up.

He found this taxed his strength to the utmost, but he succeeded.

He rested the flagstone up against the wall.

A large square black space was now made visible, and Jack set to work to dig it up.

The soil was very soft, and he scooped it out with his hands with very little trouble.

He worked rapidly, and in a short time had cleared away the soil from the frame on which the door was hung.

Suddenly, however, as he was loosening the earth with a piece of his fetters, he felt the end strike against some metallic substance.

The sound dismayed him.

Hastily and anxiously he removed the soil, being anxious to ascertain the precise nature of the obstruction.

His heart failed him now, for he had a presentiment that he would have to suffer a second disappointment.

Again and again as he tried to loosen the earth underneath the door did his tool strike against some metallic substance.

What could it be?

At length, by the exercise of incredible labour, Jack had cleared away a large quantity of soil; and then he proceeded to ascertain, if he could, what it was that barred his progress.

Passing his hand over it, he became conscious at the first touch that it was iron.

He uttered a groan.

A more rapid and searching examination made all clear to him.

"I see it all now!" he cried, as he started in frenzy to his feet—"I see it all now! They have taken a hint from the way in which I formerly effected my escape. Fool—fool that I am! I ought to have known that they would do so! They have fixed a huge sheet of iron under the door, which I cannot possibly pierce through or burrow under!"

This was precisely the state of the case.

When it became known how Jack had formerly made his escape, steps were taken which would, it was believed, effectually prevent a repetition of it.

Underneath the cell doors a large piece of sheet iron of considerable thickness was placed, in a position perpendicular to the door itself.

This iron wall nothing would penetrate, and such was its dimensions that it would have taken hours to have either burrowed under it or round either side.

This was the case with the newer cells, but the one in which Jack was confined was of great antiquity, and this precaution had already been adopted with respect to it.

Jack was in despair.

He threw himself down upon the damp floor of the dungeon, and groaned aloud.

The second resource, upon which he had so confidently reckoned, had failed him.

What was to be done now?

How was he to escape from that dreadful cell?

Would it baffle all his efforts?

It would seem so.

At present, all he had done was to waste time, and uselessly exhaust his energies.

The only consolation he had derived from his labours was the conviction that it was impossible to escape.

Jack writhed upon the ground like some wounded snake.

He could imagine the jeers and taunts of Jonathan Wild and the Governor, when they came in in the morning and saw how he had been employed.

This thought maddened him more than all the rest.

He took hold of his hair, and tore it off by handfuls.

By degrees, however, he grew calmer.

Then he rose to his feet.

"This is folly," he said; "I will not despair—I have determined to escape, and I will do it, no matter how many difficulties stand in my path. I will do it—I will be free!"

Jack looked around him as well as the darkness would permit him.

But he could see nothing that would give him hope.

Just instinctively he turned towards the door, and a groan which he could not repress came from his lips.

How that door had disappointed him!

He had scoffed at its strength and security, but now he was abased and humbled.

He could see no means at present of effecting his release if he could not overcome this door.

The only other openings in the cell were the chimney and the window.

As for the latter, it was a mere hole in the stone-work, and strongly defended by iron bars.

If he removed these—and it would require some hours to do so—the aperture they protected was so small that he could not have even squeezed his slender anatomy through it.

Then the chimney.

That was so small that he feared it would be folly to attempt to try to ascend it.

At last, however, as he could see nothing else better, he resolved to try.

He had his choice of making the effort, or lying down and abandoning all hope of escape entirely.

While there was the ghost of a chance, Jack was not likely to do this.

But he went to the chimney with a heavy heart.

He had looked at it many times, and was all but confident he could not ascend.

But he made the attempt.

He did succeed in getting his head up, but that was all.

The aperture was so small that it was impossible for his body to pass through it.

He would have stood just as good a chance if he had tried to crawl through a keyhole.

Jack drew back with a groan.

All hope was over now.

He must remain just where he was, to be found in the morning, and laughed at for his impotent attempts to escape.

Jack dreaded this ridicule more than anything else, and it proved a powerful incentive to exertion.

But it could not make him perform impossibilities.

It seemed as though that cell was strong enough to laugh all his efforts to scorn.

Jack was in despair.

He flung himself down upon the ground again, and beat his head with such violence against the hard stones as threatened to break his skull.

As before, however, the paroxysm passed away.

But how time was consumed!

A long time had elapsed since he had commenced his operations, and now, if he succeeded in leaving the cell, he did not stand half so good a chance of ultimately getting off, for he would have to work his way from the centre of the prison into the open air.

Who could contemplate such obstacles as lay before him, and not stand back agast?

Probably none save Jack Sheppard.

His fertile brain never allowed him to sink long under a difficulty, and the present occasion proved it.

Ere long another thought occurred to him, and the next moment so pleased did he feel with it that he clapped his hands and cried out with pleasure.

"That will do it!" he said—"that will do it! Fool that I was not to think of such a simple thing before! That is what I ought to have done first, and then by this time I should doubtless have been outside Newgate. But better late than never—I will try now!"

The project which Jack had now formed did not appear to be at all of a character to inspire much hope.

Finding the entrance to the chimney so small, he had given it up, but now he recollected the shape of it.

It swelled gradually from the bottom to the top, being shaped almost like the segment of a huge funnel.

Jack's idea now was to form a breach in the wall of the chimney, as high up from the floor as he could reach.

He should then be able to ascend the chimney, and make his way into the chamber overhead.

Out of this chamber he would probably have little difficulty in making his way.

What a hopeless, endless task this seemed!

But Jack thought only lightly of it.

He saw, indeed, the road to freedom lying open before him.

Taking up the files again, which had already done him such good service, he proceeded to pick away the mortar from round a stone as high up in the wall as he could reach.

For this purpose the sharp file was admirably adapted, but suddenly, through bearing too heavily upon it, he broke it.

He threw it down with an impatient gesture, for now that it was broken the pieces were so very small as to be wholly unserviceable.

He had another file, however, and this now proved a very fortunate circumstance.

With greater care he used this second file, for if he broke it the consequences would be fatal.

Having at length picked away all the mortar, he put the file into his pocket, and with the heaviest portion of his fetters tried to knock the stone into the chimney.

It gave way before his efforts.

He renewed the vigour of his labour, and presently the stone sank into the chimney and fell rattling down into the fireplace.

"Hurrah!" cried Jack, as he wiped the streaming perspiration from his forehead with the sleeve of his coat. "Hurrah! This is success indeed!"

He paused, for his lips were parched, and burning with the mortar he had dislodged.

Nevertheless, he resumed his toil with greater ardour than before, for now he had encouragement to proceed.

One stone having been removed, no longer made it necessary to use the file.

Picking up the stone itself, he held it in both hands, and used it as a hammer to break down the rest.

By adopting this measure, he enlarged the breach with very great rapidity.

Suddenly he came to a fresh obstacle.

This was a bar of iron about an inch square, which had been placed across the chimney with superfluous caution, so as to do away with all possibility of a prisoner making his escape.

No. 76.—BLUESKIN.

"I will have that bar," said Jack, as soon as he perceived it. "It will make an excellent crow. I will get it out, and then I shall be able to make the walls of Newgate crumble down before me."

Jack set to work to clear away all that portion of the masonry which interfered with his seeing the bar, and having done so, he found that it was about two feet and a half in length.

Could he but obtain possession of it, it would indeed form a serviceable and formidable weapon, and Jack determined not to be baulked of having it.

But he found that it was very firmly bedded into the stones with a species of mortar that seemed to be of a harder quality than the rest.

To remove this, Jack was compelled to resort to his file.

He used it with great care so as to prevent a breakage, and after some time had the satisfaction of finding one end was free.

He then set about the other, but almost at the first stroke the file broke.

A more vexatious occurrence than this could scarcely be imagined.

Jack's passion was terrible; and it was while dominated with it that he seized the piece of iron with both hands, and, with a sudden jerk, released the other end.

Having done this, reconciled him in some measure to the breakage of the file.

He now held in his hands a bar of iron two feet and a half in length and an inch square.

With such a weapon how much might be accomplished!

Feeling, however, that there was no time to lose, Jack set about him with right good will.

At every blow he struck the wall of the chimney the stones fell clattering down, and in a few moments he had made a hole large enough to crawl through.

Placing the bar which had served him so well in a convenient position he mounted, and without much trouble scrambled through the breach.

Then taking the bar in his hand he held it up at the full length of his arm in order to ascertain whether there was any other obstruction above him.

CHAPTER CCCLXX.

RELATES HOW JACK SHEPPARD GOT OUT OF HIS DUNGEON INTO THE RED-ROOM, AND HOW FROM THENCE HE MADE HIS WAY INTO THE CHAPEL.

HE waved the bar about, and, as he fully expected, it struck against the bottom of the grate in the room above.

A light would now have been of the utmost service to him, but it was folly to think about such a thing, so very wisely he banished the thought.

Stimulated by the success he had already had, Jack set about this fresh task with additional ardour.

He would have to make a breach in the floor of the room above, and then, when he had drawn himself up into this apartment, it would be time enough for him to think what further steps he should take.

It required a dauntless courage to make, or rather attempt, an escape from Newgate.

Even when the next chamber was reached, one would be a long way from being free.

But Jack was not cast down.

One reason for this was, he never allowed himself to be daunted with contemplating at one time all that he had to do.

He shut his eyes to all difficulties except the one before him.

When he had surmounted that, then was the time to look at the next.

This was the secret of his success.

He had first looked at his fetters, and, as we have seen, he freed himself from them.

Then he turned to making his way out of the cell, and he seemed likely to do that.

Until he had worked his way out of it he would not look the next obstacle in the face.

It was a wise proceeding.

The only fear was, that as he found obstacle after obstacle springing up with obstinate pertinacity he would grow tired of their perpetual recurrence.

We shall see.

As though he cared very little whether he was heard or not, Jack Sheppard worked away with his iron bar at the floor above with right good will.

Down came the bricks and fragments of stone and mortar in a perfect shower.

Jack redoubled his efforts.

Suddenly, to his great joy, the iron bar ceased to encounter any obstruction.

He could wave it about freely overhead.

The way to the upper chamber was open to him.

He resolved to climb up, but to do so with the iron bar would be difficult.

Still he could not think of leaving so valuable an implement behind him.

He could not tell what further need he might have of its services.

It might prove to be of greater use to him than it had been hitherto.

After wondering for a long time how he should manage this, he fancied he should be able to throw it up into the room above and then ascend himself afterwards.

No sooner did this thought occur to him than he set about putting it into execution.

The first time he failed.

He threw the bar up, but it did not remain.

It came clattering down again, and he narrowly escaped receiving a severe blow from it.

He caught it in his hand and threw it up again.

This time it remained, and he now set to work to follow it.

This was, in comparison with his former achievement, the easiest thing imaginable.

In less than a moment he climbed the chimney and squeezed his body through the hole he had made.

Upon gaining his feet the first thing he did was to feel about for his iron bar.

His hand soon encountered it.

Taking it firmly in his grasp, and holding it out horizontally before him, he walked boldly across the room, though he was careful not to stumble against anything.

There was one grated window in this apartment, and through this a few rays of nightlight came.

This was all Jack had to aid him.

He took care to walk across the room in the direction that would take him over the door of his dungeon below.

He argued, and plausibly enough, that the one door would be situated immediately over the other.

Ere he had gone many paces the extreme end of the bar struck against something.

He paused at once, and felt about him with his hands.

By the feel he could tell that he was touching the stone wall of the chamber.

He passed his hand over it, and presently felt the door.

To his joy he found it was not lined with iron as the one was that led out of his dungeon, and this inspired him with the hope that he should be able to make his way through it.

The room in which he now stood was known among the officials of Newgate as the Red-room.

A long time had elapsed since the door had been opened.

The last prisoner it contained was some nobleman who had been concerned in the rebellion of 1715.

They were all staunch adherents to the Stuart faction, and were proved guilty of treason to their lawful Sovereign.

The sentence passed upon them was death by the hand of the executioner.

In consequence of their rank, however, they were spared the ignominy of the hangman's rope.

They were all beheaded, and some say that it was from this circumstance that the dungeon in which they had been confined received the name of the Red-room.

This may or may not be true, but it is an undoubted fact that after their death the door was locked and no person had from that time entered the chamber until Jack Sheppard made a forcible entry into it in the manner we have just recorded.

Nearly seventy years had elapsed from this period.

We have digressed so far in order to show how it was that this door was not so strongly secured as most others in the prison were.

In his examinations Jack soon found that the door was fastened by a lock only.

He went to work, therefore, with great spirit, and in less than ten minutes had it open.

He passed through at once, and stood in the corridor without.

Jack had already planned a certain route to take in getting out of the prison, and the chapel was comprehended in it.

Towards this then he resolved to proceed without delay.

But he had to pause a moment or two to consider which was the direction he ought to take.

He had particularly noticed the route from the door of his dungeon to the chapel, and after a little reflection he turned to the right along the corridor.

He continued along it for several yards until his further progress was stayed by another door.

Here then was another obstruction.

With a feeling of great confidence about his heart, however, Jack proceeded to examine it.

In the course of this examination his confidence abated. His heart failed him.

He began to fear that the door would prove the most serious obstacle he had at present met with.

It was a perfect miracle of strength, and on the side upon which Jack stood no fastening could be found, with the exception of the lock.

Upon this, however, Jack made a resolute attack with his iron bar; and having succeeded at length in inserting the point of this between the box of the lock and the door-post, he by a sudden exertion of strength wrenched it off.

Having done this, he tried the door; but, to his mortification, found that, to all appearance, it was as strong as before.

He could not move it in the least.

Having made this discovery, he tried to call to mind what fastenings were on the other side of the door.

Unless he was mistaken, a heavy iron bar crossed it in a horizontal direction.

This iron bar must be removed.

But how?

The door itself was so strong as to laugh to scorn all attempts that he might make upon it.

Then the door-post was composed of stone, and evidently of great thickness.

A cold perspiration broke out upon him.

But he soon rallied.

He determined, after having accomplished so much as he had, after making such incredible exertions, he would not be baffled by a door.

Animated by this spirit he set to work upon the door-post.

He could see no other means of achieving his purpose than by chipping away the stone with his iron bar.

This would not only be a tedious and difficult operation, but a noisy one.

From noise he had everything to fear.

Up to the present moment he had caused no alarm.

All within the prison seemed as silent as death itself.

The gaolers and the Governor, tired out with their extra duty in the court during the preceding days, slept even sounder than usual.

Fortune had favoured him exceedingly, but he feared that upon making a breach in the stone wall large enough to remove the bar, he should create an alarm.

He might be heard by the debtors, whose quarters in the prison were not far distant from this; for at the period of which we write, Newgate was a prison for debtors as well as felons, and continued to be so for many years afterwards.

Notwithstanding these apprehensions, however, Jack stuck bravely to his work; but he was careful not to make any more noise than he could help.

He delivered his strokes with the iron bar with great rapidity, and at each stroke a piece of stone was chipped off.

He could wish for no better encouragement in his labours than this, and he continued to work without stopping, except when he paused to listen now and then to ascertain whether there were any signs of an alarm having been given.

All continuing silent as before, however, he went on with his work.

In a short time he succeeded in making a breach completely through the wall, and so well had he calculated the distance from the floor at which the bar was placed, that he was able to lift it from its setting.

He was compelled to let it fall, however, and it reached the stone floor of the corridor with such a terrible clang that made his heart go as cold as stone.

He stood for a moment in a state of the utmost suspense, but reassured by the silence which still endured, he ventured to push the door open.

It yielded easily to his touch.

He passed through it in a moment.

He was now able to proceed without further interruption to the chapel.

He knew well enough, from the careful observations he had taken, that there was no other door to hinder him, save the one which led into the chapel.

Here he soon arrived.

The peculiar appearance of this door had not escaped his notice.

The lower part was of wood, studded with rivets, and was securely fastened.

The upper portion, however, consisted of iron spikes, so that in the daytime it was quite possible for anyone to stand outside the door and look into the chapel between these spikes, which were upwards of a foot in length.

Jack had previously made up his mind as to how he should deal with this door.

He determined not to attempt to force the lock or bolts, but to break off one of the spikes, and squeeze himself through the space thus left.

It was an easy way of overcoming a very serious difficulty.

Taking up his iron bar, he held it lengthwise, and with it struck the spike near the bottom part.

At the third stroke he broke it off.

The space now left was not very great, but still Jack thought it was large enough to squeeze his slender body through.

In the first place, he pushed the iron bar through, and let it drop on to the floor of the chapel.

Then seizing hold of the top edges of the door, he raised himself up.

The aperture proved very narrow, and he bruised himself sadly in attempting to force his way through it.

When he had forced his shoulders through, the difficulty was not so great, and after repeated struggles he reached the floor of the chapel.

Having done this, he rested a moment to recover his strength, for he was terribly exhausted by the efforts he had made.

He then felt about for the iron bar, which he was resolved not to part with.

In feeling for this his hand encountered the iron spike which he had broken off.

This he immediately consigned to his pocket, for there was just a chance that he should be able to avail himself of it in some way.

The iron bar was close by; and once more taking up this implement, without which he could certainly never have done what he had, he proceeded to cross the chapel.

This place was in profound darkness, and great care was therefore requisite to avoid coming into contact with the numerous objects it contained.

As before, he held the bar out before him in a horizontal position, so as to be aware, at the earliest moment, when he was near to anything.

By adopting this very simple measure, he saved himself several severe blows, which otherwise he would have inevitably sustained.

Although the only opportunities Jack had of observing the interior arrangements of the chapel were while he was being led to his pew and taken from it, yet he had made such good use of his eyes that he imprinted the whole of it upon his memory.

This knowledge was now of the utmost value to him, and without making the least mistake, or deviating from one direction, he crossed the floor of the edifice.

CHAPTER CCLXXI.

JACK SHEPPARD SUCCEEDS IN GETTING ON TO THE ROOF OF NEWGATE.

JACK SHEPPARD was well aware that from one side of the chapel a door opened which led into a passage or entry, communicating with the leads, as the roof of the prison was called in consequence of its being covered with this metal.

It was the roof which he desired to gain, for he fancied that once here he would have little trouble in descending to the street below.

Having reached, at length, the wall of the chapel, somewhere near the spot where this door was situated, Jack began to feel about him with his hands.

Never until this moment was he so conscious of the utility of his eyes.

The least light would now have saved him an infinite deal of time.

He was, however, compelled to be patient.

At last his hands encountered the door, and he immediately set to work to ascertain what kind of fastenings were upon it.

They were all on the side upon which he stood, and consisted of two bolts and a lock.

The bolts he drew without delay, and then set to work upon the lock.

In doing this he called the spike which he had broken off the other door into requisition.

By the exercise of some skill and patience, he succeeded in inserting its point into the box of the lock.

Having done this he used his iron bar as a lever, and at the second attempt he wrenched the box completely off.

There was one more obstacle overcome.

Again did the route to freedom lay open before him.

After listening for a moment and finding all was still, Jack passed through this door into the passage beyond.

As we have said, this passage communicated with the roof of the prison.

But Jack found that there would yet be some trouble in reaching it.

All the obstacles had not been overcome.

The one which he now witnessed was of far more formidable character than any of the others.

This was another door which was situated some distance down the passage.

Liko most of the doors in the prison of Newgate, it was very securely fastened.

Jack tried to shake it into its setting, but in vain.

At this fresh and unexpected obstruction his spirits somewhat failed him, for he feared he should not be able to get out of the prison before daylight.

This feeling of dejection lasted but a few moments.

Shaking it off, he set to work upon this door with undiminished resolution.

As was the case with the last one, the fastenings were on the side nearest to him, which was a very great advantage.

As before, he drew the bolts, and then finding that the lock was all that he had to contend against, he endeavoured to wrench off the box in the same manner as he had done before.

But this one appeared to be more strongly screwed on than the other.

However, having inserted the spike, and got the iron bar in a favourable position, he exerted his utmost strength, and, to his satisfaction, the box gave way.

He pulled the door open eagerly, and darted through, not doubting that at last he had reached the entrance to the leads.

But he was doomed to a fresh disappointment.

Ere he had gone a dozen paces further, he came to another door, and this was the strongest and best-protected door of all, the one opening from his own cell alone expected.

It was, to use Jack Sheppard's own words, as quoted from his account of his escape, "guarded with more bolts, bars, and locks than any I had hitherto met with."

How to overcome this he knew not.

The labour he had already performed was really immense.

It was superhuman.

He felt the effects of his exertions most severely.

His strength seemed almost spent.

A very short time, comparatively speaking, had elapsed since he commenced his operations, and yet he had done more than several workmen could have done in a couple of days, even had they been furnished with tools suitable to the accomplishment of their purpose.

Perspiration streamed from him at every pore, and he panted and gasped for breath.

He would never have had courage enough to attack this door had it not been for the thought that this was, perhaps, the last obstacle which intervened between him and liberty.

Reanimated by this hope, he resumed his efforts.

But that strong door threatened to laugh all he could do to scorn.

The success he had met with in wrenching off the boxes of the doors made Jack attempt this means; but he failed.

This time his labour was in vain.

Panting and weary he rested again, to recover some portion of his expended strength.

Then, as a last desperate effort, he resolved to attack the fillet on the main post of the door, and to try whether he could not forcibly remove it.

To his joy he succeeded.

It was beyond his expectation.

With a crash the fillet came away, and brought the box of the lock away with it.

Once again, then, was the road open before him, but this time Jack almost dreaded to cross the threshold.

He was afraid that, as on former occasions, he would be able to proceed only a few paces before he met with an obstruction.

This was a weakness, though a pardonable one.

He overcame it.

Urged on by the necessity of being as speedy in his movements as possible, lest after all at the last moment he should be captured, he entered the gloomy passage which stretched beyond.

He would make a desperate effort now, for what more vexatious occurrence could be imagined than that of being captured after taking such incredible pains to get free.

No alarm appeared as yet to have been given, and with a trembling heart he crossed the threshold, and stepped cautiously along the passage beyond.

He groaned faintly, for suddenly he found his worst forebodings realised.

His progress was stopped by another door.*

He had not the heart to feel for the fastenings.

He leant up against the wall, and almost felt inclined to cease all further efforts.

As he stood in this dejected attitude, he fancied he could feel a current of cold air come through the crevices in the door.

This roused him.

That door, then, was surely all that intervened between him and the open air.

With desperate resolution, he determined to make one more trial.

He felt for the fastenings.

The first thing that his hand encountered was a bolt at the top.

This he drew instantly, and felt for the one which was no doubt at the bottom.

He drew this also, and then, to his amazement, the door creaked slowly open.

Those bolts, then, were all that secured it.

Beyond the door he could see the dull, night sky, while the cold air streamed in upon him.

At first, so totally unexpected was this piece of good fortune, he could scarcely bring himself to believe in the reality of what he saw before him.

He clutched the door-post, for he felt as though he was about to faint.

His head swam round and round.

The cool night air, however, playing soothingly upon his fevered body, soon recovered him.

He presently released his hold, and stood upright.

Then, with a reeling step, he crossed the threshold.

A frantic, maniacal shriek of joy which he could not repress announced the gladness he felt at once more standing beneath the arch of heaven, even though his feet rested on the roof of Newgate.

At this moment he felt himself a free man.

He experienced a fresh accession of strength.

Indeed, he became utterly forgetful of all the fatigue he had undergone.

For a moment it all passed away.

He drank in, with feverish eagerness, the cool, fresh air.

It was in truth sweet and delightful to him, who had for so long breathed the impure atmosphere of a dungeon.

He swallowed it in large quantities, and each inspiration that he took appeared to have the effect of endowing him with fresh strength.

"I am free!" he gasped—"free at last, although the difficulties in my way were so very numerous! Free—ha, ha!—I am free!"

He checked himself suddenly, for the thought struck him that he was congratulating himself just a little too soon.

To be sure he had gained the roof of the prison, but yet he was not exactly free, and most certainly he was not out of the reach of his foes.

This caused a slight abatement to his felicitations.

* The Author desires to state that in this account of Jack Sheppard's escape from Newgate, he has adhered with all possible closeness to Jack Sheppard's own statement, made and signed by him on the 10th November, 1724.

Stepping out on to the leads, he closed the door after him, and with much greater calmness looked about him.

He had to decide which way to go to reach the ground. This was rather a serious point, and one that it was necessary to perpend upon.

He had never been upon this part of the roof of the prison, and he now walked round and took in its general appearance.

He found he was shut in on all sides by a wall, for the roof of the other portions of the prison was much higher than that upon which he stood.

Indeed, he stood merely upon what were called by the officials the lower leads.

How, then, was he to gain the upper ones?

He travelled all round, and at length paused before a place where he fancied the wall was not quite so high as in others.

Here he resolved to make his attempt to ascend.

The roof was quite flat, or nearly so, and Jack retreated a few paces.

Then running forward, so as to give himself an impetus, he sprang up and caught hold of the top of the wall with the tips of his fingers.

This was enough.

With very little trouble he improved his grasp, and then, by calling into exercise the muscles in his arms, he drew his body until his breast was level with the top of the wall.

When he was in this position he was easily able to swing his legs up.

In another moment he was standing on the upper leads.

It was a clear, starlight night, and in the distance Jack could see the monster dome of St. Paul's Cathedral.

This proved an excellent landmark to him.

He was now without doubt able to make his way in any direction he wished.

If he stood with the dome of St. Paul's on his right hand, then the Old Bailey would be on his left, and Newgate Street straight before him.

This was the position he took up, and having done so he crossed to the wall that looked down into the Old Bailey.

On arriving here a glance told him he was correct.

The street below was silent and deserted.

It seemed an impossibility to reach it, for the wall presented a sheer descent of many feet.

Convinced that to escape in that direction was quite out of the question, he crept along just inside the parapet until he came to the corner of Newgate Street.

Here he once more ventured to look over.

This street, like the Old Bailey, was quite deserted.

All the shops were closed, and not a single pedestrian or vehicle was in sight.

From where he now stood he could see down Skinner Street and Snow Hill, as well as up Giltspur Street, but in all of these the same state of things presented itself.

The steep wall was still below him without any break, so that unless he had had a long rope or a ladder it would be impossible to descend.

As he had neither of these, he kept on his way round the parapet, in the hope that he should presently come to a place where a descent might be more easily accomplished.

Arriving at the next corner of the wall, Jack looked over once again, and saw below him the roof of Wild's house.

The distance from the wall to it was not great, and by holding with his hands he doubtless could have lowered himself on to it without receiving any injury, or creating any alarm.

But Jack shook his head.

It was too much like jumping out of the frying-pan into the fire for him to think of getting on to the roof of Wild's house, however easily the feat could be performed, and without some powerful motive it was not likely he would run the risk of doing such a thing.

Had he but known, however, that Edgworth Bess was a prisoner within that dismal habitation, he would not have hesitated a single moment about jumping down and endeavouring to effect her release.

But he had no more knowledge about her than Jonathan had communicated, and supposing that to be true he pictured her lying at the point of death at some obscure habitation near the river, whither Jonathan had conveyed her after her leap into the Thames.

CHAPTER CCLXXXI.

WILD JUNIOR MAKES A TRAITORLY PROPOSAL TO EDGWORTH BESS.

AND here, doubtless, the poor girl would in reality have been had it not been for her own abortive effort to escape.

Now, however, as the reader is well aware, she was a prisoner in the thief-taker's house, and Wild junior had taken upon himself the task of keeping her in his safe keeping.

At the very moment that Jack stood upon the leads looking down on to the thief-takers' house, a scene was taking place within it between Edgworth Bess and the thief-taker's rascally son, which would have driven him frantic could he but have witnessed it.

But Jack remained profoundly ignorant not only of that, but of the fact of her being in the thief-taker's house at all.

Let us leave Jack upon the roof of Newgate, seeking about for some means of escape from that elevated and unpleasant position, while for a brief space we turn our attention to Edgworth Bess.

We will show the reader what was taking place while Jack Shoppard stood looking over the wall of Newgate on to the roof of Jonathan Wild's house.

We will show the reader that which was invisible to the individual to whom the knowledge was most necessary.

That Wild junior was not sincere in all his protestations of good faith to his amiable parent was quite certain.

Whether the thief-taker was sincere himself remains to be seen.

At any rate, his son was not, or he would never have kept up the deception about the papers, of which he had so cleverly gained possession, and so cunningly secreted.

He had a little game of his own to play, but he could not carry out his schemes without he kept on good terms with his parent.

When we last saw them that very desirable state of things appeared to be completely brought about.

It cannot be doubted that George Wild had some deeper motive than he expressed or allowed to be visible for advising the thief-taker to act as he did.

It may be presumed that he had some particular reason of his own for professing his willingness to watch over Edgworth Bess in her imprisonment, and be answerable for her safe keeping.

He had a motive, and it was not long before it developed itself.

There was one point, however, upon which Wild junior was perfectly sincere.

That was his wound.

He had received several very severe injuries, and had he not to a great extent inherited the iron constitution of his parent he would not have been able to do as he did.

At times he suffered the most intolerable anguish from the pistol wound he had received, but each day showed an improvement in it.

As for Edgworth Bess, she demanded all the attentions of Mr. Snoxall for several days, but she eventually grew better.

On the night when Jack was endeavouring to achieve an escape from his cell, she was stronger and better than she had ever been.

As she happened to be of more value to Wild alive than dead every possible attention was paid to her.

Up to this night, Wild junior had kept his watch in the adjoining apartment in the most exemplary manner.

But in the long solitary hours which he passed while doing so, his busy brain created and pondered over a thousand schemes.

He hit upon one at last which seemed as though it would answer his purpose exactly.

He thought of it under every aspect, and finally he muttered:

"Yes—yes, that will do? Excellent—most excellent! Shall I wait a little longer or make the attempt at once. I must pause a little and decide. Blueskin and Jack Sheppard are both safe enough, that's quite certain. They cannot come in between us. Then the gov'nor, he's out of the way for a bit! I will try it! I will see this girl, and I will try what smooth words and fair promises will accomplish. If I can only win her round to me—if I can establish such a claim upon her gratitude as she cannot resist—if I can make her my wife!—Ha, ha!—then all will be well! I shall laugh at the gov'nor then with all his d—d cleverness. The heiress will be mine, and I shall have all the papers necessary! Ha, ha! Capital!

The ruminations and congratulations upon the part of the thief-taker's son will give a tolerable insight into his intentions, and it will soon be seen how he set to work to carry them into effect.

Having decided upon his course, he waited until all within the house had retired to bed, save and except the two men downstairs who were always on the watch all the night long.

For a reason which will presently be given, he knew he had nothing to fear from his father in the shape of interruption.

The course would never be clearer before him than on that night, and he resolved not to omit to avail himself of so favourable a conjunction of circumstances.

With a stealthy step he approached the door of the room in which he sat on guard, and opening it, looked out on to the landing and listened.

The silence of the very grave itself prevailed.

Reassured by the silence, Wild junior stepped quietly on to the landing, and approached the door of the room in which Edgworth Bess was confined.

He tapped at it gently with his knuckles, and waited for a response.

None came.

He tapped again, and this time with greater loudness than before.

This time he was heard, for a voice said:

"Who is there?"

"A friend," replied Wild junior, in a voice just loud enough to make itself heard through the door—"a friend," he repeated; "one who will aid you to escape."

He grinned much in the fashion that his father would have done as he spoke, and taking a key from his pocket, he fitted it into the lock and turned it.

He next withdrew the bolts, and then he entered.

Edgworth Bess was standing near the threshold.

"Hush!" said George, in a mysterious whisper—"hush! Do not speak a word until I have closed the door! If you do, we shall be overheard!"

Scarcely knowing what to do or how to act, Edgworth Bess obeyed.

But her limbs trembled, and her heart was filled with forebodings of coming evil.

George Wild closed the door, and advanced towards her.

But Edgworth Bess shrank back as she said, in tones of aversion:

"Hence! I know you not! You are no friend of mine, but a foe, for it is you who keep guard over this chamber!"

"Hush!" said Wild junior, again, who was not in the least taken aback by this reception. "Do not speak so loud, or you will ruin all! What you say is perfectly true, but I am disposed to stand your friend if you will allow me to do so! I know I guard this chamber; I was set to do it by Jonathan Wild, and I am answerable to him with my life for your safe custody. But, as I said before, I am willing to serve you and assist you to escape if you will allow me to do so!"

"Oh, sir, I know not whether to trust you! I have been so deceived by those who I thought could have been wholly trusted, that—that—"

"You have suspicious now of everyone who offers to be your friend!"

"Pardon me if I am unjust in your instance," replied Edgworth Bess; "but I must answer yes!"

"Oh, I pardon you freely enough; you are quite right to be suspicious of everybody, and more especially of me, your gaoler! But if you will listen to me, I will convince you that I am sincere!"

"Oh, sir, if you can do that I shall be glad indeed! I will listen to you with all earnestness! To be free, I would give anything; for to be in this dreadful house, in the power of Jonathan Wild, is worse than death itself!"

"Exactly; and now I can come to the point without any trouble. I think you said just now, that you would give anything to escape?"

"Yes—yes!" replied Edgworth Bess, hesitatingly.

"Then that is the proof of my sincerity; for, look you, I do not profess to set you free for the mere sake of doing so, or for your particular benefit; but for the sake of the reward which I shall obtain from you for so doing!"

"Reward?"

"Yes."

"But I have no money!"

"I know that, but I am willing to trust you—give you credit! I understand more of your affairs than you do yourself; if you have not money now, you will have it!"

"I ought to have it! It is my right!"

"And you shall have it; because, you see, it is to my interest to help you to it. I shall want a little security, that's all!"

"What security do I possess?"

"Are you willing to give the security I require?"

"What is it?"

"If I set you free, and enable you to obtain possession of what is lawfully yours, will you—when you are firmly established—will you reward me?"

"Certainly!"

"Will you swear that, when all is done that I have said, that you will give me the reward when I demand it?"

"What amount do you require?"

"That is an important point in the present stage of the affair. You do not know what I may have to do, nor what services I may be able to render you, so that it would be difficult to estimate the amount of the reward. I shall leave that to you! I merely want, just as a security, your solemn promise, or your oath that, when I have done what I profess, you will reward me!"

Edgworth Bess hesitated.

She did not like the idea of making such an unconditional promise.

Wild junior observed her hesitation.

"It is quite right for you to think over the matter; but the fact is, you see before you a man who is desirous of bettering his condition! I make no disguise about the matter; I am willing to assist you, simply because I believe that I shall advantage myself by so doing! Do you understand that?"

"Perfectly well!"

"Is it a bargain?"

"I can scarcely reply."

"Why not?"

"I should prefer to know what your expectations are! You must forgive me if I am suspicious. The reason is, I have been made the unsuspecting victim of so much villany."

"I don't mind your suspicions," said George Wild, with an affection of frank off-handedness,— "I don't mind your suspicions, and I think I can remove your doubts and fears about the reward!"

"Indeed! How so?"

"I will claim none."

"Claim none?"

"Even so."

"But I do not understand you!"

"Is it possible? I thought my meaning was clear enough! I will explain."

"Pray do so."

"I will do all that I have promised if you will undertake to reward me. I shall require your oath to that effect; but as to the reward itself, I shall leave the nature of it and the amount entirely in your hands. Do you understand now?"

"I think I do."

"I shall make no demand upon you. When all is done I will present myself before you and say, 'I have done all that I promised to do, and I ask for my reward.' I shall leave it to your own generosity; you shall give me as much or as little as you think proper. But you will admit that, when the service is performed, you will be better able to estimate the worth of it than you are now!"

"Certainly I shall!"

"Do you understand me now?"

"I think so."

"Nay, are you not sure?"

"Yes; I am sure I understand you."

"That is enough, then. I must leave you now. I have already stayed too long. During my absence you will be able to think over what I have said, and make up your mind whether you think it worth your while to agree to my terms. For my own part, I cannot help thinking that they are very fair and straightforward indeed."

"Well, then, leave me," said Edgworth Bess, "and I will give your proposal an attentive consideration. I have no one to advise with or consult but myself, and I do not wish to decide upon any course of action with too much precipitation."

"I like you all the better," said George, "for taking such a business-like view of the question as that. It makes me think that we shall eventually come to an understanding with each other. Good night, lady; I leave you until to-morrow night, when I will ask for your reply."

With these words, Wild junior left the room.

But by the time he gained his own apartment his countenance wore a totally different appearance.

"Ha, ha! The first step is taken!" he said. "I have succeeded beyond all hope or anticipation. Ha, ha! I shall win yet!"

CHAPTER CCLXXXIII.

JACK SHEPPARD SUCCEEDS IN MAKING HIS ESCAPE FROM NEWGATE.

SUCH was the scene that was taking place while Jack Sheppard looked over the parapet of Newgate on to Jonathan Wild's house.

But he had no idea of it.

Could he but have been an auditor and spectator of that interview, how quickly he would have put Edgworth Bess upon her guard.

He would not have been deceived by George Wild's speciousness.

He knew, from what Blueskin had told him, that the thief-taker's son was a thousand times more to be dreaded than the thief-taker himself.

He would have known in a moment that some deep villainy or other was in contemplation.

But, alas for her, Edgworth Bess did not possess this knowledge!

There seemed to be, indeed, every probability that she would fall an easy prey into the hands of George Wild.

That individual himself fancied so, and he felicitated himself accordingly, as he pictured the ultimate result of his plot.

Clever as Jonathan Wild undoubtedly was, yet it seemed as though he would be overmatched by his son.

Leaving them, however, for the present, we will return to Jack, upon the roof of Newgate.

Having made up his mind that it would never answer his purpose to descend on to the roof of Wild's house, he turned away, and crept still further along the parapet.

The direction in which he now went took him towards Newgate Market, and presently, as he looked down, he saw beneath him the roof of a house.

It was at no great distance down, and he could see that the garret window was swinging open.

This seemed to point at once to the route for freedom.

But the difficulty was to reach the roof, which was a slanting one.

The distance to it was not so great but that he could have dropped safely on to it, but then, owing to the steepness and slipperiness of the tiles, he would never have been able to retain his footing.

How, then, was he to proceed?

He had no rope, and nothing that would serve in lieu of one, by which he could gradually make the descent.

This was a puzzler, and Jack perplexed his brains in vain to find a solution of the difficulty.

He measured the distance again and again, and calculated the chances of being able to let himself down on to the roof and retain his footing; but each time he was reluctantly forced to admit that the chances of success were so slight as to make it too great a risk.

Time, too, was passing, and he dreaded each moment as he lingered to hear an alarm indicative that his absence from his cell had been discovered.

Then, to be taken after working so hard and accomplishing so much,—to be taken while standing, as it were, upon the very threshold of liberty—the thought was too terrible, and Jack felt that he would run any risk rather than this should happen.

Suddenly, a thought occurred to him, but it involved so much danger and risk of discovery that he was almost ready to discard it as soon as it had glanced across his mind.

But the thought came back again, and really it seemed to present the only means by which the roof below could be safely reached.

It seemed as though he would be compelled to adopt this resource.

What was it?

The reader will start at the boldness of the idea.

In his cell—the cell from which he had with so much difficulty made his way—there was an old blanket or coverlet, which he had used to keep off the cold to some extent while sleeping.

It was the only thing in the shape of bedding which the officials had allowed him.

This blanket, torn into strips and tied together, would form a rope by the aid of which he could descend in safety to the roof of the house below.

But Jack Sheppard, even with all his boldness, shrank somewhat from the idea of running into the lion's mouth, for such it would be to return to the cell for the purpose of fetching the blanket.

But this was the feat he had in contemplation—surely the most desperate of any that he had performed.

To wait and hesitate would, however, do no good, and at length, unable to think of any other means by which he could complete his escape, Jack turned back, resolved at all hazards to retrace his steps to his cell and fetch the blanket.

If he could only succeed in doing this without raising any alarm, all the rest would be easy.

He would be able to get clear off.

But it was something to be wondered at that he had done so much as he had already without attracting the attention of someone, or without his being missed from his place of confinement.

But having once made up his mind, Jack did not hesitate.

With a quick, bold step, he crossed the leads towards that part of the lower roof from which he had ascended.

Arriving here, he lowered himself down with much greater ease than he had got up.

A push opened the door, which he had closed after him, and he re-entered the passage.

The doors, however, between him and the chapel were no longer able to obstruct his progress.

He passed through them with undiminished speed.

Arriving at the chapel, he made his way cautiously across the stone-paved floor, and felt for the door over which he had climbed after breaking away the spike.

Not without some difficulty, owing to the profound darkness in this place, he found it.

Little did he think on the former occasion that he should so soon force his way again through the same aperture.

In another moment the corridor was gained.

Here he paused to listen.

But no sound broke upon the silence.

Clearly his escape had not been discovered as yet.

Jack stopped no longer than was necessary just to convince him that all was well, and then he directed his steps towards his cell, or rather to the Red-room over it.

At the door of this he presently arrived.

Entering this, he made his way towards the fireplace where he had made the hole in the floor.

Then, with as much care as he could, he lowered himself into the abyss.

Another moment saw him standing in his cell.

But what a different cell it now seemed to be.

He was conscious that he had the power to leave the moment he thought proper.

Again Jack listened, and again all was still.

Reassured by this, Jack possessed himself of the blanket which he had run such a fearful risk to obtain.

Rolling it up into the smallest possible compass he prepared to return.

Up the chimney he went into the Red-room.

From there to the Chapel.

Thence to the leads.

In his hurried course he had paused to listen once or twice, and each time he set forward with fresh confidence, for the silence remained unbroken.

Throwing the blanket up first, Jack then climbed up to the higher portion of the prison roof in the same manner as he had previously done.

Then snatching up this precious article he crossed the leads to the spot from which he had resolved to descend.

Arriving here, he took up the blanket and saw that it was sufficiently large to allow him to tear it up into three portions.

This he did by the aid of his teeth and hands.

His next proceeding was to tie these three pieces securely together.

Then lowering them down he was rejoiced to find that he had a rope sufficiently long to answer his purpose. But a fresh difficulty presented itself.

How was he to make fast one end of the blanket upon the wall while he lowered himself down by its aid.

It would require to be fastened very strongly so as to bear his weight.

Should it give way he would inevitably be dashed to pieces.

But as he looked around him, Jack could see no place to which he could secure it.

At this fresh and unexpected obstacle he lost all patience.

But he did not long give way to this feeling.

After accomplishing what he had it was not likely that he would allow himself to be conquered by this.

But he looked about, and felt about, in vain for some object to which the blanket could be attached.

There was nothing but the bare walls.

He had almost began to despair of making available the blanket which he had run so much danger to obtain, when he bethought himself of the spike which he had broken off the door leading into the Chapel.

This had already done him good service, and it might prove to be of still further use to him.

It was just possible that by the aid of the iron bar he might be able to drive the spike in between two of the stones with sufficient firmness to answer his purpose.

He resolved to try.

If this failed he was sure there was another resource.

Taking the spike from his pocket, and picking up the iron bar, he selected a spot which he imagined would best answer his purpose.

Then he commenced to knock the spike in.

The mortar was hard, and the iron entered it with difficulty.

When about half buried, Jack seized the spike and pulled with his utmost strength.

But it was immovable.

With a feeling of the greatest joy and satisfaction about his heart, he tied the blanket to the spike.

At length he had triumphed over every obstacle, insuperable as some had seemed, and he was about to bid farewell to the gloomy prison of Newgate.

Having tied the blanket to the spike, Jack lowered his rope until it hung at full length.

Even then the end was some distance from the roof, but he thought if he had hold of the extreme end of the rope his feet would almost touch the tiles.

At least he resolved to make the attempt.

Slowly and cautiously then he committed himself to the frail rope.

Should it break, or one of his hastily-tied knots give way, nothing would save him from an instantaneous and painful death.

Gently Jack allowed the blanket to slip through his fingers.

As he got lower and lower he swayed about from side to side by the wind, and was at times dashed so violently against the stone walls of the prison as to make him terribly apprehensive as to whether the blanket would bear such sudden and repeated strains.

He quickened his descent, which was the only thing it lay in his power to do.

At length his hands grasped the extreme end of the rope.

But now he swung about more than ever.

He looked down as well as he could.

The roof of the house was at no great distance below, still, as he hung down, the slanting portion was beneath him, and it would require great care to alight upon it and retain his footing.

He tried to cling closer to the wall, and then having got his body tolerably steady, he let go.

He fell only a few inches, but to him it seemed many feet.

His feet slipped from under him.

He gasped for breath, as he thought he was hastening to his death.

He clutched wildly at the slight projections in the tiles, but he did nothing more than break his nails and bruise his fingers.

Still, by his efforts, he succeeded in diminishing the rapidity of his descent until at length his feet touched gently the bottom of the parapet with which the roof of the house was protected.

Here he remained for a few moments, wholly unable to move.

He was utterly exhausted.

But the imminent danger of remaining where he was roused him quickly into action.

Raising his head he looked for the open garret window.

It was within a short distance of him.

Encouraged by its proximity he endeavoured to approach it.

Slowly, for his strength seemed to have almost wholly deserted him, he crept towards it.

His hand at length grasped the window sill.

He peeped in.

The interior of the garret was profoundly dark, and from this circumstance, and the fact of the window being open, Jack concluded that it was empty.

He drew himself up still further.

He remained for a moment before the window in such a manner that if anyone had been inside the room they must have seen him.

But all continued silent, and Jack now feeling tolerably convinced that he had the place all to himself came still nearer, until at length he stepped over the window sill and stood inside the garret.

When once here his first proceeding was to close the window and fasten it, in order to destroy as much as possible the traces of the route he took.

CHAPTER CCCLXXIV.

JACK SHEPPARD FINDS THAT THERE ARE STILL OBSTACLES TO OVERCOME BEFORE HE CAN REACH THE STREET.

JACK SHEPPARD had become so accustomed to darkness that notwithstanding the garret into which he had thus intruded received no more light than came through the little window from the night sky, yet he was able to see about him with tolerable ease.

At any rate he distinguished the door immediately, and lost no time in making his way towards it.

His intention was to steal down the stairs as quietly as he possibly could and get out at the front door.

The silence which prevailed seemed to indicate that the whole of the inhabitants of the dwelling had retired to rest, and the lateness of the hour strengthened this supposition.

It was so late that even in London few persons would be found out of bed.

This was very favourable to Jack, who did not doubt that he had skill enough to descend the stairs and pass out of the front door without awakening the inhabitants.

Without loss of time then he opened the door leading out of the garret, and having done this he stood still and listened.

He started.

From below there came the unmistakable sounds of merriment and jollification.

Jack grasped the door-post and leaned out over the stairs to assure himself that he had not been deceived.

His sense of hearing had not played him false.

Laughter and loud voices could be heard distinctly.

"Curse this!" Jack muttered, when there was no longer room for a doubt. "Curse this, it will spoil all! What am I to do? If I attempt to descend I shall surely be discovered by someone."

This was such an unlooked-for and unexpected event that, as we have seen, it seriously discomposed Jack when he first became cognisant of it.

"This will not do!" he added, after a brief pause. "I must not be balked by this. The danger is so much increased; and as for those who may attempt to stop me, let them beware!"

With these half-spoken words upon his lips, Jack commenced the descent of the stairs.

BLUESKIN INCAPACITATES JONATHAN WILD FROM GIVING EVIDENCE AGAINST HIM.

He soon found that he could not proceed so quietly as he wished and fancied he should be able to do so.

The footlocks which yet remained round his ankles prevented him from moving noiselessly.

Nevertheless he crept down the stairs with all the stealthfulness he could command.

Upon reaching the landing that was next beneath him he paused a moment.

At present he was certain he had given no alarm.

The stairs beneath seemed dark and silent.

After listening again he concluded that the sounds he heard came from the first floor, while he was standing on the third.

To descend to the second floor would not then be attended with so great an amount of danger.

It would be the descent of the next flight which would call for so much circumspection.

Slowly and quietly Jack made his way on to the landing on the second floor.

Then he looked over the balusters.

No. 77.—BLUESKIN.

A faint gleam of light shot up from below.

While standing where he did he could not see from whence it proceeded, but a slight change of position enabled him to do so.

He crept half-way down the flight leading to the first floor.

Here there was a bend in the stairs, and here he paused. He now commanded a view of the first-floor landing.

The gleam of light came through a partially closed door.

Jack was convinced in a moment that this door led into the room where the company was assembled.

Someone was singing a song in rather a boisterous tone of voice.

At the end of each verse there was the jingling of glasses as they were clinked against each other for chorus.

No one knows how that song grated upon Jack's ears.

While he stood deliberating whether to descend, the voices ceased.

The singing was succeeded by the murmur of conversation.

If Jack remained until a change took place he would probably have to wait till after daylight.

At all hazards he resolved to descend.

The only danger would be in passing the door.

That would not take him a moment.

It was now more than ever necessary that his progress should be noiseless.

Down the remaining stairs he crept without causing a sound.

He was within a few steps of the door when the fetters on his ankles clanked together.

"What noise is that?" he heard a voice ask in tones of terror.

It was a woman's voice.

"Don't be frightened!" said another voice.

This was a man's.

The accents were thick, evidently from the effects of drink.

Another cried:

"Oh, it's only the dog, or the cat, perhaps."

More than this Jack did not wait to hear.

Fearful of proceeding he retreated, and ascended the stairs with marvellous celerity and silence.

Perhaps it was as well he acted thus.

Those who occupied the room came to the door with candles in their hands and looked about them.

As there was nothing to be seen the noise was set down to the cause assigned for it.

As they were about to re-enter the room and sit down again someone came up from the lower part of the house.

It was the servant.

She was questioned, but could give no solution to the mysterious sound.

They then retired to the room again.

Jack congratulated himself upon his luck in happening to turn back, for had he descended the other stairs he would have encountered the servant, and his discovery would have taken place.

But what was to be done now?

The act of passing by the half-open door was ten times more dangerous than before, for now those within would be doubly on the look-out.

Jack pressed his hands to his head, uncertain how to act.

At this moment there came over him such a feeling of utter fatigue and exhaustion that it was with difficulty that he retained his feet.

Indeed, had he not suddenly clutched the balusters he would have fallen to the ground.

He was now beginning to feel the effects of his tremendous exertions.

"I must rest!" he gasped. "I must rest! It will be folly for me to go in the street while in this frightful state of weakness. I must rest a little while. I will creep back to the attic and lie down there a little while. I shall be safe, for my escape will not be discovered until the turnkeys go the first round in the morning."

This did not seem the most prudent of resolutions to take, but, nevertheless, Jack acted upon it.

There was no certainty whatever as to the time when his escape would be discovered, and his proximity to Newgate could not fail to be dangerous.

Yet, on the other hand, as he has truly said, it was perfect folly for him to think of getting into the street while in such a desperate state of fatigue as he then was.

He felt as though he could scarcely place one foot before the other to mount the stairs.

At length, however, to his satisfaction the door of the attic was reached.

He pushed it open and entered.

The chamber was unfurnished.

The articles it contained were some boxes and other lumber piled up in one corner.

But Jack did not care for this.

As soon as he had got inside he closed the door behind him and lay down at full length on the floor.

But he took care to do so in such a manner as to make it impossible for the door to be opened without awakening him.

Then, with a hardihood scarcely to be comprehended, he closed his eyes and went to sleep.

He knew that this would give him a fresh lease of strength.

But who, save Jack Sheppard, could have slept soundly as he did under such circumstances.

Had he been surrounded with every security, and had his limbs reposed upon the softest of feather beds, he could not have slept more quietly and dreamlessly than he did.

But his slumber was not of long duration.*

As soon as Nature had to some extent recuperated herself, his mind began to exercise itself.

In his sleep he went over all his past actions.

He dreamt all that had occurred to him up to the moment he laid himself down, and then he fancied a body of police-officers burst into the room and pounced upon him while he slept.

So vivid was this fancy that it awoke him.

He even started struggling to his feet.

But he soon discovered that the danger existed in his own imagination only, and he calmed himself.

His brain was for a moment or two rather confused, but he quickly gathered his senses about him.

How long he had slept he was unable to form any idea.

One thing, however, was quite certain, it was not yet daybreak, nor could he perceive the slightest signs of the coming dawn.

Once more he opened the door, listened, and crept down the stairs again.

In a few minutes he got in sight of the door which had proved so serious an obstacle to his escape.

He could still hear voices.

He crouched down upon the stairs and listened.

"Not a moment more, my good sir," he heard a man's voice say. "D—d—don't mind me! All jolly you know! Keep the pot boiling—(hiccup)—and all that sort of thing! But I must go. I promised—(hic)—promised—and—hic—"

"He's promised his wife," said another voice, the tones of which were decidedly uproarious. "He's promised his wife to go home. Ha, ha!"

"Ha, ha!" was laughed in chorus by the whole of the guests.

"No, no—gemmen! Upon my word," said the first speaker. "It's too—too bad—(hic)—to say—(hic)—such a thing as that. But I must go; I can't stay any longer."

"Oh, never mind your wife, old boy. Stop along with me. Don't desert your friends. We'll all go home with the milk in the morning!"

"Ha, ha! Bravo! Yes! So we will!" said a number of excited voices.

"Sorry to leave you—(hic)—gemmen; very sorry! But upon my word, I can't stop—I can't, indeed!"

"Well, good night, old fellow! Never mind your missus! Wait a minute, and I'll ring the bell for the servant to come with the candle. You won't be able to find your way down in the dark."

The tinkling of a bell in the lower regions of the house now struck upon Jack's ears.

"I will make a bold rush for it," he muttered. "It is certain destruction if I remain here."

He could now hear the servant ascending, and presently after he caught sight of her.

She was carrying a candle.

"Show this gentleman downstairs to the door, Sarah. Light him carefully, for the stairs are awkward, you know!"

"Good night, gemmen!" said the individual, who for some reason or other was so desirous to be gone, and whose mode of speech showed that he was far gone in intoxication. "Good night, gemmen! Sorry to leave you! Enjoy yourselves! Good night!"

"Good night to you, old fellow!" responded several, speaking all at once—"Good night to you!"

The servant, with the candle in her hand, now came out on to the landing.

She was closely followed by the departing guest, who pulled the door close shut after him.

Jack was rejoiced.

He had resolved to follow this pair downstairs and then watch his opportunity to slip out.

The inebriated gentleman said something to the girl, but Jack did not heed what.

They began to go down.

* Jack Sheppard actually did return to the garret and sleep exactly in the manner here described—that is, if his own confession is to be believed.

Jack descended to the first-floor landing. Then he crossed it and passed the door. He commenced the descent of the stairs communicating with the ground floor.

The gleam of the candle which the servant carried flickered fitfully upon the walls.

He could hear the murmur of their voices as they preceded him.

From their manner it was easy to conclude that they had no idea anyone was following them.

Jack was careful not to get too close, for fear he should be overheard.

He had everything to fear from an immediate alarm.

Cautiously he crept down, taking pains not to decrease the distance between them.

Suddenly a door closed, and the light vanished instantly from Jack's view.

It was the door at the bottom of the stairs.

In one more moment he reached it.

He pushed it open and cast a hasty glance along the passage.

A gush of cold air came upon his face, and he saw the servant standing on the door-step.

Jack approached her with rapid yet stealthy strides.

When he reached the door she turned round.

They confronted each other.

The girl opened her mouth to scream.

But Jack did not lose his presence of mind for a single instant.

With the rapidity of thought he seized the candle and thrust it, lighted as it was, into the girl's mouth.

The servant's scream and the flame of the candle were extinguished at the same moment.

Jack did not wait for more, but darted out into the street with the velocity of an arrow.

CHAPTER CCCLXXV.

JACK SHEPPARD FLIES FOR SAFETY TO THE COUNTRY, AND SEeks SHELTER IN A RUINED HUT.

ONCE more, contrary to the expectations of everyone, Jack Sheppard stood a free man in the streets of London.

Slackening his speed only a very little, he made his way past St. Sepulchre's Watch-house.

With his heart full of elation, he called out "Good morrow!" to the watchman and continued on his way.

Down Snow Hill and up Holborn he went, leaving St. Andrew's Watch on the left.

He passed the Watch-house at Holborn Bars, and turned down Gray's Inn Lane.

This portion of London was then very different to what it is to-day.

Gray's Inn was then a comparatively new and modern-looking edifice.

But beyond this, going towards King's Cross, there was scarcely a house to be seen.

Green fields and trees were about him on every side.

Summoning what strength he had, Jack hastened on.

He knew that when his escape was discovered the closest search would be made after him.

His best plan then would be to get as far away from London as he could in the shortest possible space of time.

He fancied that if he took his course straight off into the country his enemies would be baffled in their search for him.

About his ultimate proceedings he had thought nothing.

He knew from former experience the fatality of laying his plans far in advance.

So many events might occur of which he could form no previous conception, every one of which would have the effect of totally deranging whatever plans he might have formed.

Jack then was content to keep before him the one idea of getting out of the way of whatever pursuit might be commenced after him.

He argued reasonably enough that he had left no track behind him.

He was certain there was nothing which would indicate that he had gone into this part of the country.

He had gone north, but his foes would not be able to tell whether he had gone south, east, or west.

Inspired by this feeling, he kept on at a run for a long way.

He would no doubt have plenty of time to think about his future proceedings when he had found some temporary asylum.

His feet were still encumbered with the fetters, and they galled and fretted the skin about his ankles terribly.

Gradually his pace slackened, until at length his run became a walk.

Still it was a brisk walk, and one that got over the ground with great rapidity.

He could see no signs of it as yet, but still he felt certain that the dawn was close at hand.

The whole face of the heavens had, however, become covered with one huge cloud of a dull greyish tint, which concealed the first rays of daylight.

Jack did not keep along the main road, but turned slightly to the left, across the fields.

For the most part, he took his way along the footpaths that ran behind the hedges with which the meadows were defended.

In this manner he was able to keep his body concealed from the view of any persons who might be travelling the high road.

He wished, if possible, to reach some quiet country place without being seen by a single soul.

In this endeavour he had so far succeeded.

At times, however, a deadly and terrible sensation of faintness would come over him.

It was the result of his superhuman exertions.

Nothing save the conviction, ever before his mind, that upon his speed depended the ultimate success of his escape would have enabled him to proceed.

To add to his discomfort, rain now began to fall.

At first, the drops came slowly; but they soon increased, until the rain came down like a perfect sheet of water.

Jack was wet through in a moment.

He still toiled on.

If anything, the coolness of the air was pleasing to him.

Perspiration streamed from his body at every pore, and the rain rose from his garments converted into vapour.

He had now travelled a long way.

Quite far enough to answer his purposes he thought, and therefore he began to look about him for some place of shelter.

He had a tolerably good idea whereabouts he was.

He had made up his mind he was in the fields somewhere near Tottenham Court, and this was indeed the fact.

But, though he looked all around him, Jack was unable to perceive habitation of any sort, or even the signs of one.

To be sure he could not see far in consequence of the thickness of the atmosphere and the descending rain.

He was though in a place where dwellings were far apart.

It was not Jack's wish to enter any inhabited place for fear he should be suspected.

And that suspicion would be aroused seemed certain, for how could he conceal the fetters which still clung round his legs?

They were partially hidden it is true, but they would nevertheless have been discovered.

He wanted some place that was just possible to afford him shelter.

Some place where he could remain out of sight during the day, and from which he could emerge unsuspected at night.

The difficulty was where to find such a place.

Jack trudged on steadily.

The rain came down without abatement.

In respect to the effect it would have in keeping people out of the fields, it was perhaps a favourable circumstance to Jack.

A dim, misty-grey light stole over the face of Nature, showing that day had fairly begun, but not a human being could Jack Sheppard see.

Nor could he find a place such as he wished for.

So tired was he, that at times he almost felt inclined to lie down under the hedge and rest there.

But the risk of being seen made him resolve not to adopt the expedient until he was actually forced to it.

Presently, to his joy he saw a few fields off a building which promised to answer his purpose.

Inspired with this hope he forsook the path he had been following, and directed his steps towards it.

Upon a nearer approach he found it was a kind of labourer's cottage, such as are seen dotted about a farm.

But it was in a state of the utmost dilapidation, and on that wet morning looked inexpressibly dreary and wretched.

Jack hastened towards it with a lightened heart.

He was sure no one was within the building, for the door was swinging open.

In appearance it more resembled a huge shed than aught else.

Upon reaching the door Jack leaned forward and peeped in.

The interior had even a more shed-like view than the exterior, for on the floor there was a small quantity of damp, decaying straw, which indicated that cattle of some kind or other had been placed there.

Jack gave a sigh of relief.

The silence that reigned all round convinced him that he had the place all to himself.

"At last," he murmured, "at last I have found a place of shelter!"

Before he entered, however, he took the precaution to look all around him over the fields as far as he could see, in order to ascertain whether there was anyone watching his movements.

But apparently not a single human being was in sight; and, feeling tolerably secure from interruption, Jack entered the hut.

He hesitated for a moment or two whether he should leave the door open, as he found it, or close it.

The first he fancied was most prudent, but then the cold and the rain blew in so terribly that he felt he could not remain without the door was closed.

Not without some trouble, he pulled it to; and, in order to retain it in this position, he was obliged to place a stone against it.

The hut was then rendered a great deal more comfortable.

He next gathered up what straw there was lying about the floor and placed it in one corner.

Upon this rude bed he lay down with a feeling of the deepest thankfulness about his heart.

It would be impossible to describe the feeling of fatigue which he experienced.

Every bone and muscle in his body ached, while his legs were terribly swollen and bruised by the fetters.

Much as they galled him, Jack made no attempt to take them off.

He was too tired to do anything save lie down.

When he had rested himself he promised he would try what could be done.

It was nothing but natural that having once laid down Nature should seek to restore herself by sleep.

No sooner did Jack's eyes close than he fell off into a profound and dreamless slumber, in which he forgot not only his past sufferings and present fatigue, but his future trials.

This sleep continued for many hours without intermission.

When he finally awoke it was broad daylight.

He sprang to his feet and looked about him.

He could see nothing to cause apprehension.

He went to the door of the hut, and, opening it, peeped out.

The rain still continued to fall steadily.

Not a single being was in sight, and so heavily and incessantly had the rain come down that it lay upon the ground in large pools of water.

Jack turned away from this cheerless prospect with a shudder.

Still he had much to be thankful for.

Owing to the sky continuing to be obscured with clouds he was unable to see the sun.

Could he but have ascertained its position in the sky he would have been able to form some idea as to how far the day was advanced.

As it was he could not tell whether it was morning or afternoon.

One thing, however, was quite certain.

By this time his escape had been most certainly discovered, and a pursuit commenced.

But he had been left undisturbed, and from this he argued that his foes had failed to get upon his track.

Here then was ample room for hope and congratulation.

Jack shut the door again, and then rested himself upon his straw couch.

His feet and ankles pained him excessively, and he proceeded to examine them.

The bazils, or iron rings, around his ankles were of thick iron, and had been fastened on with a rivet.

The only means by which they could be removed were by filing through them, or else by means of a hammer and a small punch to drive the rivets out with.

The first would be a work of time, but Jack was not able to perform it.

No tongue could tell how bitterly he regretted the breakage of the two files.

He had thrown the fragments aside as being useless, but now he wished he had one of them.

That was a vain wish.

He fancied that if the piece had been ever so small he should have been able to achieve his purpose.

But what was to be done?

It was quite certain the fetters would have to be removed, but how was he to get rid of them?

The second means of taking them off was quite out of the question, for he had neither hammer nor punch, nor could he see the slightest prospect of being able to obtain possession of either of these two articles.

To leave his present place of concealment while they hung dangling at his heels would be to ensure discovery.

What was to be done?

He resolved to think.

First of all he produced all the money he had remaining in his pocket, and counted it up.

He found he possessed between forty and fifty shillings.

This was all the money he had in the world.

This was not over consoling, and he returned the coins to his pocket again.

The pangs of hunger and thirst began, too, to make themselves felt, and he was without the means of assuaging either.

Nor would be able to do so until he had got rid of the fetters.

He racked his brain in vain to think of some means by which he could get out of them.

It was to no purpose, however.

He was obliged to give up in despair.

In this miserable manner he passed the time until he was warned by the increase of darkness of the approach of night.

He went to the door again and looked out.

The rain had ceased, but the atmosphere was thick and heavy.

Night was coming on with rapid strides.

As before, no one was in sight.

Jack stood for some time leaning with his back against the door-post looking out, watching night close in.

As he did so he felt the craving for food increase to an intolerable degree.

"I must have food," he said. "I must have it at all risks. If I remain here I shall neither obtain that nor get rid of my fetters, and yet both must be done. Let me think—let me think! Yes, that will do!"

Jack had thought of a plan, and he now went back into the hut to carry it into execution.

This was to try whether he could not conceal his irons in a more effectual manner than he had done when he tied them up so hastily in the dungeon.

At any rate his sole chance was to conceal them so as not to attract attention.

This task occupied him some time, but at length feeling somewhat satisfied as to the result, he rose to his feet.

Favoured by the darkness of the night he hoped to be able to escape detection.

At any rate he resolved to make the attempt.

He approached the door of the hut—looked forth for a moment, and then, fancying the coast was clear glided off into the darkness.

CHAPTER CCCLXXVI.

BLUESKIN STABS JONATHAN WILD IN THE ANTECHAMBER, AND SO INCAPACITATES HIM FROM GIVING HIS EVIDENCE.

THE proceedings of Jack Sheppard have of late been of so important and highly interesting a character that we have been unable to break the thread of the narrative until the present moment.

Now, however, as he is menaced by no immediate danger, we will leave him and return to the doings of other characters in our narrative.

To do so, we shall be obliged to go back many hours. Blueskin has received no share of attention lately, although in so perilous a predicament; and we have also to account for that which puzzled Jack so much, namely, the non-appearance at the accustomed hours of his old enemy Jonathan Wild.

The reader may be sure something of an unusual character must have taken place, or Jack would have seen something of his pursuers.

Let us, however, describe events as far as possible in the order in which they took place.

To begin then with Jonathan Wild.

After having procured Blueskin's commitment to Newgate he became very busy indeed.

The reader may be sure that the capture of Blueskin happening so unexpectedly as it did, interfered materially with the precise course of action which he had chalked out.

He wished the trial and execution of Blueskin to take place as speedily as possible, and this necessitated a great deal of extra trouble upon his part.

The frequent visits to Jack Sheppard which he had so firmly made up his mind to pay became absolutely impossible, and this is the reason Jack saw so little of him during the latter part of his imprisonment, though it is not the reason why, in the end, he failed to pay any visits at all.

It was first of all necessary to have a case against Blueskin, and one, too, that would not fail.

Now this was not the easiest matter in the world.

To find out prosecutors, and get together witnesses, in order to complete a case is a matter of time, and Jonathan soon discovered that he must either allow Blueskin's trial to stand over until next sessions, or else by the adoption of some clever expedient get him disposed of at once.

As the former would disarrange, in a great measure, the scheme which he had formed, Jonathan resolved upon the latter.

Having pondered over this for some little time, the thief-taker fancied he could not do better than put into practice a little scheme which hitherto had never failed to accomplish the end desired.

It was to get up, or, rather, fabricate some fictitious charge against the prisoner of so simple and clear a character, as to make conviction certain.

To do this, it would be necessary to employ a certain lawyer, who always managed these sort of cases in a manner highly satisfactory to Jonathan Wild.

Having given him the particulars, Jonathan next proceeded to get the services of two persons: one to swear to having had certain articles taken from him by the prisoner, and the other to corroborate what he said.

This Jonathan managed, and drilled all the particulars into them.

As the facts of the case were exceedingly simple, he did not very much dread failure.

He knew well enough the impolicy of having an intricate case, in which the witnesses would get confused.

Then Jonathan reserved a little share in the business for himself.

Such was the plot he had manufactured against our old friend Blueskin; and when we say that he had made it complete in every respect, the reader will be able to understand that the exertions he had made to bring about such a state of things were decidedly of a superhuman character.

It took up the whole of his time, that is certain.

On Thursday Jonathan had everything ready.

He had seen Mr. Noakes, and obtained from that amiable functionary a most solemn promise that while he was unavoidably occupied with Blueskin's case he would be unremitting in his attentions to Jack Sheppard.

With the promise thus obtained the thief-taker was forced to rest content.

As to how faithfully Mr. Noakes had performed it let the reader judge by what we have related.

All this time Blueskin had remained in his cell a prey to the deepest possible dejection.

How it had come upon him he scarcely knew.

Most likely it was the conviction which, strive as he would, he could not keep from pressing on his mind, that it was useless to struggle—that Jonathan would indubitably triumph.

What was more hopeless than the prospect before him.

He was a prisoner, heavily ironed, and guarded with treble care.

Jack Sheppard was in the same predicament, and beyond all doubt Edgworth Bess was a prisoner in Wild's house.

There was no direction, look where he would, in which he could secure a ray of comfort or consolation.

And so, as we have said, a feeling of deep dejection took hold of him, and he strove in vain against its influence.

He knew not the precise nature of the charge that was to be preferred against him.

All that he had been able to learn was that it was a charge of highway robbery.

All particulars were denied him.

At length Friday morning came.

The turnkeys found him in just the same position.

It had been arranged that Blueskin's trial should take place the first thing, and so immediately after breakfast the blacksmith entered the cell to knock off his fetters.

The prisoners were never taken to the dock in irons.

Blueskin stood still and quiet enough while the blacksmith performed his duty.

But he felt rather better when he was freed from these unpleasant incumbrances.

In case the reader may fall into any error, we here venture to remind him that the events which we are now recording took place on the morning preceding the night upon which Jack Sheppard effected his escape.

Mr. Noakes, the Governor, made his appearance in Blueskin's cell just as the blacksmith was knocking out the last rivet.

"Hold him fast!" he said, addressing himself to the turnkeys. "He's a desperate character, but, thank goodness, the case against him is so clear and straightforward that he is sure not to escape his just fate. Tyburn Tree groans for him, that it does!"

In obedience to the command of their superior, the turnkeys tightened their grasp upon Blueskin's collar.

He, however, made no resistance, and altogether disdained to take the slightest notice of the Governor's remarks.

This exasperated Mr. Noakes, who would have been better pleased if he could have succeeded in aggravating him.

"Bring him along!—bring him along!" he said presently to the turnkeys. "It will soon be all over with him. Come along!"

"The Court's hardly seated, sir."

"Never mind; we'll take him to the outer chamber, and have him there in readiness. Look after him!"

The Governor stood aside, and the turnkeys led Blueskin passively and unresisting out of his cell.

Mr. Noakes followed, with a pompous step.

It was perfectly true that the Judge had not yet taken his seat upon the bench, but, nevertheless, Mr. Noakes thought he would have Blueskin at hand in good time.

With his head bowed down, our old friend suffered himself to be led towards his destination.

He heeded not the stone passage through which they passed; he took not the slightest notice of their route.

When they paused, then, he raised his head and looked about him.

He found he was standing in a small stone chamber, to all appearance quite as strong as the cell from which he had just been brought.

As the turnkeys, too, numbered seven or eight, he was tolerably secure.

The door through which they had passed to enter this place they closed after them, and securely fastened.

On the other side there was another door, very massive, and of great strength.

Beyond there was a flight of steps, which led up into the dock.

There was a stone bench along one side of this chamber, and on this Blueskin was permitted to sit down.

A turnkey placed himself on either side of him.

Blueskin, having taken a glance round, subsided into his former attitude, and the turnkeys, observing this, relaxed their vigilance somewhat.

Some minutes would elapse before business commenced, and so they chatted idly to each other.

The turnkey who sat on Blueskin's right hand took out a clasp-knife—truly a formidable weapon—and some bread and cheese, which he set about eating with great relish.

He was thus engaged when Jonathan Wild entered the chamber.

His countenance was contracted into a derisive smile, and folding his arms, he stood for a moment or two looking at the prisoner, exulting over his downcast appearance.

But Blueskin remained unmoved.

To speak the truth, Wild was not a little surprised at the prisoner's dejection.

He could scarcely account for it.

"What Blue, old boy," he cried, in a mocking tone of voice—"are you so down in the mouth? I thought you would die game, but you don't look much like it now!"

Blueskin took no more notice of Wild's words than if he had never spoken them.

Jonathan came nearer.

"Ha, ha, my friend! do you recollect the pleasant little bit of conversation we had not very long ago? If you do, perhaps you will remember a certain offer that I made to you. I told you what the consequences would be, didn't I?"

Wild touched him on the shoulder as he spoke.

Blueskin looked up savagely.

"You had best keep your hands off!" he said.

"What! Have you found your tongue at last? Ha, ha! well done! Don't you wish you had said yes, when you would have the chance? I know you do! But it's too late now, Blue—it's too late! The whole affair is cut and dried, and has gone so far as to be beyond my control—even mine! I could not call you back, or keep your head out of the halter, if I was even so minded. But you shall swing! I'm going to be a witness against you, Blue—a principal witness, for I shall swear to your identity. They won't shake my evidence by cross-examination, I know—I am too old a hand at that sort of thing!"

Ere this, the reader must have noticed that Jonathan Wild took an insane delight in thus tormenting and teasing any of his prisoners.

It delighted him to work them up to an ungovernable pitch of fury, and then watch their impotent rage.

He could tell by the flashing glances that came from Blueskin's eyes that he was getting enraged, and he hastened to increase the effect he had already produced.

"I shall get up into the witness-box," said Wild. "Ha, ha!—what fun! When I am asked whether I know you, I shall say, 'My lord, I know this man very well. He was formerly a police-officer, and now——'"

"You lie!" exclaimed Blueskin, in a voice of thunder—"you lie! You will not say a word this day if I can prevent you."

While he spoke these words, Blueskin, to the surprise and consternation of all present, started to his feet before anyone had the least idea of what he was about to do.

His eye was on the open clasp knife which the turnkey who sat next to him held in his hand, and, pouncing upon it like a hawk upon its prey, he wrested it from the man's grasp with lightning-like rapidity.

Then bounding forward, he seized Jonathan by the throat, and bore him backwards to the ground.

Then he inflicted a terrible wound in the thief-taker's neck, from which the blood spurted out in incredible quantities.

So suddenly was all this performed, that a clock could not have ticked thrice while Blueskin sprang to his feet, seized the knife, and stabbed his foe with it.

He would have repeated his blow—indeed, the weapon was in the very act of descending when his arm was arrested by the turnkeys, who by this time had recovered from the state of utter amazement and confusion into which they had been thrown.

By their united strength they succeeded in dragging

Blueskin away from Jonathan Wild, who fell heavily at full length upon the floor.

The knife was wrested from Blueskin's grasp, and his arms held tightly by four turnkeys, while the remainder, together with the Governor, stooped over the prostrate form of the thief-taker, and endeavoured to ascertain the extent of the hurts he had received.

CHAPTER CCLXXVII.

IT SEEMS AFTER ALL AS THOUGH JONATHAN WILD IS DESTINED TO DIE BY THE HANGMAN'S ROPE.

THERE was no trouble to hold Blueskin.

Having, as he thought, accomplished his purpose, he relapsed into his former apathetic state, except that he watched with the keenest interest all that took place with respect to Jonathan Wild.

It was mere impulse which had prompted Blueskin to commit this deed.

He had no thought of it the moment before, but stung to the quick by the taunts to which the thief-taker had given utterance, he felt a desire to be revenged.
